

Title: Wind That Shakes the Seas and Stars

Summary: AU of OoTP, Slytherin!Harry, HPDM slash. Snape begins the year with a mistake that sets his ward against him. Now Harry is using all his own considerable cunning to ride out the multiple storms, even as the Second War goes into motion.

Notes: This is the fifth story in what I call the Sacrifices Arc, following Freedom and Not Peace. It's therefore not going to make much sense if you haven't read the first four. By this time, the differences from canon are pronounced, and while there are nods to OoTP here and there in this story, its plot is not much like OoTP's.

This story, as planned, is a long bastard, at 95 numbered chapters, plus some Interludes and Intermissions. (If you want to see the outline, you can visit my LiveJournal; the link is in my profile).

Disclaimer: The recognizable characters, events, concepts, and settings in the following story belong to J. K. Rowling, not to me. I am making no money from this fanfic.

Updates: I archive on Fanfiction, Skyehawke, and my LJ, and send notice of updates through my Yahoo!Group. The addresses of all of them, and information about the Arc itself, can be found in my Fanfiction profile. Complete Word and .PDF files for download are on a site created by Therio, the link to which is also in my profile.

Warnings: Violence, language, torture (both physical and mental), child abuse (in memories), heavy angst, twisted psychology, slash and het and saffic (femmeslash) in varying degrees of explicitness, multiple character deaths (both canon and OC's, both good and bad guys, both minor and major characters).

Well, then.

Let's start this off with a bang, shall we?

Wind That Shakes The Seas and Stars
Chapter One: Breeding Basilisks

Harry dreamed.

He was once again in the cavernous house he had seen in his visions earlier that year. He could feel his whiskers twitching, and knew he was once more in the lynx form he'd adopted in the other visions.

So cling to any familiarity you can find, he thought, as he lifted his head and felt his scar burst into pain. Fight your way through the agony, fight your way through the knowledge that Voldemort is back. You have to survive, so you might as well fight.

He took a step forward, and nearly tipped over. He had forgotten that his left forepaw was missing, victim of Bellatrix's cut just as his left hand had been. Harry forced himself to work through the feelings that wanted him to lash his tail and squall. He could not afford to be enraged right now—or ever, in truth. He thought of unicorns, and light, and crept forward until he could see around the divan that stood in front of him.

The first thing he saw was the fire burning in the center of the floor, pulsing like a heartbeat and sending flares and ripples of light and shadow through the room. It was more red than orange, and more gold than either, and it spread out in a strange pool beneath a squat yellow shape that it took Harry some moments to identify. When he did, he felt his mouth pull up in a snarl.

An egg.

He heard Voldemort's laughter, and backed hastily behind the divan again just as the Dark Lord strode into sight, his robes fluttering around him and his lipless mouth stretched in a smile. He was not sure if Voldemort could see him in visions like this, but he simply couldn't take the chance. Once again, he calmed his breathing, and called up the training that Lily had given him when she told him he might become a spy in the wars. See everything. Remember everything. You never know what might be useful.

Harry had to know if that egg was really what he suspected it was, and so he stayed still as Voldemort turned to speak to something or someone he couldn't see. "Come here. Come here and fulfill your duty.” The Dark Lord broke into laughter again halfway through the words, as if he found them funny. Harry didn’t see why until the person he was talking about moved into sight.

It wasn’t actually a person, or even people, but a group of snakes, gleaming black and green and red. They wrapped themselves around the egg and began to massage it. Harry saw the fire gleam in their scales dully for a few moments.

Then they burned.

Harry shuddered as he heard hissing cries of pain, odd words that were probably as close as snakes could come to obscenities, and the sharp crackle of scales and flesh crisping in the flames. Nevertheless, even as some of the serpents fell dying to the floor, others took their place, and the ones who were lucky enough to be high up on the egg, away from the fire, went on massaging, hissing, writhing, as if they could rub their own bodies into the shell.

Voldemort went on watching, his mouth twisted in a half-smile. When he spoke again, it was in a language Harry didn’t know, but the words seemed to sear themselves into his brain. They were ugly sounds, with a hook on the end of them. Harry thought of speaking them himself, and felt the fur stand up on his spine.

Four words—and Harry hated being able to tell that, hated the fact that he thought he could recall this language if he had to—and the snakes abruptly lay still. The fire flared and leaped, wrapping the egg in molten gold and obscuring the sight of the serpents. Voldemort laughed again, a fevered sound of high-pitched excitement, and Harry’s scar deepened into agony that made his vision blacken.

He could feel the magic dancing madly through the room. It coiled back on itself like a serpent, and then sank cold, poisoned fangs of power into the egg. That killed Harry’s hope, if he’d had any, that the Dark Lord was anything less than fully recovered from the memory loss and mental damage that Harry had managed to inflict on him.

The flame and the magic combined with each other, whirled around in an embrace, and dissipated. What remained was the egg, a gleaming red-gold shape that Harry could not find beautiful, despite its resemblance in color to Fawkes. It looked more like swirls of blood floating in urine.

Voldemort spoke one more hook-like word, and yanked his hand backward. The eggshell splintered at once, as if pulled from outside rather than smashed from within, and a lithe, wriggling black shape poured through the rent and into the world.

Harry half-closed his eyes as he watched the young basilisk dance, its deep green scales still wet from the egg fluid. He wasn't sure how deadly the snakes could be when newborn, or even if its gaze would work on him in a vision, but he wasn't about to take the chance. There would be less taking of chances, less sacrifices, from now on, he promised himself. He had to live to fight this war.

Voldemort walked around the basilisk and spoke to it in what Harry knew must be Parseltongue; the snake stilled at once upon hearing his voice. "So beautiful, my young one. You will listen to me. You will keep your false eyelids upon your eyes when you are near anyone belonging to me, whom you may know by this Mark." He spun one hand, and the Dark Mark, flaring green, took form in the air above him. "You will not bite anyone bearing this Mark, either. All others are your rightful prey when you are grown and unleashed upon my enemies."

The basilisk raised its head—or her head, Harry saw, since she was missing the scarlet plumes that would have identified her as a king basilisk. "I am hungry. Obedient, but hungry. Bring me one whom I may eat, my master."

Voldemort let out a lazy laugh, and looked over his shoulder. Two masked Death Eaters came from the shadows, and they held a struggling creature between them that turned Harry's heart to a stone.

It should have been impossible for them to capture a unicorn foal. How in the world did they do it?

The foal was purely golden, marking it as less than two years old. Its eyes were large and a shifting deep color, somewhere between purple and deep blue. It thrashed and kept on thrashing, the movements of a purely wild and free being made to endure no captivity.

Harry moved a step forward. It didn't matter if he would be seen, if he was in danger from the vision itself or the basilisk or Voldemort. He had hidden once while he watched the Dark Lord slaughter a unicorn. He would not hide so again.

He sprang from behind the divan, his claws on his right front paw unsheathed, letting the pressure from his hind legs drive him—

And passed through the basilisk as if through a ghost. Harry landed on the floor beyond, and it felt solid. Perhaps he had missed his strike. He turned, planting his hind feet and spinning to hook his front paw into one of the advancing Death Eaters' robes.

They passed across his fur like smoke.

Frantic now, Harry tried to reach out to the unicorns, the free ones who must be singing in horror at what was happening to one of their own. Do you see this happening? Why aren't you here? Free him! Come on! Where the fuck are you?

No response came, and the basilisk was edging forward, her long fangs bared and her head slowly turning so that Harry, standing in front of the unicorn, would be within her deadly yellow gaze in a moment.

Harry reached out with all his willpower, pouring magic and strength through himself, trying to open a conduit through his body to the vision and provide a shining wall of defense and protection for the foal. He was good at defensive magic. He'd certainly trained long enough for it. He had to be able to save the foal now. He'd seen one child lost to Voldemort's people already, and that was enough.

Nothing happened. The Death Eaters dropped the unicorn hastily to the ground, and the basilisk struck, coiling her body around the foal and sinking her fangs home. The foal trembled and let out a thin scream. His legs thrashed once, and then he was still, blue-silver blood leaking from the holes in his neck as the basilisk turned him around and began to swallow him headfirst.

Voldemort was laughing.

Harry crouched where he was, able to see everything but unable to be seen or interact with it, disbelieving, shaky, horrified.

What changed? Why should I have been able to hurt and kill Nagini before, but I can't stop Voldemort's other snakes now?

The only possible answer Harry could come up with was that Voldemort's resurrection had somehow altered the link between them. It would protect him, but at the same time, it would damn anyone in the position of innocent sacrifice.

Harry hated—well. He was not sure what he hated most at the moment, Voldemort or the situation or himself. He crouched where he was, and hissed hisses that no one paid attention to, and hated. He watched the basilisk eat the unicorn, drinking the blood that would taint her, if she were not already so, and bind her even more firmly to Voldemort.

He imagined the unicorns who had carried him into the sea yesterday morning, searching in vain for the golden foal the Death Eaters had taken, and wished he could vomit.

Voldemort caressed the basilisk's head and murmured to her, in words that Harry could have understood but did not care to. He flattened his ears and his whiskers and stared at the floor. Is this going to happen in every vision from now on?

Then he shook his head. He should not be concentrating on this now. He had had to deal with grief and hatred and self-loathing enough in the past few days that he should be used to them. The important thing was what he could get out of the visions, since he could not stop having them, and he might as well use his invulnerability to his advantage. He glanced at the Death Eaters, but they retained their masks, and they gave no betraying gestures that might mark them as those whom Harry knew well.

Voldemort turned to them and spoke in high, cold English. "Call upon our contacts in the Ministry. And call upon Fenrir Greyback. He smelled his way to Tullianum prison once before. He can do so again."

One of the Death Eaters bowed low before he spoke. Harry twitched a tufted ear, but could hear nothing familiar in his voice, still. "My lord, are we to free all of the Death Eater prisoners we can find? If we are pressed for time, who should be our priority?"

"All of them, of course," said Voldemort peevishly. Harry glanced up at his white face, and found it twisted into a why do I surround myself with these idiots? expression.

Because only idiots will agree to have a skull and snake branded into their flesh and conduct senseless raids on the Muggle and wizarding worlds? Harry thought. Well, idiots and people who are acting as sacrifices for their friends and people who've repented and decided that, yes, they were in fact idiots. He found it comforting to think about Peter and his allies at a time like this, and Snape—

No, not Snape. He wasn't allowed to think of him, or he would weaken. Carefully, Harry willed thoughts like that out of his head, and tried to listen for something he thought might make the unicorn's death worth it.

"But if you must choose," Voldemort continued, "free Walden Macnair first."

The Death Eaters bowed to him and Apparated away. Harry felt his dream dissolving, and doubted he would see anything more interesting anyway, as Voldemort was simply stroking the queen basilisk and murmuring soothing words to his pet.

I have seen quite enough, he thought, as he turned and vanished among the dissolving shreds of dream, back into reality.

Harry opened his eyes slowly. His body felt, oddly, as though he really had been taking springs and leaps with it, but he supposed the intense physical nature of the dream, or his own exhaustion, might have something to do with that. He blinked away the blood he had expected to be pouring from his scar, and found Draco leaning over him, eyes so intense they hurt.

“Are you all right?” Draco asked, very softly.

Harry nodded once, and then winced as that set his scar off like a brand again. He sat up carefully. “Do you have a parchment and quill?” he asked, flexing his right hand. Then he flexed the glamour of the left, trying to mimic the natural bends and motions of his actual appendage. It was harder than he thought it would be, especially since he had to do it in a mirrored way and not simply replicate the movements.

Draco lifted a quill and a scroll silently from beside his chair. Harry, holding his head so that blood didn’t drip on the parchment and pinning the side of the paper with his left wrist, wrote as simple and short a note to Scrimgeour as he could, warning him to guard Walden Macnair with extra precautions and watch for Death Eaters trying to find their way into the new, hidden Ministry prison.

By the time he looked up from the paper, Fawkes was already sitting on the back of Draco’s chair, crooning softly. Harry blinked at him. “But wouldn’t you burn the paper to ashes?” he asked.

The phoenix gave a sharp chirp, and in Harry’s heard formed the vision of an owl swooping awkwardly and crashing into a wall. That made Harry smile, briefly. Fawkes was saying that accidents could happen with owl post, too, but that most wizards still trusted their messages to the birds.

Fawkes picked up the parchment in his beak and vanished into a ball of flames. Harry leaned back and closed his eyes. Wherever Scrimgeour is, that note will probably reach him in time. I don’t think that the new wards the Ministry put on Tullianum will let Greyback sniff his way right in as he could last time.

“Harry?”

Harry opened his eyes. "Yes, Draco? I'm definitely not asleep. I'm not sure I'll sleep the rest of the night."

"The Dark Lord's recovered from whatever it was that you did to him?" Draco sat plucking at the sheet, staring at the floor.

"Yes," said Harry simply.

Draco's hands clenched around the sheet, hard enough to make it shift on Harry's legs. "I wish he hadn't," he said. "I wish he'd died."

Harry opened his mouth, then shut it. It wasn't really the wish that surprised him, and he could hardly scold Draco for wishing Voldemort dead if he were going to wish anyone like that. It was the intensity in Draco's voice, the same kind that had been there when he essentially swore vengeance on Bellatrix Lestrange for cutting off Harry's hand.

Harry reached out and gently touched Draco's wrist. "Are you all right?" he asked.

Draco snorted, a desperate sound of laughter and hatred both at once, and then lifted his head. "Shouldn't I be asking you that?" he demanded, leaning forward until his nose was inches from Harry's face.

Harry shrugged and rubbed absently at the blood on his cheeks, using the glamour of his left hand before he thought about it. Not dry yet, he noticed, as the liquid smeared on his sleeve. No point in cleaning his face yet, then. The scar would go on bleeding for a while.

"I think we can both ask each other that," he said. "I know that it hurts you to see me suffering like this."

"But you're the one who looks like you've been through the wars." Draco took a deep breath. "And it's only going to get worse, isn't it?"

"Yes." Harry didn't see the need to add anything else. He knew what Draco was struggling with, in silence. Being in love with him would take a toll. Being at his side even as a friend would take a toll. Harry didn't think he had the right to make Draco's decision for him. If he chose to withdraw—

Harry's feelings twisted in panic, and he sat on them.

--then he chose to withdraw. He had to do what his will and his heart inclined him to do, what would keep him safe if safety was more important than anything else.

Draco looked up just then, into his eyes, and let out a harsh, exasperated breath. Then he grabbed Harry around the middle, hard enough to make Harry jump a bit in surprise and set up a throb of pain through his sore muscles. "Stop that," he murmured fiercely into Harry's ear. "I'm not going to abandon you. I'm never going to. I love you, I told you that, and you are part of my life, and if you try to force me away from you—body-binds and sleeping spells, remember?"

"You said that was only if I went into danger without you," Harry muttered, but he allowed himself to relax and return the embrace as best he could. Draco was pinning his arms, and he couldn't move them very far.

"Trying to fight this war by yourself would count." Draco leaned as close to Harry as he could. "I love you, and Merlin you're stubborn, and you are going to come to Malfoy Manor with me for the summer."

Harry narrowed his eyes. He's too Slytherin for his own good, sometimes. I might have agreed to that if I weren't listening so closely. He gently pushed at Draco, forcing him to loosen his hold a bit. "We've already talked about that. I told you why I couldn't. I would ask that—"

"Where would you go, then?" Draco demanded, his eyes narrowing. "You can't stay with Snape, and if you suggest actually going to your parents, I'll—"

"Use a Body-Bind or a sleeping spell, I know." Harry frowned at him. "I have another solution." He paused, reaching out instinctively for Fawkes to warn him if Dumbledore was listening, and then remembered that Fawkes was gone, delivering the message to Scrimgeour. Harry shook his head and lowered his voice, leaning close to Draco. "I was thinking McGonagall. She already knows more than I wanted her to, but she wouldn't be dangerous to me the way that your father would, and she's capable of protecting me."

"If you stay in the same school as Snape and Dumbledore, what will happen?" Draco held his eyes, and did not look away.

"Snape I can ignore," said Harry. He was certain of it now. The wild anger that had driven him on Midsummer night, and which he thought now his compulsion from Dumbledore might have influenced, had fled him. "And it's necessary that I stay near the Headmaster. If anything can bring him to redemption and to consider his mistakes, then I think that being near me might do it."

"What are you talking about, Harry?"

Harry jerked; he couldn't help it, though he thought part of the movement came from Draco's startlement as well as his own. He lifted his head, slowly, and looked over Draco's shoulder towards the doors of the hospital wing.

His mother was standing there, her eyes wide, her head slowly shaking back and forth. Harry couldn't decide if she looked mad or not, but he knew that he didn't like the expression on her face when she gazed at him.

"You're coming back to Godric's Hollow for the summer, Harry," she said softly. "That's what we agreed on. That's what Albus told me you'd agreed on when he summoned me. Why are you making plans now to do something other than what we asked of you?" She closed her eyes and took a deep breath. "Will you ever stop thinking that you know best, or that you can just change your word when you give it without any consequences?"

Harry started to respond, but a shadow stirred behind his mother, and Dumbledore entered. He took a moment fussing with his robes, as if he were going to appear in public at any moment and needed to look good, though as far as Harry could see, they were his normal star-decorated attire.

Then he lifted his head. Harry looked straight into blue eyes.

Dumbledore knew, now, that Harry had been fooling him, only pretending to be under the compulsion.

Draco made a wordless noise, a small snarl, and drew his wand from his pocket, but Dumbledore got there first. He lifted a hand, and Draco's wand soared across the hospital wing to land in his palm. He lowered it gently to rest on a hospital bed next to him. He hadn't really looked at Draco all this while, Harry saw. The greatest part of his attention was on Harry himself.

And there was a storm gathering in his eyes.

"I thought we had agreed, Harry," he said, his voice full of ancient disappointments. "I thought we could trust you, that you were not going to become a Dark Lord like the one you had struggled so hard to avoid becoming. But it seems that I was wrong."

He struck in the next moment.

Harry had already called a Protego, one of the Charms he could do without thought, wandless, in his sleep if he needed to. The shield sprang up around him and Draco, and the mingled light of Dumbledore's spells—two cast at once, hexes to render him sleepless and motionless—bounced off the shield. Dumbledore only lightly sighed, as if he had anticipated this result and did not like it, but could put up with it for the necessary length of time. He moved a few steps forward, putting out a hand to Lily when she would have followed him.

"Rest, my dear," he said gently. "I know this would be hard for you to endure. You have struggled and sacrificed to keep your son from becoming what he has, and he has anyway. That is a hard blow for any mother to endure. Rest."

Lily stood where she was and bowed her head tamely. Harry felt his lip curling, wondering why someone who had been in Gryffindor would be so spiritless, and then he shook his head sharply. No, he wouldn't think that way. He couldn't think that way if he intended to heal her. She was only contemptible as she was right now. That didn't mean that she'd been contemptible when she was a child. It didn't mean that she'd never had any Gryffindor qualities.

Dumbledore moved forward until he stood at the end of the bed, just outside the limit of the Protego. His expression was the most benevolent and open that Harry could remember seeing it, perhaps because it was the weariest, as if he were letting Harry see all the toll the war had taken on him.

"Come, Harry," he said. "I know that you are dedicated to this war, committed to it, no matter that you do not agree with us on the best methods for fighting it. It would cost much and avail you little to destroy me, or hurt me, and it would earn you distrust from many of the Light wizards. And it would harm the wards of Hogwarts, and I think we all agree they must be made more secure than ever, now that Voldemort has returned. Surely, Harry, surely you can relax, and enter your mother's house, and have peace there as you learn about war."

Harry couldn't sense any edge of compulsion in the words, but that didn't mean it wasn't there. He bared his teeth, but said nothing. Dumbledore remained still, looking at him with patient, twinkling eyes, and waited.

Harry wondered for a moment why he didn't just attack. Then he remembered that Dumbledore probably feared his ability to eat magic, and, also, he wasn't supposed to be thinking about besting Dumbledore in battle. He was supposed to be his vates, to think about a way to snap his constricting thoughts—which Harry thought resembled a web, even though he knew they weren't a literal web—and invite him out into the light of wisdom and compassion.

Being a vates for everyone is hard.

“I don’t want to fight you,” he said carefully. “Nor do I want to destroy Hogwarts. But I found out that you used compulsion on me, sir, and for that reason, I don’t want to go home for the summer. I don’t want to follow any course of action that I agreed to when I wasn’t myself.”

“I was only looking out for your best interests, Harry,” said Dumbledore gently. “If you would only—”

The doors of the hospital wing, which had only half-opened when Dumbledore and Lily entered, abruptly flew back with a slam. Harry caught his breath as he realized that wandless magic had done that—the wandless magic of a powerful, angry wizard or witch who didn’t feel familiar. It definitely hadn’t been either him or Dumbledore, and it lacked the fanged edge of Snape’s power, and Harry was sure that he would have known at once if Voldemort was on school grounds.

He understood in a moment when a familiar woman entered the room, though not the source of her rage. Auror Mallory, the Head of the Auror Office since Scrimgeour’s election to Minister, was nearly as strong as Snape, and if her anger was riding her now, then so would her magic be. That power was strong and pure and cold to Harry, with a slight smell of tin, like snow being blown into his face.

Dumbledore turned and stared at Mallory with a faint frown on his face. “Auror,” he said. “What is it?”

Mallory snarled at him. Her wand was in her hand, but she didn’t point it at Dumbledore. Her magic was going to do just fine for her, Harry thought. He wondered if he should be more concerned about protecting her or Dumbledore. Even a Light Lord could be hurt by wandless magic of this power, if it got through his defenses.

“You knew,” she said. “You knew, and you were part of it, and it sickens me to think that I trusted you.”

Dumbledore frowned more deeply. “Auror, if you have had any strange dreams lately, I suggest that you consider what you are saying carefully. Voldemort could have reached out and—”

“Did you know,” said Mallory, while her magic whirled a small object out of the pocket of her robes, “that the only reason my father was never tried was that I killed him when he started eyeing my younger sister?” The small thing spun twice around her head, then snapped towards Dumbledore. The Headmaster watched it come, probably, thought Harry, believing that it wasn’t very dangerous.

Harry recognized it right before it hit. It was a Still-Beetle shell, which caused a stillness of the body so complete that even a powerful wizard wouldn’t be able to free himself, his magic caged under his skin. This one must also have had a Portkey attached to it, or have been made into a Portkey itself, because ordinarily a Still-Beetle would root a prisoner’s feet to the floor. Instead, Dumbledore froze and then disappeared into a whirl of colors a moment later.

“There,” said Mallory, and her gaze went to Harry. She gave him a short, choppy nod. “Sorry to have to do it like this, Potter, but we didn’t know where the bitch who calls herself your mother was. Your father came out of the house when we called for him. That was a neat, simple arrest. Not like this one.” She snarled again, and then whirled.

Harry, dazed, saw that two other Aurors had come in through the doors while he was entirely occupied watching Mallory and Dumbledore. One was Tonks, her hair a gleaming, metallic black. The other was Auror Feverfew, whom he’d met a few times before, especially when he patrolled the school this year. They’d just finished binding Lily’s hands behind her back. His mother’s eyes were wide, and fearful, and glimmering with tears.

Finally, finally, too late to do any good by Dumbledore, Harry snapped out of his trance. He dropped the Shield Charm and pushed slightly away from Draco, who’d come close to him and wrapped an arm around his waist. “What are you doing?” he demanded. “Why are you arresting my mother and the Headmaster?”

Mallory, who had been watching Lily with her magic dancing and jumping around her, glanced at him. Her face softened. “I haven’t gone through exactly the same things that you have,” she said, and Harry faltered before the way she seemed to see him. “But I know some of what it’s like. My father...touched me. Constantly. When I got too old for him and he started doing it to my sister, my magic killed him. I was never tried, of course. When the Wizengamot saw the Pensieves, they all agreed that I had a right to defend my sister.”

Shit. Oh, shit. Oh, no. Harry coughed through the sticky mess in his throat, and managed to say, “What crime are my parents and the Headmaster charged with?”

“Child abuse,” said Mallory. “Almost any kind that you can describe. Emotional, mental, neglect, willingly putting you in physical danger...leaving you to You-Know-Who, for Merlin’s sake.” Her mouth twisted, and she looked at Lily. “I don’t consider you human,” she said casually. “I thought you should know that right now.”

Harry persisted through numb lips. “And who filed these charges?”

The answer was not unexpected, but the sound of it still bit into him.

“Severus Snape.”

Chapter Two: Snape's Firestorm

Snape could feel Harry coming.

Of course, even if he hadn't, the ice that raced along his office walls and the green snake that appeared coiled around his throat, hissing, would have been clues, he thought. But he could feel the actual rolling power of Harry's magic, too, a storm that promised pain and headache and heartache all in one. It grew to a dull pressure behind his temples long before the ice, long before the snake, long before the thundering knock that sounded on his door.

Of course, "long before" in this case means about five minutes, Snape thought. He sat back, one hand petting the snake looped on his neck. He hoped it would not coil too tightly. He still had bruises from the last time that Harry had decided to choke him.

"Enter," he said, when the knock came. His voice was calm, resolute, if heavy. His mind was much the same way. There were advantages to being an Occlumens and being able to slip all his emotions into one of the quicksilver pools that the discipline enabled him to maintain.

Merlin knows I will need it now.

The door opened, and Harry strode into the room. Snape watched him. He might, if he did not know Harry so well, be properly frightened. Harry's magic swirled around him in the form of an aura of darting black snakes, no sooner visible than they vanished again, crawling on the air and on his arms and clothing. His breath hissed and rasped between his teeth as though he had run a race, though it wasn't that far from the hospital wing to the dungeons. He fixed his eyes on Snape so fiercely that their green color seemed actually to have deepened a few shades.

But Snape knew Harry, and he had eyes. He saw how much of Harry's trembling and panting came from the effort of moving like this when he had done little but lie in a hospital bed and sleep for four days. He saw the pallor of his face, the dark circles beneath his eyes that even that much rest had done little to remove, the way his apparent left hand didn't move quite in time with his right. He saw the fear behind the anger in Harry's eyes.

If only that fear were for someone other than his abusers!

"Hello, Harry," said Snape. "If you had wanted to see me, you know, you could have asked, and I would have come to you. I did not want to tax you by having you rise from your bed so early." He knew exactly how he would respond to this. He would not panic, he would not lean back or flinch, and, above all, he would not apologize. Even if Harry wanted him to, it was rather difficult to retreat across his bridges when he'd burned them all.

This is the only way to do things, the only way forward. Snape studied Harry's clamped lips, and decided the boy was trying not to say anything that would result in a scream. Harry claimed to want to change matters. Perhaps I can even make him see that this is a part of that.

Then he strangled the hope and pushed it back under the carcass of his heart. He had given up rights to Harry's love when he did this. He had to remind himself of that. It would never do to forget reality. He might long to have that love, that forgiveness, back, but it would have to be entirely Harry's choice to give them.

"How does it feel," Harry whispered at last, "to know that you have contributed to three murders?"

Snape froze, his heart beating louder than the snake hissed. "The Aurors did not—" he began.

"No, of course not." Harry gave a small laugh that was on the verge of being crazed with exhaustion. He is nearly at the end of his strength, Snape thought, as he watched Harry whirl away from him. "But you slaughtered the people that Lily and Dumbledore and James could have become. They might have been entirely different if I'd just managed to talk to them." Harry was breathing fast, his voice barely steady, as he extended a hand towards the wall and the ice cracked, tumbling in shards to his palm. "I was on the verge of changing my relationship with James. You know that. You know he was getting better. Why did you charge him, too?"

"It had nothing to do with my rivalry with him," said Snape quietly. "I will say that under Veritaserum if you like, Harry."

Harry remained motionless for a moment, before his shoulders stiffened. Then he said, "No. I don't need that. Tell me why."

"Because he was a danger to you, and always must have been." Snape paused for a moment, wondering if he should try to spare the one who had helped him, and then pushing ahead as he remembered a resolve that had shone no less than his own. "Because your brother showed me the letter that James wrote him."

Harry slumped as if someone had punched him in the solar plexus. "No," he said a moment later, his voice hollow.

"But yes," said Snape, and closed his eyes as the snake around his neck took up a discordant song of Harry's pain. "The letter that said he believed you wished to reconcile with him and Lily, that you wished to be one family again, in Lux Aeterna or in Godric's Hollow. He is dangerous, Harry. He did not bother writing you to see if you were serious, or question your decision, even though your brother said you had told him on Midsummer morning that you still did not wish to see your mother. He is not a good father. His concern for that—wife of his overpowered his concern for you."

"But he could have changed," Harry whispered. "He has changed. He had changed. He was caught up in the excitement of the moment. And Lily and Dumbledore—"

"One compelled you, the other believed, or wished to believe, that the compulsion was the result of your own decision." Snape stood and leaned forward, eyes intently fastened on Harry's back, ignoring the snake. He had too much trust in his ward to think that it would simply bite him without warning. "And that is not counting every atrocity they have heaped on you since childhood. They slaughtered thousands of the people you could have become. I will not allow you to damn yourself in trying to save them."

Harry made a desperate noise in his throat that could have been the beginning of either a sob or a curse. He turned around, though, and Snape thought that a good sign. "Sir," he said, making an obvious effort to speak quietly and calmly. "Surely, if I could forgive them, then you should be able to?"

Snape narrowed his eyes. Even with his emotions mostly locked in Occlumency pools, Harry retained an ability that no one else had, to bring his anger and his protectiveness surging to the front of his mind both at once. "And what about Peter Pettigrew, Harry? And what about your brother? They have arranged his life, though they did not try to arrange his mind as thoroughly as they did yours. And what about the way Dumbledore required us to part for a time in third year, and the way he has torn the wards, and his negligence in watching and defending his school from Death Eaters? What does it say that his first action after the Dark Lord's return was to compel you, and not to take the field against him?"

Harry closed his eyes and shook his head. "I don't know," he said. "I don't know. Peter deserves justice, but couldn't you have helped him file the charges and just left my own past out of it?"

"They would want to know why he obeyed Dumbledore's orders," said Snape. "And leaving you exposed to the Dark Lord would still have been seen as a crime, and then they would have looked further into the past, and they would have found the truth." He bit back the insults he wanted to give, the urge to shake Harry until he woke up from whatever desperate dreams still consumed him. That had only a little to do with the snake around his neck, which had grown quieter as Harry's anger retreated into pleading. "This was always going to erupt, Harry. I have received letters from Hawthorn Parkinson and Narcissa Malfoy and Adalrico Bulstrode, all attempting to pry, more or less subtly, information from me concerning your past. I waited to act until the moment when Lily and Dumbledore presented an intolerable danger to you. Then I could wait no longer."

Harry shivered and put his head down. "But if you dropped the charges—"

Snape's hold on his temper slipped at last. "I will not do that," he snarled, slapping his hand down in the middle of his desk. The snake around his throat hissed at him. Snape stifled the urge to unwrap it and throw it across the room. Harry was staring at him with wide eyes, seeming to hear what he said at last, and that was quite enough of a reaction. "I will never do that," said Snape, a little more calmly. "But I will admit that what the Ministry chooses to release, and what will escape on its own, is harder to predict. Therefore, I have made copies of the memories of your past—"

"What memories of my past?"

Snape tensed. He had forgotten that he hadn't told Harry this. "I invented a potion that took memories from Dumbledore's head about your training," he said coolly. "I have been watching them all, and transcribing them. The Ministry has received that potion along with one copy of the recorded memories." He took a deep breath, and flung himself down the tunnel that had opened up before him. "I have also sent Narcissa and Hawthorn Parkinson copies of the memories. I am not sure how far you actually trust the Bulstrodes. But I know that you trust Narcissa, and I know that Hawthorn forgave you for being involved in Dragonsbane's death."

Harry's face was an odd color, like green-tinted wax. His voice was a whisper, so deep with betrayal that Snape had to turn away from him. "Why would you do that?"

"Because," said Snape steadily, "I knew that you would turn away from me in the wake of this revelation—or even before, as you told me that you meant to do. You must have an adult near you who knows what happened to you and has the freedom to approach you."

"What makes you think that I would let them near me?" Harry was glaring at him now. Snape knew the pressure of a gaze like that, even though he wasn't looking at Harry. The snake around his throat took up the hissing again, too, sounding more serious than it had the last time.

"I know you," said Snape. "They are your allies, and you are sensible of the promises that you have made them. Besides, you would not blame them for having knowledge that was given to them. You would blame me for betraying you, and that is what you are doing.” He gained, from what place he would never know, the courage to turn around and face Harry again. “I am going to make sure that you are protected, Harry, and in this matter I am aware that I am acting against your will.”

“But that’s,” said Harry, and stopped. Then he returned to the whisper, which Snape found harder to endure than the raging. Probably the exact reason that he’s using it. “Please. I came through it all right, didn’t I? They abused me, if you insist on using that word, and I still survived. And I’m taking steps to make sure that they don’t hurt anyone else. I was confining Dumbledore’s compulsion. I was getting ready to work on Lily. James would have been easy. Please, drop the charges.”

Snape shook his head. He wondered how he could phrase things so that Harry would know it was no good appealing in this direction. He had already been as blunt as he could, he thought.

No. Not quite as blunt as you could be.

“No, Harry,” he said. “Even if I dropped the charges now, the Minister would still investigate them. I swore once that I would unleash a firestorm to protect you, and reach for any help I could.” He folded his arms, but not because he was cold. “This dragon is flown, and everything is burning now. It is no good appealing to me to drop the charges. The moment is past when you could have changed things.”

Harry stood there shivering for a moment. Then he said, “My brother will have to endure this, too.”

“He agreed to,” said Snape quietly.

Silence. Then Harry whispered, “I don’t understand. Don’t you care about my parents and Headmaster Dumbledore at all?”

Snape curled his lip. “In comparison to you? Not at all,” he said.

Harry just stared at him for a long moment. Then he said, "But they're human, too."

"And so are you, Harry."

Harry ran his hand through his hair. "It's different with me, that's all."

"How different?" Snape decided that he might as well push on this point. The best he could hope for was Harry both safe and awakened to his potential danger, to what would have been the consequences if his parents and Dumbledore had remained free—and the consequences of their abuse in the past, as well. Harry was skating on the slippery ice of illogic right now. If Snape could shatter that ice...

"I just—it just is," said Harry, in a low, fretful voice.

"How?"

"It just is!" Harry jerked his head up and glared at him. The snake around his throat tightened like a noose. Snape stood still, barely breathing, hardly daring to do anything but watch the face of his charge.

Harry swallowed several times, the rage draining away as something else obviously occurred to him. "I'm going to talk to the Minister," he said abruptly, and then ran out of the room.

Snape watched him go, shaking his head as the green snake vanished. If you believe Scrimgeour to be more sympathetic to your parents than I am, Harry, you are grossly mistaken.

"Harry. You could rest, you know." Mallory's hand on his shoulder was firm, her voice soft and warm. "You don't have to see the Minister right now. I know that he wanted to talk to you sometime soon after your parents and the old fool were arrested, but it could have been any time in the next few days. You don't need to do this now."

"I want to," said Harry, and gave a little shake that would get her hands off him. Regulus, in his head, sighed and whispered at him, but Harry wasn't in the mood to listen. He was remembering, with all the clarity he could summon or force into his mind, all the times that Scrimgeour had acted fairly. He might achieve the right ends by sneaky methods sometimes, but they were the right ends. Harry trusted the Minister's sense of justice. Surely Scrimgeour would see that that justice, the cause of greatest peace and regard for other people's lives, required the release of his parents and Dumbledore. The trial would only cause a great deal of publicity and pity and excitement that would detract from their efforts to fight the war against Voldemort, and it would utterly ruin the chances anyone involved might have to be a new person. That had to matter.

Mallory crouched down in front of him, forcing him to look at her. Harry had insisted on accompanying the Aurors back to the Ministry, and had asked Draco if he would mind staying at Hogwarts. Mallory had acquiesced to all of it, though she had raised her eyebrows when Harry held Lily's hand and murmured that it was going to be all right. She had escorted him to the Head Auror's office without complaint. Harry could not imagine why she would balk now.

Mallory smoothed a hand down his hair. "Harry," she said, "I do understand what happened to you. You should rest. This has been a great shock—I remember that it was a shock to me when the Aurors found out what I had done to my father—and you're swaying on your feet."

Damn. Harry steadied himself by putting his hand on the wall. "Please, Auror Mallory," he said, concentrating to make sure his voice didn't shake. "I am sorry for what happened to you, and I understand that you only want to help me. But I have to see the Minister." The urgency inside him was making his muscles twitch and jump like a caged unicorn's. "Please?"

The Auror studied him, then nodded reluctantly. She rose and rapped on the Minister's door. Scrimgeour's voice answered at once, with no trace of tiredness. "Come!"

Harry let a cautious beam of hope enter his heart as he stepped into the office. Fawkes's message about the vision would have reached Scrimgeour by now. He had other things to think about. Surely, surely he would see that it was best—

And then he stepped in, and saw the way that the Minister's yellow eyes fixed on him, and knew it was not going to be that easy. Fawkes, sitting on an arm of the Minister's chair, lifted and flew towards him, singing. Harry held out his shoulder for the phoenix, but found himself unable to look away from Scrimgeour. There was admiration there, and respect, and profound compassion, and iron determination. Harry was afraid of what the determination meant.

"Fiona, please leave us," said Scrimgeour.

Auror Mallory hesitated. "Sir—"

"You may go to the prisoners' cells only if you think you're able to control yourself, Fiona," Scrimgeour said. "Not otherwise."

Harry felt the movement of air across the back of his neck as Auror Mallory bowed. Then she retreated, and there came the sound of the door shutting.

He's not going to help, Regulus whispered in his head. Save your strength, Harry. Get some rest, and heal. This is what should have happened long since, and you know it. He's not going to help.

Harry shook him away, almost literally, and sat down in the chair in front of the Minister's desk. "Sir," he said, deciding that he might as well be direct, "you've heard of the charges against my parents and Dumbledore by now. I would like to ask that they not come to trial."

"Impossible," said Scrimgeour, without changing expression.

Harry drew in a harsh breath. So Regulus had been right, but it was still like crashing full-force into a wall that he hadn't known was there.

He blamed his shock for letting Scrimgeour get a question in edgewise. “What happened, Potter? You’ve got blood all down your face.”

Harry swallowed. He’d honestly forgotten that, but now that Scrimgeour had drawn his attention to it, the dried blood felt flaky and itchy. “It’s my scar, sir,” he said quietly, and lifted his fringe, though he didn’t know if Scrimgeour would be able to make out the scar under the liquid. “It’s a connection, of sorts, to the Dark Lord. And I know that he’s returned to full power now.”

Scrimgeour dipped his head. “This trial will undoubtedly be hard on you,” he observed in a distant voice. “It will be hard on everyone.”

“Yes!” Harry gratefully seized the chance at explanation. “That’s the reason I would like you to stop it, sir. All it will do is bring up bad feelings and cloud the air with old crimes. Do we need that, on the eve of battle? I don’t think so. What my parents did is old news now, and I was rebuilding a relationship with my father until my guardian intervened.” He paused, remembering something else he had meant to do. “That reminds me. I wanted to ask for papers to terminate Severus Snape’s guardianship over me.”

He waited. Scrimgeour eyed him for a moment. Then he said, “It might take me some time to find the paperwork.”

Harry blinked. He knew the Minister’s tactics. He had just never dreamed that he might use them on him.

“Why?” he whispered, too stunned to add any title of respect.

Scrimgeour’s eyes narrowed. “I was an Auror, Mr. Potter,” he said, and his voice dipped into the Muggleborn diction he used in moments of great emotion. “I know ‘em when I see ‘em—criminals like your parents and the Headmaster, trials that have to be endured. Snape saw ‘em before I did. And he did the best thing a guardian should for his charge. You won’t do half so well with anyone else.” He paused. “Do you have someone else in mind?”

“No,” said Harry.

Scrimgeour nodded. "And unless Snape actually wants to emancipate you—which is about as likely to happen as my hair turning purple with green polka dots—then you need a guardian with your parents in prison."

"But if you released them—"

Scrimgeour lunged over the desk, the motion so unexpected that it silenced Harry. "They are child abusers," Scrimgeour snarled at him. His eyes made him look like an old lion watching its prey, though Harry knew the Minister wouldn't consider Harry his prey. No, that's reserved for people less able to defend themselves, Harry thought, and felt another surge of angry worry for his parents and Dumbledore. "I've dealt with abuse cases before, Potter. I have no sense of humor about 'em at all. None. Do you understand me? It's an Auror's job to arrest abusers and save the victims."

"I," said Harry, "am not a victim."

Scrimgeour's eyes narrowed further. Moving slowly, carefully, as though his bad leg had started to pain him, he sat down again. His voice was clipped when he spoke. "And I've seen that before, too, Potter. Children denying that what happened was abuse, saying that they deserved it."

"What does deserving have to do with anything?" Harry shook his head. There was a buzzing in his head, a howling like a storm in his ears. "I never said that I deserved it. I said I wasn't a victim. I'm not helpless. I could have defended myself if they ever physically hurt me. I was trying to help them, don't you understand?" His voice had turned into a plea, which horrified him, but he thought it might be one way to get Scrimgeour to comprehend him, since rational argument hadn't worked. "I've managed to persuade you that you should work with magical creatures instead of against them. I've managed to persuade some of my allies that their best chance lies with me and not Voldemort, even some of the ones who served Voldemort. I could have managed to persuade my parents and Dumbledore that their course was wrong, and then we could have handled everything privately."

"That doesn't change the fact that it was abuse, Potter," said Scrimgeour. "It doesn't change the fact that this is just another species of saying you deserved it, exonerating those who committed the crime and condemning yourself."

"I've forgiven them," said Harry. He was beginning to feel frantic, but he repressed it. There had to be some way of turning this aside. Snape had said the dragon was flown, but the dragon was still in the Ministry. There had to be some way of capturing and taming it. "I've not condemned myself for anything but weakness and indecision. Please. Let them go."

Scrimgeour shook his head slowly, but not as if he were refusing, more as if he were expressing silent wonder. "I see that Snape was more right than I ever dreamed," he said. "He said that you'll proceed in your convictions even with proof to the contrary staring you right in the face." His expression softened further. "Potter, I admire you enormously for surviving under these conditions. You have immense strength. But it's time for you to face your past, and that will take even greater strength. Can you do it?" He leaned forward, his eyes intent.

"What matters is whether they have the strength." Harry shifted hard enough to unseat Fawkes, who settled on the back of his chair instead and wrapped a warm wing around his neck. Harry sat on the impulse to break down. Control, control, I have to have control. "Don't you see, Minister? I'm concerned about them, and not about me."

"I see that," said Scrimgeour. "Better than you can imagine. Harry."

Harry swallowed, in order, the urges to lash out and scream out and cry. If he sees, why is he ignoring the truth? It'll be hard, but I can survive anything they throw at me. I can survive being seen, until people get bored and go back to paying attention to something else. But Connor and Lily and James and Dumbledore...why is no one more concerned about them? Connor may think he can survive this, but he doesn't know that like I know I can. And the others! Am I really the only one who cares about them?

He was becoming horribly, horribly afraid that he was the only one who did.

"I'd like to see my parents," he said. "Please." He knew it was no good asking to talk to Dumbledore. The Still-Beetle would make him unable to talk, and the Ministry was not about to remove that confinement yet.

Scrimgeour stared at him.

"I promise I won't hurt them," said Harry, in an agony of impatience. "I'll swear whatever oath you like."

"I am not worried about you hurting them," said Scrimgeour, in a voice full of meaning.

I'm worried about them hurting you. Harry could translate that well enough. It made him want to rage and shout and spit. Merlin, why did no one see that his parents were the victims here? They were the ones unable to defend themselves against accusations that would destroy their lives. Snape's firestorm would burn them alive. Dumbledore at least had his magic and the protection of his past reputation. But James's Auror exploits were old enough not to matter. And Lily...

His mother was without her magic.

And if they find out why she lost it, they'll only use it as more evidence of this being abuse that I couldn't survive. Goddamnit!

He shook his head, and made an effort to calm down and just think. "My father, at least, sir," he said. "The charges against him are different, aren't they? Just neglect, instead of active abuse?"

Scrimgeour paused as though reluctant to acknowledge it, and then said, "Yes, they are. But he was still a party to this."

Harry let out a low whistling breath. "He was on the verge of connecting with me again. He'll think a large part of this is just Snape's grudge against him coming to the forefront. Please, sir. I want to talk to him. I want to explain. Let me?"

Scrimgeour stood. "I see that you will not rest until this request has been granted," he said. "And better the man who sired you than the woman who bore you. I will conduct you to this interview."

Harry nodded. He would have liked to go alone, but he knew, from the expression on Scrimgeour's face, better than to ask.

This is a mistake, Regulus insisted at him.

Harry didn't bother answering. Regulus and he had distinctly different ideas of what was right in this particular case. Regulus had actually whispered, when Harry had been talking with Snape, that Snape had done the right thing.

The cell they kept James in was a plain room, but not entirely bare. It had a bed in one corner, a writing table, a battered bookshelf, and a door that Harry thought led to the loo. Of course, it lacked any form of entertainment and Harry knew his active, studious father would be going crazy here, but compared to some of the cells they might have had at Azkaban, this was the height of luxury.

They entered to find James on his feet; he seemed to have sprung up the moment he heard the locking wards fall and the key turn, and was staring tensely at the door. His face was white.

"Hello, Dad," said Harry, his voice half-strangled with emotion, and started to step forward. Scrimgeour's hand came down on his shoulder, holding him in place, and Fawkes fluttered in front of him, momentarily obscuring the sight of James.

But Harry could hear his words well enough.

"How can you call me that, after what you did?" he snapped. "You said that you were going to come home, that you loved your mother enough to give her a second chance, and then this. How could you do this to people you claim to love?"

Scrimgeour's voice held every nuance of polite loathing as he replied, "I am surprised that you can ask that, sir. Do you know what love is? It looks rather different from your own behavior."

Fawkes dipped back to sit on Harry's shoulder, and showed James advancing a step. Scrimgeour's wand was up and pointing at once, and Fawkes gave a chirp that filled Harry's mind with visions of burning.

"I was under a compulsion from Dumbledore when I wrote that letter, Dad," said Harry, trying to remain as calm as he could. He deserved these castigations from James, Merlin knew he did, but they were pushing him further and further towards the edge of a breakdown that he couldn't afford to have. "I did mean to come home at the time, but only until I broke free of the compulsion. And then I didn't know how to tell you the truth without also revealing it to Dumbledore."

James shook his head, wildly. "Why were we arrested, though? That's what I don't understand."

Scrimgeour growled like a thunderstorm. "Because what you have done is wrong," he said. "Love is unfamiliar to you. What about the concept of justice?"

Harry flinched. Letting him escort me was a mistake. "I didn't choose that," he said, willing his father to believe him. "I would never have chosen to do that. That was entirely Snape's decision."

"And you didn't stop him?"

"I didn't know anything about it until just an hour ago!" Harry controlled himself at the expression on James's face. Calm, calm. This isn't his fault, remember? And he's upset. "I promise, Dad, I'm going to try and free you. Make them see that what you did wasn't that bad, that—"

"That's not enough, Harry." James turned away, burying his face in his hands. "Even if we were released right now, the taint would cling to us and follow us around. No one's going to hire me now. Everyone's going to think your mother some kind of madwoman, and Dumbledore.” He gave a harsh laugh. “The war’s coming, Harry. Albus wrote me about that. How do you think we can fight it now, with the leader of the Light side in prison for child abuse? This is horrible. It’s all horrible. Our lives are utterly destroyed.”

Harry bowed his head. I knew this would happen. Damn it, why did I let them tell Snape about the compulsion? I’m sure that that was what pushed him into acting now.

“And our family life, you boys’ childhood, will be all over the papers,” James was saying, each separate phrase hooked out from the back of his throat. “Did you think about how this would affect your brother, Harry? Why did you tell anyone about what happened at Godric’s Hollow? We’re all smeared with shit now, and it’s all your fault—“

“Silencio.”

James’s voice cut off. Scrimgeour lowered his wand and turned Harry around. Harry let himself be turned. He barely felt it. He was tingling and going numb with shock.

“What he said was untrue,” said Scrimgeour calmly. “Utterly. Come with me, Harry.” He lifted his head, and Harry didn’t see what expression was on his face as he addressed James, since he couldn’t seem to stop himself from staring straight ahead. “You are charged with neglect, Mr. Potter,” said Scrimgeour. “Charged. I am going to look over the evidence that Professor Snape laid before me more closely. I find myself, after hearing this little speech, unable to believe that neglect is all it is.”

He turned and guided Harry out of the room, his hand never faltering. Harry shivered, and followed.

The truth had hit him along with James’s words, or perhaps because of them, like a block of stone falling on his head.

There is no way back. Their names really are smeared now. The dragon is flown. The firestorm is burning.

All I can do is help them ride out the storm as best I can.

And I need a safe place to think about these things and plan out my strategy. Hogwarts won't do right now.

Harry broke into a fit of shivering. Scrimgeour said nothing, but handed him over to an Auror Harry didn't know, with soft instructions to wrap him in a warm blanket, give him chocolate to eat, and return him to Hogwarts.

Harry didn't really remember how he got back to the hospital wing; his shock was too great. He did know that Draco was waiting for him, and a second figure who, on examination, turned out to be Narcissa.

Harry nodded at her, and faced Draco, who checked himself sharply at the sight of his expression.

"I've decided to come to Malfoy Manor for the summer," said Harry. "If I'm still welcome?"

Draco at once hurried forward and clasped him close in his arms, whispering to him. Harry looked at Narcissa, who nodded.

Harry closed his eyes and held on fiercely to Draco. He didn't think he could bear to see the pity he knew must be in Narcissa's eyes. She knew, but he doubted she would press him about things the way Snape would have, and the Manor was quiet and isolated enough for him to think.

And Draco would be there.

I can't keep this firestorm from burning, but perhaps I can tame some of its winds.

Chapter Three: He Stands Not Alone

Narcissa rubbed her fingers gently over the back of the small wooden dog she held, and watched her son embrace Harry. Harry embraced him back, and Narcissa supposed that was a good sign.

His cheeks still bore the red-brown traces of dried blood, and his eyes were glazed and stunned and staring. But even those could be cleansed; even those could be healed. Narcissa's concern was whether he would recover in enough time to meet the Dark wizards who had agreed to ally with him, or at least the first seven, who had all grown subtly more pressing in the last few weeks.

I do not know if he will. Narcissa gave a little shiver of mingled excitement and disquiet as she thought about what Harry had done in the past, and then about the memories that Severus had sent her. But living in uncertainty like this is more exciting than I would ever have given it credit for.

Harry at last gently pushed Draco away from him, and faced her. "Did you come to take us to the Manor, Mrs. Malfoy?" he asked.

Narcissa watched him for a moment. His eyes didn't lose their glazed look, but neither did they waver. So. He was not yet letting himself collapse and relax, but neither was he curled up and shaking against his will. She would follow his cues, then, and not say everything that she wanted to say until they were back at the Manor.

"I did," she said. "But I also found this. I thought you might be interested in it." She extended the toy with a solemn look.

Harry took it with a confused expression at first, but then, awkwardly manipulating it with the fingers of his single hand, managed to turn it over. When he read the letters carved on the belly, he took a quick breath and looked up at Narcissa.

"This is him," he whispered. "It has to be. Thank you."

Narcissa nodded, smiling. She had thought to look at the toys she fetched from Wayhouse herself, to see if the Dark Lord might have left any distinguishing marks on them, and encountered the dog with R.A. B. carved on its belly. Perhaps the Dark Lord had done that for his own amusement, perhaps simply to be able to find the toy again, but it was too great a coincidence for one of the toys to have Regulus's initials. At least they could begin the work on re-Transfiguring there.

"I'm not that good at Transfiguration," Harry was saying regretfully, rolling the dog in his fingers now. "I'll have to take this to Professor McGonagall—" He paused as though remembering something. "No," he said softly. "She's Headmistress McGonagall now, isn't she?"

"She would be, yes," said Narcissa carefully. The more she saw of Harry, the more concerned she became. She was not sure how much taking him to the Manor would help. He looked like a fragile collection of glass shards held together around an iron rod. She was not sure if he would let himself collapse. But if he fell apart against his will, or if he met Henrietta Bulstrode so obviously weakened...

"Then let's go see her, and congratulate her on her new position," said Harry, with such a straight face that Narcissa didn't recognize the morbid joke until her son smothered a stunned laugh. Her worry grew as she followed Harry out of the hospital wing and towards the Headmaster's office.

He needs rest. How to convince him to take it?

Yet he didn't look as if he needed rest with his face turned away from her, Narcissa noticed. His stride was firm and strong, and he walked with his head held high. He glanced at the walls they passed now and then, as if he were estimating the strength of the wards and protection spells that crawled over them. Narcissa wondered if he was only acting.

Or perhaps they trained him to change his own weariness into strength, to keep going even when he was on the brink of collapse.

The anger that had been burning in her since she read the scrolls Severus sent tried to roar up again. Narcissa took a deep breath and carefully placed a lid over the embers. The anger could do her no good right now; she stood a chance of breaking in a different way, but no less disastrously, than Harry if she tormented herself with those thoughts. They would wait.

They reached the gargoyle, and Harry murmured the names of several sweets before it leaped aside. Narcissa wondered if McGonagall hadn't had the time to change the password yet, or if the old Head of Gryffindor House also preferred the same ridiculous ones as the former Headmaster.

The former, child-abusing, deceptive Headmaster...

Narcissa banked the fire again. In the end, it would burn longer and hotter, and be put to better use, for having been balked for a time. She rode the moving staircase up behind Harry and Draco, and watched the way her son leaned towards Harry, and wondered. Lucius was assuredly right in what he planned to do about Harry's abuse. She did not think he was right in the observations he had made to her on Draco the other day.

They knocked on the door of the office, and a tired voice answered, "Yes, I'm here. That's you, isn't it, Harry?"

Narcissa flicked a suspicious glance at the ceiling, and only then saw the glow of the green watching spell in the corner above her. She shook her head. She really should have seen it at once. She drew her wand and held it loosely at her side as Harry opened the door. Her last meeting with the old cat had not been pleasant.

The office looked strangely altered, though Narcissa had only been in it a handful of times as a student, and only once as a parent. And anyway, it had only been a few hours since Dumbledore was arrested, as Draco had told her when he firecalled; why would McGonagall make her first priority changing the decorations?

Who knows why Gryffindors do anything? Including abuse their children—

This time, Narcissa told herself, firmly, that she simply wouldn't think about it until they returned home. This anger felt creeping, insidious, worse than anything she'd experienced before. In fact, it felt more like the madness that sometimes ran in the Black family and which her mother had warned her about than any normal anger. She had to ignore it, and therefore, she would.

McGonagall stood up from behind the desk when she saw them, though Narcissa thought that was less a gesture of courtesy and more so that she could have her wand out and freedom of movement if she needed it. Her eyes fixed on Harry's face first of all, and she made a faint noise of distress.

"Mr. Potter," she said softly. "Your face is covered in blood."

"My scar bleeds when I dream about Voldemort, Headmistress," said Harry, ignoring the way McGonagall started at the title. "I came to ask you for a favor." He held up the wooden dog. "This is Regulus Black, Sirius' brother. He betrayed Voldemort, but he got caught and Transfigured, and no one knew what he got made into until just a few days ago. Can you work on changing him back?"

McGonagall was blinking and staring throughout this, but to her credit, Narcissa thought, she took the dog from Harry and gently smoothed her fingers over the wood. Then she closed her eyes, and her face altered, becoming the sharp, focused expression that Narcissa remembering seeing in countless Transfiguration classes as she examined botched student work. Narcissa had never been that good at Transfiguration.

She shook her head, telling herself that she was no longer eleven, and she should no longer let that look intimidate her.

"Yes, this is a Transfigured human," McGonagall was murmuring. "But the spell is hooked to several powerful Dark Arts curses that would affect anyone who tried to undo the change, and there are preservation spells, too, I assume to keep him alive while they tortured him. If I don't pay attention to keeping them intact, he'll come back wounded and bleed to death." She set the dog gently on the desk before she opened her eyes. "I can change him back, Mr. Potter, but it is not the work of a few days, or even a few weeks. It will take months."

Harry paused, and then said, "That's all right, Headmistress. I can live with that. I'll bear it."

McGonagall took a deep breath, and Narcissa recognized what she was going to do, but not in time to prevent it as she leaned forward and said, "Just as you have borne everything else that happened to you so far, Harry?"

Harry stiffened. Then he said, "Not in the same way, Headmistress. We found Regulus after a long quest and looking in several other places. I got resigned to it taking some time."

"That is not what I meant, Harry," said McGonagall. Narcissa would not have thought a Gryffindor could be so merciless. "I have read the memories Severus wrote out. You have been ignoring much of what happened to you. If you had told me in your second or third year what the Headmaster had done, I would have helped protect you. I swear it. He lost my respect almost two years ago now. I would have helped."

"That's not the point," said Harry. His voice had gone high and strained. "Please, Headmistress. I appreciate your concern—" Narcissa snorted; no, he didn't. McGonagall's gaze flicked to her, but went back to Harry as he continued. "—but there's really nothing anyone could have done before this point. And I know that you're busy with the school. That's another reason I'm not going to be impatient with your changing Regulus back. Merlin knows you have a lot to do." Narcissa leaned forward in time to catch the edge of a bright, brittle smile on his face. He was fighting back the emotions that wanted to rampage across his body.

"Harry," said McGonagall softly.

"I don't wish to speak of it," said Harry. "Isn't it enough that I'll have to do so in public in a few months, whether I want to or not?"

McGonagall looked stricken, but Narcissa felt a tiny flicker of relief, both at the words and the way that Harry edged closer to Draco, reaching out one arm for support. At least he can admit that the trial is going to happen. I would be worried if he thought he could somehow turn the juggernaut Severus has released aside.

“You are right, Mr. Potter,” said McGonagall stiffly. “Where are you going for the summer, if I may ask?”

“With the Malfoys,” said Harry. “I know that Connor is going with the Weasleys. I’ll visit him soon. I have—lots of things to say to him.” He stared at her for a moment, then said, “And I feel like I should have more to say to you, too, Headmistress, but I don’t. Not right now.”

McGonagall simply nodded. Then her eyes looked up and caught Narcissa’s over the boys’ heads. Narcissa sneered at her. It was infuriating that this witch—no longer young, no longer pretty, and not even of the Dark—could make her feel as if she had four legs and a hairless tail with just one look.

“If you hurt him,” said McGonagall softly, “I will Transfigure you into a mouse and set you loose in the castle.”

She didn’t need to say that she would find Narcissa in that form, or that Mrs. Norris would. Narcissa simply nodded, and then waited for the boys to pass her before she left the office. She wanted to remain between them and the Headmistress, just in case.

She studied Harry’s back worriedly the whole time. Already, he had let the strain fall from his shoulders and moved a bit away from Draco. He was chattering animatedly with her son, but, like his smile in the office, that mask shone too brightly and was liable to shatter.

What should I do?

Put off the others until Harry is ready to face them, of course. Until he’s had at least a few days to recover.

Narcissa felt much better once she had made that decision, and a little ashamed that it had taken her so long to make it. Of course her family came first, and Harry was important to her family, and important to her in and of himself, and half-adopted already, with the linking to the wards that Lucius had given him at Christmas. The other wizards and witches were pressing, Henrietta Bulstrode in particular, but she could dance around them and make excuses for at least a few days longer. And she would do so, until Harry was soothed, or had shattered and then drawn himself back together again.

What most worried Narcissa at the moment were two things: that she did not know how long it would take Harry to work through his emotions, and that she did not know how to get through the wards into the Ministry to punish Harry's parents and Dumbledore as they deserved.

In some ways, I wish Severus had not gone to the Ministry. It would have made it easier to kill them.

On the other hand, perhaps that was the exact reason Severus had done it.

Narcissa fixed her eyes on the two boys walking ahead of her. I promise, Severus, I will guard Harry as if he were my own. In many ways, he already is.

"Draco. I would like to see you alone."

Draco stood up at once from the chair in the library where he'd been reading the book about basilisks, and put the tome down on the table beside it. He followed his father out of the library without a backward glance, because Harry wasn't in the room with him. Harry was asleep in his bedroom upstairs, exhausted from another day of researching every subject that occurred to him—means to get the last few remaining Dark spells off the stump of his wrist, ways to counteract basilisk poison, powerful glamour incantations.

The interrogation techniques that Aurors used with abused children.

Draco had bitten his lip when Harry found those books, but he'd said nothing. He'd had a lot of practice at silence in the last few days, since Harry returned from the graveyard. He helped Harry when Harry let him, and when Harry asked to be alone, he left him alone, and when Harry reached out for him—more and more frequently now—Draco was there. It was three days now since they had come home to the Manor, and Draco had done all those things multiple times.

It was for Harry, of course it was, Draco thought, as he followed his father into the study where Lucius and Harry had spoken the first Christmas they met, but it was also for himself. He'd had the sensation, over the last week, of watching pieces of his mind and soul shift and float and lock into new places. It was—rather strange, like watching an outside force change him, but Draco knew this wasn't Harry's magic, or even the news of Voldemort's return. It was the events around him interacting with what made him who he was, and the most magical thing about it was his awareness of the process and his determination to hold back and watch it rather than interfere and consciously change his mind.

“Sit down, Draco.”

Draco took the high chair that Lucius waved him to, noting with a distant pleasure that his feet reached the floor now, where they would have dangled a few inches off it last summer. His father paused with the most mild and fleeting of disconcerted expressions on his face, as though he had found himself caught by surprise at the same sight, and then went smooth-faced again and sat down in his own chair.

Draco calmly fixed his eyes on his father. Lucius was tall and imposing. He was the man Draco had loved and adored and been in awe of and feared since the days when he first became aware that he should keep silent around some people and talk to others. He had always been closer to his mother. She was more prone to let him know when he crossed an unbreakable boundary, but always treat him as if he behaved well otherwise. Lucius, meanwhile, often looked as if he were waiting for Draco to break one of those unwritten laws of good manners and pureblood behavior.

The thing was, Draco was fifteen now, and he no longer feared his father.

"You made a request of me some little time ago," Lucius began. He always did this, too, approaching most subjects so obliquely that an outsider to the family might have blinked in confusion as he listened. But Draco was not an outsider to the family. "I find myself moved to grant it, as long as you tender me an apology for the argument that we had at the same time." He sat back and put his fingers gently together, watching his son.

Ah. I'd thought so.

Draco tilted his head. "I find myself not much inclined for either the giving or the receiving of gifts at the moment, Father."

Lucius's nostrils flared, the only sign that Draco had just taken him by surprise. He remained silent for a short time. Draco knew this tactic. It was meant to fluster and disconcert him. But he didn't have to be flustered and disconcerted if he didn't want to be.

He'd always been stubborn when he thought he was in the right, but then, that had been a kind of frantic stubbornness, similar to Harry's at the moment. The shifting of his soul in the last week had taught him patient stubbornness, rather like a stone. Panic and fear did no good when you were sitting by the side of the man you loved and watching as he slept off massive trauma.

Lucius said at last, "I was under the impression that you rather wished to have the request you made of me granted."

"I did," said Draco, letting his father hear him emphasize the past tense ever so slightly.

They watched each other. Lucius could easily have broken the dance and asked him outright what had changed, and then Draco would have told him. But his father had started this waltz, and no matter what he might say about pride getting in the way of accomplishing one's goals, the fact remained that Lucius Malfoy was proud and stubborn and far too used to getting his own way to ask an honest question when he'd begun obliquely.

Draco could move the waltz ahead, though, and he did. “Was there anything else that you wanted of me, Father? If not, I should go back and research basilisks. Fascinating creatures, basilisks.”

His father’s mind was obviously searching and sorting through his words, looking for some way in which they could be a threat. Then he gave a slight, sour smile, and tilted his head.

“Yes, Draco, by all means,” he said. “Did you know that in some of the legends, basilisks have green eyes, and in some, golden?”

“Then I’ve been in a room with both kinds at once,” said Draco, standing and striding out of the study. “How fascinating.”

His thoughts briefly swirled and stormed, representing the Chamber of Secrets to him, before he shoved them firmly back down. He had things to do.

He went to Harry’s bedroom and eased the door open. The sound of soft breathing from the bed didn’t stir. Draco liked that, liked that he was the only one who could approach Harry without waking him up. His mother had tried it a few times, but even she made Harry turn his head and at least regard her before he went back to his book or his nap.

Draco sat down in the chair next to Harry and shook his head. Harry still hadn’t allowed himself to heal. He was ignoring every mention of his parents and Dumbledore, slipping Narcissa’s every attempt to talk about the memories she’d received from Snape, and simply refusing to acknowledge why he was researching the common signs of abuse and how people found out about them.

But that was what Draco had expected. He knew Harry better than any of them did, after all. Harry faced many other things bravely, but from things like this, he went on running until he could run no more. Last time, he had run until Hawthorn Parkinson forced her way past his barriers and he collapsed in exhaustion. Everything else so far—Draco’s attempts to hold a conversation with him, the unicorns, the soothing atmosphere of the Manor—was only a temporary relief. He would have to fall further before he could land. Draco knew it.

Draco closed his eyes, and reached out gently towards Harry with his empathy. He wasn't here to confirm things that he knew already, but to take note of a change that had happened in the past few days.

Yes. He was right. There was still the stinging sensation of pain from Harry, but it was muted, compared to what it should have been. Draco had likewise noticed that the emotions that represented winds from Harry had changed to breezes, and that he didn't know the meaning behind some of Harry's minor expressions or quick changes of mood at all anymore.

His empathy was changing, just like everything else about him.

Draco opened his eyes and regarded Harry thoughtfully. He had more sympathy for the person Harry had been during second and third year than he had ever had while the transition was actually happening. How did you go through a transformation like that and keep your sanity?

Of course, it helped that Draco wasn't fighting his change and trying to stay the person he had been the way Harry had, and that he could step back from his emotions, thanks to his training in the dances, and regard himself as an interesting object. He did not think that would have been possible for Harry, who either tried to ignore himself entirely or followed well-worn paths of guilt and self-loathing.

Whatever his empathy was mutating into, Draco did not think it was altogether a different form of magic. He had noticed that, while he caught fewer emotions from his mother and father and Harry, he seemed to sense their selves better. He had known, the other day, just what book his father was looking for, and that his mother was sitting in her room and reading over the scrolls of memories from Snape again when he wondered where she was, and that Harry was going to take a step to the left before he actually did so. It was odd, and interesting, and Draco was looking forward to seeing where it went. At the moment, he thought it too caught in flux to give him any useful information.

He closed his eyes, and thought about the settled things, the things he did know.

The past week had brought home to him how firmly he was not Harry, for all that he loved Harry and would have given his own left hand to save his. He would not have dealt with these losses as Harry had done. He would have let Madam Pomfrey see the wounds the moment he got back to Hogwarts. He would have wept to express his grief, which Harry had very rarely done so far. He might have had trouble denouncing his parents as abusers, if that had happened to him, but he would be more accepting of the reality than Harry had shown himself even now.

He was different.

And—perhaps this was another part of the change that had started in his soul when he saw Harry coming up the path next to the lake with Fawkes on his shoulder—he found that he wanted to know himself, his own motives for doing things. Just loving Harry wasn't a good enough reason any more. Yes, he loved Harry.

And?

Could he actually become a good fighter, an asset in a fight for his own abilities, rather than just someone Harry had to protect or someone who learned Dark Arts and dueling spells to protect Harry? Could he become interested in magical creatures for their own sake, and not just because Harry worked to free them? Could he find some way to share Harry's life that didn't involve subsuming himself in him?

He had wanted so badly to achieve equality with Harry, so that Harry would never overshadow him and they could stand on equal footing. But why should he worry about that, if he was simply going to drown himself?

He had one point at which he differed from Harry. He would find others—or he would find points of similarity and work from there. He wanted to have his own life, just as Harry did, even as they shared a life.

Draco didn't plan to tear himself from Harry, of course. Far from it. He would know himself, and he would know Harry, and he would be conscious what they shared and what they did not. He thought it would be the most interesting study of his life so far.

And when he was ready, he would break free of the cocoon of silence that had held him for the last week, and start pushing—both against people who might try to do things that shoved at him, like his father refusing to acknowledge Draco as a magical heir of the Malfoy family until Draco apologized for attending Walpurgis Night, and at Harry, from whom Draco had the right to demand some consideration, too.

He thought he would be ready soon.

He rather suspected that some people would be surprised when he opened his wings.

Wings. That's right.

Draco stood, brushed his hand over Harry's shoulder, and then turned and strode from the room. He had a letter to send, to confirm the order for Harry's birthday gift, that he had nearly forgotten about. Lucius shook his head as he finished his letter. The owl he used for delivering ordinary messages, Octavius, waited patiently in the corner of his private study as he bound the note to his leg.

"To Ollivander," he said, and Octavius spread his wings and soared out the window.

Lucius watched him go, his hands folded behind his back. His right hand was clamped down on the left, that was true, pressing until Lucius could hear the bones grind together, but someone else coming into the room would only have seen him standing calmly. That was as it should be. Lucius put on a performance for an invisible audience most of the time, so that he could put on a faultless performance for a visible one when he needed to.

He had read one more scroll of the memories Snape had recorded. He read one a day, and had almost reached the end.

His right hand pressed down further, and Lucius knew there would be dents in the skin afterward. He would cast a glamour to cover them.

Some years ago, during the first war, the Dark Lord had sent Lucius and two other Death Eaters to capture Ollivander, wanting the wand-maker to himself. Unfortunately for the Dark Lord, those were the days of chaos when his attention was mostly occupied elsewhere, and Lucius had had a long-running grudge against the Death Eaters assigned to accompany him—one neither of them knew about. He had waited until they had entered the shop and he was sure that all their attention was on Ollivander, and then had dispatched them smoothly with a Killing Curse to the back of each.

Ollivander had thought Lucius had done it to save his life, and therefore he owed him a wizard's debt. Lucius had hardly wanted to discourage the impression, keeping it in reserve as a favor he might use someday, and had even helped the wand-maker make it look as if he had fled before Lucius and the others arrived. The Dark Lord had just fought a battle against Dumbledore, and had accepted the report. Compared to destroying Dumbledore, Ollivander was a low priority.

Lucius had never found a use for the wizard's debt.

Until now.

His right hand pressed down insistently, and Lucius felt his lips part in a slashing smile. Acceptable, now that he was alone, and he had wards on the study that would have chimed in a moment to let him know if his son or wife had entered the hallway outside the door.

He had wanted vengeance when Narcissa told him about the loss of Potter's hand, but he had wanted to think his target over carefully. Narcissa had claimed her sister, as she had the right to do, and planned to keep her alive, torturing her delicately, drawing out the kill to give her as much pain as possible, inflicting more and more debilitating wounds as time passed. Lucius approved. He would do the same thing, but he had to figure out which one of his former comrades would give him the most pleasure.

Then had come the memories, and the news, from Snape, that Potter's parents and Dumbledore would be arrested for child abuse.

And Lucius's rage had shaped itself into a knife pointing straight at his targets.

Lily and James Potter.

There were some things one did not do. Lucius supposed some of his enemies might have laughed at the thought of a Death Eater having morals, but he did, of course. He honored his family, and he knew that older blood was better, and he disdained murder and torture that did not serve a cause.

And he knew that child abuse was wrong.

One did not torture one's children. Love for the children argued against it. Magic argued against it. The most basic common sense argued against it. Perhaps a Muggle could get away with abusing a child—Lucius did not really care to know what Muggles did, and for all he knew, abused Muggle children were as common as doxies—but not a wizard.

The family would be shattered. The family was supposed to be inviolate.

The children might react by losing most of their magic, if they were harassed and suppressed so much that they became quiet and cringing. Many supposed Squibs in the pureblood lines centuries ago had come fully into their magic once their abusive parents died, their power roaring up in them when they had the time and space to breathe. The laws against child abuse had originally come about for that reason.

Or the child might lash out, turn, turn dangerous. Wizarding parents should never forget they were raising potential wizards and witches. Lucius had seen the remains of parents whose children did not turn meek and cringing. Narcissa herself had been called home to help her cousins Capella and Canopus, Sirius Black's parents, when their son turned on them at last. She had come back white-faced and silent, but, once she could speak, gleeful. Lucius had listened to the description of their wounds with the keenest sense of justice imaginable.

And now...this.

That someone would abuse a child with Lord-level power was beyond comprehension. What would happen if he turned on them? For that matter, what would happen to the rest of the wizarding world if once he lost his temper, or even came into his power unexpectedly, late in life, uncontrolled?

From the information that Lucius had silently collected on Tom Riddle's background in the last few months, he could guess at the answer—and Riddle had been more neglected and not thought of than abused. It was a wonder that Potter had not become a monster.

And the waste, the sheer and utter waste. When any Dark pureblood family would have welcomed a child like Potter with rejoicing, would have lorded it over their friends and relatives with constant smugness, and would have snapped up the chance to adopt him and make him their own son if he had been free before this, the Potters had turned their backs on him and tried to interfere with the natural expression of such rich, deep magic. It was enough to make Lucius sick with fury.

Lucius was not unconscious of the fact that his son loved Potter, and that the boy could easily become part of their family, and that he already half was, with his links to the Malfoy wards. But that only made what he had chosen to do all the sweeter, since he could claim the privilege of revenge for himself. In any situation, at any moment, in any way, this would have been something Lucius would have risen against in his mind.

He would get one chance at Lily and James Potter, he thought, and no more, rather than the multiple ones that Narcissa planned to give herself with Bellatrix. The risk was too great to enter the Ministry many times. He would have to make it count. Rather than giving them one wound, and then returning to give them an even more devastating one, he would have to concentrate many rounds of torture into a few hours, and then finish things off with a curse that would kill them slowly, undetectably.

He knew how to do it. The books on medical magic waited patiently next to his chair.

He would need them, he found with mild surprise when he turned from looking out the window again. He had broken his left wrist with his pressing on it, and so great had been the haze of his anger that he had not noticed the pain.

Interlude: Special Order

To: Tertius Serpentigena

Coluber House

July 3rd, 1995

Dear Mr. Serpentigena:

This is simply a letter to confirm my order placed on the twenty-second of April. I had not heard anything from you since the original letter acknowledging that you had an Omen snake on hand, a laying female. Just to make matters clear, I wanted to request a young Omen snake, and neither an egg nor an adult female. All my research has made it clear how much depends on the young snake having his or her own mind before their choice of a partner is complete. An egg hatched by a certain person will result in an Omen snake too attached to that person, and most adults have chosen already, or never will. The need in this case is for a companion, a friend, not a mindless servant or a distant adviser.

Please acknowledge my letter, and inform me that you have such a snake on hand in Coluber House. If you do not, I must ask that you return the half of the payment I have given you directly.

Sincerely,

Draco Malfoy.

To: Draco Malfoy

Malfoy Manor

July 8th, 1995

Dear Mr. Malfoy:

I do indeed have several young Omen snakes on hand. My laying female's latest clutch has hatched, and I have been looking over the brood to see which would be most suitable. I have three females and one male, all a month old and very intelligent. Which one would interest you most?

Sincerely,

Tertius Serpentigena.

To: Tertius Serpentigena

Coluber House

July 11th, 1995

Dear Mr. Serpentigena:

For several reasons, a male snake is more desirable. Enclosed please find the second half of the payment, and I look forward to your delivery of the Omen snake no later than the morning of July 31st.

Sincerely,

Draco Malfoy.

Chapter Four: The Potter Alliance

Harry blinked, then blinked again. Somehow, of all the arguments he'd envisioned having with Narcissa Malfoy, this hadn't ever been one of them.

"But I could Floo over," he said, trying his most charming smile. Narcissa just gave him that long, slow look that told Harry she managed to see through most of his deceptions, and put down the scroll she'd held on the table. Harry's eyes darted to it, and then away again when he recognized Snape's handwriting. He did not ever want to know what Snape had written on those scrolls. Just looking at them, being reminded they existed, brought back the sting of betrayal more keenly than ever.

"The Weasleys have likely closed off access to their Floo Network except for utmost necessities," said Narcissa. "It is not inconceivable that your brother as well as you could be in danger from Voldemort, Harry, and they would know that."

"But the Burrow's protected by wards," Harry said. He knew that; Connor had reassured him of it when he said he was staying with the Weasleys for the summer. "We're not going to be in danger. I could send them an owl, and ask them to open their Floo at eleven or so, and I could go."

Narcissa shook her head, making her unbound hair ripple over her shoulders. "That's true. We could do that. Where is my mind today?" she murmured, massaging her forehead. Harry ventured no joke, because he was afraid of the answer. "However, I will still make sure the Aurors know where you are, Harry, and when you are likely to leave the Burrow, even if you will not permit them to actually escort you there. That way, you will have extra protection while you're outside the wards of Malfoy Manor."

Harry shook his head. "With all respect, Mrs. Malfoy—"

"Please, Harry. Call me Narcissa."

Harry nodded uncertainly. "All right, Narcissa," he said. "Will all respect, I don't see why the Aurors would be interested. They've got other things to do."

A strange expression crossed Narcissa's face. Harry regarded it suspiciously. He'd managed to survive the few days he'd been at the Manor by using his familiarity with Lucius and Narcissa's expressions and movements to guide him in what he should say and do. Draco was the only person he didn't have to do that with, which made him more relaxing to be around. Now Harry wondered if he hadn't spent too much time relaxing. Not knowing what Narcissa would do next left him feeling as if his stomach was disintegrating.

"The Aurors are part of the case against your parents, Harry," said Narcissa quietly. "They are watching the Manor in rotating pairs, and they asked to be informed if you went anywhere else. They want to protect you against people who might throw themselves at you, either in accusation or in misguided sympathy. I think my niece and Auror Mallory are on duty now. They've both been here far more often than any of the others."

Harry felt himself fighting the urge to squirm. He fought it off successfully. "All right, then," he said. "I'll send the Weasleys an owl, and ask them to open their Floo at eleven. I'll come back at three. Is that acceptable, Mrs. Malfoy?"

"It's acceptable," Narcissa murmured, and this time the expression was familiar—a sad one—but Harry could see no reason for her to be wearing it. He shied away when she reached out towards him. Narcissa sighed and placed her hand gently back in her lap. "Very well, Harry. Let me fetch you parchment and ink."

"I can get it myself. Thank you, Mrs. Malfoy." Harry smiled gratefully at her and went back to his room. He had two letters to write, two for Hedwig to deliver, and he would rather not have anyone know that he was sending the second one.

Harry stepped uncertainly out of the Burrow's fireplace. He wasn't sure what to expect, but it wasn't for his first sight of the house to be Molly Weasley's shoulders as she grabbed him and hugged him firmly.

“Oh, Harry,” she said, as she held him. Harry just barely managed not to kick and struggle and get away. Lately, most embraces did that to him, causing a rushing feeling of disorientation and panic. “Oh, we were so sorry to hear what happened. I still can’t believe that Albus...that Lily...I knew her in the Order, and she was so different...oh, Harry!”

And so on, until finally, when Harry thought an acceptable amount of time had passed, he pushed back a bit, and Molly let him go, tears streaming down her face as she sniffled. She leaned past him to close down access to the Floo, giving Harry a moment to both steady himself and survey the kitchen of the Burrow.

The cheerful sounds of the Wizarding Wireless Network slid across the kitchen, though at the angle he stood, Harry couldn’t see where they were coming from. Most of the room was taken up by a scrubbed table, with chairs shoved close around it. None of the people sitting there were talking now, instead turned towards him, with their expressions caught somewhere between solemn and hesitant, as if they didn’t know what they should say to him, but knew it had to be something grand. Ginny was gnawing her lip, the twins were staring steadily at Harry, and an older Weasley brother, with slightly longer hair than normal and a fang dangling from one ear, was sipping at his tea in deliberate swallows.

Molly broke the awkward moment by turning around again and sweeping Harry further into the room. “Well, you know Ginny, of course, Harry, and Fred and George. And this is my oldest son, Bill.”

Harry nodded cautiously to him. Though he hadn’t seen an updated list of Order of the Phoenix members in several years, he thought he remembered Lily mentioning that Bill Weasley was one. He wondered if Bill would be angry with him for getting Dumbledore sacked and imprisoned.

“Hello, Harry,” said Bill. If he was angry, there was no way of telling it. He stood and extended a hand, which Harry took. He made no attempt to turn it into a hug, and for that, Harry was extremely grateful.

“Heard about what happened to you. Awful,” he said simply. Harry relaxed a little further.

The twins whispered to each other, then one of them said, “We’ll go fetch ickle Ronnie and Connor. They didn’t think—”

“That you’d be on time,” finished the other, and they slipped out of the room.

Molly patted Harry’s head a few more times and shed a few more tears, then ordered Harry to sit down at the table so she could prepare some tea for him. Harry sat down and tried not to watch her. Narcissa never did her own cooking, of course, with house elves to do it for her. But Lily always had.

“Harry?”

He glanced up and met Ginny’s eyes. She had stopped gnawing her lip, and looked committed to whatever she was about to say. Harry braced himself. At least, once she had made an expression of sympathy or anger, it would be over, and then he wouldn’t have to listen to it anymore.

“I’m glad you came,” said Ginny quietly. “I think that Connor needed to see you, and you really look like you need to see him.”

Harry nodded.

“And I’m not going to say anything about your parents,” said Ginny. “They’re your parents, not mine.” She gave Harry a strained smile, then turned and followed the twins.

Molly had just plopped down a cup of tea in front of Harry, with an injunction to “Drink the whole thing, young man!” when Connor entered the room, with Ron a few paces behind him, at his right shoulder.

Harry hastily used his magic to levitate the teacup over and apparently hold it cradled in the glamour of his left hand. Connor was advancing with a fixed expression, and had seized his right hand tightly.

“Harry,” he said.

Harry found his throat closed. If he hadn’t wanted to talk to his brother so badly, he would have been prepared to dismiss this as a bad idea. As it was, he would just have to keep things going.

“Connor,” he said, after a cough, and glanced at Ron. Ron just gave him a look that had too much understanding in it. Harry lowered his head. “Is there some place where we can talk in private?” he asked.

“Harry!” scolded Molly. “You haven’t finished your tea yet.”

Harry hunched his shoulders. He didn’t like all this pressing closeness. He wanted to run from it, to go someplace where no one could see him and he could hide for a time. Draco had been letting him do that at Malfoy Manor lately. Harry did not know how he was going to get through four hours here.

Abruptly, Harry’s cup wavered and lurched and spilled on the table. Bill put down his wand, looking extremely surprised.

“Well, that was clumsy of me,” he said. “I was trying to bring the kettle to me, but I got Harry’s cup instead.” He winked at Harry as his mother went on a tirade that included the words “earring” and “no sense” and many another familiar topic about which she had apparently just been waiting to scold Bill. That gave Harry and Connor an opportunity to sneak out through the door. Ron remained behind, though Harry could feel his eyes every step of the way.

In the Weasleys’ garden, the shimmer of isolation wards was visible, more than familiar to Harry from the long childhood spent in Godric’s Hollow. Connor sighed and stuck his hands in his pockets, closing his eyes. As was usual with him over the holidays, he wore Muggle clothes, not robes.

"I love the Weasleys, but sometimes they get to be a little much," he said. "And you looked like you were about to vomit or something." He threw Harry a cautious look. "Are you going to start, or should I?"

Harry found that he had to start, because there was one question that he needed to ask above all others. "I can understand Mum, and even Dumbledore," he said. "But why did you show that letter from Dad to Snape?"

He had expected astonishment, or hurt, or perhaps some self-righteous tirade about how much James deserved it. He had not expected Connor swinging around and gripping his arms, staring hard into his eyes, nor for his anger to be a diamond-edged rage.

"Because I'm sick and tired of the way he wavers," Connor said, every word grinding out between his teeth. "He never makes up his mind permanently. Something always happens to change it. He was perfectly content to live with Lily until he found out about the abuse—"

"Connor, don't call it that—"

"I have a perfect right to call it whatever I want." Connor's chin lifted. "I was living in that house, too, and it happened to me, too."

Harry tugged fretfully against the hold his brother had on his arms. "But he was trying to reconcile with us."

"I haven't finished yet," said Connor. "Then he couldn't even make up his own mind, even when you used the justice ritual on Lily's magic, and he knew you'd used it. He had to go through the Maze to make his decision. And then his resolve to be a good father lasted—what? A month, I think."

"Longer than that—"

"You're forgetting that he never wrote to you while you were with Snape last summer." Connor lifted his head and tossed it like an impatient horse, making his fringe fly off his scar. "Because he was childish, and wanted you to write him first. And he just had to write insulting letters to Snape, didn't he? Now, I don't think Snape's an adult either, really, but James should have known better, if he really was the kind of man he said he was after the Maze. And he didn't. And he kept on not knowing better. He tried to take you away from Snape without even asking if you wanted to be taken away, and then repaid your healing him with filing charges against Snape."

"But that's one of the things that makes this so bad," said Harry, determined to get a word in edgewise. "That it was Snape who filed the charges, I mean. Dad thinks this is just some part of a great scheme against him, that Snape did it out of revenge."

"Well, yes, he would think that," said Connor dismissively. "Because he's a self-centered prat who never grew up."

Harry stared at his brother, well aware that his mouth was hanging slightly open. "But you love Dad," he said. "And you've never liked Snape."

Connor blinked a bit, then abruptly let him go and whirled away, kicking at the ground. He managed to get a gnome who was just peering out in the head, and it uttered a thin little scream and ducked away. Harry kept still, staring at his brother's back, knowing he had done something wrong, but not sure what.

"How dare you," said Connor evenly, looking over his shoulder, "think that I can't recognize right and wrong because of that."

"I never meant to suggest that!" Harry protested. All the words out of my mouth are wrong lately, unless I'm speaking them to Draco. I can't convince Snape to drop the charges, and I can't convince Scrimgeour to do it, either, and I couldn't convince Dad that I didn't intend for this to happen. "I only meant to say that I didn't know you'd do this. And he was getting better, Connor. He really was. Remember the way he was concerned for us at Easter? And you should see some of the letters that he wrote me after the Second Task in the Triwizard Tournament—"

"And then he turned against you again," said Connor, "when you went to the Ministry the night they were arrested."

“How did you know about that?” Harry asked.

“I’m keeping in contact with Scrimgeour and the Aurors,” said Connor. “I’m interested in the progress of this trial, Harry, and I want to know everything I can about the procedures. You do realize that they’ll want to interview us before the trial actually begins? A few times, probably. Child abuse cases are very delicate. They’ll want to know what details we can speak about in public and which we absolutely can’t. I think Madam Shiverwood of the Department of Magical Family and Child Services will probably do it herself. After all, this is the family of the Boy-Who-Lived. Very high profile.”

Harry nodded slightly. “I guessed that.” It was the reason he’d been reading the books about interrogation techniques he’d found at Malfoy Manor. He would know what Madam Shiverwood was looking for, what signs would convince her he’d taken trauma from the abuse, and he planned to not display them. He knew he couldn’t stop the trial from occurring, and he couldn’t change the fact that they knew about his training now, but he could soften the blow. There weren’t many people who knew how he’d been affected by that training. The memories Snape had written down were only memories, and prejudiced by his perspective besides. If Harry could show he’d come out of those memories completely untraumatized, then he might encourage the Wizengamot and anyone who advised them, like Madam Shiverwood, to leniency.

He wouldn’t let them make him into a victim. He wouldn’t.

“Harry?”

Harry lifted his head and blinked. He hadn’t realized he’d been standing in the middle of the Weasleys’ garden staring at his feet. Nor had he realized that a beetle was zipping around his head, wings fanning his face purposefully, until he saw Connor’s amused gaze. The isolation wards didn’t keep animals out, Harry supposed, which was how his owl had been able to get through them.

As it happened, he’d sent a letter to Rita Skeeter asking her to come to the Burrow around noon in her Animagus form.

“Connor,” he said softly, “I have to do something important. Will you please go inside and leave me out here?”

Connor narrowed his eyes. “Harry—“

“I promise it doesn’t involve Apparating to the Ministry and trying to free Mum and Dad and Dumbledore,” said Harry, with a smile that it hurt his face to give. “Nor does it involve hypnotizing myself to forget everything that happened in the past fourteen years. I know there are Aurors watching me, and I’m not going to try to get away from them. I just want to talk with someone. Please?”

Connor sighed, and nodded at him, and then gave him an abrupt hug that ended before Harry thought to pull away from it. “I wish you would accept more comfort than you let yourself,” he said, giving Harry a sad look that Harry couldn’t meet. “And, in fact, just to answer your question about James, yes, I do think he was trying to reconcile with us. But then he would have just turned away again the next moment some great pressure came and sat on him. He’s not dependable, Harry, and he’s a party to child abuse. That’s more than enough to convict him.”

Harry didn’t respond, though the beetle let out a shrill, high-pitched buzz that Harry could almost imagine was prurient interest. Connor didn’t seem to be waiting for an answer. He just nodded at Harry and walked towards the door of the Burrow, though he paused to add, “Don’t be too long, Harry. Mrs. Weasley makes the most fantastic meals.” He wore a dreamy expression as he shut the door behind him.

Harry immediately paced behind one of the thick old trees, so that Skeeter could change back without revealing she was an Animagus to do it. The reporter was walking beside him a moment later, patting at her thick blonde curls as if to make sure they hadn’t managed to tear themselves free. Her acid-green quill and her notebook were already hovering beside her.

“You had a story for me?” she asked Harry, staring directly into his face. “I suppose that you want to give your personal perspective on the story your brother spread around?”

“In a way,” said Harry, grateful again that he’d made Skeeter’s acquaintance. “I do want to give you an interview, or an article if you think that would do more good than an interview, and have you print it.”

Skeeter snorted and sat down on the tangled grass that covered the bank of a large pond. “Either would do plenty of good. Everyone’s going mad over this story. Honeywhistle grabbed the front page from me today, but she’s not going to do that all the time. I just have to get a unique angle or something no one else knows, and we’re off to the races.” She looked expectantly at Harry.

Harry nodded as he dropped down opposite her. “Then the interview. You ask me some questions, and I’ll give you honest answers.”

He could see Skeeter’s nose twitching, like the nose of a rat who scented cheese, and suspected she wanted to know why he was doing this. But, in the end, reporter’s curiosity proved too much. Besides, he could almost hear her thinking, it would get her the front page. Why should she care how she got it? Her newfound commitment to truth wouldn’t have limited her ambition.

“All right, then. How do you feel about the abuse being front-page news?” Skeeter asked.

Harry concealed a flinch as best he could at this evidence that Skeeter, too, was misunderstanding the situation. But that was why he’d sent his letter to her. He wanted everyone to know the real truth, and this was his best chance to do it.

I wish you wouldn’t do this, Regulus whispered in his head. He wasn’t often there anymore, and he sounded exhausted when he was. He said that Harry’s refusal to see the truth wearied him. You know she’ll refuse to print it.

No, she won’t, Harry thought at him, and told Skeeter, “It’s horrible. I don’t like the attention. And what makes it even worse is that everyone is misunderstanding the situation.”

Skeeter's eyebrows shot up eagerly as her quill dashed across the paper. "What do you mean by that, Mr. Potter?" she asked, in a soothing, professional voice.

"I wasn't abused," said Harry.

Skeeter paused. Her quill stopped scribbling. She frowned at Harry as if he were an unknown species of beetle who'd flown up and tried to communicate with her while she was in her Animagus form. "Yes, you were," she said.

Merlin, not her, too. Harry kept his face still, though. Even if Skeeter privately believed something different, he knew that she could spin the truth. They'd done it successfully after Fudge had abducted him. "No, I really wasn't," he said. "Do you know what the purpose of my training was?"

"Is that what you call it?" The quill made a note, which caused Harry to relax. They were back on track now.

"Yes," said Harry, "because that's what it was. My brother is the Boy-Who-Lived, you know—of course you know that—and my parents were worried that Voldemort might come back and kill him. So they trained me to help protect him." He winced at this betrayal of one of his old vows, but that was, essentially, one that had got broken when he was still a student in first year. "I had powerful magic, and I wasn't the Boy-Who-Lived. I could help. So that was what the training was about, and of course it was strict. After all, how do you make a child understand that life and death are at stake if you aren't strict?"

Harry was proud of himself for that. He'd got to the end of the speech without his voice wavering or breaking. He sounded as if he were fondly amused with himself, rather like a parent. He looked up to meet Skeeter's eyes.

Skeeter hadn't written anything of his speech down. She sat back, with her arms folded, and she was glaring at him through her ridiculously large glasses.

"I'm not publishing that," she said.

Harry swallowed. "But it's the truth."

"It's how you see things," Skeeter corrected him. "I've heard and seen the most awful things about your past, Potter. You were abused. Even that article you gave me to blackmail your father with showed it. I didn't know anything for certain then, or I would have gone ahead and pushed and exposed it." For a moment, a dreamy expression covered her face. "That would be something, to have discovered it all by myself," she muttered, and then shook her head. "The thing is, I do have morals, even if you don't think I do. And I can recognize child abuse, because I've covered cases of it before. True, the parents are usually slapping the children around or raping them instead of—this. But this is still abuse, Potter."

"You said that you would print an interview with me." Harry clung to the slender threads of hope he'd first spun when he summoned Skeeter here. This was one of the few chances that he might have to influence the course of the trial in public. Most of the people around him would be howling for blood and refusing to acknowledge the nuances of the situation. Even Draco didn't agree with him about those nuances, though Harry only knew that from long, slow looks that reminded him of those long, slow looks of his mother's. "And that's what I really believe. I promise you."

"It's what you believe because your parents and your Headmaster trained you to believe it," said Skeeter, and now she was looking straight at him, and there was pity in her eyes.

"No, it's what I believe because that's who I am," Harry retorted, stung. Do they really think I'm no more than a mindless puppet of my parents? That rather diminishes the heroic light they want to cast me in. "And because I was the one who lived through it. I ought to know what I went through if anyone does."

"Abused children are often among the last to recognize their situation," said Skeeter, as if she were quoting a long-established truth. "I'm sorry, Potter. I'm not going to print what you just told me. The most I could do with it would be to print that you believed it, and no one else would believe it with you."

“My parents and the Headmaster must have allies—“

Skeeter snorted. “And do you think that they’re getting an airing right now, Potter? Yes, there are some people who will testify on their behalf. But this is news. The respected Headmaster and Light Lord an abuser of children! James and Lily Potter, whom everyone was sure must have been model parents to have raised the Boy-Who-Lived and the Young Hero—“

“Merlin, I’m not—“

Skeeter ignored him. “And it turns out they’ve been savagely abusing their children all along. No.” She stood. “I suppose that you might be able to change people’s minds in a short time, but not now. And I’m not going to be the one to help you change them. Your parents and Dumbledore deserve everything they get.”

“Skeeter—“ Harry could not believe she was doing this. Yes, he could see her point about covering child abuse cases in the past, but he had been sure that once he explained this wasn’t really a child abuse case, she would be amenable to doing as he asked. It would help her, too.

“No, Potter,” she said. “Talk to someone else about this. I won’t prevent that.” She made a disgusted noise deep in her throat. “As if I could prevent Honeywhistle and the rest from rolling dung every chance they get, anyway,” she said. “But I won’t join them anymore. I made myself a promise about a year ago, and I’ve kept my word so far. I’m not going to either make you look more like a victim than you are or like less of one. I want to print the truth, Potter, and there’s plenty of that still left.” She nodded at him, and then faded into her beetle form and was gone.

Harry sat in silence, staring at his hands, both false and real. A rustle of wings obscured his vision a few minutes later—at least, he thought it was a few minutes later—and Regina, Narcissa’s owl, landed beside him.

Harry unfolded her note with a feeling of dread, only accented by the sharp strokes with which Narcissa had written it.

Harry—

I did the best I could to keep them off until you were recovered, but seven of the wizards and witches from the alliance list I've created are here. They're willing to wait until you return, and only one of them, Henrietta Bulstrode, insists on meeting you outside a common introduction. But they're tired of excuses, and they're going to be looking for blood.

I'm sorry. I know this is very far from the best day.

Narcissa Malfoy.

Harry nodded to Regina, said, "No response," and watched as she climbed back into the air. He stared at the sun until his eyes watered and ran from that, and that only. Then he stood and walked back into the Burrow.

He would live. He would get through this. He would bear with the trial, and the Weasleys, and his new allies, and all that they could throw at him.

And if one tactic for convincing people of the truth failed, then he would just try another.

"Mr. Potter. I'm so happy to meet you. I've been waiting a long time."

Harry held his chin up as he extended his hand. He had got through lunch with the Weasleys, as well as an impromptu game of Quidditch and "invitations" from the twins to try out their latest jokes, on sheer willpower. At least, with this woman, he could use the formal pureblood dances to bolster him. "Merlin's smile on you, lady," he murmured. "I am sure I must have been waiting a long time to meet you as well, though I did not know it."

The woman walking across the anteroom to meet him buzzed like a swam of locusts, her magic lifting around her as she smiled. Harry would have known at once that she was trouble, even if her reputation hadn't preceded her. Her magic was either as strong as Auror Mallory's or not a good deal weaker. And she moved with the graceful, easy stride of a predator, fully in tune with her magic and confident of its possibilities.

Henrietta Bulstrode, Harry remembered as she took his wrist and he lifted her hand to his lips, was Adalrico's second cousin—and thus distant enough from his immediate family that the alliance Harry had made with Adalrico, Elfrida, Millicent, and Marian didn't affect her. She was an astoundingly forceful woman, and if she didn't get her will one way, she would another. She'd never been a Death Eater because she killed three of them when they tried to recruit her.

Harry could remember being told that, but not that Henrietta was beautiful, with dark red hair on the edge of black and brown eyes like severing curses, and obviously used to using the beauty to get her own way. Or that her gaze flickered across Harry's face and read several clues there that lit her expression with a fire Harry recognized. He'd last seen that flame burning behind Dumbledore's eyes. Henrietta Bulstrode was an emotional manipulator, and would try to use any knowledge he gave her as a weapon, to better secure her own position.

No wonder Narcissa, standing politely in the far corner of the room while Henrietta introduced herself, looked so strained.

And no wonder that Henrietta began at once. "I was so sorry to hear about your parents, Mr. Potter," she murmured. "That must have been hard, to have everyone finding out about the abuse all at once."

Harry tensed, and did not let her see it. This would be shattering. After he greeted Henrietta, he had to go into the room behind her and meet his other new allies, as well as Hawthorn Parkinson, Adalrico and his family, and Arabella Zabini.

You'll survive. It's what you do best.

"The hardest thing was the betrayal," he said. "To have my guardian give them up. I don't like traitors much."

Henrietta gave a quiver like a hunting hound straining against a leash, obviously eager for this dance to begin. "I should hope that you would never have to fear them again, Mr. Potter," she said, as he let go of her hand.

Unless you're weak enough to deserve to fear them.

Harry could hear the words, and knew she knew that, and suppressed the urge to run away somewhere and hide his head in the sand. He wanted to curl up in Draco's arms and sleep for a week. He wanted to cry. He wanted to just let the gathered pieces of himself collapse to the ground and wake up from this living nightmare.

But that was not going to happen. So he twisted his mind to meet the brutal dance that was upcoming.

"I do not fear traitors," he said, giving the verb a light garnishing of emphasis that Henrietta would pick up. "Shall we meet the others, Mrs. Bulstrode?"

"In the Potter Alliance, you mean?" Henrietta had a small smile on her face. "Of course. Lead the way, Mr. Potter." She could inflect her own verbs ironically, too, Harry thought.

He nodded to her, and went towards the sitting room where his allies awaited him, prepared to dance among knives.

Chapter Five: Change As the Winds Change

This room was not one that Harry had seen before, or perhaps it only looked different with so many people crowded into it. Harry didn't have time to stare at the walls and figure that out. He was much too busy studying the people in the room with him, seated just far enough apart around a delicately carved wooden table to avoid crowding, and deciding whom he knew and whom he didn't.

Hawthorn Parkinson was sitting on the side nearest him, her head turned to study him with intense hazel eyes. Harry knew part of their ferocity came from the impending full moon, and perhaps another part from seeing Henrietta Bulstrode behind him, but he feared at least half came from those memories she would have read. He dipped his head and looked carefully away from her.

The foot of the table, including one empty chair they must have left for Henrietta, was a mass of unfamiliar wizards and witches. Harry made out two other women, one of them marked by a springing mass of red curls, and four men, all of them dark-haired and more or less calm. Next to one of the men sat a dark-haired boy, bolt upright and staring at Harry with undisguised fascination. A slender, pretty girl had a chair behind another of the wizards, and close by the empty one was a girl at least a few years younger than Harry, her hands clasped together and her eyes on the floor. Harry nodded once to all of them in a general introduction, knowing he would have to meet them individually in a few short moments, and turned his attention to the other side of the table.

Oddly, it was a gaze from that direction that nearly broke him. Oh, not Lucius Malfoy, and not Arabella Zabini's solemn look, and not Adalrico or Millicent. It was Elfrida Bulstrode, cradling a small shape on her arm that could only be her daughter Marian. Her eyes held a world of compassion that implored Harry to relax without making him feel as if she pitied him.

Harry looked quickly away. He didn't want to seem rude, but, on the other hand, the last thing the alliance could afford was to have him break down because he badly wanted to talk to Millicent's mother alone.

"I am very pleased to meet you," he said, lifting his chin. "My name is Harry Potter, as you will know by now, elder son of Lily and James Potter, elder brother of the Boy-Who-Lived."

"Son of a neglectful pureblood and abusive Muggleborn," said Henrietta, just loud enough that it was hard to tell who had heard, as she slid past him to resume her seat at the bottom of the table.

Harry had been prepared for her to say something like that, though—he had her measure now—and simply inclined his head, perhaps responding to her comment and perhaps not. "Some of you I know already," he said, and turned to smile at Hawthorn. "Mrs. Parkinson. I hope you have rested well in the wake of recent events?" He wasn't sure how many people here would know about the death of her husband Dragonsbane, and he wasn't about to expose it if she'd chosen to hide it.

"I have, Mr. Potter," said Hawthorn. She had long since started calling him by his first name, but that was in front of more trusted allies than these, Harry thought. Right now, she would not appear to weaken him by calling him anything familiar. "Thank you for asking."

Harry nodded, and then looked over at the Bulstrodes, deliberately meeting Adalrico's eyes and not Elfrida's. No one would think that strange. Elfrida was puellaris, devoted to the protection of her children, and deliberately supposed to appear timid and meek in public. Certainly the other allies would not expect her to take the lead in anything that happened today. "Mr. Bulstrode. I hope that I find you, your wife, and your heirs well?" It was no exposure to say that Marian was a magical heir, either; she must be, or she would not have been here.

"You do." Adalrico was staring searchingly at him, as if looking for weakness. Harry raised his chin. Search as you will, sir, you will not find it here. I am determined that I will not let you down.

"Good," said Harry, and moved on to Arabella Zabini. She had her hair done up in bells to prove that she was a Songstress—or so Harry assumed, since the bells were both larger and made of richer metal than he had seen her wear at Walpurgis Night or the Halloween meeting last year. “Mrs. Zabini. I was saddened to hear about the raid on your home. Are you any closer to catching the perpetrators?”

“I do believe that I know who they were.” Arabella gave him a charming smile. She was a beautiful woman, though Harry wondered how anyone could be lovely enough to snare the seven husbands she’d poisoned. “And my vengeance will take them when I am ready. Thank you for asking, Mr. Potter.”

Harry nodded at Lucius, and then turned to face the wizards and witches he did not know. “Sirs, madams,” he said. “Mrs. Malfoy tells me that you are willing to ally with me. But I know only names on a list, and very little about who you are and what you stand for as yet. If you would introduce yourselves?”

He turned to the wizard sitting closest to Lucius, who stood up at once, with a faint smile on his face as he examined Harry. His hair, eyes, and skin were all dark enough to suggest some ancestry not entirely British, which Harry had confirmed as soon as he murmured, “Thomas Rhangnara.” He glanced at the girl sitting behind his chair. “And this is my daughter and magical heir, Rose.”

The girl curtsied. Harry cocked his head at Thomas, whom he knew was the descendant of an Indian wizard who’d fled to Britain more than a hundred years ago. “If you don’t mind my asking, sir, I was unaware that your family claimed any particular allegiance to Light or Dark. What changed your mind?”

“I’ve spent most of my life trying to understand the difference between Light and Dark,” said Thomas simply. He still hadn’t stopped smiling, though his smile had a dreamy and more thoughtful edge to it now, as though he were thinking of something other than just the conversation in front of him. “And now I’ve finally decided that the Dark makes more sense.” He turned his hands up in front of him, as though he were surrendering, but the glow in his eyes said that wasn’t it. “Did you know that Merlin most probably united Dark and Light qualities within himself? And that no formal philosophy of the Light was formed until the middle of the thirteenth century, with no formal philosophy of the Dark coming until later? That—“

“Father,” said Rose Rhangnara, laying a hand on her father’s arm and giving Harry a look somewhere between embarrassed and apologetic. “I don’t think that Mr. Potter wants to hear all about your studies. He has other people to meet, after all.”

Thomas blinked, then smiled at his daughter, a more “present” smile than the other one he’d used. “You’re right, of course, my dear. Sorry,” he added to Harry, and then sat down.

Harry was breathing more easily than he’d expected as he turned to the next wizard in line. He thought he might like Thomas Rhangnara, though admittedly, the man might be the kind of distant philosopher who valued lives less than books, and that could cause problems.

This next wizard, from the white streaks in his dark hair, was older, enough that he evidently felt he could nod to Harry with a slightly condescending look on his face, and didn’t need to rise. “Edward Burke,” he declared, then paused as though to let Harry make the obvious connection. When Harry said nothing in the next moment, Burke prompted, “Grandson of Herbert Burke, who married Belvina Black.”

Harry made a slight “ah” noise under his breath, even as Regulus sneered in his head. Of course he wants to claim some connection. The Burke family is hardly distinguished enough on its own to merit anyone’s notice.

Who’s being a proud pureblood now? Harry snapped back at him, and nodded slightly to Burke. “We’re honored to have you, sir. You are Declared Dark, I take it, and eager to renew your participation in politics?” One thing he knew for certain was that Burke was no Death Eater. He didn’t get the slight tingling buzz in his scar that he did when he focused on Adalrico, Hawthorn, or Lucius.

“Yes.” Burke frowned at Harry a bit. “And I have been most unfairly ignored, I must say. I was an Auror until Scrimgeour sacked me for using a bit of Dark magic on a prisoner. And until young Narcissa remembered me, I thought I would end my days in isolation. Really, anyone who approaches me and has the benefit of my experience would be gaining an invaluable ally, but not many people in the last twenty years have realized that.”

Very proud, Harry noted, in the corner of his brain where he remembered things like that. Handle him with care. “I shall remember that, sir, and I’m sure that we’ll call on you for many things as the months go by,” he said smoothly, and then faced the young witch who sat at Burke’s side even as he nodded in satisfaction.

This witch grinned at him. She had golden curls favored with the slightest touch of red, and incisive blue eyes, and a lion pendant hanging around her neck. It wasn’t until Harry concentrated on it that he realized the pendant was a glamour. It glittered as realistically as it should have, were it really made of silver, but it passed through the top of her shirt instead of bouncing off it as she stood and made him a little impromptu curtsy.

“My name is Honoria Pemberley,” she said. “And because I think that you must be tired of pompous speeches already—it doesn’t take much to get me tired of them, I know—I’ll just tell you everything that you need to know about me in short bursts.” She rattled the next words off, as an illusion of a crown came into being above her head and then melted away in shimmers of gold and silver that became dancing serpents on her shoulders. “Gryffindor when I was in Hogwarts. Half-blood; my mother is a Muggle.” Burke gave her a startled look and edged an inch away from her, which Honoria ignored merrily, though one of her illusory snakes stuck its tongue out at him. “Experienced illusionist, as you can see. Declared Dark because someone told me once that no halfbloods were ever Dark, which is just stupid.”

Harry stared hard at her. She caught his eye and flicked her own gaze towards his left hand. Yes, her face said, she knew, but she wouldn’t tell anyone. Unless it would be more fun that way, maybe.

Harry nodded cautiously back. He wasn’t sure how far he could trust her.

“Tybalt Starrise sends his regards, by the way,” Honoria added. “He’s one of my best friends.”

That only increased Harry's unease. Tybalt Starrise was not the...steadiest wizard in the world. Still, this meant that Honoria had connections with both Light and Dark families. That could make her useful to the alliance in the future.

"Welcome, Madam Pemberley," he began.

"Call me Honoria, please," said Honoria, and flicked her hair over her shoulder, at the same moment as two small bears stood up on her shoulders to dance. "Madam Pemberley is my mother, and I wish her joy of the title."

There's a story there, I think, Harry mused, but nodded. "Welcome, Honoria. I hope you find plenty of entertainment here," he couldn't help adding.

She grinned at him and sat down again. Henrietta was next, but she only nodded coolly to the girl sitting behind her.

"Mr. Potter and I have already met," she said, managing to make it sound like a special privilege instead of something she had arranged. "But he has not met my daughter Edith, my magical heir. Edith, stand up and curtsy for Mr. Potter."

Her voice held the snap of someone expecting instant obedience, and Edith did indeed obey at once, trembling a little as she stood. Harry didn't think she could be more than thirteen, and he was certain that she must attend Durmstrang or Beauxbatons, since he'd never seen her at Hogwarts. Her eyes rose to his face, huge and wondering, and then slid away again as her mother commanded her back to her chair with a subtle pinch to her elbow.

Harry was already certain, as Henrietta Bulstrode sat down and focused on him, that he did not like her very much.

He moved past the awkward moment by looking at the thin and very neatly attired wizard next to Henrietta. He just bowed his head an inch, without bothering to stand up. His face had a cultivated bored expression. His eyes were green, Harry thought, or that shade of blue that could shift to green with the right light. His hair was dark and bound with a curling serpent of silver.

“Mortimer Belville,” he said, and then paused, as though that should be enough for Harry to know who he was.

Harry simply nodded, not revealing his private thoughts. His mother had told him of the Belvilles, a mostly older family, with Mortimer their only heir. Mortimer was Snape’s age, and had never married or joined. He seemed to like the thought of playing around and teasing his older relatives with the prospect of the family line not continuing until he was in his fifties or so.

He had also fled the country during Voldemort’s War—no, during the First War, Harry supposed he must call it now. Taken no stand at all, and exhibited neither courage of conviction nor of principle. Harry supposed he could think of him as sensible, but he didn’t think he could trust him to stand firm.

Well, needs must when the nundu comes prowling, he thought, and nodded to Mortimer. “Mr. Belville,” he said. “I have heard much about you.” He left Mortimer looking pleased, though Henrietta appeared an inch from laughter, and focused on the red-haired witch.

She stood and gave him a different bow than the others, her hands clasped in front of her as though cupping a bowl of water. “Ignifer Apollonis.”

Harry knew that he blinked and stared, but he couldn’t really help that, either. It wasn’t every day that he met someone his mother had used to frighten him with childhood tales of—someone who had been reared Light, in one of the oldest and proudest pureblood families of Ireland, and then turned to the Dark when she was nearly twenty.

Ignifer’s hair was red, her eyes golden, and her English very slightly accented with something that didn’t sound like the usual Irish lilt. Harry supposed there was some truth to the idea that the Apollonis children were taught to speak Latin before any other language. She stood very straight when she recovered from the bow, and Harry could see no trace of any sense of humor in her face. He supposed she was another person he would have to handle carefully.

He thought for a moment, and found the greeting words that were used for a powerful, potentially unfriendly Dark witch met under unfamiliar circumstances. "May you have dark water and stones, my lady, to quench your thirst and test your strength."

The faintest of smiles crossed Ignifer's face, like sunlight in midwinter. "Thank you, Mr. Potter," she said, and then sat back down, evidently pleased that he took her as a Dark witch, without pausing to question her Light heritage. Harry doubted the impression would last long, though. Ignifer struck him as too inflexible for that.

"Mr. Potter."

Harry turned to look at the last wizard, the one with the boy behind him. He had dark hair and eyes that looked familiar, though Harry couldn't say why until the wizard rose, bowed, and said, "Charles Rosier-Henlin." He did look something like a saner Evan Rosier.

Charles straightened back up and locked eyes with Harry in an intense, testing gaze. Harry felt the brush of Legilimency, and bounced it off without thought, using a milder Occlumency shield than usual, just so that he wouldn't bruise his ally's mind. Charles blinked, but turned without explanation to introduce his son. "This is Owen, the elder of my twin boys and my magical heir. You wouldn't have met him. He's attended Durmstrang all his life."

Owen nodded to Harry. Harry thought he was a year older than himself, but he too obviously had to subdue awe. "Heard about what you did in the Triwizard Tournament," he murmured. "Wonderful, Potter." He looked away again the moment he could politely do so.

Harry hoped he hid a frown. He didn't want the kind of constant, subtle testing from his allies that Henrietta seemed prone to, but neither did he want cringing or fawning. Why they couldn't simply be equals, true allies, was beyond him. His own power was set off by his youth and the stories circulating about him right now.

"Welcome, sir," he told Charles. "And I hope to know your son better. Do you play Quidditch, Owen?"

That brought Owen's head up in startlement. "Beater," he said, without thinking about it, and then flushed. "You?"

"Seeker for Slytherin," said Harry, with an encouraging smile. "Though probably not half as good as Viktor Krum. I saw him at the Quidditch World Cup this past summer."

Owen relaxed a bit, and nodded. "And doesn't he know that he's good! I'm almost glad that he'll be gone this year, even though it'll make our trainers harder on us all, so that we can have another player as good as he was."

Harry clucked his tongue. "I know all about that," he said, thinking of the way Snape had encouraged him to play Quidditch, and win, against his will. These memories were distant enough that they didn't cause him as much pain. "Sometimes we forget it's supposed to be a team effort, I think, with all the focus on individual positions."

"Funny," Henrietta murmured, a touch of poison in her voice. "I hadn't thought that we came here to discuss Quidditch."

Owen flushed, and Charles snapped his head to the side to glare, but Harry was actually grateful that she'd interrupted there rather than elsewhere in the conversation. It made a graceful segue. "No," he said equably. "But we came here to discuss a team effort, Mrs. Bulstrode, I think."

He turned and took the chair at the head of the table, beside Narcissa, silently calling for Fawkes as he did so. The phoenix alighted on his shoulder with a croon a moment later, and Harry scratched his feathers, smiling as he noticed that Burke, Henrietta, and Mortimer had all jumped, but that Owen was staring at the phoenix in fascination, and Honoria in delight. A moment later, the illusions around Honoria began to swarm with red and gold flames just the same color as Fawkes's feathers. Fawkes squawked at her, and Honoria opened her mouth in a soundless laugh.

“We came here to discuss our alliance,” said Harry, raising his brows and looking from face to face as he waited for an interruption. He found none ready and waiting, so he nodded. “We may as well do so.”

It was getting harder and harder for Hawthorn to sit on her anger and worry.

Since she had read the memories Snape had sent her, she had wanted to kill something. The urge only grew worse as the full moon came nearer, and the wolf inside her joined its voice to hers, whispering, urging her on a quest for blood and raw flesh, preferably still screaming as it went down her throat.

Hawthorn wanted to rip apart Harry’s parents for what they had done, and Headmaster Dumbledore for what he had done, and anyone who had had anything to do with the concealment of this, and she had believed that she knew what rage was when she felt this emotion.

But no, she hadn’t. She didn’t know what rage was until she watched Harry walk into the meeting room at Malfoy Manor and confront his new allies.

She could only stare and murmur a few inconsequential words when Harry greeted her. She was nearly sick with the scents of pain and exhaustion and panic swarming around him. Sometimes, having a werewolf’s nose was a blessing, but not this time. She knew exactly how much Harry needed to rest, and it was distracting her during a very important time.

That wouldn’t do.

By the time Harry had worked his way around the table to Honoria Pemberley, Hawthorn had got control of herself back, but that just meant she had more room to focus on Henrietta Bulstrode and snarl a bit. She didn’t trust the woman. She wasn’t sure why Narcissa had included her in her recruitment efforts, save that she was too powerful to be ignored.

Calm, Hawthorn ordered herself sharply. You're thinking and reacting as though Harry were your own son, instead of your leader. He needs your support now, not you snapping out of your chair because you're angry every time someone acts like the witch or wizard you know they are. That means that if Henrietta challenges his authority, you come up with plans to help deflect her challenges.

But it was hard, it was very hard, to watch Harry take his place and know how badly he needed help—and that he couldn't show any of that, lest someone should take advantage of it and use it to harm him.

Perhaps this is what was missing from my alliance with Voldemort. The thought darted unexpectedly into Hawthorn's head as the phoenix appeared on his shoulder and Harry began to speak. This feeling of actual protectiveness, love, comradeship. I know that we told Harry the wizards and witches who follow and protect someone with Lord-level power are supposed to be companions, not just the mindless lackeys Voldemort made the Death Eaters into, but I didn't know I would ever feel this so strongly.

She found some comfort in that idea, though it would have been easier without the wolf in her head snarling blood, kill, murder them, bite them...

Harry could see no better way to start than with honesty. There were some things that he would need to conceal, of course, but what he could tell, he should. That way, any of his new allies—he couldn't help flicking a glance at Henrietta—who were dissatisfied with the way he saw things could abandon him now, without claiming they'd been deceived and becoming traitors.

"First of all, just to clear up any misconceptions, I am not going to become a Dark Lord," he began. "I'm not going to Declare for either Dark or Light, and I'm not going to become a Lord. And I am fighting Voldemort." Most everybody still flinched at the name, save the people who had been Death Eaters. Harry noted that. He wouldn't want to use it too often, but as a weapon to throw people off balance, it could be useful. "If you do need to follow a Lord, or you entertain some hope of compromise with that madman, then you need to leave the alliance."

He paused. No one made for the door. Of course, these were Dark wizards and witches accustomed to seeking advantage wherever they could find it, with perhaps the exception of Ignifer. He was not going to flush them out so easily.

So he went for another tactic.

"I don't intend for my war against Voldemort to be reactive, either," he said quietly. "I will carry this on the offensive." He was getting stares even from his long-time allies for that declaration, Harry knew. He supposed it came from their knowledge of his past and their assuming he would be preoccupied in dealing with that. Well, they were wrong. He would not let the people who were so eager to make him a victim define him that way. "I have an advantage that will allow me to do that."

He waited a moment, wondering who would ask it.

"What is that advantage?"

Arabella Zabini. Interesting. Perhaps she does not trust me completely yet, despite what Narcissa told me yesterday about her allying herself more firmly with me. Harry chose his words very carefully. This was the most dangerous part of what he had to do, and if he became caught in an obvious lie, his allies would distrust him at best. "I have a—connection with one of the Death Eaters who has left the Dark Lord's ranks," he said. "Evan Rosier is his name."

Charles leaned forward sharply. "You cannot trust my cousin," he said. "He is completely mad."

"Mad, to be sure," Harry agreed, "but it is a riddling madness. He scatters clues in the letters he writes me, and he cannot stop writing me those letters. It's a sort of compulsion with him. He did warn me, outright, about what would happen in the graveyard where the Dark Lord resurrected himself, and even told me the nature of the magic he would use. I did not interpret another of his hints the right way, or I should have been forewarned."

“What good are clues that you can only know about later?” Henrietta Bulstrode asked, her voice a drawl, her eyes half-lidded. “Unless you bring the letters to your elders, of course, and have them interpret them for you.”

Harry held onto his temper. It was easier than Henrietta seemed to assume it was, from the way she taunted him, and drew attention to something obvious—his age. She did not consider him a very formidable opponent yet.

Shall I disillusion her?

“He has left the Dark Lord entirely now,” said Harry. “He turned in the graveyard, and tried to kill Bellatrix LeStrange. He didn’t succeed—”

“Nor will he,” said Narcissa. “Bellatrix is mine.”

She wasn’t making that declaration so much to him, Harry surmised, as to the rest of the wizards and witches. Glances flitted from face to face, and heads were bowed, and Harry simply nodded to Narcissa and continued in the middle of that glancing and thinking.

“He has sent me another letter since then. That one enabled me to prevent the death of Rufus Scrimgeour.”

“That is something we really must settle, Potter.” Burke, unsurprisingly, frowning at him. “Why are you on such good terms with the Minister? He’s a Light wizard, and you know they’re all treacherous bastards—”

“Who are, nonetheless, grateful to the people who help engineer their elections.” Harry raised his eyebrows. Time to move a bit on the offensive, I think. “Or did you not read the papers last year, Mr. Burke? After Minister Fudge kidnapped me, Rufus Scrimgeour was one of those who supported me throughout Fudge’s trial and the trial of my guardian. Scrimgeour knows that he owes a good deal of his success to the way I testified at the first trial. And if he has done me favors in return—well. They weren’t necessarily favors that strict Light wizards would approve of.” Harry shrugged his shoulders. “I don’t think you'll have to worry about Scrimgeour. The newspapers would have told you that."

Honorina laughed outright at the expression on Burke's face. Ignifer, though, shifted, and drew Harry's eye to her before she spoke.

"And what about what the newspapers are saying now, Potter?" she challenged. "About your abuse by your parents, and Albus Dumbledore? Can we trust you to bear through all of that just as casually?"

At least she's direct, Harry thought, and reached deeply into the reserves of his will and strength, using them to paint an indifferent, almost bored expression on his face. The best thing he could do was to show that this didn't matter to him. In fact, it would be good practice for the dancing he intended to do around Madam Shiverwood and others who might question him. Show no marks, and it would frustrate anyone who looked for wounds.

"Of course," he said. "The timing is damn inconvenient. I could have wished my guardian would wait. I have a war to fight." He shrugged, while Ignifer stared hard at him, and met her gaze for gaze. "I consider myself a warrior first, as well as vates for the magical creatures," he said quietly. "But since he didn't wait, then I will handle it. I have a chance now, finally, to show everyone that I'm not just an appendage to my brother, the Boy-Who-Lived, and not just prone to occasional newsworthy events, either. The former Minister took me for a child last year. That was his mistake." He lifted his eyebrows and flicked a glance up the table. "I would hate to see anyone here make the same mistake."

Thomas Rhangnara nodded as if impressed. Arabella Zabini lowered her eyes, frowning thoughtfully. Edward Burke pursed his lips. Most of the others sat immobile and blank-faced.

Not Ignifer, of course.

"You're an abused child, Potter," she insisted. "You must be aware that most of the wizarding world will see you that way."

Harry forced himself to smile. He hoped that it wasn't too bright, wasn't too brittle, but he could only hold onto it and hope. It was beyond him right now to make absolutely sure that his smile was convincing, and he didn't know the minds of his new allies well enough yet to realize what would allay their doubts beyond another murmur.

"They'll see me that way," he said, his voice just above a breath. He could sound more confident like that, especially when he forced them to lean closer to hear him. "That doesn't mean I'm really that way, does it? Someone can think a diamond a piece of quartz all he likes, but that doesn't mean the diamond will shatter when he puts it under a compression spell."

Ignifer subsided, apparently satisfied. Adalrico Bulstrode immediately took up the thread of the same conversation, though, as if he wasn't.

"Potter," he said hesitantly, "you must know that we, at least, would follow you down much further than you have gone so far." He glanced at the rest of the table, and explained, "Potter saved my wife's life and power when she drained herself to make Marian her magical heir." He turned back, and Harry forced himself to meet that dark, burning gaze. It was harder than with any of the others, since he knew one of the flames behind that gaze was frantic concern. "But that means that you must be strong enough to lead. Are you truly that way?"

Harry curled his lip. I told you, look as hard as you can, and you will find no weakness in me. "I am, Mr. Bulstrode," he said, keeping his voice curt. "The war is the important thing to me, and the revolution I intend to introduce once I have enough consent from both wizards and magical creatures to make it a reality. The future, not the past. I have no intention of looking back until I must, and then I'll deal with the husks of my parents and the Headmaster, and go on."

He concentrated on Adalrico's face until he nodded, reluctantly, and then looked around the table again. "Does anyone else have anything to say?"

No one apparently did. Harry passed on to outlining the first of his plans against Voldemort.

“The Black estates are ours, thanks to an ally whom most of you will eventually meet—“

Hinting at me? Regulus mocked him. Refusing to talk about me outright? I’m hurt.

Shut it, you. “And I plan to use at least a few of them as bases in striking against Voldemort. The magical weapons within them will also prove useful, once we can train in them. I believe that we can even lure Voldemort into traps using the rumors of them. If he thinks that anything can harm him, he will want to capture or neutralize it. We must not underestimate the power of rumor...”

Hawthorn shook her head as Harry went on outlining his plans. They sounded good. Of course they did. The boy had obviously thought about this, and he did have some natural touch of leadership when he chose to apply himself. He led best when no one was reminding him that he led.

But she had seen the gazes that passed from eye to eye, even as Harry engaged in his staring contest with Adalrico, and she knew that not everyone was as convinced as he would like them to be. For that matter, Hawthorn herself did not think the trials were a mere inconvenience to him.

We are not following simply an abused child, she thought, as she studied Harry and compared his confident words to the scent of pain and turmoil flooding from him. But we are following a leader who will not allow himself to rest. I very much fear that he will run himself to death before he attends to his own wounds. Someone must make him face that truth.

I am not sure who could.

Hawthorn sighed, and returned to listening to her wolf. At least bloodthirsty thoughts of vengeance filled her with more cheer than the fact that Harry was bleeding and would not stop for bandages.

Intermission: Four Wizards, Three Witches

The clash of skillets greeted Charles as he stepped through his fireplace with Owen beside him. He wasn't surprised. Medusa would have tried to cook while they were gone, because she had the odd idea—acquired from one of the thousands of books upstairs—that it was the duty of a pureblood wife to cook dinner for her husband when he went to a formal alliance meeting.

And then, of course, Michael, who despised his mother's cooking, would have crept into the kitchen and stolen one of her pans, so that she would be forced to leave it up to the house elves.

Charles held a finger to his lips, which Owen understood. He grinned, then followed silently behind his father as Charles went to the door of the kitchen and peered around the wall.

Michael and Medusa, sure enough, were dueling with their skillets while all around them agitated house elves tried to keep pots from boiling over and half a dozen different baking projects from burning. Michael laughed openly, his dark hair falling across his eyes as he leaped and dodged. He was identical to Owen, but, maybe because the weight of responsibility on him had been less, far merrier.

Charles had to smile as he looked at his wife. She would hate the reasons behind the expression, but there it was; it was the prerogative of spouses to hate each other sometimes. The woman who had been Medusa Bulstrode when he married her still had laugh lines around her mouth and worry lines around her eyes, though right now her heavy brown hair was far more tangled than it had been on their wedding day. She darted forward, swinging her skillet at her son's knees, and, as Michael dodged to block her, caught him a smart rap on the shoulder.

"Owww, Mum!" Michael complained, even as his arm went numb and he dropped his weapon.

Medusa danced in triumph, turning to say something sharp to him—doubtless about how he should respect his mother more—and then caught sight of Charles and Owen. In an instant, she'd handed her own skillet to an elf and advanced to kiss Charles on the cheek, trying hard to calm the flush on her face into something more demure. "Greetings, dear," she said. "I trust the meeting went well?"

Just this once, Charles didn't want her to put on the mask. He held her shoulders, kissed her until he heard his sons make gagging noises, and then shooed them away. Medusa watched him questioningly, the more so when he led her out of the kitchens. "The cake—" she started.

"Was going to burn anyway," Charles finished.

She crossed her arms and huffed at him.

Charles embraced her in silence, letting his head rest on her shoulder. Medusa went quite still for a moment, then stroked his hair. This was why they had the kind of marriage they did, Charles thought, relaxing from more than the touch. They complemented each other, and they did it very well. The moment he arrived home agitated, Medusa would know, and seek to calm him. And when her false worry gave way to the real thing, then he took her in his arms and rocked her until she could stand on her own.

"More real than you expected?" Medusa whispered, standing on her toes so she could speak directly into his ear.

And that was it, that was exactly it, though Charles hadn't known it until she said the words. "Yes," he said, his arms tightening fiercely around her. "Yes, it was."

Medusa didn't question him again, but stood and let him hold her, while Charles's mind sped intensely over everything he'd seen for the last few hours.

Oh, he'd agreed to the alliance with Narcissa Malfoy thinking he knew what it meant. He had no reason to be fond of the Dark Lord. He'd spent all the Rosier-Henlin money donated to his cause in the last war with a reckless lack of care, and he'd killed one of Charles's own nephews in a raid at the height of his power, when he regularly underestimated the readiness of the Aurors. Dumbledore wasn't attractive either, though, and any third way would have sounded like bell music to his ears.

And then had come the stories about Harry Potter being abused. Charles had blinked, but still thought he knew what it meant—that the alliance would just be a little harder, that was all, and the adults would guide the boy, use him more as a figurehead than anything else.

And then, today, he'd actually met Potter.

Such strength and such fragility, Charles thought, as Medusa guided him to a chair and sat him down in it, beginning to massage his shoulders. He'd seen the pallor and the dark circles beneath the boy's eyes, both indicating a lack of rest. He'd seen, in many ways, the fourteen-year-old wizard he'd expected. And Potter had made mistakes that he must not have known he was making, constant small missteps that would have been impossible if he knew more about the families and the backgrounds of his allies. He did need guidance and advice.

But the magic.

Charles had been near Albus Dumbledore only a few times—though one of those times had convinced him not to send Owen and Michael to Hogwarts—and the Dark Lord only once. He had forgotten, or perhaps just never known, the sheer intoxicating effect that power had when it was pouring off a Lord-level wizard, rotating around him in a visible aura. Charles's family saw such power as lightning, and he'd kept quiet throughout most of the meeting, not wanting to embarrass himself by revealing his distraction. Harry Potter in the midst of a lightning storm took some getting used to.

And he was an Occlumens! That, Narcissa Malfoy had not reported; Charles wondered if she had known. He hadn't followed up on Charles's admittedly feeble Legilimency. Perhaps he was too tired.

Perhaps he had no need to. The phoenix on his shoulder would attest to that, and so would the confident way he laid out his plans.

And so Charles was left following an ally who could apparently fall any moment, but promised utter glory and rewards if he succeeded.

This is so real, he thought, as he laid his head on his wife's shoulder again. So very real, and I wonder more than ever now what the Potters were thinking, to turn such power against them.

Mortimer Belville settled his cloak carefully around his shoulders before he strode into Belville Hall. Portraits of his ancestors, and not the living things, sat around the room, but they would like to see him looking his best.

Murmurs of appreciation followed him as he made his way through the room, and Mortimer inclined his head, looking neither to the right nor the left. It didn't do to take too much notice of portraits; it only encouraged them. For the matter, he could say the same thing about his parents and grandparents.

He found several letters from said distinguished oldsters waiting on the table when he arrived in his private study, accompanied by flustered owls. Mortimer rolled his eyes and levitated treats to them from a distance. He didn't want to chance getting feathers and pellets on his clothes.

He sipped his wine as he read through the letters at a leisurely pace. They were all the usual bothersome notes, offering to introduce him to this young witch or that slightly older wizard. A blood child or a magical heir, that was what the family wanted. Preferably several of them, and they wanted them right now.

Mortimer snorted and let his head fall against the back of his chair, flexing his fingers around the wineglass. Why did none of them ever realize that he wasn't interested, not yet? Of course he had every intention of doing his duty by Belville when it was time. But he was only thirty-five, and a pureblood wizard. He had decades left to live, unless he did something stupid first.

And the one thing I am not is stupid.

Lazily, he levitated the history of Merlin he'd been reading last night over to himself and scanned the pages, smiling as many of the names on them rang bells of recognition in his memory. Most wizards would not even know who one of these people were, let alone twenty. Not even most of his fellow Ravenclaws in Hogwarts would have known. Mortimer delicately licked his finger and turned the page, enjoying the smell of ink and wine and silence.

All of them think they can control me. Even Potter does. I saw that from the way he looked at me. He thinks me small, of no account, just a tool for his ends. Ha, I say, and ha again.

I control them, not the other way around. Intelligence always wins, and I am more intelligent than anyone there.

Cradled by his confidence in how bloody brilliant he was, Mortimer settled in for a long afternoon of reading.

Too cold here. Too lifeless. Too without the noise and the light and the warmth that Edward Burke was already coming to think of as a necessary component of his life, ever since little Narcissa Malfoy had shown up at his door with just the right combination of admiration and judicious flattery to get him to join this alliance she was setting up.

Edward liked being flattered, of course he did, but that didn't mean he was just going to give in to it. One didn't do that, especially someone who was a son of the illustrious Burke line and a rightful heir, if he'd only chosen to press the claim, of the Black family.

He had to be courted. He had to be won. And someone with ties to Minister Scrimgeour, of all people—wasn't that a blasted surprise, and just like a young wizard, all power and no sense?—would have to work harder than usual to win his support.

Edward stamped his foot and snapped his fingers irritably, so that the house elves would get into his bedroom and light the damned fire already. Honestly, sometimes he felt as though the disrespect which infested the outside world and made it an uncomfortable place for him to live had infested his own home. There was no other explanation as to why Tid couldn't have the fire in his bedroom already lit when he returned from an important meeting like this one.

He took his favorite chair, affecting to take no notice of Tid as the elf crept in and performed his duties. In reality, of course, he watched every movement, and noticed how long it took, and compared it to the quicker motions of the Malfoy house elves. More observant than most people thought him, that was Edward Burke all over.

And more able to look out for his own advantage, too.

Oh, he knew why Narcissa had approached him. She wanted the pressure of his family name, of one more Dark wizard making the alliance look attractive to other Dark wizards. He was a tool. He knew it.

Edward didn't mind. Or, well, he minded, but he knew better than to show he minded. He could wait. Slytherins were patient. Burkes were patient. Blacks were—well, not patient, but they could be ingenious.

He noticed everything. He'd noticed the way that Narcissa had seated him by the halfblood Pemberley girl, a subtle insult, when she knew that he couldn't abide Muggles or those polluted by their dirty blood. He'd noticed the way that most of the wizards around the table affected not to look at him. Intimidated, they were, by the thought of matching wits or stares with a scion of the Black and Burke lines.

He'd noticed when Potter didn't dare to make him stand up and bow like the others. He had the advantage there, no doubt about it.

And why shouldn't he? The Potter boy was halfblood, and everyone who was anyone knew that dirty blood clouded and dirtied the thoughts as much as it did one's ability to perform magic. Edward listened, and oh, Edward knew. He had heard the whispers. Unnatural, they said about his magic, and Edward was inclined to agree. No son of a Mudblood had any business having that much magic.

So, old Edward listened, and old Edward noticed, and old Edward knew. The Potter boy wasn't really anybody. He was a convenient puppet that the Malfoys had found. Most likely Lucius, the sly old crow. And they were manipulating him with just the right degree of incredulity. A fourteen-year-old wizard with Lord-level power, who put on a light show at Walpurgis? It sounded just ridiculous enough to be true. Merlin knew there were Dark wizards out there who would snatch at any chance that would get them clear of either Light wizards or Voldemort's power.

But such traps couldn't catch a wizard of Edward Burke's strength or discernment. He would watch a little longer, but he was already sure where his advantage lay with this alliance, and unless he uncovered something stunning about Potter, then he wouldn't hesitate to employ it.

A vates is a wizard poised between Dark and Light, one committed to freedom and unbinding. A vates is in an unusual position, because, while he must have enough power to declare himself a Lord, he must never do so. A Lord is committed to leadership, to ruling and governance, and may, of course, use compulsion for the ends of either the Dark or the Light. A vates must be committed to leadership only if it is the best course for those he would lead, and must never use compulsion at all. There has never been a vates in history who freed more than a few magical species, because of the difficulty of staying on this path...

Thomas Rhangnara pushed the book gently away from him, aware that excitement was making his hands, and thus the pages, vibrate. He leaned back in his chair and closed his eyes, hooking his hands together behind his head, while fireworks burst in his mind.

That would be something, wouldn't it? Potter apparently embodies a philosophical problem come to life. I'm not sure I believe that he can tread this path, because no one ever has, but to see him tread it...

Thomas shot to his feet and paced around the library. At times like this, when he was so excited, he just couldn't sit still. He had been like this in the last days before he declared for Dark, too, because then the arguments were all starting to make sense, and rushing together in his head towards some magnificent conclusion. He almost felt the same way now, though of course it was different; now, he hadn't studied for several years to get to this same place.

But there was a wizard walking around in the world who might be a vates.

How exciting was that?

Thomas knew he couldn't stay in the library any longer. He had to share this with somebody. He burst out of the library, nearly knocking down his eldest daughter, Melissa, who had just emerged from her bedroom. She steadied herself with a little cry, but her face softened the moment she looked up at him. Thomas smiled back at her. His children all knew his expression when he'd just learned something new, and all of them were perfectly willing to listen to him, too. Thomas often felt blessed, but never more so than when Robert, or Melissa, or Rose, or Charis, or Albert, all showed that his thoughts were important to them.

"What is it, Daddy?" Melissa hooked her arm in his and turned him back towards the library.

Thomas began explaining what a vates was to her, and how Potter might become one. Melissa listened and made admiring noises until Priscilla opened the door to announce that she was back from the Ministry, and why hadn't Thomas made dinner yet?

But when she found him on his favorite chair, with Melissa on the stool at his feet, Priscilla simply rolled her eyes and kissed him on the brow and said, "Meeting go well, dear?"

Thomas leaned back and grinned happily at his Auror wife. "Very."

Priscilla kissed him again. "Good. Now, perhaps we can get something to eat? I'm very hungry. We chased a bastard today who went over five roofs in a row before we finally caught him."

Thomas stood up and started to walk out of the library, but Melissa and Priscilla both made him, as always, leave the books where they were, instead of bringing them to the dinner table. Thomas had to be content with chattering to his wife and daughter—and the other children, who soon joined them—about why he felt the meeting had gone so well.

This is just so interesting. If nothing else, I am going to owe Potter for making my life so interesting.

Ignifer Apollonis straightened her back and held absolutely still. Her mother was the one who had firecalled her. That meant Artemis Apollonis could well and good state her business, or she could go away.

Her mother's face, highlighted in the flames, was the mirror image of her own, save that Ignifer was keeping her face inflexible, and Artemis was frowning. And she was starting the same speech she made every day, the one that made Ignifer grind her teeth. But it would have been cowardly to refuse to allow her mother to firecall her, and Ignifer was not a coward.

"All you have to do is kneel before your father and say you're sorry, that you apologize," said Artemis. "That's all, Ignifer. Sweet Minerva, I would not have accounted for anyone being so stubborn, let alone a sweet girl raised to honor and revere the Light and her parents."

It was word-for-word what she had said yesterday, and the day before, and the week before that, and so on and back for fifteen years. Ignifer gave the same answer she'd given yesterday, and the day before that, and the week before that, and so on and back for fifteen years. "The Dark, and not the Light, saved my life." She could feel, as if it were still present, the immense, fallen stone block pressing down on her chest, crushing the breath and the feeling and the life out of her. She could feel herself reaching out desperately with all the magic she was trained to use, and accomplishing nothing. She could hear the wind as the wild Dark, called in desperation, came to her and levitated the remains of the house she'd been in when the Death Eaters struck off her. "I promised that I would serve it if it did. And you always taught me to keep my promises."

Artemis flinched, the same way she always did. "You will never have children until your father calls the sterility curse back, Ignifer. And you know that he will only do that if you kneel before him and make submission and swear to return to the Light.”

“Then he won’t call it back,” said Ignifer. “And he won’t have grandchildren, either, nor any more magical heirs, since I am his. Goodbye, Mother.”

Neither courage nor politeness forbade her willing the flames out of existence, and thus ending the connection. Ignifer had been friends with fire since the earliest days of her childhood; it was how her accidental magic had manifested, and still the easiest weapon for her to fling in battle. She turned her back on the hearth now and paced over to sit in her favorite chair under the far wall, the one Artemis had to look at when she peered through the Floo. Ignifer had decorated it the way it was on purpose, of course.

The wall was painted black wood, hung with gleaming shards of obsidian and ebony and jet, deep green or deep purple leaves charmed to stay fresh, and black roses and belladonna and other plants used in brewing potions that had nothing but an evil purpose. Ignifer put her head back and took in the sight and scent of them until she felt slightly calmer.

Then she took up the sword that hung low on the wall—dark wooden hilt, shining blade made of Damascus steel—and passed through the door behind the chair. She felt a brief, dizzying moment of flight, and then she landed in another place entirely, a place with high mountains in the background and shimmering heat in the air, warmer than Great Britain would ever get. Ignifer shook her hair behind her shoulders with a slight smile. There were advantages to charming a door in her home to act as a Portkey.

A small, copper-colored dragon thrust its head around the boulder in front of the door, and bared its venomous fangs at her. Ignifer grinned and lifted the sword. The Peruvian Vipertooth slithered towards her, head up and neck swaying back and forth.

There was no better exercise, Ignifer thought as she spun around in a circle and thrust the sword hard against the scales, knowing it would be deflected, than dueling for one's life with a dragon when one wanted to use the body and the mind to their utmost at the same time.

Circle. Duck. Roll as the fangs came stabbing down in the dirt behind her. The tail, watch the tail.

This Potter was intriguing, and the alliance did seem more interesting than Ignifer had assumed at first. She had no love for Voldemort, but then, she had no love for most of the Dark wizards her new Declaration had made her sister to, either. They watched her with distrust in their eyes, always. At least Narcissa had approached her with proper reverence for her classical education and her affinity with fire, both of which she admitted could be useful in making alliances and in giving battle.

Leap, duck, turn, now, circle now, and down, nearly stabbing it in the eye before the dragon jerked back with a pained squeal.

And if what the alliance seemed to promise her was the real thing—

A stunning blow as the tail caught her along the ribs, but she'd deserved that; she really hadn't been paying attention. Roll, drop to one knee, let the tail go overhead this time. It really was as easy as declining manus.

--then Ignifer could only welcome it. She had always known her place when she was of the Light, known who she belonged to and who her enemies were and who she could depend on. And since turning to the Dark, she'd been floundering, keeping her feet mostly by refusing to bend or break.

A second dragon coming now. Call fire, and her hands were flaring with it, and the dragons were hesitating to approach.

If she had siblings, friends, allies, even a Lord whom she would serve as if he were a Lord despite the title he refused, then she could belong again. She could stop being so lonely, stop encasing herself in rock that she knew would make her bleed to death in the end.

And there came a Dragon Keeper, waving his arms furiously at her. None of them had a sense of humor about dueling dragons for exercise, even though she never killed one of them. Time to go.

Ignifer pushed her hair out of her eyes as she landed back in her own house. She felt more relaxed, now, enough to let some of the impressions of Potter she'd formed without knowing it dance before her eyes.

He's encasing himself in rock, too, bleeding to death behind a mask of strength. Perhaps I can help him recover from that, as long as he's offering me a place at his side.

Honoriam Pemberley stood in her entrance hall, hidden behind an illusion, and watched her father's eagle-owl vainly scan the room for her. It had been a while since she got good enough to fool owls, but it was still a new enough trick to delight her.

Of course, a giggle escaped her lips at last, and the owl fluttered over and deposited the letter in front of her, flying away without waiting to be paid. Honoriam let that illusion fall, chucking all the while, and looked at the letter. She rolled her eyes when she recognized her mother's handwriting on the outside of it.

Her mother, Mary, was a Muggle, but she acted as proud as any pureblood wizard born to the bloodline, Honoriam thought, while she created a line of small faces all sticking their tongues out at the letter. Above all, she was insistent that her daughter have blood children. No adopted magical heirs would do. She wanted grandchildren who were actually Pemberley by birth. And she had persuaded her husband, Honoriam's father, to the same way of thinking.

Since Honoriam liked women, this was somewhat of a problem.

Honoriam knew what the letter would say. Honor of the family blah blah blah, blood children blah blah blah, not welcome home until you marry some nice young wizard blah blah blah. It wasn't worth opening it, not even for a laugh. Her mother was tiresomely regular.

Honorio cast the letter into the flames, and then, since she was there anyway, opened up the Floo Network and went to Tybalt's house. He came to her eagerly, almost before the house elf who received her could call him. He clasped her shoulders, gave her a ridiculously lascivious kiss on the cheek that his partner John always pretended to scowl and grumble at, and then stepped back and looked at her expectantly.

"How did the meeting with Harry go?" he asked.

"Oh, you call him Harry, now?" Honorio shook the soot from her cloak and hung it up on the rack near at hand, creating an illusion of another one around her shoulders. "Isn't he a bit young for you?"

Tybalt smacked her hand. "I'm very joined, thank you. I just want to know how he is."

"Bad," said Honorio simply, thinking of how the glamour that hid the boy's cut-off left hand had wavered even as she looked at it. "Like he's about to collapse. Did you know that he'd had his left hand cut off?"

Tybalt stared at her.

"I guess not," Honorio concluded.

"Sweet Merlin." Tybalt stepped back and sat down on one of the shallow divans near the fire, frowning broodingly. "And then the charges against his parents. He's not having a good month, I would guess."

"No, and it'll get worse before it gets better." Honorio sat down on the divan across from her friend. She had never forgotten, never would forget, that Tybalt had been the first to open his home to her after her own parents had thrown her out. She owed him the entire truth, even though she figured Potter probably wouldn't have wanted her to tell it. "And you know that I'm practiced at seeing through other kinds of illusions, too, not just the magical ones. He's on the edge of collapse, Tybalt. When he falls, it's going to be hard."

Tybalt frowned softly. "Do you still want to follow him?"

"Of course." Honoria snorted. "If nothing else, I got a letter from my mother warning me not to do it. That's reason enough to do so."

"It might be more serious than that, Honoria." Tybalt caught and held her eye. "Can you really tie yourself to someone who might, as you say, collapse in the midst of battle, and whom you can't joke or cajole out of doing that?"

"Of course," Honoria repeated. "I am committed to this, Tybalt. I signed my name. And having a reputation for breaking my word would keep me out of all the best parties."

Tybalt sighed and put his head in his hands. "I never know whether you're being serious or not."

"I'm both at once." Honoria stood and kissed his cheek. "Now, I've really got to go. I'm practicing my Animagus transformation."

Tybalt laughed at her. Most of her friends did, when she said that. They thought the idea of Honoria becoming an Animagus, achieving a transformation that lasted longer than her whim dictated, was a marvelous piece of fun.

Honoria smiled as she stepped into the flames again. She thought it was fun to watch them laugh. It was so much fun that she had no intention of telling them that she'd actually mastered the transformation two years ago. She made quite a fine sea-mew, if she did say so herself.

"Go to your room, Edith."

Edith ran away at once. She did not hesitate and question. Henrietta nodded as she made her way to the rune room. Edith knew what she had done wrong without prompting. She had shown hesitation and fear in front of Potter. She was mortified, as well she should be.

Henrietta arrived in the rune room, and shut its door carefully behind her. Her husband, Tertian Brown, would know better than to disturb her if he came home and found her here. With the door closed, the patterns drawn on the walls came together and formed one shimmering circle of power, which Henrietta could use to work some of her strongest magic.

She began with whips of light, calling them forth from her hands with nonverbal incantations and slicing through several feet of cloth, then of wood, then of stone, which the room provided when she asked for them. With each slice, her confidence returned, and the slight startlement she'd felt in Potter's presence slid away from her.

Oh, yes, the boy is powerful, she thought, as she began the Dark Arts curses that she always practiced to keep her hand in. They burst with far more force here than they would elsewhere, but Henrietta had hopes of at least doubling their strength outside the room. But what good is power without the will to use it?

She had sensed that weakness in Potter at once, with her usual talent for finding the one personality trait that would hamstring another witch or wizard. Potter was too soft-hearted. He had magic that made Henrietta's mouth water, but he believed too much in mercy, in kindness, in compassion, in leaving choices open to other people when he would do better to herd them along.

Even more devastating, at least for his own cause, he obviously expected the same mercy, kindness, compassion, and consideration from his allies.

Henrietta laughed aloud as she cast a curse that would have made part of the room's wall sway and buckle, if the runes hadn't held it up and filled in the stone between the patterns as fast as it disintegrated.

This was the kind of chance she'd been looking for for years. She would have done something about it earlier, but there hadn't been enough of a power vacuum in wizarding Britain for the last fourteen years. Albus Dumbledore had a lock on most wizards' devotion, and the Dark families were mostly scattered, bribing people in the Ministry for petty individual gains or clinging to their old alliances and pride and not looking beyond them.

Now came this tasty prize, an alliance organizing around someone who had only his magic to recommend him.

An abused child, a soft-hearted child, a child who knew nothing about the way the world worked.

Henrietta had only to gain control of him and of the alliance, and she would have the platform she needed to work her own will.

Exultant, excited, she spun and fired another curse at the far wall, then had to duck as it bounced back at her, reflected from a shield rune.

Oh, it would take some time, she knew that. She would need to understand his psychology better before she worked it so that it broke him. But he was close to shattering already, and the papers were full of clues to his past. Henrietta was confident that it wouldn't take her long to find something she could use.

She lifted her arms above her head and bowed, in homage to her own cleverness, then raised her head and smiled at her unseen prey.

Watch out, Potter. Henrietta Bulstrode is hunting you.

Chapter Six: Song of Battle

As the new allies began Flooing or Apparating home, Harry slipped gratefully out of the meeting room. No one seemed to notice his going—except Narcissa, but Adalrico was speaking to her, his voice quiet and urgent, and she couldn't get to Harry before he escaped. Harry realized the conversation was probably about him, but so long as he didn't have to hear it, then he was content.

He leaned against the wall outside the meeting room and shut his eyes. Fawkes crooned at him and groomed a bit of his hair, then paused and uttered a warble that Harry didn't figure out in time.

"Harry."

"Mrs. Bulstrode," said Harry, opening his eyes but keeping his gaze on the floor. He knew she was kneeling in front of him, and that her face would be full of concern, because puellaris witches were like that. He didn't have to look if he didn't want to, though. And he didn't want to. This was another time when he would just have to wait a few more minutes to relax. He would fight his way through the conversation with Elfrida, and then go upstairs and sleep. He was sure that he would do so deeply with Fawkes beside him.

"I wanted you to see Marian," said Elfrida, voice gentle. "You haven't seen her since the night she was born."

Harry felt a boneless relaxation drop into his shoulders. That was true, and if she had only come to talk about Marian, then he didn't have to fear any personal inquiries he couldn't deflect. He reassured himself that he'd been silly to panic. After all, the truth he'd learned years ago still held good: most people were more interested in talking about themselves or what related to themselves than they were in talking about him. He leaned forward obediently, and Elfrida drew back a fold of the blanket that had covered Marian's face.

Harry had thought she would be asleep, since she had been quiet throughout the meeting, but Marian was awake, moving her fists in small, complicated patterns above her head, to which she was giving the whole of her attention. Her hair was coming in dark, and was plastered slightly to her head. Her eyes were still blue. Harry wondered if they would change color or not. He didn't know how long it was before that happened to babies.

"She's been very good for me so far," Elfrida murmured, smiling down at her with an expression so warm and tender that Harry felt strengthened just being near it. "She almost never cries, and when she does, then I know that she really needs something from me. I think going through what she did when she was just a few minutes old changed something in her." Elfrida lowered a hand and touched Marian's face with exquisite tenderness, then glanced back up at Harry. "I did say once that I wanted you near Marian while she was young, so that she could experience powerful magic and not be frightened of it. Do you think you could show her some of that now, Harry?"

Harry blinked. "Do you think she'll remember this later, Mrs. Bulstrode?"

Elfrida laughed softly. "No, Harry, but she would get used to it the same way that she gets used to warmth and learns to fear cold. It's not the specific memory that matters, but her growing accustomed to the sensation."

Harry nodded doubtfully. He supposed Elfrida was right, but he hadn't ever studied caring for children. It hadn't been something he needed to learn, with Connor the same age as he was.

He knelt down beside Elfrida, and then she complicated things by handing Marian to him. Awkwardly, Harry adjusted his arms around the baby, afraid that her head would flop in one direction and her body in another. He could too easily imagine her neck snapping or her head smashing if he dropped her.

"There," said Elfrida gently. "Just use one arm to support her head and one around her waist, and then—there. Good, Harry." Harry couldn't help soaking in the praise in spite of himself, and it was true that Marian's warmth felt soft and delicious against his chest. "Now, release your magic a bit."

Harry half-closed his eyes and let some of his barriers slip.

Rich magic flooded the hall, and lapped back on Harry and Marian. Marian made an inquiring little noise and waved her hands, but the noise wasn't distressed, so Harry went on pouring it. Marian's nose wrinkled up a moment later, and she sneezed.

Harry would have stopped, if Elfrida's laughter hadn't encouraged him. "She's a Bulstrode," she said. "And they smell powerful magic as thunderstorms. That's all. Go on, Harry." Her hand descended on his shoulder, as though to support him. Harry wondered why. The wall was doing a good job of holding him up.

He kept an eye on Marian's face as he went on exuding his magic, certain he should stop at any moment. But Marian only grew more and more alert and lively as the power rose around them. She giggled, and the movements of her hands seemed to become more coordinated. She laid her head on Harry's hand and blinked blue eyes up at him.

Elfrida rubbed gently at his shoulder, and then began to sing, so softly at first that Harry mistook the song for an audible manifestation of his magic. He kept his focus on Marian, at least until the actual words of the song claimed his attention.

The song was a mother's chant, the words of a witch watching over her child who would do anything to keep that child safe.

Harry calmed his instinctive flutter of panic by telling himself that she was singing for Marian, but that justification smashed when he turned his head and met her eyes. They were focused on him. Elfrida looked fiercer than he had ever seen her, and a glint of fang shone from her mouth. He remembered that puellaris witches transformed into lionesses when they defended their children.

Or children under their care.

She thinks of me as her child.

Harry stiffened, and then had to juggle Marian. He pulled his magic carefully back into his body. It was harder than he expected. He must have come closer to collapse than he thought. Elfrida watched him with a faint frown that grew more pronounced as he rebuilt his barriers.

“Harry, what is wrong?” she whispered.

“I’m sorry,” said Harry, and was horrified to hear his voice becoming jagged. He might have collapsed with some of his new allies still in the Manor. He gently pressed Marian back into Elfrida’s arms and turned his face to the side as he eased along the wall, ignoring Fawkes’s scolding croons. “This is wonderful. You’re wonderful. I just—I can’t. Not right now.”

“Harry—“

Harry did not quite run towards the stairs up to his room, but it was a near thing. Fawkes fluttered and clung until Harry hissed at him to go away. Then he closed his bedroom door behind him, locked it, and flung himself on the bed.

Relaxing was one thing. Sharing a tender moment with one of his allies was fine. Doing what he had promised was great. But he had felt himself peering over the rim of a collapse much greater than he had any room to make, down there.

I’m sorry, he whispered, uselessly, to people who couldn’t hear him. I’m sorry. But I know that I didn’t do a very good job of convincing my new allies, definite plans or not, and I need to keep up that mask of strength until I do. I’m sorry.

He pinched his nose until the tears in his eyes became the far less threatening tears of pain, and then went to bed. A gentle knock came at his door a few minutes after he did, but Harry ignored it, and after an understanding pause, Draco went away.

Harry dreamed.

This dream was unlike the others, though. In his visions, he had always been in a solid place, with walls or trees around him and the Dark Lord somewhere to the front or side. This time, he was drifting in a hazy mist, which only gradually parted and ebbed together to create images that made sense.

The strongest component of the dream was the mood, really. Harry could feel excitement around him like a living, breathing current of air. He was sure it was Voldemort's excitement, and while it made him shiver to be so bathed in it, he began to wonder if the Dark Lord was dreaming, and had caught Harry up in that dream. If so, then he should wake up, because he didn't think there was anything to be learned from seeing Voldemort's nightly ambitions. Harry already knew that he feared death and hated Muggles and desired domination of the wizarding world.

The dream snapped suddenly into focus, though, and Harry found himself very nearly in a vision. He glanced around, and saw the back of a house in front of him, with the full moon riding overhead. It looked like a dream of tonight, but did Voldemort have prophetic dreams? Harry started to lash his tail in frustration, and then realized he was human, and not lynx, in this dream.

He crouched down and pulled out his wand as an instinctive gesture of comfort. The nature of their connection had indeed altered. He wasn't sure what had done it, though perhaps it was due to the resurrection. And he had no idea whether he might be in danger here.

He scurried to the side, and watched the moon ducking in and out of the racing clouds above. Then the light struck through them, and while Harry had never seen the house from this angle, he no longer had any trouble in recognizing it, particularly given the shimmer of isolation wards around it.

The Burrow.

He's thinking of going after Connor.

Voldemort's exultation surged around him, and Harry sensed the dream breaking up through no will of his own. Voldemort was probably waking with the thought of attacking his brother firmly in mind.

Harry jumped, frantically, his heart so busy in his throat it seemed ready to strangle him. He had to wake, and he had to get to the Burrow right away.

Harry sat bolt upright, gasping, and then winced as searing pain cut through his scar. At least it wasn't bleeding, he thought, as he rolled out of bed and landed heavily on the floor. And he had no need to get dressed, since he had fallen asleep hours ago wearing his clothes. He stretched one arm above his head, then the other, to relieve the aches that came from sleeping too long in the same position, and stood and headed for the door.

He opened it to find Draco there, and blinked at him for a moment before the dream bit him like a dragon. "Excuse me, Draco," he said, starting to edge past him.

Draco caught his left wrist just below the glamour, a usual gesture with him lately when he wanted to attract Harry's attention. "What's going on?" he asked, barely moving his lips. "I felt your panic all the way down the hall. And now you look as if you're going into danger again. What is it, Harry? You did promise me that you would tell me before you hurried off."

Harry wanted to scream. Unlike the visions, which happened simultaneously with his seeing them, he didn't know how long it would be before Voldemort landed at the Burrow. That only made him more determined to go, not less. But, on the other hand, Draco was physically stronger than he was right now, and Harry didn't want to hurt him with his magic.

He made up his mind. It wouldn't take long. "Voldemort was dreaming about attacking Connor," he whispered. "And now he's resolved on it, or it seemed like that before his dream broke up. So I have to go stop him."

"Of course you do," said Draco. "And the rest of us are going with you."

Harry blinked. "What?"

"Mrs. Parkinson stayed here this evening," Draco went on. "So did the Bulstrodes—all but Adalrico's cousin, of course. It won't take long to get them out of bed, and Mum and Father with them. If you are going to battle, Harry, then you'll have plenty of allies to fight beside you. Come on." He drew Harry down the hall before he could think of an objection.

Harry managed to set his feet as he reached the stairs. "But this isn't their fight—"

"I really am sick and tired of you saying things like that," said Draco casually, without looking at him. "The Parkinsons and the Bulstrodes are your formal family allies. And do you really think my parents would do less for you than they would?" He paused for a moment. "Well, maybe not Father, but what about Mum? She's risked her life for you many times, Harry."

Harry shook his head. "It's not that. But I haven't led a battle before. I don't know how to do it—"

"Bollocks," said Draco, ignoring the scandalized portrait they were passing at that moment. "Come on, Harry." He shoved Harry into the middle of the entrance hall, and paused to stare at him. "I'm going to get the others. Remember, Harry, one movement without me, and you'll find yourself under a Body-Bind or a sleeping potion. Just one." He turned and ran in the direction of doors Harry assumed led to the guest bedrooms.

Forced to wait, Harry closed his eyes and held a silent argument with himself. Would it really be better to stay here? He could still go into battle—

Like an idiot, yes, you could, said Regulus, with brutal force. You don't know if he's there yet, Harry.

But he could be! Harry wailed. And what if everyone else takes ages to get moving?

They were Death Eaters or fighters, Regulus said dryly. And Draco has plenty of experience hurrying after you by now. I doubt that they'll be long.

I can't risk their lives.

You're not. They are. That's the difference.

Harry was about to resume the debate when he heard claws tap on the floor in front of him. He blinked and looked up. A slender, pale werewolf he recognized as Hawthorn was trotting towards him, her slightly wrong muzzle and too-lengthy legs the main features that marked her out as different from an ordinary wolf. She came to a halt in front of him and fixed him with stern hazel eyes.

"Um," said Harry weakly. "Shouldn't you be out hunting?"

Hawthorn snarled at him, for a moment reminding him of the savage beast she would be without the Wolfsbane Potion. Then she extended her head and butted at him playfully. Harry wavered and nearly sat down, so weak was he. Hawthorn whined softly, turning her head to catch his eye again.

"I'm all right," Harry lied, looking away. "Just a bit of a shock, waking up the way I did."

"There she is."

Harry looked over his shoulder, and blinked. That had been fast. Draco was running back down the hall with Narcissa behind him in formal robes, obviously the first pair she'd snatched. Lucius was at his wife's shoulder, walking fast but not in an undignified manner. Elfrida and Adalrico were just flooding out of a room down the hall, holding their wands. Harry didn't think he'd ever seen an expression of such stony determination on anyone's face as Elfrida now wore.

Worried as he was, Harry started when he saw her coming to fight. "What about Millicent and Marian?" he demanded.

“Millicent is staying here,” said Elfrida calmly, swinging her cloak out of the way of her wand. “She’ll guard Marian for me, and the wards will do the rest. I trust her to protect her sister more than I trust her in battle.”

Harry ground down his teeth and said nothing about that. “Now can we go?” he demanded.

Draco caught his arm firmly. “Where are we going?”

“Ottery St. Catchpole,” Harry said. “The Burrow, the Weasleys’ house. My brother is staying there, and Voldemort is going to attack it.”

“Did Evan Rosier really send you a letter?” Adalrico demanded.

Harry sighed in agitation. “Does this really—“

“Yes, it does.” Adalrico dropped to a knee in front of him. “We are not about to risk our lives, Harry, or let you risk yours, without more proof than this.”

Harry swiped at his fringe, revealing his scar. “This gives me a connection to Voldemort,” he said, not having time to be amused as half his audience flinched at the name. Elfrida didn’t; he did note that. “I dream about what he’s dreaming, sometimes, and about his plans, and this time I dreamed about him getting eager and excited about the Burrow.”

Adalrico bowed his head and clenched his arm for a moment. “Thank you for trusting us enough to tell us, Harry.”

I wouldn’t have, but you made it impossible otherwise, Harry screamed in his mind, but kept his face calm. “Can we go?”

“Of course.”

They arranged themselves in a moment, with Lucius Side-Apparating Draco, Narcissa holding Harry’s wrist in a firm grip, and Adalrico and Elfrida standing on either side of Hawthorn.

Harry was desperately trying to calculate angles and how many Death Eaters were likely to be there as they vanished.

Harry and Narcissa landed on the slope behind the Burrow, in almost the same place from which Harry had seen the house in Voldemort's dream. He heard more distant cracks, and suspected the others were in slightly different places. He tugged, trying to get away from Narcissa and join them. There was no telling when the Death Eaters would arrive, or how many they would be when they finally did. That was one reason to prefer the visions: they gave him more exact information.

"Harry."

Harry paused and glanced reluctantly at Narcissa. From the tone she gave his name, this wasn't the first time she'd said it.

"You are not to risk your life unnecessarily," Narcissa whispered in his ear. "Do you understand me? I know that risk-taking is an inherent part of battle, but if I see you try to get in the way of a curse that you can't block, or worry more about defending someone else's life than your own, there will be consequences."

He had to shrink under the glare she gave him. It seemed that she was actually angry at him, the same way Draco was. Harry supposed he had treated them very thoughtlessly. He lowered his eyes and nodded.

"Good." Narcissa released him. "The others landed in front of the house. We should try to meet up with them."

Harry had just begun to move when he heard other sharp cracks begin. He tensed at once, and counted them. When they reached ten he snarled in silence and began to pace forward, his mind buzzing with battle spells.

Then an eleventh sounded, coming in behind them.

Harry spun, and the Blasting Curse on his lips just barely missed the dark figure who stood there, lifting his hands in mock surrender. In the light of the moon, Harry could make out Evan Rosier's face.

"Hello, Harry," he whispered. "Don't be so hasty. I've come to help you, and to tell you to be careful. My lord has no imagination. He thinks that someone who went after you once and failed should be allowed another chance. Fenrir Greyback is here." He paused dramatically. "But that is not the worst of it."

Narcissa had her wand trained steadily on Rosier, Harry saw. He ignored that. Right now, since Rosier was actually acting sane, Harry would treat his warnings as if they made sense. "What is the worst of it, then?"

He knew, even as another crack sounded, and his scar flooded with pain.

"My lord is here," Rosier finished softly, and then drew his wand and winked. "Should we go show him that he can't have things just the way he likes any more?"

He hurtled downhill. Harry felt Narcissa try to grab hold of him. But he had heard her warning, and he would heed it, and anyway, he was the only one on the battlefield with any chance of handling Voldemort. He slipped her grasp and followed Rosier, his magic lifting his feet just above the grass as he went.

He could feel Voldemort's magic, like a fanged, clawed beast just awakened, turning to face and find his. Harry let more of his own pour through his skin, this time rising around him in the old familiar shape of wings. This was not the gentle demonstration he had put on for Marian, but one far more battle-ready.

He came around the side of the house, and took in the beginning battle at a glance. He could make out Lucius's pale hair flying as he dueled two smaller Death Eaters, and two tumbling shapes that must be Hawthorn and Greyback, and Adalrico and Elfrida back-to-back in a ring of enemies, and Draco firing spells back at a heavysset Death Eater, probably Karkaroff, with a coolness that surprised Harry—

And in the center of it all, taking down the isolation wards around the Burrow, was Voldemort.

Harry made straight for him. He heard whooping behind him, and snarling, and yelping, and yelling, and the snap of spells, but he forced that all from his mind. He let the pain in his scar act as guide and beacon, rather than a distraction. Voldemort turned to face him with one upraised eyebrow, and his lipless mouth erupted into a low, hissing laugh.

Harry felt the grass stir to the side, but he didn't have time to evade the rush of the queen basilisk, which wrapped around his body and bore him to a rolling halt. Harry sucked in a desperate breath as he felt her try to crush his ribs, and heard both her and Voldemort laughing in Parseltongue.

A moment later, light flared overhead and Fawkes sang a battle-song, and the basilisk screamed. Harry suspected the phoenix was making for her eyes.

Harry Apparated, leaping from the basilisk's grasp into freedom not far from Voldemort. The stare of his red eyes was not much better than the stare from a basilisk, but at least it wouldn't kill him all by itself.

"Hello, Harry," said Voldemort, and the pain in Harry's scar cracked down like lightning strikes. "Come to surrender, at last, to your rightful master?"

"You wish," Harry whispered. His magic still rose around him like wings, and he felt the hatred rising with it, wrapping around his neck like a vine. This was the enemy he had trained to fight, and other people's attempts to direct his attention to other targets, his parents or Dumbledore, were only distractions. He had never fought wandless magic with wandless magic, other than by trying to drain his opponent's power, but he was beginning to think it was the only way he would meet Voldemort equally. Fighting a Dark Lord was not like fighting other wizards.

Voldemort laughed at him, as if he knew the way Harry's thoughts were tending, and the magic around him leaped eagerly forward.

Harry had no idea what way Voldemort imagined his power. He didn't have to know, he found. The pain that pierced him as that magic collided with his own was the pain of fang and claw, and he might as well imagine something that could fight back against that.

He chose the manifestation of a dragon, and actually saw the gleam of the dark wings for a moment as they wrapped around Voldemort's attacking power. That power shredded his own, of course, but that was all right; his dragon only had another layer of scales under that one. The dragon crowded close and clung with four legs, and Harry moved one hand in a clenching motion, imagining it whipping its head forward and crushing the throat of Voldemort's dragon. Harry heard a gasping breath from Voldemort, and rejoiced in the knowledge that he'd hurt the bastard.

Then Voldemort began to fight back.

Harry felt his magic expand outward, pushing, shoving him back, exploding the dragon that Harry tried to contain it with. Harry gathered in his magic as it swirled about, ignored the pain in his limbs, and stared at the earth behind Voldemort, not bothering to think of incantations this time.

Explode, he willed. Explode.

The earth leaped up in a fountain of grass and dirt, and Voldemort was knocked forward by the blast, all his attention too forcefully on Harry for him to concentrate on keeping his balance. Harry took as quick an advantage as he could, this time willing Voldemort's windpipe to crumple, his throat to crush.

Voldemort resisted, his dead-white skin achieving the hardness of iron, and then threw Harry off. He retreated a few steps from the Burrow, circling, pleased to note that he was drawing Voldemort with him.

Then they fell into the duel, and Harry discovered a level of battle he hadn't known existed. When two wizards were this powerful, not needing spells to contain their magic, what mattered was will, imagination, and foresight. It reminded Harry of those ancient contests of shapeshifters he'd heard of, with one becoming a sparrow and the other a hawk, one a stone and the other a beast with teeth that could crush a stone, one a mouse and another a cat. He had to try and anticipate what Voldemort was doing and counteract it, at the same moment as he had to imagine strategies that Voldemort himself would not be able to overcome.

And all on the fly.

Harry called wind that Voldemort swallowed that became a blast of force that Harry absorbed that became another tearing of earth that Voldemort resisted that flooded forth as a strike at his heart that Harry dodged that melted into a massive slap that Voldemort bore with and counteracted with an attempt to rip his ribs through his chest that Harry turned and batted home with enough strength to make Voldemort bend over and wheeze as his lungs labored that melded with breathing a cloud of poisonous gas into Harry's face that became—

At some point, Harry fell so thoroughly into the battle that he lost track of the other fighters, didn't think about drawing Voldemort away from the Burrow, and no longer knew anything except the fierce gladness that came from making another strike and turning yet another.

Draco dropped to one knee to dodge a severing curse, and then fired a tripping jinx at the Death Eater opposite him. The Death Eater fell over, and Draco scrambled up, shaking, mopping the sweat from his forehead and trying desperately to see where Harry was.

He whipped around just in time to see his father level his wand at one of the robed, masked figures and say, "Avada Kedavra."

Draco watched in detached wonder as the bolt of green light took another life from the world, cleanly and simply and quickly. One moment the Death Eater was alive, the next he was dead. Lucius was already turning to find another victim, his face unmarred by emotion.

Draco swallowed, and wondered if he had been ready to see that. One thing he was rapidly learning about himself, another point of difference from Harry, was that he would never go willingly into battle, or really be excited by it.

He backed up a step, and noticed a Death Eater with blonde hair flowing from behind her mask creeping towards his father's back.

Draco shouted, but Lucius was engaged in a crackling spell duel with his next intended victim, flipping from one incantation to the next, and didn't notice.

Draco ran. He didn't know what he could really do—his shout hadn't distracted the Death Eater, either, and his shock seemed to have wiped his mind clean of all useful spells—but he was determined to do something.

He fixed his eyes on the Death Eater and found himself pushing, reaching, in desperation, trying to use his strangely changed empathy to predict what she would do next.

There came a tearing, ripping sensation, and Draco briefly thought someone had hit him with a curse that managed to spill his intestines. Then he realized his perception was bouncing, as though his head had detached from his shoulders. His vision filled with hurtling dirt and grass, and he gasped, thinking he would have a mouthful of it any moment now.

Then he was inside the Death Eater's head.

Draco reeled, dizzy from the onslaught of so many different sensations: a taller body, breasts against his chest, a changed center of gravity, strange circulation of blood, an unfamiliar wand gripped in an unfamiliar hand, long hair flying around him, the sudden press of a cloth mask against his face and the restricted field of vision that meant. He had just enough presence of mind to try and steady himself, and he found the body obeying, stopping in its rush and shaking its head.

Draco didn't know how he was getting the Death Eater to do what he wanted, and he didn't really care. At the moment, he wanted to figure out some way out of this person and back to his own body.

And, of course, you want to stop her from attacking your father, Draco thought, and could have smacked himself.

He squeezed certain muscles, and her hand responded, coming up and pointing her wand directly at her own temple. Draco spoke the proper incantation for a Stunning Spell, whispered it through her brain, and heard her lips intone it. Then she dropped senseless as the spell struck home.

Draco found himself bouncing through darkness, but then he opened intimately familiar eyes, and felt his stomach heave in an intimately familiar way. He just managed to make sure he didn't vomit on himself.

So that's what my gift is, he thought dizzily, wiping at his mouth. I can possess people. How bloody useful is that?

Well, it could be very bloody useful, he answered himself, if he didn't kneel here on the battlefield and stare at nothing.

He lurched to his feet, staring around for more people to possess. Snarl, and snap, and grip, and dodge, and nothing was going as it should have been, the impertinent brat, the impudent boy, the inopportune brat.

He knew the boy was making him think in confused circles—he, Lord Voldemort!—and that enraged him further. He kept trying to break away from the contest he was engaged in, and still Harry Potter wouldn't let him. His magic, Lord Voldemort's stolen magic, boiled and surged around him, and even though he should have seen long since that he was the weaker of the two, he kept right on pressing forward, as if he were a Gryffindor and not a Slytherin, as if he had the right to challenge Lord Voldemort for this kind of power!

It would have been enough to drive a greater man mad, if there were any greater men.

But Lord Voldemort knew his opponent's mind, and he knew what was most precious to him, who out of the people on the battlefield he would die to protect. And he knew what Potter would assume when he saw Lord Voldemort point his wand at that person.

Yes, there he was, staggering up from his knees, staring around the battlefield, far from the other struggling Death Eaters at the moment and not paying any attention to the great Lord across the battlefield from him.

Perfect.

Harry had been aware for some time that the pace of his and Voldemort's interchange was slowing, but he thought that was due to his own weakness. He could think of no reason that Voldemort would want to back away from this contest. He didn't, himself. He wanted to continue until one of them was dead, and he didn't think that it would matter so very much if it was him. The magic flooded him, intoxicating, coaxing, pulling effort after effort from him.

Nothing else mattered, not food or drink or his brother or anything but defeating the Dark Lord.

Then Voldemort spun to the side, and Harry staggered, trying to recover his balance. He saw that Voldemort was not staring at him anymore. He looked up, wondering if someone else had arrived, and feeling a bit jealous that anyone else could draw the Dark Lord's attention even for a moment.

He saw Draco, climbing to his feet with eyes wide with wonder, and he saw Voldemort's wand lift and point, and yes, something did matter more than defeating the Dark Lord, and he sprang forward with a scream of rage and fury and love, shaping all his magic into an offensive strike, determined to take down Voldemort or at least force him to retreat before his curse could hit Draco—

Then he realized, as Voldemort turned to face him, and Harry was all open, all defenseless, that it had been a trap, that Voldemort had used his sacrificial instincts against him.

He had no time to retreat, no time to shield. He pushed and flung his offensive magic ahead, even as Voldemort said, "Cogo!"

It was the Compression Curse, a simple spell that Harry ordinarily would have had no trouble deflecting. He couldn't now, though. He'd left himself too open, put every impulse of his heart into the strike, and as his body began to be crushed together, his shoulders bending and breaking, he knew that he was going to die, squeezed into a ball just like every other victim of the curse.

He couldn't fight it, even as the extent of his stupidity flashed on him with the vividness of a storm, so he pressed ahead with his offensive strike. It was the only thing that remained to him now.

He saw the strike go home. Voldemort had prepared himself to shield against something else, Harry saw, some complicated attempt to turn him inside out or achieve another equally showy effect.

He hadn't prepared himself for pain, and especially not for emotional pain, for Harry's transfer of everything he was feeling right now directly into Voldemort's mind.

Harry felt his back bow at an impossible angle, but he got to see Voldemort squeezing his eyes shut and shaking his head. He knew his arms were curling into his chest, like the legs of a dying insect, but meanwhile Voldemort was shaking with accumulated pain and rage and fear and grief. Bones shattered throughout his body like explosions, but Voldemort was feeling explosions of his own, his mind struggling against the crushing onslaught of emotion and finding no escape.

He wailed aloud.

Then he Disapparated.

His magic went with him, and the Compression Curse eased. Harry slumped to the ground, his voice a mixture of groan and pant and scream. He heard the Death Eaters vanishing as well, and spared a moment to wonder if Evan Rosier was among them, or if he had fallen by the wand of one of his old comrades or Harry's allies.

But most of his mind, oddly, was utterly clear—probably because he had pushed so much emotion at Voldemort—and taken up with the idea that the ending of the Compression Curse was good fortune that he did not deserve. He had done nothing to win this battle, and had done something that might well have lost it for his allies.

He had rushed in without looking. He had acted as a sacrifice again, and this time it could have been the end of him, and the end of the means of defeating Voldemort as well, unless the prophecy chose Connor and one other person.

He had been a fool, and the cracks running all through him had broken wide open at the worst possible time. The mere revelation of what he was feeling had been enough to drive Voldemort away.

He stared along the ruin of his life, and felt iron determination rise in him, as if he had a new, steel skeleton behind his shattered shoulder blades and hips. Those bones hurt less than the revelation of his idiocy.

“Integritas!”

Harry gasped aloud, then screamed, as the Whole Healing spell, a dangerous incantation about two steps away from Dark Arts, ran over him in a flash of white heat. He could feel the damn thing pulling his shattered bones into place, shoving and tugging at his shoulders until they unbowed, drawing ruthlessly on his magic to put things back together and make them as they should be. It only worked on bodily health, of course, so the mental shards lay just where they had fallen, but after a few moments of incandescent pain that rivaled the agony when he had lost his hand, Harry was physically healed.

He rolled slowly over, and stared up at a grinning Evan Rosier.

“I couldn’t let you die,” he said. “You make life too interesting. But I couldn’t heal you nicely, either. I do have a reputation to maintain, you know.”

He vanished.

Harry closed his eyes. He could hear running footsteps, and knew his allies would be there in a few moments. He knew that he could cuddle into their arms, and accept what they had to offer. They would be more than he deserved, too.

And that means that you cannot go to them yet, said the voice of the new revelation rising in his mind.

He had acted like a fool. He must not act like that anymore.

On the other hand, if he went back with his allies now, and especially to Draco, Harry knew it would not be enough. Finally, finally, he was seeing and predicting his own reactions as thoroughly as he had seen and predicted theirs, and he knew that he wouldn’t let himself collapse completely. His pride would interfere again, and his desire not to be seen as weak, and he wouldn’t fall far enough.

It had to be a complete fall, and a complete rebuilding.

And he would have to do it himself. Other people had spent enough time healing him: Draco, Narcissa, Fawkes, Regulus, the unicorns, the Maze. He would do this alone. He thought now, as the iron skeleton of resolve grew throughout him, that he could do it, so long as there was no one around to see his tears and wrap him in warm arms and make him feel as if he had to defend himself and stop anyone from seeing the extent of the damage.

He was, he thought, at last ready to face himself, in the company of himself.

And for that he needed a private place, and he knew the perfect one.

You can't go there, Harry! Regulus was screaming in his head. You can't! It's too dangerous! I know that you don't do anything by halves, but this is too much!

Regulus, Harry said gently, I love you very dearly, and you've often been right, but this time, you're wrong. Go away.

He firmed his Occlumency shields and pushed Regulus out of his mind. Then he curled up on himself, savoring the remnants of pain.

He was going to face his demons, wasn't he? Then he might as well go to the place where most of them dwelt, and, indeed, not do anything by halves. He would drag himself through an interrogation as ruthless as that he would have put a captured Death Eater through.

He vanished even as he felt someone drop to his knees beside him, Apparating to a place where none of them could have followed, thanks to the isolation wards, even if they knew where it was.

Home.

Godric's Hollow.

Chapter Seven: Breakdown

Harry opened his eyes to find himself lying on grass that had once been intimately familiar to him, with the radiant full moon shining down in broken shards from overhead where its light passed through the isolation wards. He let out a sharp little breath. He had wondered if the wards would be intact, but he had imagined they would be. Lily had lived here by herself for more than a year, with only Dumbledore's house elves to tend her. Dumbledore would have wanted to be sure that she was well-protected, and the isolation wards that had stood around the house for fourteen years were stronger than anything he could have woven in just a few months.

Harry pulled himself slowly to his feet, blinking and staggering as his newly-healed bones protested, and then reached out and touched the holes in the wards. There were a few, mostly only large enough for owls. He repaired them, and then raised a thick ward of his own, twining together Shield Charms until a chain of Protego ran along behind the isolation wards, forming a dome, as they did.

He paused to study his work when he was done, and then nodded, once. The wards around the house were keyed to James, to Connor, to Remus, to Lily, to Dumbledore, and perhaps also to Peter, though Harry was fairly sure his father had changed that after Peter's intrusion in the summer before their third year at Hogwarts. That meant that they might be able to follow him here, particularly if Regulus managed to pass information through one of the former Death Eaters to Connor—

But even if they followed him here, they couldn't get in. The Shield Charms were keyed only to him, and would hold firm.

Harry turned towards the house, lying innocently in the moonlight, only to pause as he felt a tug of warmth in his mind. He shook his head in irritation, and raised his Occlumency walls even higher than he had before. Fawkes was trying to reach him. If Harry sealed the bond off like a tunnel, however, then the phoenix couldn't find him, and couldn't appear at his side. He had been in Godric's Hollow before, of course, but that had been with only the weaker wards in place and Harry welcoming him. Harry was fairly confident he could keep Fawkes out even as he would keep out Regulus.

This was something he had to do alone.

He reached the door of the house and opened it. It swung easily under his hand, not needing even an unlocking charm. Of course, Harry thought, Lily hadn't had the need to fear anyone intruding while the isolation wards stood, and she had expected to return with him this summer. No need to lock it all up tight when she believed that she'd come back with him from Hogwarts just a few minutes after leaving.

And now she's gone.

But not forever, Harry told himself, and that was the reason he was here at all. He stepped into the entrance room and flicked his hand. The lamps in the room lit with a blast of brilliance, sending light flooding across books and furniture and carpeting he hadn't seen in a year and a half.

Harry bit his lip as he studied them. He wondered if the best place to do what he intended would really be here. The room held memories, of course, but he didn't think it was enough. His training had taken place here, but also all around the house, and the most traumatic single event he could remember occurring here was Remus's finding out he had been abused.

His fingers flexed spasmodically as he thought about that.

You can say the word. You can think it.

It didn't help that he didn't really believe it yet, of course.

Never mind. That would cease to matter in a moment.

Harry shook his head and moved on into the kitchen. It was dusty from several days of neglect; the house elves must have left to go back to Hogwarts when they realized there was no longer any human here to care for. Harry could feel his breath rushing faster and faster, his spine stiffening, his hand clenching at his side. He didn't realize it was clenched until he tried to extend it to touch the table and found his fingers resisted moving, however.

This was the place where he had seen his mother for what he believed would be the last time, the day she had tried to renew the phoenix web on him.

This will do.

Harry forced his hand to open, and then seated himself on the floor, a careful distance from both table and cupboards. He didn't want to ram his head into anything, in case he made uncontrolled physical movements. He didn't want to fall, either. He half-closed his eyes and breathed for long moments in silence.

Carefully, he stripped away his consciousness of anything outside Godric's Hollow. The emotions he felt about his allies and Draco, Snape and Scrimgeour, his parents and Dumbledore, slid into Occlumency pools and left him alone. He could feel only his breathing, and the slinking of the truths beneath the surface of his mind.

Harry thought of the way he knew his own mind looked: a living thing, half-forest and half-tame, rustling with green leaves. Throughout it lay the Occlumency pools, and under them lay the bridges of his magic that he had established at the end of his second year, when he was trying furiously to contain it. A neat structure, he thought, and undergirded by training he hadn't ever tried to change. Training that ran deeper than the phoenix web, training that had made him into the person he was but the quality of which he hadn't paused to consider.

How could he have considered it, though? He had been told, when he received it, that it was infallibly right and good.

Well, now he knew better. And now, he could summon the cool, sleek resolve that had arisen in him when he pushed his emotions into Voldemort's mind, and had seen himself lying helpless on the ground.

He had sometimes been merciless to his enemies in the past, and certainly with people he had thought behaved stupidly.

He could be merciless with himself.

Couldn't he?

Yes. I can do that.

Harry took one final deep breath. Even the means to keep himself focused and concentrated on the task at hand would end up as the means of delaying it if he let them become so. He made himself promise that, when he let out this breath, he would begin the change, and then he let it out.

And he turned his own magic on his own mind.

He imagined his Legilimency as a dragon, withering, blasting flame-breath taking out the forest, crisping and drying the leaves, collapsing the half-woven hedges, tearing into the substance of his thoughts. He heard silent screaming, and knew it came from him, that it might even be emerging from his throat as audible sound. He pushed forward, even when his head began to burn with dull pain, willing himself to ignore it. He dug down and down, setting the heart of his memories and sanity carefully in the Occlumency pools, but burning everything else.

He imagined the leaves parting, revealing the old instincts and training at the bottom of them. He saw webs and bridges and wounds, old scarred things that had been made by carelessness or design and then allowed to recover as they would. He tore them open, and more pain raged around the inside of his head. Harry dove deeper, dragging his resolve along with him.

Pain.

Memories soared past him, images of himself as a child, of his parents, of Connor, of Draco, of Voldemort. One moment he was in the graveyard, the next facing Lucius Malfoy in his study, the next a child casting pain curses on himself so that he could learn to resist torture. He accepted the wild chaos and dug deeper, ravaging the things that made him who he was. Everything most essential, the things he absolutely had to have to recover, was stored in the Occlumency pools. Everything else could be destroyed.

Somewhere along the way, he lost the consciousness of his name, though he knew he could recover it if necessary. That was in the Occlumency pools, too, or in the memories that stormed around him. He would only have to wait, and one of them would fly to him and stick itself to his face and tell him what he needed to know.

He landed at last near the bottom. His head pounded with pain. He knew that he had torn most of the webs that had confined him, though at the moment it was hard to remember why he had wanted to tear them. He lay back, panting, and then reached out and cracked open the first Occlumency pool, not trying to choose one in particular—he no longer remembered which was which—and waited to see what would emerge.

What emerged was an image of his brother. Connor, that was his name, and they were examining fairies at the bottom of the garden. After a short struggle, he remembered that their home was called Godric's Hollow. He didn't know his own name, not yet. That was not part of the scene. It was only a small thing beside the overwhelming consciousness of his brother. He smiled, and listened to Connor make up stories about the fairies, and studied the web of love that bound them.

That was part of what made him who he was, then.

And he had made mistakes because of it, savage mistakes. He had thought, for example, that nothing mattered more than Connor, or rather that Connor mattered more than everyone else. And that was a mistake because, if everyone really did deserve the same chances, then Connor deserved the chances that other people had—but not more. The people who had taught him to love Connor, whom he didn't know, yet, had twisted that, and taught him that Connor did deserve more.

Why?

He blinked. He found it odd, but freeing, that he did not know why. It had something to do with the heart-shaped scar on his brother's forehead, though. He leaned forward, and peered at that attentively. The remembered him smiled. But there was nothing about the scar that particularly drew the attention, he thought. Hm. Perhaps he should reach into the Occlumency pools, again.

He did, and stamped down on the messy emotions that wanted to emerge. There would be time for them later.

Ah. The scar came from surviving a curse and killing a monster—but his brother had been only a baby when that happened. And Connor had not been the one who had survived the curse and killed the monster. That had been the remembered him. Himself, he supposed. He thought that was where the lightning bolt scar on his forehead had come from. But no one particularly revered him for that, and why should they? He had not been the one who had chosen to face the monster.

More rummaging. More peering into the Occlumency pool.

Oh. Oh. Other people had made the decision for him. His parents, of course, and another older man whose name he didn't wish to remember yet. Well, that made more sense. Parents should make the decisions for their children. And if they knew that one of their children could kill the monster, then—

They hadn't known.

He paused as that realization struck him, and considered it a moment. Then he pulled up a memory, seen as from a distance, of the night the monster had come to Godric's Hollow, and what had happened. He watched it in silence, as if seeing it for the first time, conscious that he wasn't, but allowing new emotions to flood across his mind.

They had just left him and his brother to face the monster alone. They had not known that one of them could defeat him, not for certain. They had only hoped.

That—that is hideous.

He was aware, distantly, that his indignation was more general than specific. He would have been upset about any parents who left their children to a monster without absolute trust in the defenses that guarded them. He had a sense, dimly, that it had been harder for him to be upset about himself being the baby in the cradle who had lain helpless as the monster swooped down.

Not so helpless.

But that had been an accident, a chance, a coincidence. It might have been predicted, but no one had known which way it was going to happen. He might easily have died, and the monster might have been destroyed by his brother. Or maybe something else would have happened that resulted in Connor dying. So the excuse of the good outcome couldn't be used to justify their leaving Connor and him alone. They had not known, their parents and this man named Albus Dumbledore.

He seized that insight and examined it for a moment. He had the feeling that it was important, though he did not know how. He cracked open yet another Occlumency pool, and waited to see what would emerge.

A torrent of emotions answered him, and as they flowed out, the memories they belonged to came and attacked him. Harry, Harry, that was his name, and he was fighting, gasping, struggling to stay on his feet and keep his balance in the midst of the current, remembering the resolve that had driven him here, knowing again who he was and what his training had been—

But he had hold of the insight, too, and it did not slip away. He slammed the insight into the memories flooding past him, and then he understood.

He had said once that his training didn't matter, because he had survived it. So it did not matter that some evil things had been done to him in the name of love, in the name of a twisted greater good, that he was a sacrifice. He had survived, and he accomplished many good things with the end result of that training. Why were Snape and the others so upset about it?

Well. Now he knew.

Harry could feel himself flinching from that insight, trying to fight it, marshalling all the old arguments. He raised steel cages of pure will and magic, cages that kept him from running. Wherever he turned, he saw only himself, reflected, and came to know and understand his part, because he had no choice.

They were upset for the same reason that he was upset about leaving children alone and helpless before a danger. Parents owed more care to their children than that. It did not matter that he was Harry, or that there was a prophecy involved, or that he had been taught to be a sacrifice. Other people still saw him as a child whose parents had not taken care of him. They saw him as a victim—

He really did revolt then, trying to knock himself unconscious rather than endure what was coming, but that merciless resolve gripped him and dragged him back. By Merlin, he would live through this. They were words, true words, and he would hear them.

He pulled himself through shattered glass, and he spoke them.

“They see me as a victim of child abuse because, to them, child abuse is a child’s parents treating him with something other than proper love and care. And that’s what my parents did.”

Harry opened his eyes, and became aware that he was breathing harshly all the while. Blood ran from his lips when he licked them; he had bitten almost straight through the lower one. He could not care. Revelation rang in his head like a crystal bell, and overrode the dull pain from his destroyed mind.

So that is what they see. That is what they know, or think they know. It is no wonder that they think me a victim. They would see any child in that situation as a victim. It is not that I’m me, particularly, that makes them think I can’t bear this. They would think the same thing of Connor if he had been trained to be a sacrifice for me. They would think the same thing of Draco. They would think the same thing of Millicent.

Wonder and relief flooded his heart. So it really was simple. It really was understandable. It really made sense, when he was able to consider himself the same as everyone else, or at least as other children in the same situation, and not as unique.

Knowing that the world had not gone mad, that he could share everyone else's perspective if he really tried, was a great comfort.

Harry cocked his head. "So what would I expect Connor, or Draco, or Millicent, to feel, in the same situation?" he whispered.

Anger. Regret. Fear. Terror. They certainly wouldn't want to testify to save Lily's freedom, or to exonerate Dumbledore.

That is what everyone else is expecting me to feel.

Well, no wonder they're so upset when I don't appear to feel it!

Harry hooked his hand behind his head and lay back, staring at the ceiling. He could feel memories of the phoenix web and Lily pressing on him, if he really cared to look for them, but at the moment he was occupied in considering something else.

And why don't I appear to feel it?

Harry frowned, half-closing his eyes. He supposed that this was where his answer would differ from other people's, again. They would say it was his training. Any child should be as outraged and fearful as they were imagining.

But all those expected emotions only made part of his response. He did, still, feel the pity and the forgiveness that had made him shrink from the thought of charging even Dumbledore, the one he cared for least among the three, with child abuse. Their lives would be ruined.

"They've ruined my life," he murmured, then paused. The words felt false. He understood, now, why other people would expect him to believe them. He could adopt that perspective by flicking his mind slightly to the side. Of course they had ruined his life by driving him into pain and uneasiness, by making him flinch with guilt whenever he wasn't doing something to serve Connor, by putting the phoenix web on him.

But a softer voice answered back to that: So what?

Harry examined the voice thoughtfully. Could he be sure that it was his, and not the voice of the training they had put him through, the voice—say it, Harry, they are only words, and words are easy—of an abused child?

Well. That was a stupid thought to have, really. If he was an abused child, then the voice of an abused child would be his own voice. So he couldn't say that it wasn't him talking.

The way he thought of it, he realized, lying back in the kitchen where he'd spent years learning his lessons and taken his mother's magic away, was that the ruin of his life was a thing to be comforted and dug up and healed until it was really healed, not just paved over. But ruining other people's lives was not going to heal him, any more than killing Voldemort would bring Sirius back to life. What killing Voldemort accomplished was killing Voldemort, nothing more or less. Oh, of course, the long-term consequences of that act would be a bit different, but they still wouldn't include Sirius coming back to life—or Sylaana, for that matter—or turning back time so that neither he nor Connor would ever bear their scars. What would happen was the protection of the future, so that Voldemort could not go on killing. Harry would protect the people still alive. He could do nothing for the dead. And it seemed a bit blind of Snape to believe that he could really make it as if Harry's childhood had never been.

Harry abruptly blinked and stared.

What if he doesn't think of it that way? What if he thinks of it the other way? What if he filed charges against my parents and Dumbledore not to change the past, but to change the future, and protect me from their ever doing me harm again?

If he did...if he did...

Then I am an idiot.

Harry blew out a breath, and blinked away angry tears for a moment. Then he changed his mind and let them come. There was no one here to see him. There was no one who could get through his wards. He could weep, and no one would scold him or pity him or be frightened when he could not stop crying.

And he could not stop crying.

He turned on his side and let the tears fall until his eyes were swollen and his breath came in hiccupping sobs, drawn as though there were a thick, musty blanket in his lungs. He reveled in the peace and the certainty that followed the weeping. He didn't have anything to prove to anybody. He didn't have to keep up a brave face, or cry just the way other people would expect him to.

And he didn't have to pretend that he wasn't angry at Snape. He was still angry. Understanding why Snape had done it wasn't the same thing as agreeing with him.

How dare he? How could he? Why didn't he come to me and explain it like this? I know that he thought I was unreasonable, but then, he had the greater duty as the reasonable one to try to persuade me, instead of just letting these darts fly.

And, anyway, it doesn't matter if he was reasonable or not, I still have the right to be angry at him if I like.

The table exploded. Harry could feel his magic boiling around him, and took several deep, gasping breaths, trying to force it back under control.

Then he wondered, Why? It's not as though there's anyone here to get frightened or hurt. I can let it explode if I like.

He shook his head, and released his magic around him, much like the storm of his memories, pouring it fully and freely out for the first time.

It stretched luxuriously, as deep as Voldemort's if not as strong, and surged. Harry smelled the scent of roses, and saw random flashes of light, and heard voices laughing and singing as the room appeared to tilt sideways. He was living in a disordered world that would have frightened anyone else.

It did not frighten him.

I don't need to be anything like what other people will expect me to be. I don't need to. I can understand them, and I can heal myself, but that doesn't mean that I need to be their perfect little portrait of the abused child, either. Why should I be? If this really is my life and my magic, my mind and my memories, and if I really do have the right to be a little selfish, the way that Draco said I could, then why should I have to react exactly the way they expect me to?

He did not have to, and in the same way he hurled his magic around his head in a loop and then let go of the tail by which he'd held it, smashing a hole open in the wall, he let go of the notion that he was ever going to be exactly what Snape wanted him to be, or Draco, or anyone else. Not everything he was needed to be healed. He was more than his wounds. He had to be, or he would rebuild himself in another image imposed on him from the outside. That this time it would be in the image of people who loved him, rather than people who feared him and wanted to control his magic, did not matter. It would still be someone else's picture of what he looked like.

He was more than that. He had been more than Lily's training, Dumbledore's warrior, James's neglected child. He was more than Snape's ward or Draco's love or Narcissa's adopted son, however much those roles might also be a part of him.

Harry stepped through the hole, his magic sliding around him, and looked up at the sky. The isolation wards, and his own Shield Charms, perceptibly dimmed the light of the full moon, but did not cause the same wavering effect on the stars, perhaps because the stars were too high and distant. Harry held out his hand, and, by a simple effort of will, enabled himself to see the starlight coiling in his palm.

Then he closed his fist, and turned some of his magic into thick black fog, and let it rise around him, and shut out the sight of even the house, and the grass, and the pond, and the moon. He was alone in the darkness, with the memory of the stars and the wind to sustain him, and another harsh truth.

Harry turned and faced it. His magic solidified into a mirror before him, a mirror that held no more than his own face. Of course, that was remarkable enough, since there was no light here to see the reflection by. So be it. He saw it anyway.

He quietly examined himself. Lightning bolt scar, missing hand—he had let the glamour fall away—bare arm where once Sylarana had clung. The other scars were not as visible, but present: Dragonsbane's death, Sirius's, the cracks that had parted him first from the rest of the world and then from his family, the mental damage Voldemort had inflicted on him, the hole where the phoenix web had been, the lack of knowledge about affection and social bonds that was instinctive to most other wizards he'd met, a wildness and raging temper, the broken barriers that had released his magic on the night Voldemort had come hunting, the dark stain caused by Rodolphus's murder and Mulciber's.

All marks of sacrifice. All places where he'd given something up or had something torn away. Even knowing that Dragonsbane had gone to his death willingly, that Sirius had committed suicide to keep Voldemort from using him against two boys he loved, that Sylarana had struck at Slytherin's basilisk in protective fury, that Rodolphus and Mulciber would have killed him if he hadn't killed them, could not change the fact of their deaths. Vengeance would never bring the dead back to life. Harry would never forget that.

There would be more casualties. The war had begun. He hadn't known what it really meant when he first trained for it. Connor had been the only human tie he'd had in the wider world when he left Godric's Hollow, the only one he was capable of having. So long as he kept him safe, Harry had not expected to feel the deaths of anyone else very much.

And he had. And other people had sacrificed enough, too, Merlin knew—freedom and innocence if nothing else. Power. Prestige. Life. Magic. Love.

And just as vengeance cannot answer vengeance...

Harry paused. If he were in an ordinary place, at an ordinary time, he might have said the words, and they would just be words. As he was now, before a mirror to which he could not lie, trying himself in the court of himself, he knew that saying the words would foster and force a change.

He stood on a hill and looked down into a darkened valley lit by lightning, and he thought that he still could have turned away.

Of course I could have. No one made me choose this. Most of the people who love me would prefer something less risky.

It was knowing that he had made the choice of his own free will which pushed him forward, made him say the words which echoed tinnily in the dimness.

“Sacrifice cannot answer sacrifice.”

Aloud, the words did not sound like much.

Inside him, they snatched the flying memories, and welded them together with his steel resolve, and spun a new pattern for him, less a plan of action than a skeleton of will and desire.

By my desire and by my will, I will do this. I do not know how to recognize all the sacrifices I make, not completely, unless I descend into myself every time, and I can't do that.

White fire burned up the reluctance to speak, the desire to keep secrets. Harry yielded it not as a sacrifice, but as something he no longer needed, freely discarded. He drew a deep breath.

I will try to talk. I will ask Draco to help. He notices more than anyone else when I'm hiding. I can't fool him as well.

He chose another thing, and threw it on the fire.

I will have to learn to accept my own limits. It's better to apply a little clever finesse with small power and effort than to strike with great power, wildly flailing, all the time. I will have to ask my allies what spells they can teach me that might actually counteract Voldemort. The Unforgivable Curses don't do it, nor Rosier's spells, nor my own newly invented ones. I tried them all in the graveyard, and he defeated them all. It will have to be traps that take him, multiple combinations of spells, and not straightforward duels. I will ask. I must ask.

Harry took a breath that fanned the flames higher, and another piece of his training burned, another spike of the skeleton burst into flower with his memories and his magic secured over and under it. There were blank places left where Harry hoped he would grow the necessary emotions over time. For now, the will to do the necessary things must be enough.

To learn the spells, to battle Voldemort, to talk, I must have people who will teach and listen to me. That means asking for aid, and holding my patience and my tongue when others seem slow. They know plenty of things that I don't, from growing up with people who did not—abuse them. I should listen. I'll still hate it at first, but maybe I can learn to rejoice in it. Maybe.

He knew he had one more piece of himself left to burn, but this was the most precious, the most long-guarded, and one he was especially slow to give up because it might seem as though he yielded it just to have an easier life. Harry closed his eyes and took a deep breath. His Occlumency pools were almost all cracked open, the emotions they had contained blended with the new structure of his mind.

Save one.

Harry plunged his hand into it, and dragged forth his rage and his grief and his hatred and his confusion and his protective instincts over his parents.

He screamed, but not in pain. The darkness spasmed around him, and then broke, and Harry saw his magic spread, clawing at the ground like narrow roots. Where those roots passed, the grass and the earth they had touched simply ceased to exist. Slender grooves cut down and down into the dirt, their bottoms beyond Harry's eyesight. His magic crashed into the wards and the Shield Charms, and strained at them, devouring. Then it spread out and beyond them, and up. Harry lifted his head and bared his teeth at the stars.

I can hate them if I want. I can despise them for what they did to me. I can be madly glad that my magic's free, and not under their control any more.

Jagged dark patterns appeared above Harry, as if he were staring through bare branches at Midwinter. His magic ate the air, and left behind smooth, small traces of airless void.

I can feel pain, and know that I'll be dealing with what they did to me for the rest of my life.

His magic crashed into itself, screaming, and fell out of the sky in dark shards, landing around him in a pattering rain. Harry knew that Fawkes could find him now, but hoped the phoenix would know better than to try.

He held out his hand. The magic shot back to him and coiled there in a ball. Harry passed the stump of his left wrist into and out of it, and when he pulled it free, the skin was blue and numb with frostbite.

I can feel all those things. But ultimately, they're only emotions. And I'm free to feel other emotions towards them, too.

His magic burst free of the tiny ball, and golden light flooded the darkness around him. Deliberately, Harry made it the color of lamplight, not sunrise, the illumination that had once reached through the windows of Godric's Hollow to welcome Sirius or Remus home for the evening.

I can feel pity, if I want. I can feel protectiveness, when all the rest of the world does not feel it.

Harry felt the tears burst free again. Well, of course they would, given the way his thoughts were tending. As he knelt and wept because so much of his life and theirs had been wasted, the voice of his thoughts continued, wild and ringing.

I will not try to stop the trial from going forward. I will not lie. But along with not lying, I am going to tell everything, and that includes why I feel they deserve forgiveness now. If I do know exactly what they did to me, then I can forgive them. Hatred and forgiveness can exist in me at the same time. There is no one to say that they cannot.

Harry cast the last great reluctance within himself on the fire, and felt his mind flare and settle into the new pattern. It was incomplete. There were still things he would have to ask other people to help him with, including Draco and Snape and Connor and his allies and perhaps even the Seers, and Harry doubted that he would ever feel exactly what other people did—that every nuance of his earlier life was detestable, for example, or that love was easy. He might be equal to them, but he was not identical.

And then he was flung back from the distance he'd occupied as judge and jury and executioner of himself, as his mind united again, and the emotions and the tears overcame him entirely.

Sometime later, when his eyes were swollen until he nearly could not see and the eastern sky was lightening with dawn that he didn't remember having missed the beginning of, Harry sat up and stared to the south. He knew Malfoy Manor lay in that direction, and that he would have to go back there now that he'd created himself over again.

He didn't want to. He could acknowledge that.

But this was the first test that he had to put himself through. Before, when someone gave him a new prohibition, like Snape telling him that he must stay within the walls and wards of Hogwarts or Draco promising that he'd hit him with a Stunning Spell if he didn't stay out of danger, Harry hadn't taken it seriously. Those were only limits. He could surpass limits. There was no question but that he would have to, if someone else's life were in danger.

If he had really changed, if he really meant this, then he would have to go back to his very displeased allies, tell them the truth, and let them impose what punishments and restrictions they would. And he would have to do that of his own free will, and truly submit to them, not yield on the surface and plan to keep his promises only if it suited him.

Harry wished he knew how to assume the lynx form outside of dreams, so he had a tail to lash and ears to flatten.

Well. No one had demanded that he creep back with a penitent heart. Only that he come back.

Harry stood, and glanced once at Godric's Hollow. It looked different now, with the hole in the side of the house and half the isolation wards eaten away. It should, Harry thought. He'd gone through enough changes that he would have been shocked if the house had looked exactly the same.

He turned away again, and, drawing on his connection to the wards of Malfoy Manor, he went home.

Intermission: Punishments

Narcissa closed her eyes and leaned back against the wall of the entrance hall in the Manor. She had reached the stage where her throat hurt from lack of sleep, but she did not feel able to rest until Harry returned from wherever he had vanished to.

If it were not for his vanishing, she thought, as she placed one hand over her throat and held it there, then she would have counted the evening an entire success. Three of the Weasleys had come out of the house to aid in the fighting, and aside from a few tense stares, they hadn't shown any reaction when they realized who was rescuing them. Narcissa supposed they might even have made a difference towards driving the seven Death Eaters who had lived away. She couldn't tell for certain. She had no interest in telling for certain.

Most of her attention, from the time that Harry went into battle against the Dark Lord, had been focused on him.

Narcissa closed her eyes and shuddered. The fog that had risen around Harry and Voldemort had been like nothing else she had ever seen—as if the heat and power behind a storm had emerged in a form she could comprehend at a glance. She had expected Harry would die at any moment. It might be in the nature of Voldemort to survive such storms, but she knew too well that Harry was only a boy, and one considerably more fragile than he allowed himself to look or feel. So she had fought with her glance continually darting off, split between the duel and her own son.

Draco had done well, and not even given her a cause for panic, save when he had tumbled on his face just as one of the Death Eaters rushing at Lucius's back lifted her wand. Narcissa could not remember crossing the ground between him and herself, only that she must have, but by the time she arrived at his feet, he was climbing back to them. Narcissa had ducked hastily away before he could accuse her of hovering over him.

He did need to learn to survive on his own, just as Harry did.

Well, no, Harry already knows it. Narcissa blinked and opened her eyes, her fingers running absently over her neck this time. And if the War comes to us when Draco is this age, of course he would insist on fighting rather than being left behind. I will have to learn to accept this.

A pair of hands descended on her shoulders, steering her around and holding her so they could roughly massage the muscles. Narcissa sighed and braced her arms against the wall. Lucius murmured in her ear, "You are thinking about him?"

"Of course I am." Narcissa glanced at her husband. He looked only more like himself, not less, despite the long, thin wound that scored his cheek. "You are, as well."

Lucius inclined his head. "Only thinking that he was foolish."

Narcissa hummed softly and closed her eyes. Adalrico had felt the presence of her cousin Regulus in his head the moment after Harry vanished, informing them all that he had gone to Godric's Hollow. That presented quite a problem, of course, since none of them knew where it was. Draco had suggested letting an owl fly and then following it, but none of the adults were in any condition to fly a broom at first, and Lucius said quietly that if Draco tried to go alone, he would find himself disowned. Then Harry's phoenix appeared, crooning in distress, and Narcissa could see her son sag, giving the idea up. If Fawkes could not find Harry, then none of them would.

They knew where he was. They had only to wait for him to come back.

"Narcissa. Lucius."

Narcissa looked up, blinking. Hawthorn was facing them in human form, her face pale. Narcissa darted a glance out the window. Yes, it was indeed dawn, leaving Hawthorn able to change back. Narcissa let her breath out an inch at a time, and told herself that she had no proof that Harry was hurting more the longer he stayed away.

"How are your wounds?" she asked Hawthorn.

Hawthorn shrugged slightly. "I will live." She moved an imperfectly healed shoulder in circles as Narcissa watched, then shifted her weight from her left leg to her right and grimaced. Greyback had bitten her several times. Narcissa had done what she could with the medical magic she knew, and Elfrida, skilled in healing her own children, had helped as well, but they did not dare take Hawthorn to St. Mungo's. The Healers would recognize werewolf bites. They would confine Hawthorn and demand that she register with the Ministry, and, in truth, their only mistake would be in thinking that Hawthorn had become infected this night and not almost two years ago.

Hawthorn was quite insistent that she remain free, and Narcissa could hardly blame her. Their world was not kind to werewolves, or former Death Eaters.

Or to boys who do not know they are abused.

Narcissa winced as the thought of Harry came back to her, slamming harder into her mind for those minutes of being denied. She almost wanted to stand on her toes and look out the Manor windows, but she knew what she would see: dawn, and no one circling back on a broom. It was ludicrous to think that Harry would return that way, anyway. He hadn't left on a broom, so why should he return on one?

A movement off to the side caught Narcissa's eye. She glanced over to see her son standing there disconsolately, his face lackluster, nearly lifeless.

If there was ever any doubt that Draco loved Harry, I would discard it now. Narcissa looked at Lucius to see if he had noticed, and surprised a slight frown on his face. He smoothed it away at once, but she knew it had been there, and knew why. He thinks Draco weak for expressing his emotions in this way.

Narcissa suppressed an irritated sigh. She hated the arguments between her husband and son, but she could not interfere in this particular one. They were both Malfoy by blood and birth; she was only so by marriage. She could not force Lucius to declare Draco his magical heir, and attempts to persuade him had resulted in her husband walking out of the room.

Abruptly, the air in front of them cracked open, and a house elf tumbled out of it, squeaking. Hawthorn, wounded as she was, had faced it before any of the others could move, Narcissa noted. She felt a moment's pained envy. There were times she thought she could contract the curse for the sake of a werewolf's reflexes and senses.

"Mifi has come to say that Master Harry Potter has returned," said the elf, which was as far as she got before Draco was trying to half-strangle her.

"Where, Mifi?" he demanded. "What room?"

"The Blue Reception Room—"

Draco began to run. Narcissa hastened after him. She could hear Hawthorn gamely following, and Lucius refusing to walk faster than a dignified stroll. Along the way, they passed Adalrico's and Elfrida's door, and Hawthorn rapped smartly, exchanging a few low-voiced words with them to let them know Harry was back.

Narcissa tasted cautious relief mingling with the worry in her mouth. There was no telling what condition Harry might have returned in, after all.

But when they opened the door and saw him standing in front of the hearth, lifting his head from contemplation of the flames and blinking at them, then Narcissa felt justified in permitting relief and worry to give way to anger.

I promised him there would be consequences for risking his life needlessly. I will see that he suffers them.

Lucius felt the difference the moment he came into the Blue Reception Room and saw Harry waiting for them, his head slightly lifted and his green eyes bright with a mixture of emotions in which the uppermost one was puzzlement. He halted. Adalrico, of course, pushed past him and strode over to the boy, staring down at him.

“You ran away without permission from the battle,” he said. “Not telling us whether you were wounded, not telling us why you were going or what you wished to do, but simply running away. That is not the action of an effective general, Harry.”

“That’s because I’m not an effective general yet,” said Harry, lifting his head further to study Adalrico. “I’ve never been trained to act in concert with others, never realized I should take advantage of their strengths as well as my own. I believe I’ve undergone an experience now that will let me do that. Will you teach me what an effective general is?”

Adalrico stared. So did the women, and Draco, who had made his way to Harry’s side and had one arm clamped around his waist in a death grip. Narcissa was caught the least flat-footed, Lucius saw, but even she frowned slightly, as though she could not understand how Harry spending one night away from them would have changed him so fundamentally.

Of all of them, Lucius thought, I am the only one who understands.

He caught Harry’s eyes and held them, confirming his impression. Yes. He was the only one who had made a habit of continually feeling out Harry’s magic, even when he didn’t use it to do something overtly impressive. He knew the moments when it grew sharp-edged, and what that indicated about Harry’s emotional state. He knew the moments when it pulled in, and Harry tried to hide. He knew when it was spreading, and would probably cause a new storm in a few moments. Years of observing his Lord in this way had been worth the headaches. Lucius had been able to predict better than most Death Eaters what the Dark Lord would do next.

One thing that had always reassured him about Harry’s power—though, if asked, he would have said it was worrisome and not reassuring—was its fragility. It never intruded. It rarely pressed, unless he was so angry that he did not think to ask permission. Most of the time, Harry concentrated on keeping it as unnoticeable as possible, with an effort so deep that Lucius no longer thought it conscious.

Now, his magic spread throughout the room, causing a faint, dull, buzzing ache in Lucius's teeth, and did not apologize for itself. Something had indeed changed. While he had to trust that Harry would not declare himself a Lord, he was more Lord-like than Lucius had ever known him to be.

Draco was now demanding an explanation. Harry was going to give one. First, though, he stared back at Lucius, saying that he knew the reason for that continued scrutiny.

And that he no longer feared him.

Harry looked away, and Lucius blinked and loosed a breath he hadn't realized he was holding. His own eyes narrowed as they focused on the side of Harry's face.

He would have to step more carefully from now on. He could no longer be certain of knowing more about emotions than the boy did.

He refused to admit that that made his life a bit more exciting than it had been before. Only children thought excitement an unmixed good. Draco hadn't said much of anything at first, because joy and rage together were choking him.

He was relieved that Harry had come back safe. Of course he was. He bore no wounds, and his eyes had a look of clear sanity that Draco hadn't seen in them for days, and he wore no glamour over his left wrist.

But the rage...

Surely he was allowed to rage when Harry had dashed off and left them with no warning, only a secondary one come through Adalrico's lips? Of course he was. And when he realized that Regulus had told them against Harry's will, not as a precaution, disappointment had almost drowned his anger. He had held off on pressing Harry because he truly believed that he needed the time and the space to heal. And now it seemed as if they only made him worse, as if there were nothing to be done. Harry would reject a too-close concern, but he would not heal without it.

One new thing he had rapidly discovered about himself was his hatred of being helpless. In that way, Draco thought, he was similar to Harry.

So, now, he held Harry tight with one arm, and he could not feel this was a continuation of all the times that had come before, the times when Harry would venture out, risk his life, and return relatively intact. This time, he felt differently. He put a hand beneath Harry's chin and forcibly turned his face from Harry's staring contest with his father. He supposed Harry might be uncomfortable with Draco touching him so intimately in front of other people, but he did not give a damn.

"Where have you been?" he demanded.

"Godric's Hollow," said Harry quietly. He let Draco turn his face, manipulate it, with his eyes reflecting nothing more than a faint impatience. "No one was there. I went there because I thought I should face the home where my parents abused me."

Draco's fingers opened, and his hand fell limply from Harry's face to his side. He found himself staring again. Yes, Harry might have learned that he needed other people to teach him about war in Godric's Hollow—though Draco could not have imagined how—but that he would face this...that he would come this far...

"You're lying," he whispered.

"I am not," said Harry quietly. He turned just enough away from Draco so that the rest of them could clearly hear what he said. "I am a Legilimens." Draco saw a start and ripple travel through several of the adults. "I tore my own mind apart with that magic, and put it back together again. Memories, emotions, the truths that I use to guide and govern my life. All of it. All of it got torn apart and burned, then reassembled. I hope that I have a better idea of how to act like a normal person now, though I'll never be ordinary." He shrugged, as if he hadn't just made the most astonishing statement Draco had ever heard him make. "That's what I went there to do."

Draco drew a breath. He wanted to shout for joy, but rage was easier, and he should be dealt with first.

"That was insanely dangerous," he said.

"I know," said Harry, turning and looking at him again. "I'm sorry for the regret and pain and worry you suffered over it."

"You aren't sorry you did it," Draco probed.

"No," said Harry. "If I were, then I would have to doubt the conclusions I came to. And I don't. This was the only way."

Draco leaned nearer Harry, and pictured those bright eyes he loved closed or stilled forever, the face streaked with blood and silence, the body crumpled behind wards he could never remove in time to save his life.

He realized he was crying. He could not care. "You could have died."

"I know."

Draco punched him in the arm. "You don't know, Harry, not if you can stand there and respond in that calm tone."

Harry pulled back from him, and for the first time in two weeks, his eyes grew wide and flashed. "Yes, Draco, I know. I know I could have died. I took the risk anyway. From now on, I am going to try and find less risky ways. I know that I tend to sacrifice myself, and I literally can't imagine any other way of doing things most of the time." Harry spread his hands. "You can help me there. But I can't feel just what you want me to feel, Draco. You'll only get in trouble if you insist on judging me by the way you would react in a situation like this."

Draco swallowed. He wasn't sure which he had to struggle with more: the sob or the accusation. He looked closely at Harry.

Harry stared back at him, face bright with impatience and hope and challenge and expectation. Draco felt lost. He did not know the expression.

Then he realized that was because he'd never seen it before.

The world tore open around him, and Draco steadied himself against the sensation of freefall with a few deep breaths. He could handle this. He had been thinking of himself as a changing person, and couldn't he change to meet this, or in response to this?

Well, yes, I can, he realized. I thought I'd be a teacher to Harry, though, knowing myself better than he knew himself, able to show him all these wonders that he'd never realized existed.

I suppose I should have known better than to think he'd sit still that long.

Draco smiled slightly, and that made Harry blink and start back. Draco took Harry's hand.

"I did say that I would punish you if you ran off again," he said. "And that includes even for going to Godric's Hollow and relearning yourself."

Harry inclined his head once. The gesture was deep, formal. Draco supposed that there was more than a trace of the old Harry left, still, and that made him able to smile as he pronounced the punishment.

"Sleeping spells and Body-Binds and the like don't do a thing unless they come in before the fact," he said. "And I've decided that I'm unlikely to know every time you're about to dash off."

"I will try to be better about that—"

Draco went on as if he hadn't heard. "You made a promise to me to be better about that, and you broke it. That means that I need some kind of magical guarantee, Harry."

Harry tilted his head. "You want me to swear an oath?"

“Of course not.” Draco leaned towards him and took his chin in hand again, making Harry look at him. “You would word the oath in such a way that you could get out of it. No, Harry, I’m talking about a monitoring spell. It would tell me when you’re about to leave the building where it’s cast, and prevent you from doing so if I willed it. We can cast one for the Manor, and a new one when we go back to Hogwarts.” He stared straight into Harry’s eyes. “That’s the punishment I want. Can you accept that?”

Harry breathed deeply. Draco knew the impulses passing behind his eyes, because they would have been his, too: the urge to say that this was unfair, to point out that a monitoring spell wouldn’t solve everything, that this was a solution Draco shouldn’t have had to resort to because he should trust Harry’s word.

Against all of those, Draco only repeated, “That’s the punishment I want.”

Harry dropped his eyes, and, incredibly, only nodded.

Draco drew his wand before Harry could change his mind. He did trust his resolve, but Harry might come up with an even better idea in a few moments, one that just happened to be less restrictive.

“Investigo Harry Potter!” he whispered. He’d looked up the spell during his one productive hour of the night, imagining what he would do to Harry if Harry had the gall to return unwounded.

Harry shivered a bit as the spell tumbled down around him, but didn’t complain. Draco rubbed a hand across his shoulder. He was still reeling from the knowledge that this had happened and Harry had allowed it—and also from the bond the monitoring spell was creating in his mind—but he recognized that Harry needed to be reassured about what had happened.

That done, he let Harry turn to face the adults, to learn what his punishment should be from them.
People’s scents didn’t change that fast.

That disconcerted Hawthorn far more than anything else, though perhaps only because the full moon had shone last night. She kept wrinkling her nose and sniffing, trying to find some trace of the familiar Harry Potter, the one surrounded by pain and fatigue, long after Narcissa had begun, in a level voice, to elaborate why Harry would not be allowed to read any book heavier than one of fey tales for a week, and why he would go to bed the moment the sun set for the rest of the summer, and why he would not, on pain of having her back turned on him, communicate with his parents in any form or fashion before the trial began.

But his scent had changed. Oh, Hawthorn would have known him on the street still, among a dozen other wizards, but the edge of collapse was gone.

That was not possible.

Hawthorn did not know much about Legilimency; that was true. And she knew that sometimes, a witch could escape grief and pain by throwing herself into something new. Pansy's studies in necromancy were proceeding apace because she exhausted her attention in them, to avoid having to think about her father. Hawthorn had allowed herself one night of severe weeping for Dragonsbane, and then she had put her game face back on and continued.

But this...

There must still be buried wounds. There must still be weak points that an enemy could exploit if Harry wasn't careful.

The problem was that Hawthorn couldn't smell them.

Harry turned away from the list of Narcissa's punishments at last, and caught her eye. At once, he frowned. "Why are you standing differently, Mrs. Parkinson?" he asked. "Were you wounded?"

He shifted just then, and his left wrist came free of his sleeve, and Hawthorn saw his missing hand. She knew Narcissa had said something about that at some point, but since Harry had apparently worn a glamour- an effective one, at that- Hawthorn had assumed she'd misunderstood about his actually losing it.

He'd lost his hand, and he'd gone through a mental and emotional transformation that changed his scent, and he still had the keenness of eye necessary to notice how her stance had changed with the wounds she'd received from Greyback.

Those three facts combined and swirled around in Hawthorn's mind until she didn't think she could say anything other than what she said next.

"I am very well, child," she said. "And ready to follow you anywhere."

Harry's mouth curled in a small smile. That was nothing compared to the emotions his eyes flared with, though, or the fact that he shifted his hold on Draco to put out his hand to her.

Hawthorn came and pressed it, staring into his face. And a question she'd asked herself over and over- whether she had really been right to forgive Harry for Dragonsbane's death, when it caused Pansy such pain- was answered at last.

Yes. Yes, I was. He is making good use of the life that Dragonsbane saved for him.

Oh, my love. I hope you can see him now, that the eyes of the dead are not that different. You would be so proud of him.

It was not proper, most of the time, for puellaris witches to be angry. They kept their eyes on the ground and spoke courteous words to their husbands. Outside the home, they were in a world they did not understand, one they had deliberately given up understanding of. Elfrida found it hard enough to focus and function in her day-to-day job with Gringotts. She blushed to imagine confronting men and speaking to them the way she knew her husband had to, all the time.

But when a child was hurt...

Then, it would not have been a proper puellaris witch who could remain calm, and Elfrida was very well-trained. She had been a moment from growing fangs ever since she had heard of the abuse that Harry's parents had put him through.

He was a child, and Elfrida would transform and rend Lily Potter apart if she ever came into sight of her. It did not matter that that would break the family alliance, and cause her to bleed to death. It would happen. Her soul made it impossible for things to fall out otherwise.

Therefore, Elfrida knew, she would not attend the trial. Adalrico had told her that Lily Potter needed to live, and be tried. Most wizards and witches would not see the justice in a lioness ripping her apart, no matter what her crimes had been. Harry especially would not see the justice.

So Elfrida had something else to offer him, and when he turned away from Hawthorn, she offered it.

"Harry," she said. His eyes came at once to her face, and she saw the struggling trust in them reflected with wariness. It was a conflict she was familiar with, having seen it in Millicent's face more than once, as she found herself magical heir to her father and began to grow from a child. "I am not going to punish you, child," she said quietly. "I wish to talk with you. Once a week during the summer, I think, and even that often during the school year if we can manage it."

Harry studied her in silence, and then nodded. His expression said plainly that he didn't understand why she wanted to talk to him.

Elfrida bowed her head. He would not accept the reasons if she stated them. She wanted to remind him that he was still a child, that he had plenty of time to come to adulthood. She wanted to help raise him.

And if there was anything puellaris witches knew something about, it was raising children.

Elfrida sent a cold thought towards Lily Potter, hoping she could hear it. You didn't want him. So he's ours now. And I am going to make sure that he knows it. Separate him gently from his family. Everyone else is much too impatient, rushing through this. You can't rush growth. And he will grow. I will see to it. He is not Millicent or Marian, but then, he is not my daughter. He is my son.

Adalrico studied Harry in silence. He knew things had changed. If nothing else, Harry asking them to train him in battle strategy would have marked it.

He was coming to realize that not enough had changed, though. He had wondered, when he heard about the child abuse charges, why Harry had not contacted them first. Did he not know the Bulstrodes would follow him into the heart of the Dark Lord's stronghold, and that had had been true since he saved Elfrida's and Marian's lives?

Well, no. I don't think that he knows. Did we ever tell him?

They hadn't, Adalrico had to acknowledge ruefully. He had expected Harry to realize, as any child raised in a Dark pureblood home would, what it meant that Harry had enabled a magical heir to survive as well as her mother. Magic was more important than blood. Preserving life would have occasioned a debt, but nothing like what insuring that Elfrida lived as a witch and not a Squib or Muggle did. And Harry had given of his own magic to do it.

Adalrico's mind slammed shut at the thought of such a sacrifice. Only for one of his own children would he have been able to do it, and even then, he would have wanted the promise that they would live and use the magic for purposes he would have approved of, rather than wasting it. Harry had asked for no such promise, merely poured the magic out. Adalrico had actually been the one to stop the pouring, when he could sense his wife's magical presence as strong as it was before she bore Marian. Otherwise, Harry might have given up more and more of his own power.

Their family was what it was because of him.

And they had not told him that.

Well, there is more than one way to remedy that, Adalrico thought, as he arranged to return to the Manor as often as possible during the summer and give Harry private lessons in strategy. I can slip in lessons about what he is, who he is, during my other teaching of him. When he realizes how many among the Dark purebloods regard him-as someone incredibly gifted but willing to share that gift with others...

He will recover his self-confidence. He must. This is a glorious step forward along the path, but it is not enough.

Harry let Draco follow him into his bedroom. It would have been useless to try and keep him out, but this time, Harry actually wanted him there.

He supposed that might change soon, but for today, it had not. He could think of nothing better than curling up and going to sleep in Draco's arms.

As soon as he had finished two letters, of course.

With a soft reaching out of his magic and mind, he called both Fawkes and Hedwig to him. Fawkes scolded him and nipped his ear and scolded him again, visions of Harry dying appearing regularly in his mind. Hedwig softly hooted her disapproval every few moments. Harry ignored them as best he could, and instead scribbled out the notes, while Draco, sprawled on the bed, watched him in silence.

Connor:

I wanted to reassure you that I'm all right. Much better, actually. I thought about some of the things you said, and they helped me come to terms with the abuse. (See, I can even call it that now!) I hope the Weasleys escaped the battle unwounded. For the foreseeable future, I'll be at Malfoy Manor, so feel free to write to me here.

Love,

Your brother, Harry.

He gave that letter to Fawkes, and asked him to wait for a response. Fawkes chirped at him, good humor evidently restored by the chance to act as a messenger, and vanished in a ball of flames.

That left the second blank piece of parchment. Harry stared at it for a while, drumming his fingers on the table, and finally hissed at the hooting Hedwig to be quiet. She blinked grave disapprobation at him.

Draco watched from the bed, and Harry's own conscience watched from within his mind.

Waiting wouldn't make it easier. Harry plunged his quill into the ink and scribbled as fast as he could without making the letter illegible.

Dear Professor:

I was involved in a battle this past night, but I'm safe, and unwounded. Recovering from the effects of a Compression Curse, but that's to be expected. I'm just glad that I took no worse from the Dark Lord.

I tore my mind open with my own Legilimency and created it again, and now I understand why you filed the charges against my parents and Dumbledore. You were trying to protect my future, and me. I still wish you hadn't done it. There were better ways to address the issue. I don't feel up to seeing you yet and telling you that, but you can rail at me by letter, if you want. I invite you to write me back. Just don't assume I'll agree with you for a long time, if I ever do.

He hesitated over the ending words again, but finally wrote his name, and bound the letter to Hedwig's leg. "Snape," he said quietly. She skimmed out the window and vanished.

Then, finally, Harry felt able to lie down in his bed and let Draco surround him with tight, greedy arms. He closed his eyes, and felt Draco press a sleepy kiss to the back of his neck. He shivered. There were ways in which simply accepting this comfort was harder than coming back to Malfoy Manor had been.

But the first step on the road was taken now.

Now he only had to go on taking them- at once a hard task and an enormously simple one. At least he knew that he would never have a harsher judge than himself.

He did consider, briefly, how angry Regulus must be with him, not to have returned to his mind yet, but then he pushed the thought away. He refused to worry about the state of other people's anger when he'd done so much worrying already and Regulus refused to speak. He would explain his actions to Regulus when and if he returned. For the present, he had done all he could.

Quietly, warm and safe and comfortable and loved, he went to sleep.

Chapter Eight: Eye of the Storm

Rufus stood in front of the cell doors and idly twirled his wand between his fingers. Mallory, standing at his back, his only guard for the moment, said nothing. The door in front of him said nothing. The walls to either side of him said nothing.

Of course they didn't, Rufus thought. No one is here to save you from looking stupid, as Grandmother Leonora would say, but yourself.

He shook his head and opened the door. The warding spells had already dropped to a quiet buzz that would only arrest the movement of a prisoner through the door, and he'd undone the mundane lock. He had no excuse for not going in anymore, except his own reluctance to see the prisoner.

The door swung open to reveal a cell smaller and more barren than usual. It was Rufus's way of compromising: there were instincts he'd developed working as an Auror that demanded even worse treatment than this, but they were joined by ones just as strong that argued for him treating these offenders the same as any others.

Even if they were child abusers.

Lily Evans Potter scrambled up and stood facing him as he and Mallory moved into the room. Her face was tense, and if she had lost sleep in the two weeks since she'd come here, Rufus couldn't really blame her. Her hair was lank and dangled around her shoulders, and her green eyes, the ones he'd last seen in her son's face, were half-glazed.

Rufus gritted his teeth. He had wanted to move the Potters' trial as fast as possible, but still had only managed to fix a trial date for mid-November. There were too many people who wanted to look at the evidence, or had a reason for delaying the imprisonment or execution of the Potters so they could gawk some more. Even finding someone to lead the questioning in the Wizengamot, someone who had no ties to either Harry Potter or Dumbledore, had taken forever.

He owed Lily Potter at least an explanation of what would happen. He reminded himself that he never had to see her again after this.

She denied her son sweetness that even the poorest of children can afford. She denied him love. She denied him any existence beyond being the sword that his brother would wield without knowing it.

All of those things were true, but Rufus kept his purpose clearly in mind. When he was an Auror, it had never been this hard. Why should becoming the Minister have changed him so much?

Because you know Harry. You are biased yourself. And it has been years since you saw a child abuse case this extensive and detailed.

Rufus sharpened his mind to a small, clear point of light, the way Grandmother Leonora had taught him, and then said, in a voice he kept carefully devoid of emotion, "Lily Evans Potter, you already know that you are charged with child abuse. I am here to tell you that your trial will take place on the sixteenth of November. You will be tried with your husband, James Potter. Albus Dumbledore's trial will take place somewhat later. Until the date of the trial, you will remain in this cell. You will be well-treated, receive proper food and care—"

He had to stop there, though it wasn't quite the end of the formal speech he'd planned. The memory of the fact that Lily would receive such treatment when Harry hadn't was choking him.

It was unfortunate that he stopped when he did, though, because it provided an opportunity for Lily to speak up.

"You have to understand," she whispered, her eyes glittering with tears. Her face was becoming streaked with them, too, and from the way she winced as she wiped at them, it wasn't the first time they had made her skin stiff and tender. "I did what I did for the greater good of the world. I really did think Connor was the Boy-Who-Lived. I thought Harry's magic was unnatural. We had to do everything that we did so the world could have a chance."

Rufus's eyes narrowed. She really did think that Connor Potter was the Boy-Who-Lived? Why would she think differently now? He kept his voice polite and distant, however, as he did in the face of declarations from all prisoners, child abusers or no. “You will have a chance to explain everything that you thought and believed in your trial, Mrs. Potter. The Wizengamot will question you, and you will have a chance to call witnesses in your defense. Do you have anyone you wish to call?”

“Yes,” said Lily, and her lip quivered. “I know that my son wouldn’t like what you’re doing to me. I want to call him.”

“Which son, madam?” Rufus asked, hoping she didn’t mean—

“Harry.” Lily gave an imperious little stamp of her foot. “I want him called as a witness for the defense. He knows all the reasons behind the way we raised him. He can explain them better than I can. How dare you accuse us without listening to the way he explains things first?” She shook her head and tossed her lank red hair over one shoulder, her eyes bright and hopeful again. “I know that he’ll convince you.”

Rufus kept his voice bland. Thank Merlin there are laws in place forbidding this, or I would be tempted to scream. “The words of abused children about their abusers are not often trusted in trials, madam. Either they are too vehement, or they protect the people who abused them and try to minimize what really happened.” That’s Harry in a nutshell. “Your son will indeed be speaking in the trial, but as the person whom the case was brought for. He will be in a neutral place, neither prosecution nor defense but victim, and he will give his evidence how and as he wishes.”

“Let me talk to him,” Lily insisted. “I know that I can convince him to change his mind about that.”

She probably could. Though Rufus hoped the boy was stronger now than he had been the night he faced James Potter, he would still not want to leave Harry and one of his parents alone in a room together. “I will not do that, madam,” he said.

“You can’t keep a mother from talking to her own child.”

That proved too much for Mallory, whom Rufus had felt silently seething behind him, but whom he had hoped would manage to ignore this. “You aren’t his mother!” she snapped. “You’re just the worthless bag of shit whose womb he crawled out of, the one who heaped punishments he didn’t earn on him! I can’t believe that I chose as mild a spell as I did—“

Lily was shrinking away from her, one hand over her mouth, making small fearful noises. Rufus felt a shock surge through him, and then he turned around and gripped Auror Mallory’s arm.

“You did not,” he said.

Mallory tilted her head back and directed a superior expression at him, half-frown and half-sneer.

Rufus could feel himself shaking, he was so angry. He bit off the words as he said, “If there is anything else that you wish to question me about, Mrs. Potter, send word by your guards. From now on, they will include Auror Feverfew.” He opened the door of the cell and stepped back out into the corridor. Mallory still came with him because she had no choice, given his hand on her arm.

Rufus let her go the moment they were out in the hall, of course. He really had lost control, and he hadn’t meant to. Much better to turn, to hide his anger behind a mask of cool disappointment, and to ask, “Why the Unending Nightmares Curse, Fiona? Why did you use that one on her?”

“Who says I did?” Mallory examined the back of her hand.

“I recognize the signs,” said Rufus. Perhaps, if he stared at Mallory’s forehead, he would keep himself from snapping. Then she lifted her head, and her eyes met his, fearless and defiant, and he heard himself snarling the words again. “And you said yourself that you’d used a spell. Fiona, I do not care how much you hate the Potters, or how much they remind you of your father. I accepted you into the Aurors because you’d reassured me that you wanted to help abused children and see the abusers brought to justice, not vengeance. Using this curse is a violation of that trust.”

"They deserved it," said Mallory.

"They?" Rufus closed his eyes, as furious with his own misjudgment of what Mallory could handle as anything else. He should have known. Just because he had become Minister, and therefore less in charge of the day-to-day affairs of the Aurors, didn't mean he'd forgotten everything he learned about his people. "You used it on James Potter, too?" She couldn't have attacked Dumbledore, at least, since he was under the Still-Beetle confinement.

"They deserved it," Mallory repeated stubbornly. "They really did, Rufus. You've read the evidence itself, not just the stories in the papers. You must think they merit evisceration even more than I do. But you can't eviscerate them, and neither can I, so this is the next best thing. Eviscerate their minds instead."

Rufus shook his head, not trusting himself to speak. It was long moments, and thick breaths, before he could say, "They deserve justice, Fiona, just as anyone else does. And if that includes execution, then the Wizengamot will decide it. I trust them to bring down a sentence of utmost severity. Not only was Harry Potter horribly abused, he is the brother of the Boy-Who-Lived, and this gossip is so juicy that the papers are still tugging and pulling at it. But to make sure the prisoners survive and get to justice, I trust my Aurors to maintain a professional calm. You've proven you can't do that. As of this moment, you're off this case, Fiona."

He opened his eyes to see her staring at him. She shook her head and laughed a bit. "You can't do that," she said.

"Yes, actually, I can," said Rufus slowly. Betrayal still burned like a wound within him, but he recovered some of his own equilibrium as he watched Mallory's shock turn into betrayal of her own. "You control the affairs of the Aurors, Fiona, and no more than that. The Minister is supposed to be aware of what's going on in his own organization, and I am your boss. I could have you sacked for incompetence, but I'm not going to, because I believe that you can still be just if you try. For now, take a leave of absence from this case. Don't deal with any of the evidence on it. Don't come here to guard the prisoners—which the Head of the Auror Office shouldn't be doing anyway. Don't give interviews to the newspapers."

"How long?" Mallory was shaking, her hands clenched at her side.

"Until the Potters' trial," said Rufus quietly. "The sixteenth of November."

"Who exactly is going to take over my duties here?" Mallory's eyes flared and snapped. "At least half the owls we get nowadays are about the Potter case. Yesterday we got the first feigned report of a magical accident, just to draw my people out of the Ministry so someone could try to get juicy details."

Rufus hid his smile. At least Mallory was thinking like an Auror again, if she was indignant that her people's time was being wasted.

"I have someone who's used to handling plenty of owls," he said. "He's helped me work the Death Eater cases, and he did almost all the secretarial work during the last months I was Head."

Mallory looked slightly sick. "You're talking about your damn Percy Weasley again, aren't you?"

Rufus raised an eyebrow and waited.

"He's your running hound, Rufus," Mallory grumbled. "He sticks his nose into everything and questions it in accordance with that strict set of standards that you taught him. Yeah, I think he'd do well with the Potter case, but would he really give those bastards and that bitch justice?"

"There you go again, Fiona," said Rufus. "You can depend on the Wizengamot to give them justice. You can depend on Percy to make sure that they reach trial alive."

A dull flush spread over Mallory's cheeks. "I wouldn't have killed them. The Unending Nightmares Curse doesn't kill, you know that. I want to see them stand trial just as much as you do."

“Did you ever read about the Unending Nightmares Curse in detail, Fiona?” Rufus probed. “Do you really know what it does to its victims? Eviscerates their minds, you said. You aren’t far wrong. But it doesn’t do that just when they’re asleep. They suffer from it when they’re awake, too. The sight of you caused Lily Potter pain. People have gone mad from it. Disorder their minds, Fiona, and they’ll just go straight into St. Mungo’s and be unable to stand trial.” It wasn’t what he wanted to use to appeal to her—he should have just been able to use her own innate sense of justice—but what weapons he had to use to make sure that Lily and James Potter reached trial relatively unharmed and that his Auror didn’t make herself into a worse criminal than she already had, he would.

Mallory looked away and mumbled something.

“What was that?” Rufus demanded, leaning closer.

“I said I didn’t know that!” Mallory burst out, turning around again and glaring at him. Her face looked as if it were on fire now, and the air around her blazed with magic. “I told you, I do want them to stand trial, and have to talk about and testify to their mistakes in front of the whole world.”

Rufus held her eyes. She’s embarrassed. Good. I might have more of a chance of getting through to her than I anticipated. “I know what you suffered, Fiona,” he said quietly. “Know better than most people.” The redness climbed Mallory’s cheeks again. Doubtless she was remembering the night she’d got pissed and told him most of the story. “And I know that you wouldn’t want to use it as an excuse. It’s a reason, but never let it be an excuse. I know that you’re an Auror because you love and value justice, and not just for abused children. Don’t limit your effectiveness to help others because you want to punish two of them so badly.”

Mallory bowed her head, and nodded. Her magic had retreated into her body again. “I know,” she whispered. “I forgot, Rufus. And I honestly didn’t know what side effects that curse might have.”

“Stay away from the prisoners, Fiona,” said Rufus, with iron gentleness. “I’ll contact St. Mungo’s and summon one of the Healers over to remove the curse. It hasn't gone far enough yet to hurt her permanently."

Mallory nodded once, and then retreated in silence up the corridor. Feverfew stepped out of the shadows a moment later, his eyes understanding and his lips sealed, and took up his position in front of Lily Potter's door.

Rufus turned to make his way to James Potter, wondering if Mallory had used the Unending Nightmares Curse more on him than she had on Lily, or if they had suffered the same amount. Well, the healer from St. Mungo's could be the one to find that out. Rufus's business was justice, the clean cutting and cauterization of wounds through legal means, preventing the infection from spreading further. He was no healer of mental wounds.

I leave that up to Madam Shiverwood, he thought, with an inner grimace. I must send Harry a summons to see her soon. James Potter was indeed different. The moment Rufus opened the door, he was on his feet, obviously trying to look more deferential than pathetically eager. Rufus raised an eyebrow and shut the door, leaning against it. He had not been here since the night he escorted Harry. In retrospect, that had been a bad idea, though he had literally thought the boy would not sleep if he did not see his father.

Let us see what he can say to make up for his words then.

"I'm so sorry," James began earnestly. "I'd like to make up for everything, if you'll only tell me how. I didn't really mean what I said to Harry that night. I was just caught up in the shock of losing everything that I thought I cared about. I woke up that morning planning to apply to get back into the Aurors again, and then—well, then I'd lost the chance." He gave a shrill, false laugh. "But now I know it wasn't Harry's fault that this happened when it did. Please, sir, will you deliver a letter to him? I have it right here." He held up an envelope.

"Impossible, sir," said Rufus evenly, and concealed the furious fire of his own scorn behind the tidy words. "Your trial is set for the sixteenth of November. You will be tried with your wife only, Albus Dumbledore at a later date. Until then, you will have the best care we can provide you, a clean room and regular meals. It was discovered that your latest guard is not suitable for a variety of reasons, and another Auror will be taking over the post. Perhaps Auror Belladonna—“

“You don’t understand,” James interrupted. “You really don’t. I’ve changed my mind. I’ve repented what I said to Harry that night. That means that I don’t have to be tried.”

Rufus felt his eyebrows rise. He really should just leave now, since he knew the explanation would be rambling and pathetic, but he had to admit to some prurient curiosity of his own. Since he refused to indulge that curiosity by reading the wilder newspaper stories, it mostly gnawed at him, unsatisfied.

He might as well gratify the prisoner by listening to the confession he wanted to make, he thought. If nothing else, it would add something to his own personal collection of excuses that criminals made to explain why they shouldn’t suffer the full weight of the law. The weakest one so far came from a murderer who’d insisted that his victim told him she wanted to be murdered, conveniently alone and conveniently in just the manner he’d decided to do it.

This one promised to top that.

“Very well,” he said. “Tell me why.”

James openly sagged in relief, but then recovered himself and smiled. Rufus studied his face critically. Even if the man hadn’t been guilty of neglect, he thought, he wouldn’t have hired him. James’s face was just a little too desperate, a little too eager. He looked as though he needed the approval of others to survive. An Auror couldn’t be like that. He had to do many unpopular and unpleasant things, and glory was long in coming and fleeting when it arrived.

“I don’t know how much of Harry’s childhood you know about,” James began, and then paused and studied Rufus.

"I've viewed the memories that Severus Snape sent in a Pensieve," said Rufus. "I've also read long letters from him in which he testified to such crimes as your ignoring your wife's treatment of your son."

"I honestly didn't notice," said James, with a sheepish smile obviously meant to coax the person who saw it into agreeing with him. "I knew that Connor was all right, and I loved my little boy, and he was the Boy-Who-Lived. Is it any wonder that Harry fell into his shadow?"

"There is a long distance between favoring one child," Rufus noted, "and so neglecting the other that you never notice when your wife is training him to do without touch, in fact to shiver underneath it when someone does touch him."

James blinked, obviously disconcerted, and then came back to his point. "But Lily hid it well, with Albus's help. You must admit that. Do you think you would really have noticed anything else than what I did in my situation?"

"Yes."

James shook his head and threw up his hands. "You don't understand, obviously, since you're not me. The point is that I didn't notice. I always found another explanation when I thought I did see something strange. And that's not my fault, is it, for not being observant enough? I thought Harry was just a strange little kid who liked books too much. I didn't like books, so I shrugged and thought he would be in Ravenclaw when he went to Hogwarts. Of course I spent more time with the son who was more like me."

Rufus watched him in silence.

"And then I found out what Lily and Albus had done, via a magical artifact in my home, and I was horrified." James nodded seriously. "I quite naturally tried to get my son back. But Snape kidnapped him, and Harry never wrote to me, one way or the other, to say how he was. Then, when I tried to get my son back from him...well, you know what happened. I never meant to neglect him. I was always trying to do what was best for him. But other people—Snape, Connor, even Harry himself—didn't notice, just like I didn't notice what Lily and Albus were doing to him at first." James gave Rufus a pleading look. "You don't try people for ignorance, do you?"

"No," said Rufus, when he thought he could trust himself to keep his voice steady. "But we do try them for stupidity. And I would say, Mr. Potter, since many people have made valiant attempts to cure your ignorance, that what you have is a case of stupidity instead."

James flushed darkly. "You're so against abuse, Mr. Scrimgeour, and yet you apply verbal abuse to prisoners?" he challenged.

"My proper title is Minister," said Rufus, standing straighter. "And if you think that is verbal abuse, Mr. Potter, it is little wonder that you never noticed what your son was suffering." He turned to the door.

"You'll speak to Harry?" James asked his back anxiously.

Rufus turned around reluctantly again. He didn't want to give this spineless coward the time of day. He knew James Potter, now. The man bent with the strongest following wind. Let that wind seem to shift towards his wife and Albus Dumbledore again, and he would bow to them and be just as strongly insisting that Harry's neglect and abuse had been for the general good, even as they did.

But if James was actually willing to testify against his wife and Dumbledore, then Rufus had to use him.

"Will you speak for the prosecution in the trial?" he asked James quietly.

James's face turned the color of wet ashes. "I explain this in the letter," he said, waving the envelope. "I can't do that. Of course I can't. How could I turn against my wife and my mentor? I just want to get clear of this altogether. I barely saw anything of Harry's childhood. How could I testify to what you say they've done unless I saw the evidence? And that would prejudice me."

Rufus sneered lightly. In their own way, Lily and Dumbledore are better than this man. They at least have the conviction that they were doing right, and I know they'll testify that way, too. "And what do you expect Harry to do?"

"Forgive me," said James at once. "Drop the charges. If he decides that he wants to someday, come and live with me. I know that his mind's been poisoned by Lily and Dumbledore and Snape right now, but when it's clear again, then he should be able to see that I've never meant him anything but good."

Rufus had to close his eyes to keep himself from vomiting. "Your request is denied," he said. "Child abusers are never allowed to communicate with their victims."

"You brought Harry here that first night." There came a rustle that was probably James folding his arms. "So obviously you can bend the rules a bit. And I want Harry to see the letter. He would know how to forgive me."

"He would," said Rufus. "Because he's been taught how to forgive beyond all rational boundaries."

"Surely he's the only one who can make that decision." James obviously thought he had a point. "You can't make the choices for him."

Rufus opened his eyes and smiled slightly at James. "Actually, Mr. Potter, as he is not yet fifteen, yes, adults can make those decisions for him. And right now, his legal guardian is Severus Snape, who has threatened me with death if a letter from you ever comes into Harry's hands."

"He threatened you with death!" James pounced on that. "How can you trust him?"

Rufus opened the door, stepped out, and shut it behind him. He knew he was smiling with contempt, but he could not stop it. Oh, yes, he understood exactly what sort of man James Potter was. And he would give a great deal to make sure that Harry never came into contact with him again, after the trial.

He nearly bumped into a young witch hurrying along the hall, her head bowed and sobs breaking from her hands. He jumped, she jumped, and she backed away from him, staring at him in awe.

“You’re Minister Scrimgeour, aren’t you?” she asked, her already pink cheeks flushing pinker, as if he were there to judge the tears pouring down her face.

Rufus nodded, examining her closely. He thought the witch was familiar, but he couldn’t remember why. “And what’s your name?”

“H—Hestia Jones, sir.” The witch hid her face in her hands again. “I applied to be an Auror at one point,” she said, with a low wail. “And then I found out my brother had been arrested for smuggling flying carpets into Britain, and I decided that I had to drop out of the Auror program. How could I stand the shame of it?”

Rufus nodded. He did know where he’d seen her, now: in the newest class of trainee Aurors. Of course, her cheeks had been flushed with pride then.

“I understand if you wanted to take some time off, Madam Jones,” he said. “I do hope that we can count on seeing you in the Auror program again. Someone with an innate sense of justice as strong as yours is always needed.”

Hestia looked shyly up at him. “Thank you, sir. That’s very kind of you to say.” She cast a Tempus charm, and then jumped at the numbers that appeared. “I’ve got to go,” she muttered. “Thank you again, sir!” she called, as she rushed away.

Rufus shook his head and walked towards his office with a curiously lighter heart, ready to assign Percy Weasley to his newest duties and owl St. Mungo’s. Sometimes it helped to be reminded that ordinary life went on all around him, never mind the arrest of criminals for child abuse charges and the danger of living in a world with a resurrected Dark Lord and a child with Lord-level power and mental scars.

Hestia paused a moment to make sure the Minister was gone, then crept towards the door of the proper cell. She’d got the information through a hastily penned note, not even delivered by owl, but by falcon. She whispered the incantations that would unlock the wards, and then drew out the copy of the key she'd had made. Sometimes, having criminal relatives could come in useful.

She opened the door, and stepped into the room that held the helplessly frozen form of her leader, Albus Dumbledore.

Hestia swallowed as she hurried to draw forth the glowseeds that would counteract the Still-Beetle shell. It hurt to see him like that. She'd just joined the Order of the Phoenix a few months ago, but she'd heard tales of Albus Dumbledore, the White Wizard and Lord of Light, all her life from her witch mother. He shouldn't be standing rooted to the floor with an expression of vague surprise on his face, all his magic and all his goodwill locked away.

She pressed the glowseeds against his neck and whispered the proper incantation. Red light spread up and down his body, softening his stern outline. In a moment, Dumbledore sagged and nearly fell. Hestia took his arm and held him upright. Her heart still ached with pity, but she felt proud that she had been the one trusted to come to him in a moment of weakness like this.

Dumbledore spent several moments breathing in silence, then lifted his face and smiled at her. Hestia ducked her head, her cheeks flaring again.

"My dear," said Dumbledore gently, "thank you. But before you go away again, you must press the Still-Beetle shell in your pocket against me, and freeze me once more."

Hestia blinked. It was true that the note had said she should bring a Still-Beetle shell with her, but she had assumed that it was for the enemies who might get in their way as she rescued the Headmaster. This was so exciting. She had envisioned daring escapes. She hadn't envisioned Dumbledore staying here. "Headmaster—" she began.

Dumbledore shook his head. "I hold that position no longer, Hestia, so it is inappropriate to address me by its title," he chided her gently.

Hestia nodded. "Sorry, my lord. It's just so unfair."

Dumbledore sighed. "Yes, it is. With Voldemort returned—" he waited kindly for her to finish flinching at the name "—the wizarding world needs me more than ever. But there are many people who would hesitate to trust me now, given that the charges of child abuse are still so fresh in so many minds, and if I escaped, it would only confirm for them that I was guilty. Even the Order is divided against me. So I must needs ask that you leave me here, frozen again, so that our enemies suspect nothing."

"Then why free you in the first place?" Hestia whispered. I wanted to help. Have I really done that?

"Because the Still-Beetle shell caged all of my magic," said Dumbledore. "Free from it, I can release some of my power." He closed his eyes, and the air around both him and Hestia grew warmer. Hestia shivered in wonder. It felt as though it had been winter in the room before, and now she stood on the edge of spring.

"What are you going to do, my lord?" she whispered.

"Change some minds," said Dumbledore, in a stronger voice than he had so far spoken in. "It is an old spell, one rarely used, because there are so many would use it for wrong purposes, and it is tied to distant events rather than taking place at once. But it is the perfect spell for this circumstance." He paused, then murmured, "Converto intellegentiam de Harry Potter! Converto animadversionem ab intellegentia!"

Hestia felt the spell move outward, a thick, clinging cloud that dissipated as it touched the walls of the room. Dumbledore let out a long sigh, and seemed to age before her eyes. He smiled tiredly at her.

"Now, my dear, if you will touch me with the Still-Beetle shell again, you should go. They will visit me before long. They always do. They do not trust me."

“Don’t you want something to eat before I go, sir?” Hestia asked plaintively. “To drink?” She had dreamed of helping her hero more than it seemed she would be able to.

Dumbledore patted her cheek. “They would notice, my dear, when they undid the confinement before my trial, if I had unusual food stains on my teeth. Even this release is a risk, but as long as I change nothing about my body itself, then they are unlikely to notice.” He arranged himself in the frozen posture he’d used before, put on the same expression of vague confusion, and waited expectantly for her.

Hestia, catching her lip between her teeth before she could speak another protest, used the Still-Beetle shell on him, and watched as her leader once more froze. She sighed and slipped out of the room, hands clenching as she went.

Albus Dumbledore was still the leader of the wizarding world to those who mattered, even now the Lord of Light. He would save them. Hestia knew it. But she also knew that he was wiser than she was. If he said events had to fall out this way, then they had to fall out this way.

But she wished, more than anything else, that the charges had never been filed, that no one had ever been allowed to look at Dumbledore’s sacrifices to keep the wizarding world safe with scorn instead of awe.

Grimly, she turned and began doing up the locking wards on the door again; the note had included instructions on that, from someone who was too notorious to get back into the Ministry without being noticed. He had had injustice done to him, too. That was all right, though, Hestia told herself as she worked. Eventually justice would be done, and just as Albus Dumbledore would lead the wizarding world again, Kingsley Shacklebolt would be part of the Aurors once more.

Chapter Nine: Gryffindor's Shame

Minerva mopped at her eyes. They were watering badly, a combination of the poor light around her and the long day she'd had. Once again, she suffered the temptation to go back to the Headmaster's office—her office, now, though she still hadn't got used to that—and curl up to get some sleep. Merlin knew she had plenty of her own affairs to occupy her aboveground. There were the teachers to reassure, the Transfiguration courses to arrange, candidates for the various positions held open for her to interview, the papers to placate...

But none of that was as urgent as the work that had brought her down here, she reminded herself, and so she straightened her shoulders and plowed forward. The plop of water echoed in the distance. Minerva tried to imagine exactly where she was in relation to the castle above her, and could not.

She walked a long, sloping tunnel that sometimes stayed level but mostly led irresistibly down and down. It had begun behind a door in the Headmaster's office. Minerva didn't recognize it, didn't remember ever hearing Albus speak of it, and had immediately become suspicious. The first thing she concluded was that it led to more of the Headmaster's mischief. And then she had, on first stepping into it, felt the tingle of wards around her.

The wards weren't the same as they should have been, though. They were tangled, tattered, broken. They didn't reach out to her, but tried to lash and score her face, at least until Minerva drew out the silver Headmistress's badge she'd taken to wearing at her throat. Then they subsided and lay around her with a snarl.

Minerva immediately began following the tunnel.

She paused to lick her dry lips and readjust her grip on her wand. She hadn't cast a Lumos spell, since that could dangerously reveal her position to an enemy, but a ball of light that bobbed several feet ahead of her. As always, Minerva studied the floor for a sign of holes or weakening.

She'd just started to move forward when she stopped, nose twitching. Sometimes, when she concentrated, she could use a cat's heightened senses even in human form, and her nose was telling her there was something in front of her now.

Devil's Snare, she thought, and waved her wand. "Finite Incantatem!"

That caught her ball of light, dispelling it, but should also have taken care of the glamour that covered the plant. As Minerva conjured more light, she nodded in grim recognition of the mass of green tendrils, which swayed towards her as though starved.

Albus put this here to ensnare anyone who dared walk the path. Now I am more certain than ever that he did something wrong down here, and wanted no one else to know about it.

"Incendio!" Minerva said, and the flames ripped into the Devil's Snare, which coiled hastily away, leaving her a clear path through. Minerva edged down the path, and halted on the other side with a little laugh. Impossible as it seemed when the Headmaster had been arrested for child abuse and he had left Merlin-knew-what troubles around for her to fix, she felt younger than she had in ten years.

At least something like this requires skills I know I have, she thought, as she marched forward. Not trying to think of what people want me to say other than the truth. That had been the most frustrating part of dealing with the newspaper reporters, as they continually begged her to give them details about the child abuse that did not actually exist.

Or details that Minerva had no intention of releasing. Harry's pale face flashed before her eyes most of the time now, and so did Severus Snape's almost equally haggard one. Even knowing he had sent an incredibly naked account to the Ministry, Minerva saw no need to imitate him. Honeywhistle and the rest could find the grist for their evil mills elsewhere.

The tunnel curved around a large pillar. Minerva floated her ball of light out of the way this time, and once again cast Finite at the carved stone. It shuddered, and flickered, and then several deep blue lights came into being on it.

Minerva studied them from a safe distance, frowning. Most spells that produced blue light were pale blue, for no reasons Minerva knew (the Color Theorists at St. Mungo's were apt to babble on for hours about them, but Minerva had never listened). This was a deep, glinting blue, rather like the cobalt cups that Minerva's mother had used at the table when she was a girl.

She took one step nearer, and then another, defensive spells poised on the tip of her tongue.

Nothing happened until she got nearer the pillar, and then it was only a slight gasp and a widening of her eyes. She could see, now, that wards or spells clinging about the pillar did not cast the blue light. Instead, it came from several triangular stones, each as large as a fist, buried deeply in the pillar itself.

Minerva knew the stones by sight, but only from the pages of books. She had never assumed that she would have a chance to see them face-to... well, rock. Supposedly, they were so valuable that wizarding society had used them up long ago.

And, somehow, she had never thought that she would be seeing them face-to-rock after the Headmaster had been accused of child abuse, though if there was one place the rocks might still be in use, it was Hogwarts.

Minerva counted the stones now, silently, walking around the pillar a few times to be sure that she had them all. Yes. For all their brilliance, there were only four of them. One was carved with an open book, one a narrow design that looked like a valley cut between mountains, and the one lowest down on the pillar showed a strange device, somewhere between a wand and a sword.

The one nearest the top showed a sleeping cat.

Minerva swallowed. Granted, she was taking a risk, and she didn't know if the instinctive associations she had given the gems would help.

But she was a Gryffindor, and she was Headmistress, and she was desperate to protect her school and make up for the shame of her House that Albus had incurred on it.

She reached up and pressed her palm to the stone carved with the cat.

There came a long, deep moan, a rushing wind that gathered up speed and music as it swept along. Minerva stood still as the wind wrapped around her body, chilling her skin, sinking under her clothes. Then the pillar and the tunnel began to move, a circling, stately dance as proud as a snake's.

Minerva went along for the ride, telling herself that she was a Gryffindor, and Gryffindors were not made afraid as easily as all that.

Pressing into her mind, though, was the reminder that she hadn't told anyone where she was going, exactly the kind of carelessness she would have scolded one of her students for.

The dance stopped at last, and Minerva opened her eyes. She was not surprised to find herself in a different place entirely. No one had ever said that anchor-stones were ordinary, and one of their properties was bringing the living person in the web into contact with the dead.

Minerva stepped back, able to remove her hand from the cat's stone only now. She looked around, wondering who would meet her. She had a good idea of whom the other anchor-stones indicated, but any of them might choose to respond.

Or no one, she reminded herself. In that case, she was certain she could touch the cat's stone and transport herself back through the pillar.

Well, fairly certain, at least.

A golden light burst into being in front of her, illuminating the round, bare cavern. Well, it would have been bare to most people in Hogwarts. Now that she was Headmistress, Minerva could see all the wards, even the ones that had been slow or reluctant to respond to her so far. And this room was covered with them, blending into messy knots from which still more lines of wards led forth.

This was the anchor in more than one way, Minerva realized then. This was the room where the wards all came together, forming Hogwarts's base, the web of webs.

The golden light was separate from the wards, though. It rolled together like the ball of flame a phoenix created in appearing, and then solidified and shimmered, bright as molten metal. Minerva had to shield her eyes until the light abruptly dimmed, and an anxious, male voice said, "Oh, dear. I see that matters have changed from the last time I was here."

Minerva looked up. In front of her stood an older wizard, though his white beard still bore a trace of gold. His robes were golden and red, and worked down their seams with the same wand-and-sword design as one of the anchor-stones. He had green eyes worn by the years, but they stared at her with strong, clear intelligence.

"Godric Gryffindor," she said, because she needed the reassurance, even though she knew it must be.

He nodded. "Or a part of him," he said. "I trust that you understand how anchor-stones work?"

"This is a ghost or a dream of you," said Minerva, with a wave of her hand. "A—a record, of you as you were at a certain point in your life. Left to guard the school and to help the Headmasters of Hogwarts." She was astonishing herself with her own calm speech. Well, perhaps it was to be expected. She had gone a little beyond shock when the wards tried to attack her.

Godric nodded. "The others who remain with you, as you probably surmised, are Helga and Rowena." A flash of anger crossed his face. "Salazar was still here when we bound some of our spirits to protect the school, but he wouldn't agree to do it. Something about never leaving part of himself behind, lest an enemy could get hold of it."

Godric shrugged. "But Salazar was always paranoid. You're new, Headmistress. I think your name is—"

"Minerva McGonagall." Minerva lifted her head proudly.

"Ah." Godric nodded. "I remember a Headmaster McGonagall, about the middle of the sixteenth century. A good man."

"One of my ancestors," Minerva acknowledged. "I need to know how much you know about the recent power transfer between Albus Dumbledore and myself, sir. I found one of the anchor-stones carved with a cat, but—"

"We're only magical constructs, really," Godric interrupted. "The school takes care of transforming the stones when it accepts a new Headmaster or Headmistress. No, I don't know much, but your appearing so suddenly like this, and not being prepared to find us, isn't a good sign. Usually, the Headmaster comes with his successor and shows him or her all the secrets of Hogwarts's tunnels at one time. What happened to Albus Dumbledore?"

Minerva sighed and bowed her head. This would take some explaining.

As quietly as she could, she narrated the plan of sacrifice she now understood Albus to have been pursuing, and why he had pursued it. She made sure to mention how Gryffindor Albus had been, and how he found a Lord-level child in Slytherin an impossible concept to come to terms with, assuming that the child would of course become another Dark Lord. She explained the abuse he had inflicted—as much as she understood; she had not yet forced herself all the way through Severus's records—and why she had come rather abruptly into her own office.

Godric was silent when she was done, though Minerva could not tell what he was thinking, since he had turned his back on her. He walked over to the far side of the cavern, and then abruptly swore and lashed out with one foot. It sank into the wall. Minerva winced as she might have if he had actually contacted something and bruised his skin. I hope that I never have to bind part of myself to an anchor-stone. It must be frustrating to want to rage, and not be able to hit anything.

Godric turned back around, his green eyes absolutely burning with fury. "He was Gryffindor," he said.

Minerva simply nodded, deciding that Godric would probably come to the same conclusions she had.

"He was Gryffindor, and he did this," Godric went on, his voice rising. He stalked back and forth. Minerva studied his boots, and saw that they skimmed the floor, but she no longer thought he was solid. More likely, it was just conscious practice that kept them there, since Godric was a different kind of ghost. "What kind of shame has he brought down on our House? How are we going to recover our reputation, teach the others to trust us again?" He looked at her. "You're Gryffindor, aren't you? Most of the McGonagalls have been."

Minerva nodded again.

"They're going to distrust Gryffindors as they once distrusted Slytherins," Godric whispered, and then laughed harshly. "What kind of world is it where someone who follows my principles abuses children and someone who follows Salazar's principles is only interested in freedom?"

"One I need your help to navigate," said Minerva, seizing what she felt was her best chance. "I know that something is still wrong with the wards; they did not transfer to me as smoothly as they should have when Albus was taken out of power. Can you guide me to the place where the tangling originates from?" She took one more look around the cavern. "All of them here seem neat and smoothly braided."

Godric stilled for a moment. Then he said, "Of course I will. It is partly my doing that this happened, after all." He turned towards a corner of the cavern, beckoning for her to follow him.

"Partly your doing?" Minerva frowned as she walked, paying as much attention to the walls as to what she was saying. There seemed to be no door or any evidence of entrance elsewhere than the pillar. She hoped it wasn't a door that ghosts could get through, but which she was condemned to linger behind. "I don't think it is. I want to recover the reputation of Gryffindor as much as you do, but you aren't responsible for the behavior of everyone in your House."

"I am for this," said Godric softly. "Some years ago, the Headmaster came to me, and said that he needed to alter the defenses of the school in order to protect the students better. I accepted that, of course, and showed him how to do it. Now I worry that I gave him the key to a door I should never have opened." He gestured, and the stone in front of them vanished.

Minerva stared. What appeared to be a sheer staircase of white stone soared upward before her, gleaming in the fall of a shaft of sunlight from somewhere high above. Diamond dust, or particles of what looked like it, circled in the air. Minerva shook her head and looked at Godric. "I don't understand. Are we outside?"

"Not exactly," said Godric, and indicated another anchor-stone embedded in the rock at the foot of the staircase, so deeply that Minerva had not even noticed its deep blue glow next to the steps themselves. "Just as you can bind a dead wizard's essence to one of these stones, you can bind the essence of a dead place. Create nearly inaccessible boltholes, because, after all, you're escaping into the past—but it's a past cut off from everyone else, so that you don't need to chance meeting yourself like you do with a Time-Turner." He held his hand out to Minerva, who hesitantly laid her palm in it, and found to her shock that his fingers were solid. "This was once part of the home where I was born," he added simply. "I showed it to Albus because no one could get into it unless I was holding their hand. I couldn't think of a better place for the altered defenses of the school to rest."

Minerva took the first step up the staircase. It trembled at her weight, and then emitted a shining, shrill note. Minerva trembled back, and shook her head as they climbed higher and higher into the shaft of sun. This was like a dream of Light, and she could not imagine what the home beyond the staircase would look like.

It was as marvelous as she'd hoped. They were still indoors, she saw when the staircase played out, but the house was made of the same white stone as the steps themselves, polished planes that captured light and then breathed it back out in softened but still dazzling bursts. Minerva found herself standing on a broad floor of flat flags, with a gleam of green and gold through distant windows. The green was not the deep, poisonous color of Slytherin, but the fierce color of living trees. The air around her breathed warmth like the height of summer. Minerva could see other pillars and intricate, shining silver and white artifacts sitting tamely on the floor, just waiting for someone to pick them up and use them to create beautiful things.

"This way," Godric murmured, and swept on across the floor, in the direction of one of the pillars. Minerva followed, still looking around in wonder. This was one of those wizarding places she had dreamed about, she thought, the ones from the days of wild magic and fey tales. Then, the Light had been the minority faction, with more wizards holding allegiance to the wild Dark magic that danced on Walpurgis Night. Midsummer rituals were small and sacred but intense, things of great power, and Light wizards created their homes as bastions of civilization, dedicated to the careful keeping and preserving of valuable artifacts and books—not things to be destroyed as many Dark artifacts were, the moment their owners lost interest in them.

The Light can hurt others—Albus has proven that—but it can also create and hold beauty, Minerva thought proudly.

She heard a distant chime, like angry music, and frowned. Before she could ask Godric about it, he said, "Ah. Here," and stepped aside from one of the pillars in particular.

Minerva blinked. It wasn't a pillar at all, as she had first assumed from its upright position in a corner of the room, but a statue of Albus. He looked as he had when he strode across battlefields to fight Voldemort, clad in white robes and Light. He had a hand held up as though to calm an excited crowd, and his eyes, made of blue stones that Minerva didn't think were sapphires, gleamed with wisdom and intelligence.

And all about him curled the wards of Hogwarts, diving into his body at various points and then sliding outward again, as though he were a fly caught in the midst of a spider's web. Minerva thought he was more likely to be the spider in this particular web than the prey, though.

"He made himself necessary to them," said Godric quietly. "That's why the wards are attacking you. He made it so that no other Headmaster would be able to take his place in Hogwarts unless he approved them and was willing to transfer the control of the wards to them. There are enormous holes in the defenses right now because he's not there. And it's only going to get worse."

Minerva closed her eyes. Even with everything she already knew about Albus, how far he had fallen from the ideals she had once believed him to hold, this hurt. She could believe better that he had a particular enmity for Slytherin children with Lord-level power than she could believe that he would want his other students to suffer if something happened to him.

"Why does the school recognize me at all?" she asked.

"Because he did not bind all the wards," said Godric. "I think, now, that he didn't ask for that because I would have got curious and asked too many questions back. He left enough free to convince you, or anyone else who followed him, that you had complete control of Hogwarts. But it's not true. The deeper defenses are decaying. He planned it so that would happen if he were killed or removed from power."

Minerva shook her head. "And if he'd died of old age?"

"Then I believe the wards would have transferred smoothly, because that's a natural death." She looked at Godric to see him shrugging. "What he didn't want was anyone to have the same amount of power he did, and to make Hogwarts utterly dependent on him. He believed that he was the best one to protect it." A flash of bitterness darted across the Founder's face. "He told me that, when I helped him create this statue. I didn't listen to where he put the emphases of his words, or I might have known something was off."

He took a deep breath, tugged on his beard, and then met her eyes. "You're the rightful successor to Albus Dumbledore, and more than that, I think you're someone who will try to set this to rights. 'Go to a McGonagall if you want bloody-minded stubbornness,'" he said, as though quoting someone. Before Minerva could insist that he tell her who had said that, Godric continued, "And I want to help restore the reputation of the school, and of my House, and of the Light. I'd even like to help this young Lord you describe, if only to make up for the wrong Albus did him." He paused, his hands tapping at nothing, and then said, "This is going to sound like an odd question, but I can't keep myself from asking it. Call me a foolish optimist."

"I would never call you foolish, sir," said Minerva, with a faint smile, and waited.

Godric cleared his throat. "Has this boy—Harry, you said that was his name—spoken at all about being vates? Freeing the magical creatures, and trying to foresee paths by which they can live in peace with wizards and witches?"

Minerva stared at him.

"I told you it was an odd question," said Godric defensively.

"I—that is, yes, he has." Minerva shook her head. "I didn't know that anyone else would think anything of it, so I didn't mention it in my recitation to you."

Godric nodded. "Then I am more determined than ever to help him," he said. "In one way, and one way alone, I think Albus was right to be wary of the boy. Lords do change the world, and they can do it without regard for the people around them. Albus was like that himself. But if this Harry Potter is thinking of others...then I want to help." He sighed, staring into the middle distance. "My dearest ambition, at one point, was to be a vates. But I couldn't. I wasn't strong enough. I managed to achieve some remarkable things with dear Helga and Rowena, and even Salazar, when he was still with us, but that was always in cooperation. And none of the others quite agreed with me about freeing the magical creatures, or which ones should be freed.” He glanced at Minerva. “And now—do you think Potter will pause until all the magical creatures are freed?”

“Not unless some of them tell him that they want to remain slaves,” said Minerva, thinking of the way the Many snakes had come into Hogwarts’ Great Hall the day of the spring equinox. “He has freed Dementors that I know of, and a breed of snakes called the Many, and even the unicorns.” She had been able to feel the absence of the unicorns the moment she ascended into her position as Headmistress, though it had taken her a few days to figure out what it was.

Godric clenched his hands in front of him. “Then I am glad that you came and found me,” he said fiercely. “Albus has brought shame upon our House, but we have a chance to reverse it, and in the best way, by helping someone truly worthy of help.”

Minerva eyed the statue. “And what do we do about this? Can I simply transfer the wards to myself?”

Godric sighed, deflating again. “No. I’m afraid not. Some of the spells that surround and protect this statue are ones that only Albus can undo. Besides, we don’t want you to be central to the wards in the way that he was. What if you fall in battle? That leaves Hogwarts unprotected again.”

Minerva nodded. “And, as of yet, I do not have a Deputy Headmaster picked out.” She knew whom she was going to ask, but delicacy required that she wait a little while. “Very well. Then what would you suggest we do?”

“Coax the school.”

Minerva frowned at him.

Godric flushed a bit. “Ah. Excuse me. That would be Helga’s term for it. She believed that Hogwarts was a living thing. That was one reason she never agreed with me about trying to act as a cooperative vates. She was more interested in magical plants and buildings than magical creatures. She meant that you have to coax Hogwarts to trust you as you would any wild thing. It's been hurt by its Headmaster. It needs to see that you care."

"And?" Minerva prompted. "How do I do that?" She couldn't help thinking that Godric Gryffindor would have been an irritating professor. Students wanted to know things, learn them, or at least the best of them, like Hermione Granger, did. They didn't want endless digressions around the subject of their interest.

Godric blinked at her, then flushed more deeply. "Ah. Excuse me," he repeated. "Talk to the wards. Walk through the tunnels. Get to know them. Think often and forcefully of what you plan to do. Show the school that you don't blame it. Don't resist any wards that come and attach themselves to you. Find specific holes and repair them." He nodded. "That will do for a start. Meanwhile, I'll work on removing the protections I put on this blasted statue. It should start decaying naturally, until it reaches the point where only Albus's power is sustaining it. Then we'll call on Helga and Rowena. They're watching right now, you know."

He chuckled as Minerva glanced suspiciously around the house. "They're less proactive than I am, and they attend other aspects of Hogwarts than the wards," he explained. "Plus, you're not one of theirs. They'll approach when they feel the time is right. Show them you can be trusted, Minerva, and I have no doubts that they'll eventually warm up to you. They need to be coaxed like wild creatures, too," he added, raising his voice.

A book materialized over his head and fell towards him. Godric dodged it, laughing.

Minerva shook her head. "You're more informal than I thought you would be," she observed, unable to stop herself.

"I've been modified by contact with the Headmasters and Headmistresses over the centuries, of course," said Godric mildly. His face darkened for a moment. "Even Albus taught me much," he muttered. Then he recovered his poise. "I'm looking forward to what you can teach me." He held out a hand. "Come. I'll take you back to the entrance where the anchor-stones are."

Minerva sat up primly when the visitor she'd expected knocked on her door. She'd had a few hours to get over meeting one of the Four Founders of Hogwarts, and to reconcile herself to the extent of Albus's treachery and betrayal, the evidence that he really had trusted no one but himself to do even basic things like protecting the school. The one she faced now had his own griefs to bear, though she intended to distract him in part by asking him to take up extra duties. She would be calm and kind and implacable.

"Come in," she called.

Severus entered and took the chair opposite her, looking more than ever like a bird of ill omen. Minerva had learned to look past the menacing exterior the first year he taught at Hogwarts, though. She stared into his face, and saw the slightly sunken state of his eyes and cheeks, the way he glared at the desk and not at her, and the tight press of his teeth behind his lips.

Losing Harry like this has been harder than he would admit to himself. Minerva knew he had received a letter from Harry the other day, and had written back, but Harry was evidently unwilling as yet to come to Hogwarts and trust himself to Severus's guardianship. That would tell on him. Minerva was sure that he loved the boy like a son, for all that Severus would deny it furiously if asked.

That is one way it's better to be a Gryffindor, she thought. We can tell the truth straight out, without all of this Slytherin lying and dodging, and then we don't look foolish when we're caught in a lie.

"Severus," she said. "I asked you here to become my Deputy Headmaster."

Severus jolted, and then stared at her. Minerva stared back at him.

"I always suspected that it was the office itself that caused Albus to go mad," he said at last, his voice grating and rasping. "Now I have proof. You are mad, Minerva. You cannot mean this."

“Yes, I do,” said Minerva. And not only because it will force you to think about other things than Harry, which Merlin knows you need. “I know what you’ve given up, Severus. Do you know what that says to me?”

“That I am an idiot?” Severus was back to glaring at the desk. “That I should never think of ever having a child, when they would act like this?”

“That you are determined to do the right thing before all else,” said Minerva, choking her own impulse to snap at Severus for his self-pity. She would have done it without hesitation when they were colleagues, but she had some authority over him now, and she had to use it properly. “And that indicates a man I could trust to become Headmaster, if I died or was forced to retire. We have endured enough betrayals. I want you by my side, Severus, because I know that you will never stab me in the back.”

Severus stared at her. Minerva waited for some mocking remark about how she should never trust a Slytherin not to backstab.

Instead, he murmured, “What have you learned?”

Minerva told him, wondering if he realized that by hearing these secrets, he was essentially committing himself. Severus didn’t show any awareness of it, but, as his face grew steadily darker and his eyes glittered with anger, as he came more to life than he had since Albus was arrested, Minerva was sure that she had made the right decision. This was a man who valued the good more than his own life or his own pride.

“So you’ll take the position, then,” she said, as he got up.

Severus gave her a steady, unblinking stare. “You are right,” he said finally.

Minerva raised her eyebrows.

“I can believe that the Hat almost put you in Slytherin now,” said Severus, and swept out of the room, which was answer enough.

Minerva leaned back and smiled. She could enjoy the brief glow of pleasure over a victory before she tackled the next problem.

“Do you see? I told you that you would be a leader.”

Minerva whipped around. In the corner of her office, near the door that led into the lower levels of the castle, stood the same cloaked figure who had introduced herself as Acies once before. She still smelled of smoke and fire, but now also of something else, Minerva thought, working her nose. Life, and spring, and light.

“Who are you?” Minerva demanded, as she had before.

“Someone you’ll be seeing soon,” said Acies, in an infuriatingly calm tone. “And someone who has a message for you. Listen. This is what Professor Trelawney told Headmaster Dumbledore on a tower a few weeks ago.

“Three on three the old one coils,
Three in its times, three in its choices,
It bears his rivals to silence and stillness,
And the wild Darkness laughs, and the Light rejoices.

“Two on two the storms that are coming,
Two for the day, and two for the year,
The storm of darkness when no moon will shine,
And the storm of light that will blaze most fiercely here.

“One on one all the prophecies bear down,
One is their center, and one is their heart,
And from my mouth comes no Divination again
Except those prophecies in which he has a part.”

“And what does that mean?” Minerva demanded, though she was already trying to work it out. The thing that seemed clearest was that she could count on Sybill making more prophecies. She wrinkled her nose.

“I don’t know everything yet,” said Acies. “I thought you should know this.” This time, the shadow of enormous wings appeared to stretch around her before she vanished, and Minerva had a distinct impression of wild eyes staring at her.

Minerva sat back, and shook her head. She was weary already of prophecies and the notion of working with one of them, but she had a core of iron determination under the reluctance.

I will not mess this up as Albus messed his chance up.

Chapter Ten: Argutus

Harry was aware that Draco had been staring at him most of the day, but he'd been busy, first with Elfrida's meeting with him—and that had been odd, because she'd let him hold Marian again and then talk about how much sleep he was getting and whether his hand, which she knew was missing now, ever ached—and then with trying to decide how to reply to Snape's latest letter. Besides, the few times he'd stared inquiringly back, Draco had averted his face.

Now, though, it seemed that Draco had had enough. He burst out, "You don't have to be a hero about it, you know, Harry. You are allowed to ask."

"Ask about what?" Harry looked back up from Snape's letter. He'd finally decided how he had to respond, but that didn't mean the words would be easy to write. If Draco had something to say that would necessitate putting them off for a time, Harry was all for it.

"What we're doing." Draco waved a hand to indicate the whole of the Manor.

Harry had been vaguely aware that the house elves were preparing a long table in the house's main room for a celebration of some kind the next day, and he surmised they were also cooking and cleaning within an inch of their lives. He didn't know what to do about the Malfoy house elves yet, how far he dared to press Lucius about freeing them, and so he'd tried not to pay that much attention. "Yes?" he asked. "What kind of celebration are you having?"

Draco stared at him again. Harry shrugged. "What?" he asked, hearing his voice turn defensive, and picked up a quill. Magic kept the blank sheet of parchment pinned down to the desk in front of him, since his left wrist hurt when he ground it down too hard.

"It's your birthday tomorrow, you git!" Draco burst out.

Harry blinked, his mouth dropping open. He really had lost track of the days. It was easy to do, of course, when the days were an endless round of studying, punctuated now and then by a letter from Snape or an argument with Draco or a visit from Elfrida. Now, though, he really wished he hadn't done that.

"Shit," he muttered. "I have to get something for Connor." He jumped to his feet and made for the door.

Draco managed to dart in front of him. Harry glared up at him. Draco had gone through what Harry sincerely hoped was the last of his growth spurt, and was currently a bit taller than he was. He used it to his advantage now, leaning down and glaring back into Harry's eyes. "And where do you think you're going?"

"Diagon Alley," said Harry in exasperation.

"By yourself?" Draco looked perfectly scandalized. "Of course not, Harry."

"It's still daylight." Harry turned to study the sun coming in through the library windows, just in case. If he'd lost track of the fact that he had to get a birthday gift for Connor, he might well have managed to lose track of what time it was. He nodded and glanced back triumphantly at Draco. "See? I'll ask your mum if she'll go with me." Privately, he thought this ridiculous. He could defend himself better than anyone else, and he would only put Narcissa's life in danger. But since he'd rebuilt his mind, he'd found it paid to humor the people who loved him like this.

"She's busy with the preparations for the party," said Draco.

"Why is there going to be a party?" Harry could hear his voice getting plaintive, but he thought it had a right to. Draco and the Malfoys had given him gifts for his birthday before, of course, but they'd never thrown him some kind of extravagant celebration. "There doesn't have to be."

"Because Mother wants to invite your allies," said Draco. "Even the new ones, the ones who might not have carried away a very good impression of you from last time. Give them a chance to see what you look like when you're strong, and to meet each other." He snorted. "I can't wait to see the expression on Edward Burke's face when he sees that Tybalt Starrise's been invited. He thinks Light wizards have no place in a Dark wizards' gathering."

Harry frowned. "When are they coming?"

"Late morning, early afternoon." Draco seemed more relaxed now that he believed Harry had given up any intention of going to Diagon Alley. "Mother thinks a few of them will probably arrive before then, though, to talk to you as privately as they can."

"Then I have some time to go to Diagon Alley tomorrow morning and buy a gift for Connor," said Harry hopefully. "Maybe even take it to him myself—"

"Harry." Draco folded his arms. "You can make a gift for your brother. I've seen you do it before. And you're not going anywhere outside the wards."

Harry narrowed his eyes. "I still think Bellatrix being outside the wards that day is a coincidence, Draco. And she ran the moment she saw your mum, anyway." Narcissa had still managed to inflict a curse on Bellatrix that she had said, cheerfully, would feel like a living thing trying to claw its way out of her belly. Harry had found himself wincing and wondering if there should be a limit to the oath of vengeance Narcissa had sworn, but then he'd looked into her face and known better than to say that.

"I don't think it's a coincidence, Harry." Draco's voice was still light, but it had frosted over, and Harry knew he was going to lose this argument, unless he actually wanted to Apparate through the Manor's wards, find a gift, and then dare to come back and face Draco's and Narcissa's wrath. "Besides, the last owl you sent your brother came back dazed, remember? I don't think the wards they've got him under, wherever he is, will let one through this time, either."

Harry scowled. He didn't know where Connor had been moved after the battle at the Weasleys—Connor had said that he couldn't tell him, just in case the letter fell into the wrong hands—though his brother could send post to him. He'd said he was cheerful, that he hadn't been wounded in the battle, that he was glad Harry was safe, and many other things Harry had found reassuring at the time. Now, though, he was longing to know exactly where those owls came from, and wishing he'd receive one tonight. Perhaps he could persuade it to stick around and take a present back.

"Why are you worrying so much about buying a gift for your brother?" Draco repeated, his voice gentle and coaxing.

"Because I don't have any ideas for making one." Harry turned to pace around the library, trying to run his left hand through his hair on instinct, and then snorting as the hair raked along his wrist instead of over his fingers. "It has to be perfect, Draco. I want it to say something about the last year, and who we are, and what we've done—"

"Hush, Harry." Draco had come up behind him and put his arms around him. Harry squirmed uncomfortably. Lately, Draco didn't do this when Harry needed comfort, but any old time he wanted to. "You'll think of something. I know you will. And if you can't give it to him until after the summer, then that's all right."

Harry started to say it wasn't all right, and then stopped, eyes widening slightly. For whatever reason, Draco's words had sparked an odd chain of thoughts in his mind. When the summer was over, they would go back to school, and thanks to the lack of a Triwizard Tournament this year, he and Connor would both be able to play Quidditch. In a moment, he'd thought of the perfect gift for his brother.

"Excuse me, Draco," he said, and elbowed gently at his arms. Draco let him go with an amused little snort.

"Had an idea, didn't you?"

Harry nodded distractedly and jogged to the other side of the library. The books he needed were on the top shelf, where he'd noted but not read them the first day he was here. Luckily, Narcissa's punishment on reading heavier books than ones of fey tales had expired; Harry had found it exquisitely frustrating while it lasted. He pulled out two of the weightier tomes and then curled up in a chair to read.

Draco watched Harry for a moment. He could feel his emotions, humming like a hive of bees, and also, if he really concentrated, his muscle movements, sometimes presaging what he would do next.

His gift continued to change, and Draco was not sure what he was going to do about it.

Or how he was going to tell Harry, for that matter.

Draco had opened his eyes a few days ago to find that he was opening his father's eyes, not his own. He'd lain still, caught between fear and curiosity at the feeling of limbs so much heavier than his, the sensation of long hair and sleeping robes instead of pyjamas, the soft sound of his mother's snoring in his ear.

He'd concentrated, and managed to hop back to his body. But then he'd lain awake and silent, still afraid.

He had known without having to think about it that he could have commanded his father to stand, stretch, yawn, scratch himself, speak words that were words of Draco's devising and not his own. It had felt even easier than with the Death Eater Draco had attacked. It was not compulsion, not the way that Harry had described his brother's ability to Draco. Compulsion functioned on the mind only, and could be resisted. This was the knowledge that Draco could manipulate other peoples' bodies like puppets to his will.

He could imagine how useful it would be in battle.

He could imagine how much Harry, with his love of free will, would hate it.

Draco shivered before the thought of telling him. It had to happen sometime, of course, even though Draco had never intruded into Harry's mind and never planned to without invitation. But every day that Draco could put it off, and had no more wandering incidents in the nighttime, was one more that he could bask in the glow of Harry's unrelieved regard, and know that Harry never suspected him of more than, in Harry's view, an odd desire to touch him too much.

Draco straightened his shoulders and took a deep breath. He had promised himself that he had changed, would change, and he knew that the kind of person he wanted to be would have told Harry as soon as the moment seemed right after the battle. Besides, the moment was coming when he would have to push Harry, gently, to get other things he wanted. Back down from that, and he would never have the equal footing in their bond that he so desperately yearned for.

A flutter of wings pulled his thoughts from their descending spiral. Draco turned, and watched two great horned owls swoop through the window. Suspended in a net between their claws was a large green box, bearing the coiled silver serpent that marked Coluber House.

Draco accepted the box, hearing the delicate press of scales as something slithered around inside, and paid the owls with some of the Sickles he'd been carrying in his robe pocket in anticipation of the delivery. They bobbed their heads at him and soared away.

"What have you got there?"

Draco cradled the box against his chest and didn't turn around, despite Harry's curious question. "A birthday gift for you," he said loftily. "You'd better not try to see what it is."

Harry laughed at him, though the sound had a tinge of sadness. "Draco, you don't need to buy anything that it takes two owls to deliver," he said. "But thank you. I won't try to see it, or guess."

Draco crept out of the library, casting several suspicious glances over his shoulder to keep the joke running, and then took the box to his room. One glimpse inside reassured him that the Omen snake looked the way he was supposed to look, compared to the pictures in the books Draco had studied. He dropped a few of the stunned crickets he'd also prepared into the box, and heard soft crunching a moment later.

Draco flopped back on his bed, then winced. Beds in Malfoy Manor were not really made for flopping on, however comfortable they were for sleeping. He folded his hands behind his head and uttered a long, deep breath.

I'll wait to tell Harry about my ability. I think I have to. The gift I give him tomorrow is going to be hard enough for him to stomach.

Harry delicately wound a tendril of magic around his fingers and then stood back, nodding. The seven tiny Quidditch players he'd created, adapting a spell from one of the Quidditch books that teams used to predict strategy, zoomed around their artificial pitch, Transfigured from a piece of parchment. Harry grinned at them. They wore the robes of the Chudley Cannons right now, but they would change their colors depending on the team names that Connor spoke to them.

It was not, perhaps, the perfect gift, but it was one that would have meaning to Connor, and certainly did to Harry. Here's something that you enjoy, and which hasn't had a chance to be tainted by the last year. He might even write those words in the letter he hoped to send his brother, but probably not. He trusted Connor to understand his meaning.

He sighed and cast a glance at the clock above the mantelpiece in the library. It was already almost nine, and he didn't know how much longer he'd have before the guests started arriving. If it weren't for Narcissa and her punishments, he could have stayed up late last night and finished this, but Narcissa actually checked on Harry to be sure that he went to bed at the time she'd assigned him. Harry was disappointed in her. Yes, he had promised to obey the limits she set, and he was, but these were silly ones. His cheeks stung just thinking about them.

That's probably why she did it: to make you feel so humiliated that you won't think of running off again.

Harry huffed a breath, and then looked up hopefully as a house elf came in with a confused-looking owl perched on its arm. Sure enough, the owl had a small box hooked to its leg. Harry held out his own arm and whistled, and the owl launched itself to him, delivering the package and the letter to him with a solemn air.

“Wait a bit?” Harry asked, while smiling his thanks at the elf. “I have a package for you to take back, if you’re willing.”

The barn owl fixed him with wide golden eyes, as much to say that she couldn’t do that.

“I have a dead mouse here,” Harry added. And he did, lying beside him under a preservation spell. When he realized he might have to tempt the owl that came from Connor, he had thought he’d want to have the best temptation possible. “It’s yours if you take the package back.”

The owl swiveled her head, but at least she hadn’t refused outright. Carefully, Harry shrank the Quidditch player set and put it into its box before he opened the letter Connor had sent him.

To my brother Harry, happy birthday. Have some fun this year.

Love, Connor.

Curious, Harry opened the small box, and smiled at what lay inside, struggling furiously against its bonds. It was a Snitch, but slightly larger than normal, and as Harry watched, it flashed with various colors, then turned clear and almost vanished from his sight. Snitches like this were sometimes used to train serious Seekers, but mostly they were children’s toys, intended to amuse.

“It looks like we’re thinking along the same lines,” Harry muttered, and then set aside the Snitch to pick up the box containing the Quidditch player set. He eyed the owl coaxingly. “The mouse is yours, if you just take this back.”

The owl hopped in place. Harry grimaced a bit as she cut his arm and trails of blood started to flow from beneath her talons, but he kept his stare steady, and in a short time, she inclined her head and permitted him to tie his box and note to her leg. Then she stared imperiously at the mouse. Harry laughed, ended the preservation spell, and tossed it to her. She sat on his arm and happily fed until the mouse was gone, then turned and launched herself past the startled house elf, who chased her.

Harry turned around with a chuckle, just as the fire in the hearth flared green and Henrietta Bulstrode stepped through.

Harry lifted his eyebrows and studied her. Henrietta stared back for a moment, as though she hadn't expected to find him there. Then her mouth curved in a smile that couldn't fool him. Harry had seen eyes like hers before, in pictures of hunting great cats.

"Hello, Potter," said Henrietta. "Happy birthday." She placed a carefully wrapped box on the mantelpiece. "I trust that I find you well, though you seem to have deprived yourself of a hand since the last time I saw you."

Harry concealed a snort. Is that the best she can do? He hadn't worn the glamour of his left hand since returning from Godric's Hollow, and of course Elfrida and Adalrico had seen, along with Hawthorn, and the word had spread among the Dark purebloods. "Hello, Mrs. Bulstrode," he said, not even bothering to respond to her barb. "Many thanks for the birthday wishes. Did your daughter come with you?"

Henrietta twisted her head, rather like the owl. "She did not. But I will tell her that you asked after her. Many a young witch might be happy to hear that you were interested in her fate."

Harry concealed another laugh. Why is she being so obvious? Well, after all, I was weak the last time she saw me. That probably factors into it. "I wish her all the best, of course," he said. "I can imagine the sight that she'll make in a few years, when she's come into her power and her beauty." Henrietta's eyes brightened, which made it the perfect moment for Harry to add, "Of course, she would receive an invitation to my joining."

Henrietta blinked and stared at him. "Your joining?" she asked, and then obviously hated herself for ever saying something so inane.

Harry smiled at her. "You must have heard of that, too," he said. Patronizing, just the right among of patronizing in my voice—and oh, how her eyes flash! "That Draco Malfoy and I are most likely going to be joined,” Harry clarified, and added a few more dollops of condescension into his voice for good measure.

There passed a few moments during which Henrietta simply breathed, and then she dropped a curtsy. “Let me be one of the first to wish you congratulations then, Mr. Potter,” she said.

“Oh, most people already have.” Harry wandered to the library door, smiling over his shoulder at her. “But I accept your good wishes just as I accept your birthday wishes. Come this way, please, and you can put your gift with the others. I’ll see that you receive some refreshment, too, Mrs. Bulstrode. Do you prefer wine? Perhaps not this early in the morning, hmm? Pumpkin juice might be better.”

He turned forward again, before his victorious grin could become visible. He still thought this whole extravagant birthday celebration was a ridiculous idea, and could not tell why the Malfoys had planned it—even as a convenient excuse to gather his allies, there was no reason it had to be so lavish—but he might as well use it to have fun with someone who thought his control of the alliance fragile. Henrietta stood where she was for a moment, eyes narrowed and focused on the door.

I acted stupid.

And it was my own fault.

Grimly, Henrietta ran the memory of that first meeting over in her mind, even as she gathered the gift she’d ordered for Potter up and followed him down a corridor and into the massive, sunlit central room of the Manor. She could still remember Potter’s pale face, the staring eyes that indicated he was thinking of his own ends before anyone else’s. She had thought him a fanatic, and easy to trick and delude as all fanatics were. He had magic, of course he did, but he wore only the appearance of power, and she could drape him over herself like a cloak easily enough.

That boy was nothing like the one who confronted her now, turning her barbs with ease and seeming utterly unashamed of his lack of a left hand.

Henrietta raised her eyebrows at the long table, already set with a few gifts, and placed her own among them. Well. She had made her mistake, and she had paid for it with a few moments of humiliation.

She intended to pay with nothing else. She had listened to the stories about Potter when ordering her gift, even as she let her own impressions of him order her behavior. The gift was one for a more dangerous man, adapted to Potter's unique circumstances. It might have shattered him if he were really as weak as she thought. Now Henrietta could be thankful for her foresight. At the very least, it would inflict a deep wound.

She turned and summoned a smile to her face even as she saw Honoria Pemberley, of all the Dark witches in her acquaintance the one she despised the most, come towards her with her hand out. Henrietta tried to take the hand, and it vanished. Pemberley giggled.

Henrietta simply nodded, as though amused at the trick, and waited. Potter would open her gift soon, and she could be content in the knowledge that he would suffer when he did.

"...and then he ate the whole thing!"

Harry couldn't help smiling as he listened to Honoria Pemberley narrate the tale of the pudding she'd created with illusions, and which her father had attempted to eat gamely despite most of it vanishing and bending around his spoon. She was an accomplished illusionist, she reassured him, strong enough to create the glammers of taste and scent which had fooled her father. Harry resolved to keep that in mind whenever he was dealing with her.

"Potter." Thomas Rhangnara had all but bounced up to him, with a woman Harry hadn't seen before at his shoulder. "This is Priscilla Burke, my wife. Well, she was Priscilla Burke when we married. She's Priscilla Rhangnara now. That is, if she changed her name." He turned to his wife with a slight frown. "I keep forgetting to ask, dear. Did you change your name officially, or didn't you?"

Priscilla smiled tolerantly at her husband and held out her hand to Harry. She was a tall woman with a fall of golden hair that looked longer than it was thanks to the length of her neck. In reality, Harry saw, it stopped just short of her shoulders. Her eyes were large and wide and as green as his mother's, but both harder and warmer, like jade put in a fire. "It's Priscilla Burke still, dear. I wanted it to be." She turned her attention fully to Harry. "Auror Priscilla Burke, technically. And yes, that's possible because I've never Declared. Neither Scrimgeour nor Mallory would have tolerated a Dark Auror working in their department."

"You really should Declare, my dear," said Thomas chidingly. "I told you, the Dark has the best arguments. True Dark wizards work individually, yes, but in patterns that collapse and change according to the wills of the wizards involved. Think of constellations. Stars can move. Do they shine the less brightly for that? No, they don't. And of course they can be grouped into different constellations. Take Achernar—"

Priscilla guided her husband away with a firm hand on his elbow, and an eyeroll at Harry that told him she knew well how to manage Thomas. Harry found that oddly reassuring. He wanted people at this celebration who were less than focused on him. Thomas was the only one he could absolutely count on to be so, though.

For example, he was acutely aware of Henrietta's eyes on him every time he moved, and Draco's as well.

Henrietta's scrutiny he could understand, but Draco's seemed to have something to do with his gift, given the way his gaze darted back and forth between Harry and the box sitting on the table. Harry caught his eye and smiled, trying to reassure him that he would love it, whatever it was. Draco looked away.

Harry rolled his own eyes. Fine. Be like that. He probably thinks he would manage me like Priscilla manages Thomas, but I think I could return the favor a time or two.

Then he blinked and touched his head. I don't understand myself sometimes. I still don't know if I'm going to survive the War, and I'm thinking about Draco and me joining?

He shook his head and glanced about for Narcissa. It was nearly noon, and from the look of it, no more allies were due to arrive. Edward Burke was the only one missing and he had already sent a sneering letter saying that, due to the unfortunate presence of the halfblood Honoria Pemberley, he preferred to stay home and wait for a more dignified occasion of celebration.

He'll either get over that or stop being my ally right quick, Harry thought, even as Narcissa caught his eye and nodded at him.

"Thank you for coming," said Harry, casting a mild Sonorus on himself so that his voice captured everyone's attention at once. "If you would sit down at the table, we do have a meal planned for you."

His allies moved to take their places. Harry sat at the head of the table, of course, flanked by Draco and Narcissa. Lucius took his place next to his wife, but Harry was curious about where the others would sit.

Henrietta, he was amused to see, took a position exactly in the middle of the left side, neither far from him nor near. Honoria, Tybalt Starrise, and his joined partner John gravitated together into a giggling, arguing, sometimes sneezing clump. Ignifer took a seat next to Lucius, sitting bolt upright and returning him blank proud look for blank proud look. Mortimer Belville sat on the other side of Henrietta, a safe distance back from the table, so that he wouldn't get food on his robes, Harry thought. Thomas would probably have stood if he were allowed, or wandered from place to place talking, but Priscilla took his arm and guided him gently to a seat next to Draco. Charles and his wife Medusa, whom Harry had met only in passing thanks to Honoria insisting on monopolizing his time, sat a few chairs down on the other side of Ignifer. Harry had to admit he approved of that. Charles was obviously a cautious man, and though his presence here bespoke his allegiances, he stood as near to neutrality as he still could while Harry paid him no special notice.

Hawthorn took the seat next to Ignifer, ignoring the woman with easy grace. Elfrida and Adalrico were next to her, Elfrida cooing softly to Marian and not looking up often. A permanent blush seemed to stain her cheeks. Harry could hardly credit that this was the same woman who had sternly asked him questions about his health yesterday. She was very different now—but then, puellaris witches were trained to be fierce only in defense of their children, and to act as modest and retired as possible in public.

Harry wondered, as the house elves carried in plates to everyone except him—he was casually levitating his lunch out of the kitchen instead—what his allies would think of the meal.

Mortimer was the first to react, staring down at the plate as if it were covered with worms and not pasta. “Potter,” he said. “There must be some mistake. Birthday dinners between the ages of fourteen and sixteen traditionally begin with stuffed quails. The birthday dinners of Auglorious the Red began the custom,” he added, and then paused, as if he were waiting for Harry to ask who Auglorious the Red had been.

Harry didn’t intend to give the pompous scholar the satisfaction. “Not just pasta,” he said, and then poured the bowl of tomato sauce that had floated after his plate over the pasta, casually hovering the dish just over his left wrist. “Spaghetti. I like it.” He smiled at Mortimer. “Do eat up, Mr. Belville.”

Mortimer looked as if he could conceive of nothing more horrifying, probably because the sauce would tend to get on his robes. He extended his fork and poked at the pasta, and then shook his head. Harry noted that Honoria, Tybalt, and John had all dug in with squeals of recognition and delight, and Narcissa, who had known about this from the beginning, was eating with resignation, but most of his other allies were staring at him. Draco poked the spaghetti several times with his fork before seeming to understand that it wouldn’t hurt him.

“Isn’t this a Muggle food, Potter?” Charles Rosier-Henlin asked at last, his voice fascinated.

"In origin, I think." Harry levitated a napkin over to himself and dabbed at some of the sauce that had already escaped onto his chin. He was more thankful than ever for his magic since he'd lost his left hand. He could use it to do simple things like wipe his face without letting go of his fork. "I don't really know that much about it, just that I like it."

He went back to eating, and gradually, one by one, his allies did the same. Harry knew he was still receiving stares, and felt entertained. They would be seeking some subtle message in his choice of food.

The only one Harry intended was quite simple and obvious, really; he thought it was more significant that he was eating without house elves serving him, though they had still cooked the food (which he was unhappy about, but Narcissa had refused to allow him in the kitchens). I am stronger than I was at one point. And in minor matters, I'm going to do as I like.

Finally, everyone except Mortimer had finished, and he pushed the plate away as though glad to have an excuse for quitting. Harry heard him fervently muttering cleaning charms to himself as the house elves came out and fetched their plates away—with the exception of Harry's, which had tamely taken itself back to the kitchens already.

"I suppose I should open my gifts now," said Harry aloud.

"Please do, Potter." Henrietta Bulstrode was leaning forward, her eyes bearing the gleam of a hunting cat. "Open mine first, if you wouldn't mind. I spent some time fussing over my choice."

"How wonderful, madam," said Harry casually, even as he summoned Henrietta's box to him. "You've only had a week to know about this." Narcissa had told him that much yesterday, when he'd tried to talk her out of a large birthday celebration and failed. "It must have been a lot of fussing concentrated into a small space of time, and yet it doesn't show on your face at all." He smiled at Henrietta, and then opened the box with a snip of his magic.

"Well, it's very small, Potter, but it is what I want to give you," Henrietta was saying.

Inside the box lay a gleaming left hand, sculpted of silver. Harry had seen a few wizards wearing them in the past, long before he had any reason to be interested in them.

He raised his eyebrows and glanced up at Henrietta. Her eyes devoured his expression. Obviously, she'd hoped he would flinch, be hurt, panic.

"It's handsome," Harry admitted, letting his magic levitate the hand out and spin it front of his face. "Unfortunately, the wrist is a bit too big to attach to mine." He smiled at Henrietta. "But I appreciate the thought, and even the pun. It was very clever of you, to think about giving me a hand."

Someone giggled. Harry thought it was Honoria. The rest of his allies were sitting in absolute silence. Harry directed his beaming smile around the table, then laid the hand and the box both aside. He did detect a flash of stunned disbelief in Henrietta's eyes before her face smoothed again.

She expected me to be ashamed of being crippled, then. I'm not. This is a war-wound. I'll leave the glamour off, not draw attention to it unless I'm asked, and then admit to it. Neither hiding nor flaunting is the way to go. This is just part of who I am, at least until I figure out how to break the last of Bellatrix's spells.

He grinned at Honoria. "Should I open yours next?"

"Oh, please do." As he called her box to him, Honoria made tiny hovering phoenixes follow it and chirp at the ceiling. Harry opened it with a sense of real curiosity. He didn't know what whim of hers Honoria might have gratified in choosing a gift.

He found a silver whistle, and held it up with his hand, letting it spin on its chain. "What does this do, madam?"

"Blow it," Honoria suggested, and then began laughing aloud.

Harry concentrated, but couldn't identify any Dark magic on it. He shrugged, put the whistle to his lips, and blew.

Everyone sitting around the table promptly burst into laughter. From the looks of things, they wanted to stop laughing, but they couldn't. On and on they went, as if they were being tickled mercilessly. Mortimer Belville actually fell out of his chair. Medusa Rosier-Henlin was holding her sides in pain. Lucius's eyes were furious above his distended mouth.

Though Honoria hadn't told him how to stop the effect, Harry decided that he could do worse than blow the whistle again. As the shrill sound echoed around the room, everyone relaxed and stopped laughing. Lucius's face had gone icy.

"That was a ridiculous gift," he told Honoria.

"Was it?" Honoria tilted her head to the side. "I don't think it was. Think about it, Mr. Malfoy. Harry here blows that whistle at his enemies, they start laughing, and he escapes." She shrugged, looking extremely smug. "And they won't easily think the whistle is a weapon, either, because it's my own invention, and not registered with the Ministry."

Harry nodded at Honoria and put the whistle back in its box. He wasn't entirely sure if he approved of her doing that and embarrassing his other allies, but at least she'd been laughing right along with the rest of them—and the whistle hadn't affected Harry at all. He could take it as a protective gift, if he wanted to. He still wasn't sure he could trust her.

But she is fun, he had to admit.

Several of the other gifts were more prosaic—a set of fine robes from Mortimer Belville, a tiny mechanical lion that paced and roared from Tybalt and John ("to bring some Gryffindor influence back into your life," according to Tybalt), a book on Quidditch from Charles and Medusa. Harry smiled at Charles, understanding the import of the gift. They weren't pretending to know him better than they did, and they were still making a statement of neutrality. Charles would have known that he liked Quidditch from Harry's conversation with Owen at the last meeting. Harry nodded at him as he put the book aside, and received a surprised glance, followed by a slow relaxation, from Charles in return. Medusa leaned her head on her husband's shoulder and smiled widely in Harry's direction.

He was utterly unsurprised when the large, flat packet from Thomas and Priscilla turned out to be a book on the constellations. He nodded to them as he stroked the cover. "Thank you."

"There's also philosophy inside," said Thomas eagerly. "All about the comparison of Dark wizards to stars, and how—"

"Dear." Priscilla put her hand on his shoulder. "Do you want to spoil the book for Potter? I know that you don't like it when someone does that to you."

Thomas's eyes widened in horror. "Of course not! I'm sorry, Potter." He nodded several times. "My lips are sealed now. You'll just have to discover the book's wonders on your own."

Harry smiled and put the book aside. He was already getting a little weary of the gifts, though. Honestly. No one needs this many.

He frowned when he received Ignifer's present. It looked like a broad, flat rock, but it was copper-colored, and thin, and sharp on the edges. He took it up, gingerly, so that he didn't cut himself, and looked at her.

"It's a dragon scale," said Ignifer softly. "From a Peruvian Vipertooth. If you need my help, Potter, wave it in the air, and it'll ignite and let me find you anywhere in Britain."

Harry blinked. It was a more open declaration of alliance than any of his new allies had made so far, unless one counted their coming to these meetings at all as an absolute commitment, which Harry didn't. "I—thank you."

"You're welcome." Ignifer leaned forward, never looking away from him, her yellow eyes as proud as a hawk's. Harry experienced a dizzy moment as he gazed at her. She appeared a distant figure out of legend. Her looks bespoke Light witch so strongly that he found it hard to reconcile them with the aura of Dark magic that pulsed about her, even knowing the facts about her expulsion from her family as he did. "It's the least I can do, if you are also offering me a sense of belonging."

Harry nodded slowly. Whether it was because of her heritage or something else, Ignifer was offering him a true alliance. He was not about to disdain it.

"Thank you," he repeated, and then set the dragon scale down and turned to the gifts from his closer allies.

From the Bulstrodes, of course, came a book on the strategy Adalrico had been trying to teach him, and a book on taking proper care of oneself. Harry flashed a sheepish glance at Elfrida. For one moment, he saw fangs among her teeth. He wondered what Millicent had been punished with if she didn't eat properly and go to bed on time.

Hawthorn gave him a silver frame. Harry swallowed when he saw what it contained: a wizarding photograph of Dragonsbane. Swaddled in black, of course, so that his face could not be seen, as Harry had always known him. A necromancer never showed his face to anyone but his spouse and children. Still, that Hawthorn would give this picture up in the first place to the one who had killed her husband...

Harry met her eyes solidly. "Thank you."

Hawthorn merely nodded. Harry had to look away as he set the photograph in a place of honor beside him.

Narcissa and Lucius's gift was a silver bracelet, carved with delicate letters. Harry couldn't make out what they spelled, though. He didn't even know if they were runes, or ordinary letters so entwined with vines and the like as to make them unreadable. He glanced at her with, he knew, a faint frown on his face.

Narcissa leaned forward and laid her hand over his. Her voice was low but clear. "As a wizarding child gets older, Harry, he should have some emblem of his becoming an adult, and more and more a representative of the family instead of just someone who shelters under its protection. This bracelet is that.” She nodded to it. “We couldn’t, of course, just adopt you into the Black or Malfoy families, but we can show how much you mean to us: one Black by birth, one Malfoy by birth, and now a mingled family of both bloods. Please consider yourself bound and entwined with both of us, not only with the Malfoys.” She lowered her voice. “And, of course, if you ever do find yourself bound even more firmly, we would not object.” She led Harry’s gaze to the side, and he met Draco’s.

Draco’s face held an odd expression: hope, and determination, and caution. Harry swallowed, and couldn’t look away for a long moment. When he could, his cheeks were burning. He suspected he was about to find himself pursued with more determination.

He examined the bracelet to distract himself, and found that he could make out the letters, now. They were the Malfoy and Black mottos, intertwined. He smiled at Narcissa, and clasped the bracelet around his right wrist. “Thank you. I accept.”

Narcissa relaxed. Only then did Harry realize that she’d been nervous he might reject the bracelet.

Why? Just because I’m Potter by birth?

Harry shook his head briskly. He was his parents’ son, yes, and in more ways than just by blood, but that didn’t mean he would ever be heir to Lux Aeterna or anything else James or Lily Potter owned. He would have refused them if they were offered. He didn’t see why he should want them.

He forced the emotions away from him by smiling at Draco. “Well, Draco, it’s time for your gift.”

The expression on Draco’s face became tinged with faint panic, but he didn’t try to stop Harry from summoning the large box to himself and opening it.

Harry felt his own face change as he stared at the small snake in the box. He swallowed. It was inevitable that he should, he thought defensively. Memories of Sylarana were brewing in his head. He half-wanted to shout at Draco for getting him another snake at all.

But he put his hand into the box and hissed a soft greeting. The snake raised his head, hissed back, and crawled onto his arm. Harry lifted him out, staring at him and trying to appreciate everything that Draco had done for him.

Harry had recognized his breed at once. He was an Omen snake, one of a species of serpents whose bodies could reflect the future, and who sometimes appeared as signals of the fulfillment of prophecies or signs of impending disaster or fortune. His scales were utterly smooth, the color of milk—until they caught the light. Then they brewed and stormed with silver and white and gold, and sometimes shone transparent. He was beautiful, his head slender and more pointed than Sylarana's had been, his eyes a pale, cloudless blue-green, like the sky during a particularly fine sunset.

And he was of the Light. Omen snakes had always been associated with it.

Harry stared at Draco across the top of the box, and Draco nodded back at him.

"I got him because I thought he would be a good companion for you, Harry," he said. "When Omen snakes choose, they're more friends than—than pets." He coughed. "If he likes you. He might not."

Harry looked back down at the snake. A companion. And of the Light, and male.

He really was trying to give me someone who could be a friend, and who would remind me as little of Sylarana as possible.

There was another way in which he didn't remind Harry of Sylarana, Harry thought, as the snake yawned. He had no fangs. He was a constrictor, not a venomous biter.

Harry took a deep breath, and said in Parseltongue, "Hello. Do you like me? I'm not sure that you do."

The snake cocked his head seriously to the side. "I'm not sure yet, either," he said. "But I think so. You speak, yes, but it would take more than that to win my affection. You hold me gently, and that matters more. And you smell shocky, but you keep going through the pain. That is worth a great deal. I think that I will stay with you at least a few days, and if you cannot be my friend, then we will part with no hard feelings." Shining like a ripple of living water, he climbed to Harry's shoulder and curled the lower part of his body there, lifting his head to touch his tongue to Harry's cheek. He was only about six inches right now, but he would grow, Harry knew, until he was at least as long as an adult wizard's torso. "I like the way you smell."

Harry swallowed. "Good," he tried. "What is your name?"

"I do not have one," said the snake placidly. "But I would like one in the language wizards use for spells. I like that one. If I could choose any human language to speak, it would be that one."

Harry nodded, and watched the snake for a moment, trying to think of a suitable Latin name. The serpent had turned outward to watch the rest of his allies, who were sitting still. Harry wondered if any of them knew how to react. He thought not.

The snake twisted once more, his scales flashed, and the perfect name came to Harry.

"What about Argutus?" he said aloud. The word meant "clear," and also "significant," when applied to omens.

"I like that," said the snake happily. "I think I like you. But I must wait a while to make up my mind, and I mean no offense if I do not choose you for a companion. There are many people who are simply not suited to be friends to an Omen snake."

Harry had to close his eyes, then. Omen snakes formed no involuntary bonds. He had known that, once, but had forgotten; it was a long time since he'd read about magical serpents. Argutus would choose to be his or not of his own free will.

Draco has done this for me. And he knew exactly what he was doing.

Harry lifted his head and opened his eyes. Draco's fear melted. Harry didn't know exactly what his own face was showing, but he suspected it wasn't half his emotions.

So he nerved himself, braced himself, and leaned forward to kiss Draco, gently, on the cheek. "Thank you," he whispered into his ear, while Argutus grumbled and adjusted his perch, slithering down his left arm to coil about his wrist, and he heard a few of his allies buzzing. "You don't know how much this means to me."

"Enough for you to kiss me in public." Draco's eyes were brilliant when Harry sat back. "I think I do, Harry."

Harry stared one more moment before he turned away. That gaze was just a bit too intimate, and made him feel like he was in freefall. He needed to move past this awkward, and potentially vulnerable, moment.

He graced the rest of the company with a smile. "Should I have the house elves bring in dessert?"

Interlude: More Than Yourself

July 31st, 1995

Dear Harry:

First of all, happy birthday. I would have written earlier, but I had no idea of what was happening in the outside world—one of the few disadvantages of living in the Seers' Sanctuary. The shadows they create around the building to protect themselves also slow and bewilder the owls, so that post takes forever to reach us. They have opened a path in the shadows for my owl to fly swiftly.

But you know all that. I am only trying to put off expressing my letter's real purpose.

Snape has written to me. He has invited me to return and testify against Dumbledore. A copy of the Daily Prophet has reached us now, and we know exactly what he was charged with.

He, and your parents. Harry, I am so sorry. I never suspected that James would be so faithless, even knowing what he did to put me in Azkaban. I had thought that a parent's love for his children would prevail over his bond with Lily.

I regret that I will never have the opportunity to set some of the rats I have an understanding with upon him, but perhaps it is better this way.

Understand please, Harry: I am returning. I know that Lily, James, and Dumbledore have inflicted damage on you that can never be repaired, but they have also hurt me. I will testify in Dumbledore's trial, and against your parents as to the effects of the abuse I witnessed. I know that the Aurors will hunt me, but I intend to give myself to the Ministry and insist on undergoing interrogation with Veritaserum. With all luck, I will be free by the time the trials come around.

It is time the truth be known. Again, Harry, I am sorry, in case you see this as a betrayal, but they have hurt more people than yourself.

There were some segments of wizarding culture, a few hundred years ago, who believed that fifteen was the age of adulthood, rather than seventeen, as we now think. I hope that it is so for you, that you are able to understand why I am doing this, even as you may taste the bitterness of age.

Sincerely,

Peter Pettigrew.

August 1st, 1995

Dear Peter:

I do understand the reasons that you are returning, and if I had thought about it at all, I might have assumed Snape would contact you. Thank you for writing and informing me, however.

I will do nothing to prevent or interfere in your testimony. How could I? You deserve justice. The abuses that my parents and Dumbledore inflicted on you are not ones that I could deny, nor do I wish to.

Since you have been so honest with me, I will be honest in return. Though you may have been able to guess it, since you know the person I used to be, I did not give my permission to Snape to file these charges, and I have not cooperated with him at all so far. I will not try to free my parents or Dumbledore, or prevent the trials from going forward. They do have some opportunity of doing good, in exposing those crimes perpetrated on you and other innocent victims, whatever the outcome may be of the crimes they are charged with against me.

However, I am going to testify on the way I see their abuse of me, which, as I am continually reminded, is very different from the way that others see it. I plan to argue for leniency in those charges I can affect. I have done enough research on child abuse to discover how often the punishment in such cases, if the Wizengamot finds the criminals guilty, is execution. My parents and Dumbledore might deserve death for what they have done to others—that is not for me to say—but it is the charges affecting me that could prove fatal to them. I plan to struggle with every breath in my body before I let the sentence of execution come down.

So long as they are still alive, they have the chance to change. They cannot do that if they are dead.

I understand you perfectly. I hope you will understand me, and not take this as a declaration of war on your principles. I am already embroiled in a struggle with someone who does.

Sincerely,

Harry.

August 2nd, 1995

Harry:

I believe that you still do not understand me. I will try to explain myself one more time.

I did what I did because I believed it was the right thing to do, and so that neither your parents nor Dumbledore could ever threaten you again. I did this to secure your future. I knew that you would hate me for it, and that you have reached out to me with your letters is more than I had any right to hope. But I do not intend to retract or drop the charges, no matter what you may say in the trial. And you should know that my testimony will directly oppose your own. Pettigrew, McGonagall, and the Malfoys, I have no doubt, will also testify on the side of the prosecution. That is not to mention all the others who may have something to say. Even if your parents and Dumbledore manage to call character witnesses, I expect them to be imprisoned, and perhaps stripped of their magic.

I have made my choice. You may hate me again before all is done, but I will continue my course. I regret only the pain that has come between us, and the necessity of having to do this at all. I do not regret the exposure of the abuse.

Severus Snape.

August 3rd, 1995

Dear Snape:

I understand you perfectly. You are the one who continues to misunderstand me.

I will do nothing to prevent your testimony, or anyone else's. I understand that people have a right to speak their minds. I am not trying to make you regret anything you do not. I understand that you have a right to your emotions.

What I will do is pursue my will. By my desire and by my will, I am doing what I feel must be done, what is most in accord with my own personal code of justice. There are places that my actions affect other people, where I cannot follow a certain course because it would crush the freedom of others. This is not one of them. If anything, I am striving to secure the lives of others.

I am telling the truth as I know it. Why is this so hard for you to grasp? Why do you think that my doing so will somehow silence you? I know it will not. And if you think me contemptuous, speaking in scorn—the only cause for scorn I have is that you still think of yourself in some position of authority that can control my actions.

Your legal guardianship over me is a formality only, preserved by Scrimgeour. I will not oppose it for now. But, so far as I am concerned, the only connection we currently have is that of two principled men on the opposite side of a debate of principles. I understand why you did what you did. That does not stop me from hating it. You understand why I am doing what I do. That does not stop you from thinking me wrong.

Kindly cease to think of me as an abused child who does not know what he is doing, or someone who is only trying to spare the lives of my parents and Dumbledore because of a misguided love of sacrifice. I would try to spare the life of anyone who was charged with potentially fatal crimes against me. I ripped apart and rebuilt my mind, and I can choose to forgive them, rather than being compelled to do so.

Peter wrote to me that this is larger than I am. Of course it is. And the world contains more than you and your perceptions, Snape. It always has, but that was never truer than it is now. Perhaps you should consider that. You may have given up your grudge against my father, but you are just as blind as you ever were.

Harry Potter.

Chapter Eleven: Madam Shiverwood

“But we have to go with you.” Draco said that as if he were talking to someone legless, who had proposed standing up and walking before his artificial legs arrived.

“No, you don’t have to.” Harry smiled over Draco’s shoulder at Narcissa, who was waiting patiently for him on the other side of the library, and shut the book called Dark Blades: Everything You Ever Wanted To Know About Knives and Feared Would Cut You. “I’m going with your mum to the Ministry, and I’m grateful that she decided to take me, but I have to go into the interrogation—“

“Questioning, Harry,” said Narcissa.

Harry shrugged. So far as he was concerned, it was an interrogation. “With Madam Shiverwood alone,” he told Draco. “Someone else there with me might either constrain what I’m going to say or make me tell more than I’m comfortable with.” He was quoting the letter the Ministry had sent him about his appointment with Madam Shiverwood yesterday, but the words sounded more natural when he said them, he thought. They should. He’d practiced them several times before he got up this morning, knowing Draco would object to their parting.

Draco folded his arms and tapped his foot. Harry waited patiently. He was confident he could talk Draco out of coming into the interrogation room with him. Narcissa was on his side, and that was always a good thing where handling her son was concerned.

Draco chose to object to something else, though. “I wish I could be there so that I know you’re saying as much as you should, Harry,” he said.

“Huh?” Not my most eloquent moment, Harry thought an instant later, but Draco seemed to ignore it entirely as he clasped Harry’s wrists and looked into his eyes. Argutus, coiled happily about Harry’s lower left arm, hissed as Draco squeezed him and slithered up towards his shoulder.

“Are you actually going to tell her about the abuse, Harry?” Draco asked. “Or only what you think she should know?”

Harry narrowed his eyes. Is he going to suspect me just like Snape does? “I’ll answer all the questions she asks me with the truth,” he said shortly. “I won’t lie. I made a promise to myself about that during my time in Godric’s Hollow.”

“But if what she doesn’t touch on one aspect of the abuse?” Draco asked.

“Then she doesn’t.”

“Harry—“

Harry shook his head, and drew his wrists gently but irresistibly out of Draco’s grip. “I really do appreciate that you’re concerned,” he said, aware that his voice didn’t sound like it. “But since this is a personal decision that I’m making, I wish you wouldn’t push it. There’s one point when you wouldn’t have pushed it,” he couldn’t help adding.

“Expect to be pushed more from now on,” Draco murmured.

Harry stared at him. Draco didn’t try to look to the side, and Harry caught a glimpse, for the first time, of just how much he’d changed in the past two months.

Damn. And double damn. He does think I won’t collapse at any moment now. So he’s going to shove. Get more of what he wants, and what he thinks would be good for me instead of just what I tell him I want.

“Harry?”

Harry shook his head and turned away from Draco, though he could feel his eyes on his back like a brand. “Coming, Mrs. Malfoy—“

“Narcissa.”

Harry smiled at her, and did his best to ignore the odd feeling of excitement that had overtaken him. When he met Madam Shiverwood, he would have to be as collected as possible. "Narcissa, then. I'm ready."

"Ah, Mr. Potter. Please come in."

Harry entered the office of the Head of Magical Family and Child Services, staring around. He hadn't had much chance to notice the décor here when he and Snape came to meet James for the custody hearing. Then, he'd been mostly occupied with watching what Snape's insanity potion did. Now, almost a year later, he could see the picture of a child on each wall, and the deliberately calm and soothing atmosphere of the office, and suspect that Madam Hellebore Shiverwood took her job very earnestly indeed.

And I don't need to worry about that because I have nothing to worry about, he told himself firmly again. I'm going to tell the truth. All of it. I wouldn't ever try to prevent my parents from being imprisoned or punished. I will try to show why I don't think they deserve execution. That's all.

And that was precisely why both Draco and Snape seemed to be angry at him.

Harry shook his shoulders and focused on Madam Shiverwood, who'd come from behind her desk with her hand held out to him. Harry shook it, concentrating on her face. Her eyes were direct, and full of sympathy.

There was another light in them too, though, one that made Harry tilt his head to the side. She's impatient with this? Does she think it's as useless as I do, since my testimony at the trial should really work to establish my parents' guilt or innocence?

Thoughtfully, Harry took the chair in front of Madam Shiverwood's desk, wondering how he could use this.

“Now, Mr. Potter,” said the witch, as she sat. “You know that the purpose of this session is to draw some basic facts about your abuse from you, and try to offer you some comfort with them.”

She examined him like an insect. Harry knew why, having read about this point of the interrogation in the books on child abuse in the Malfoy library. She would be watching to see if he flinched at the word “abuse,” or averted his eyes, or made any of the more subtle signs of discomfort.

Harry supposed he might have made one that he didn’t know about, but all those he did recognize, he had been ready to control, and he did. He simply nodded, his eyes wide and guileless. She had to see how fine he was with this, that his focus wasn’t on angrily resisting her questions and denying the abuse had ever happened. He was doing exactly what he thought was right, exactly what he had thought a few weeks ago most people would be happy with him for doing.

And yet, no one seems to be happy with me.

Harry snorted to himself as Madam Shiverwood scribbled something down. That’s because my behavior wasn’t what they really wanted. Snape wants me to think the exact same way about this that he does. I don’t know what Draco wants, but maybe it’s the same thing.

Well, they can’t have that. My thoughts are my own. It happened to me, as they keep reminding me, and that means that I’m allowed to have my own opinion of it.

Madam Shiverwood looked up at last and gave him a smile Harry couldn’t help thinking of as insincere. “Let’s start with your mother, Mr. Potter.”

Harry nodded.

“How long has her abuse of you continued?”

“From the time I was a year and a half old, until the year that my brother and I went to Hogwarts,” said Harry promptly. “That was 1991,” he added, when the witch muttered and dug through some of the notes on her desk. "Since then, there have been scattered incidents, but I only saw her over the summer and briefly for some holidays. She had no time to build up a sustained cycle of abuse." See? I'm using the word. I'm adult. I can face this.

Madam Shiverwood clucked her tongue as she wrote that down. "And what would you say the most damaging part of her abuse was?"

Harry smiled in spite of himself, acknowledging a question he hadn't been prepared for. "Training to be a sacrifice," he said. "She said I was to die for my brother if necessary, to give him all the credit for achievements like winning Quidditch games even when I won them, to use my magic to protect and defend him and put him forward. When I managed to break out of that mindset with my brother, I found myself doing the same thing with other people."

"The most damaging part was not the phoenix web, then?" Madam Shiverwood scowled at her notes. "Your guardian seemed to think it was."

Harry frowned. "The phoenix web bound my magic, and tied my loyalty to my brother," he said. "But the sacrificial training was deliberate. The phoenix web had many consequences which my mother and Dumbledore no more expected than you expect someone to break a leg when you push him down a hill."

She glanced quickly up at him. "But the fact remains that they pushed you down the hill in the first place," she said, voice soft.

"Yes. Well." Harry shrugged and struggled to regain control of himself. Snape wasn't even here. Harry had no reason to get angry at this stage of the game. "They did. But you asked me what I thought was most damaging, and not my guardian. And the sacrificial training was my answer."

"How would you describe the other abuses you suffered?" Madam Shiverwood sat back and watched him, eyes sharp, but face gentle.

Not playing fair, Harry wanted to whine. This was another question he hadn't expected. Questions about dates and specific incidents, yes, but not forcing him to fall back on wide consideration of his abuse.

But you can do this, because you're strong.

Harry ignored the way his nose stung when he breathed through it, and walked forward. "Hard," he said. "In my mother's eyes, necessary, but now I realize that most of them were not so—"

"Only most of them?" Madam Shiverwood was on that like a mongoose on a cobra. "Why not all of them?"

Harry hunched his back. Argutus hissed sleepily at him from his shoulder. "You smell as if you are in pain," he said. "And you should not have come here alone, I think. When my kind are as young in the general span of our years as you are in yours, then we are always with our mother and our siblings. You need your sibling, since your mother is evil."

Harry found the soft words soothing. "It's a human thing," he said, and saw Madam Shiverwood's eyes widen at his Parseltongue. "Sorry," he added to her, and turned to focus on Argutus. "Not something I can help right now, that my sibling's separated from me."

"Humans are clever sometimes, but marvelously stupid others," Argutus murmured, and, to Harry's relief, went back to sleep.

"Is that something you do often?" Madam Shiverwood was rattled and trying not to show it, but her voice gave her away. "Speak to snakes?"

"When there's a snake to be spoken to." Harry owed her the truth on that, too.

Madam Shiverwood shook her head once or twice, and managed to gain control of herself, apparently. Then she returned to the question that Harry had hoped she would forget. "Why do you see only most of the abuses as unnecessary?"

"A slip of the tongue." Harry shifted uneasily. "Of course all of them were things that she should not have done to me."

"Forgive me, Harry," the witch said, her voice now completely soft. "But in this kind of environment, such slips of the tongue are significant. Please tell me what you meant. Let me reverse the question," she added, before he could say anything. "What parts of your abuse would you describe as necessary?"

Harry lifted his head. He thought he might know for a moment how the stag felt, followed by hounds.

But then he reminded himself that he had other concerns than how pressed and harassed he felt by Madam Shiverwood's questions. Lives rode on what he was doing. He forced his breathing back under control and smiled at her. Madam Shiverwood blinked.

Harry summoned the truth, fashioned it into words, and made them flow from his lips. "I suppose I think that some of the discipline was necessary," he admitted. "Training me to resist torture, for example. If she hadn't done that, I wouldn't have survived my experience with Voldemort this summer. I would certainly have snapped, or perhaps simply died from the shock."

Madam Shiverwood flinched at the sound of the Dark Lord's name, but said, "Just because it had good consequences doesn't make it good. You know that, Harry, don't you?"

"I do now, madam." Harry thought of Godric's Hollow, of how he'd used that insight to build up part of the skeleton of his mind.

"But you continue to think this part of the abuse was good? Was necessary?"

"I'm grateful that it happened," said Harry. He could watch her face twist in pity, he told himself. It was not as hard as losing his hand, or kissing Draco in front of other people. "Not the same thing, perhaps. I know what would have happened to me if it wasn't there. And I do prefer being abused to snapping permanently under Voldemort's torture. With my magic, I would have done more damage to many more people.”

“Harry.” Madam Shiverwood’s voice was soft. She leaned across the desk to clasp his hand. “Please, listen to me. I want you to listen to me.”

Harry nodded. He’d expected this part, too.

“Your mother had no right to do what she did to you,” Madam Shiverwood whispered. “Even now, you’re using and building on the premises that she taught you to obey. It would have been understandable if you had snapped. You shouldn’t have had to cast pain curses on yourself just to insure you didn’t. And you are still thinking more about the damage others would have suffered than the damage you did.”

“For the first,” Harry said, floating a little iceberg of calmness on top of the sea of pain, and making sure only the calmness got access to his lips, “I do find it hard to regret. Perhaps that’s wrong, but it’s what I feel.”

“Nothing you feel is wrong, Harry,” Madam Shiverwood whispered.

But you think it is. Harry recognized the look in her eyes. She wanted to cure him of those kinds of thoughts, just as Snape did, just as Draco did. Harry preferred to keep the sanctity of his own mind intact. He’d had enough of other people meddling in it.

“As for the second,” Harry continued, “that’s part of my training that I never want to give up. I do care for others, Madam Shiverwood, yes. I know now that that does no good if I’m so weak or hurt that I can’t actually accomplish anything for them. I deprived myself of sleep to tutor others, and in the end that was useless, because I collapsed at the first pressure and missed their tutoring sessions.” Wincingly, he touched the memory of Hawthorn forcing him into a breakdown last year, and then putting him to bed. It still made him want to hide when he thought about it. He’d been stupid, and more, he’d acted like a child, and so been treated like one. “So I want to go on caring for others. I promise that I no longer believe, as my mother tried to train me to believe, that every little whim and pleasure of my brother, or anyone else, is more important than my own health.”

“And what about your own whims and pleasures?”

“Beg pardon?” Harry felt a bit dizzy. Madam Shiverwood wasn’t conducting this interrogation exactly like the sample ones in the Malfoy books, which wasn’t fair.

“How do you feel your own whims and pleasures compare to others’?” Madam Shiverwood simply watched him, never taking her hand from his. Now her fingers were stroking the back of it. Harry wriggled uncomfortably.

“I can tell you,” he said. “But you’re not going to like the truth.”

“Nevertheless, I wish to know it.”

Harry nodded. “The greatest pleasure I get is helping others,” he said. “That’s still true. It will always be true, I think. And if the things I want are only whims, then there’s really no sense in indulging them. But I am trying to get better. Really. I know now that there’s no harm to my wanting something, that it’s not selfish just because I’m the one doing the wanting. It’s putting it into action that gives me hives.”

Madam Shiverwood smiled at him. “That was a very honest answer, Harry,” she said. “I admit, when you came here, I felt—oddly disposed towards you. I thought, for some reason, that you would refuse to give me any information at all. But that’s disappeared from my mind like a fog in the morning. You’re being honest, and I appreciate it. It’s often very difficult for abused children to admit they’ve been abused at all.”

Harry nodded. He still objected to the “children” part of that description, but she had no need to know that.

“So we’ve taken the first step,” Madam Shiverwood continued comfortingly. “Now. I’d like you to do something for me between now and the time when I next see you again.”

Harry blinked. "We're done? That's it?" He had thought she would require more evidence from him on how much abuse his mother had inflicted.

"For now, we're done," said Madam Shiverwood with a nod, sitting back. Harry was relieved when she let his hand go. "The purpose of this session was to begin healing you, Harry. Sometimes a Healer is actually the best person for that, but mental and emotional abuse to the extent that you suffered are—well, different. They're rarer than outright physical or sexual abuse in the wizarding community, and almost always accompany them, rather than stand alone."

"My parents never touched me like that," said Harry savagely.

"It's all right," Madam Shiverwood murmured. "I know they didn't. But it does mean that I'm going to be helping you heal most of the time, Harry, rather than a Healer."

Harry frowned at her. Somehow, he hadn't expected this, though he thought he was prepared for everything. To give testimony on the abuse, yes. But why did she want to change the way he thought?

Because she thinks this kind of thinking is wrong. They all think that, he realized in resignation. Well, he would just have to keep showing them how much he had healed, how it no longer hurt him to tell the truth, until they believed it.

"I want you to try indulging at least a few whims and pleasures," said Madam Shiverwood. "No more than one a day. But do that, Harry. Think of something you want, something ordinary and small, and fetch it. Or encounter a physically pleasant situation and try to enjoy it for its own sake, rather than as a pleasure for someone else or something to be endured."

Harry concealed a groan. Therapy. Great. But he nodded obediently.

Madam Shiverwood smiled at him. "Thank you, Harry," she said. "I've rarely seen such courage and such honesty. I look forward to speaking with you again."

Harry hesitated as he stood, then decided he might as well ask. He wasn't sure when he would meet with Madam Shiverwood again, and he couldn't guess the answer from how this meeting had gone. "Madam?"

She glanced up at him from marking a piece of paper that looked like a list.

"Do you think that my parents and Dumbledore will be executed?"

Madam Shiverwood clucked her tongue. "Who told you that, child?"

"I learned that execution is a common punishment for child abuse," said Harry impatiently. He was not a child, and it was unfortunate that he was giving her that impression, because it wasn't how he really felt. He would have to work on that. "What do you think, madam?"

Madam Shiverwood sighed. "Your father was a good man, once," she murmured. "A famous Auror. I had a bit of a crush on him myself. And your mother defied the Dark Lord at his side. And of course everyone knows Albus Dumbledore's legend. I know it's hard to credit that they could fall this far. But at this point, Mr. Potter? I really don't know what the Wizengamot might do to them."

With that, Harry had to be content, and he slipped out of the room to find Narcissa.

She wasn't alone when Harry did find her. Harry paused and tried to recognize the woman who talked to her, matching her up with several potential pictures in his mind. He couldn't make her fit any of them, though.

She had long golden hair, with a ripple of deeper gold in the middle, as though someone had held her head in a vat of molten metal. Her eyes were large, and so blue that Harry could see them from several feet away. She wore a gown rather than a robe, fringed with white lace. At her side stood a lean hound made of jewels, shifting and scratching itself with a tingle of magic and a jingle of sapphires.

Harry moved forward slowly, vaguely alarmed when it became clear that the witch was questioning Narcissa on his living with them, and Narcissa was explaining more about the specifics of the child abuse case—not much, just what had been in the newspapers already, but Harry had no idea why she was telling even that much.

The stranger noticed him first, and turned towards him with a fierce smile. Harry blinked. He had thought there was a fang in her mouth for a moment, as he would have expected to see in Elfrida's, but wasn't that impossible? A puellaris witch would not have approached a stranger the way this woman must have approached Narcissa, and she would have a husband somewhere close to her.

"Harry Potter," said a voice that had obviously been trained to piercing softness, like Elfrida's. Harry's puzzlement grew as she clasped his hand. "My name is Laura Gloryflower."

Harry had heard of the Gloryflowers, a Light pureblood family who often made magical animals out of materials like metal or jewels. They were responsible for the original creation of the voting owls that helped in the elections for Minister. That explained the hound, at least. It didn't explain Laura's unusual boldness.

Narcissa seemed to notice his floundering, and came to the rescue. "Harry, Mrs. Gloryflower was trained as a puellaris witch, but her husband died in the Dark Lord's War," she said. "She had to take over the family."

Harry blinked, and tried to imagine what a witch who was forced to confront the world after hiding from it all her life might do. She might crumple. On the other hand, if she adapted and confronted it head on...

He swallowed at the thought of the ferocity that could entail.

"Why did you want to meet me, Mrs. Gloryflower?" he asked, hoping it was not for the reason that had just darted into his mind.

"Because you are a child, and you have suffered," said Laura, dashing his hopes. "So I came to offer my help. I had no way to meet you, until I realized that of course you must come to the Ministry at some point and speak with Madam Shiverwood, as all abused children do. So I came here, and asked until I found someone willing to tell me the date and time.”

Harry bristled in spite of himself. “I thought they weren’t supposed to give that kind of information out.”

“Oh, they’re not,” said Laura. “But being pinned to the wall with a lioness breathing in one’s face tends to intimidate most people.” This time, her head flickered with the shadow of a cat’s head, and she looked immensely satisfied with herself.

I don’t think I like her, Harry thought. “Mrs. Gloryflower, I do appreciate your good intentions, but—“

“I also came to propose a formal alliance with you,” Laura continued. “My family was allied to Albus Dumbledore, but he is a disgusting wizard whom I want nothing to do with again.” She said “disgusting” in the tone that other witches might have used for much stronger adjectives. “Therefore, we would like to follow you.”

Harry set his feet as best he could. He didn’t want her help if it was only based on his being an abused child. “Are you sure that this won’t split your family, Mrs. Gloryflower? The only other Light pureblood family with ties to Dumbledore that I’m aware of, the Starrises, are sharply divided on the issue of allying with me.” “Sharply divided” was a bit of an understatement, from what Tybalt had told Harry about his uncle Augustus.

“Oh, no,” said Laura, sounding quite sure. “They do what I tell them to.”

I bet they do, Harry thought uneasily.

“I suppose I don’t understand what basis you have for thinking I’d be any better,” he said bluntly. “So, yes, your training might tell you to protect me, but there are plenty of other abused children you could protect. And I have more Dark allies than Light ones right now. You must know that. So why do you think you should fit in?”

“Harry,” Narcissa chided him.

“Sometimes, you are rude,” said Argutus. “I can tell that you’re being rude from the way you smell.”

“Because I want to,” said Laura. “Part of it is to do with family honor. We followed Dumbledore for so long that I can’t help feeling we’re tainted by the association with him. Part of it is wanting to be a part of the wizarding world’s future. My family has never led, as such, but we’ve always been there—sometimes as lieutenants, sometimes as supporters, but there. We recognize change and we accept its inevitability. I’m also capable of studying evidence, and I don’t think I’m stupid. You may have stronger Dark than Light associations, but that doesn’t make you either. You haven’t Declared for Dark. That, to me, says that you will welcome Light allies, and won’t use them for puppets.” Laura cocked her head, and Harry had the feeling she had flattened her ears and lashed her tail, too, never mind that she currently didn’t have ears or a tail. “So. Here I am.”

Harry blinked again. Not even Ignifer had been this direct.

Well, it might have something to do with her being Light, and not invested in twisting every tiny meaning out of every word she can, he thought at last. Laura went on looking at him expectantly, and Harry nodded. “If you think that you can accept the terms of formal alliance—“

“Oh, a formal family alliance? No,” said Laura, decisively. “I don’t want to swear never to hurt a member of your family. I don’t think it’s a good idea. If one of them fights you, the Gloryflowers have to be able to protect you. And if one of my family did turn against you, though they’d be idiots to do it, I would want you to be able to hurt them back. So. A different kind of alliance. I was thinking an Unbreakable Vow. Shall we have your adopted mother serve as a Bonder?”

“I don’t like Unbreakable Vows,” said Harry, determined to have some control over the developing alliance.

Laura nodded cheerfully. "Then I'll write you at some point in the future, and arrange things to both our satisfaction." She smiled at Narcissa. "Mrs. Malfoy has been kind enough to invite me to the Manor with the rest of your allies, pending your approval of our joining you, and at that point, we'll ally in front of everyone. I think everything should be done as much in the open as possible. I'm not good at deception or subterfuge. Gloryflowers leave that up to other people. I'll see you then, with your approval, Mr. Potter?" She paused.

Harry studied her face. He would be a fool to reject what seemed to be a sincere alliance merely because he didn't like the family matriarch thinking of him as a child. Unwillingly, he nodded.

"Good." Laura stooped and kissed him on the cheek before he could protest, pausing and smiling when she saw Argutus. "An Omen snake," she said. "Now I think this alliance even more favorable than I did before."

She swept away, the jeweled hound padding at her side. Harry stared after her.

"Talking to her makes me tired," Narcissa admitted after a moment of silence. "Laura Gloryflower is—a force."

"I don't see how a puellaris witch can do that," said Harry, and knew he sounded plaintive.

"She thinks of the whole world as her children." Narcissa shrugged. "But if one child wrongs another, she takes the part of the wronged child." She caught a glimpse of his expression, and smiled at him. "Don't worry, Harry. It is not unique to you."

Harry didn't respond. He had caught a glimpse of someone coming up the hall behind Narcissa, and it seemed as though every muscle in his body had stiffened. He could feel his face tensing up, his mouth working into a snarl.

Snape halted a few feet down the corridor and watched in silence.

Harry moved his jaw enough to knock loose a few words, at last. "What are you doing here?"

"As your guardian," said Snape, his voice quiet, "they told me when Madam Shiverwood would interview you." He studied Harry, and Harry could almost feel the words that he longed to speak, bubbling between them. But those would only be more of the words that had existed in the letters, and thus useless to say.

Harry struggled against the growing pressure of his rage, Argutus hissing in displeasure as the air around him chilled. He shouldn't hate what Snape had done this much. If he could forgive his parents, why not Snape? He should just reconcile with him, distantly and coldly, and go on his way. He could hold his tongue in more trying circumstances. He had no reason to speak now.

But two things made what Snape had done unforgivable to Harry: he had hurt other people, and, specifically, had filed charges that endangered other people's lives. Harry could understand Dumbledore and his parents being brought to trial on non-fatal charges. That they might be executed was unthinkable.

And, as much as he hated to admit it, the second reason was rooted in his own love for Snape. He could forgive his parents and Dumbledore because they didn't matter that much to him. But for someone he so valued to do this, to threaten other people with death in a situation other than battle, and refuse to understand why Harry might want to let them live...

Harry only realized he had lost the fight against his emotions a moment after he began to speak.

"Why do you keep thinking I'm going to change my mind? I'm not. Yes, they might go to prison, but they can't die. And I didn't even know that they might until I started investigating the trial procedures. You must have known from the beginning. Yet you condemned them anyway, with charges that you knew would lead to their deaths and their long slow suffering in public beforehand. Why?"

Snape's face, which had been haggard and pale, tightened. "Because they must be stopped," he said. "Not merely given a slap on the wrist. And a slap on the wrist is all you would have given them, Harry."

"Not true." The words felt dragged up from the depths of his throat. "I could have stopped them."

"Not this way. Not permanently." Snape took a step forward, cocking his head. "And that's the difference between us, Harry. You try to give an equal measure of protection to both victims and offenders, and when their crimes are against you, you would forgive them completely. I will not see that happen. I will insure that you have as much justice as anyone else would."

Harry shook his head and turned away. He had regained control of himself. He should not have started speaking in the first place, he thought. He knew what Snape believed. There were no surprises to be had here.

"I'd like to go back to the Manor now, Mrs. Malfoy," he said.

Narcissa hesitated for a long moment, but then seemed to come to a decision. "Severus," she said, with a little bow of her head, and then escorted Harry down the hall, a hand on his shoulder.

Harry bowed his head and tried to tell himself that he didn't feel anything at all.

"You smell of pain," said Argutus. "Do you do that often? And do you smell as often of determination to endure the pain?"

Snape leaned on the wall, his eyes tracking Harry's movements. He had not realized what a shock it would be to him, to see Harry walking about without the glamour of his left hand, and, seemingly, a few inches taller than he had been when he left Hogwarts. Harry's eyes were clear and determined, and even his voice, choked with rage, had been stronger than Snape expected it to be.

His words should have struck home. They should have hurt.

They did not. Not particularly.

His last letter had made Snape come as close as he could to thinking that what he had done was wrong. It rang with steely conviction that Harry would triumph, and made him seem driven entirely by principles, as if he had let all emotion about the case drop by the wayside.

Seeing Harry in person told a different story. He had needed his parents and Dumbledore brought to justice, whether or not he would acknowledge it. Snape had observed him in silence for a few moments before he approached, and seen how easy it was for Laura Gloryflower to overwhelm him. He had been dazed from his interview with Madam Shiverwood. He was well on the road to healing, it seemed, but not there yet.

No matter what he thinks.

And he had let himself slip into an argument with Snape instead of ignoring him completely. That alone said that Snape was important enough to him that he couldn't debate rationally.

I still matter to him. This is not entirely a debate of principles.

Snape folded the hope up, put it in his pocket, and returned to Hogwarts a good deal more cheerful than he had felt for the last month.

Chapter Twelve: A Sound of Many Voices

Harry dreamed.

This time, he didn't have the odd cloudiness that had marked his vision of the attack on the Burrow. Harry found himself rather grateful for that as he crouched in his lynx shape on the floor of a cave he hadn't yet seen, and watched Bellatrix carving wood in front of him. She did it mostly with magic, but now and then she would slice a knife across a piece of wood. Harry didn't try to see what she was making. Instead, he turned and faced Voldemort.

The Dark Lord was speaking with someone else, whom Harry couldn't see until he shifted a bit to the side. Fenrir Greyback crouched in front of Voldemort, his head bowed and his long shaggy hair hanging over his face. He was saying, "...don't think that most of them will have any objection, my lord."

"Excellent." Harry wondered how the sibilance that had never troubled him in the voices of Argutus, Sylarana, or the Many could sound so ugly in Voldemort's. "Then travel to your kindred, Fenrir. Summon them to me when the moon grows full again."

Greyback bowed his head once more, and then turned and slipped towards the entrance of the cave. Harry saw a stir of motion where the dimness gave way to light. He suspected it was Cynthia Whitecheek, Greyback's consort and a new Death Eater, who had devoured a small boy in the graveyard while Harry watched.

He shuddered at the reminder, and crept into the shadows as Voldemort turned to Bellatrix. He didn't think that his enemy could sense him, or he would have attacked Harry by now, but he didn't know how these visions might have changed since Voldemort's resurrection, and he was in no mood for a head-on confrontation.

"Bella." Voldemort hissed her name, too, though with no sibilants in it, that didn't seem possible. "How goes your carving?"

"Almost finished, my lord," said Bellatrix, and went on chanting in a language that Harry didn't think was Latin. Voldemort watched her for some time, reaching out absently to stroke the head of the queen basilisk, who had slithered up beside him. Harry crouched further at the sight of her, but the snake didn't turn around. She merely coiled lazily at her master's feet and let the set of false eyelids that kept her gaze from killing fall over her eyes.

"Done, my lord," said Bellatrix abruptly.

Voldemort released a harsh laugh, and put out one white hand to take the collection of wooden circles that Bellatrix handed him. Harry squinted, but couldn't make out much about them. They were small, perhaps the size of Sickles, and they had elaborate carvings; that much he was sure of. But when he shifted to the side, Voldemort had scooped them so close to his chest that his fingers and robes entirely concealed them. Harry uttered a little growl, then remembered the basilisk and froze. She still didn't turn towards him, though.

"What should I tell them, my lord?" Bellatrix stood, her single hand, the one she had stolen from Harry, brushing at her robes. Her full attention was on Voldemort's face, despite the presence of a dark hole at her back Harry thought he saw the darkness in the hole ripple, and shivered.

"That we come up from beneath on the autumnal equinox," Voldemort whispered, never looking away from the wooden circles in his hand. "That my breeding of basilisks proceeds apace, and they may count on their help if they have trouble. That we will strike at the Muggles where they least expect it." He choked out a high, cold laugh that Harry had not missed at all, though it had been some time since he had last heard it. "Go, Bellatrix. This is the greatest plan of Lord Voldemort since his rising!"

"My lord," Bellatrix murmured, and strode around the brink of the hole, moving out of range of Harry's vision.

Voldemort laid the wooden circles on the ground, and Harry promptly inched forward to get a glimpse of the design on them. To his disappointment, it was nothing recognizable, only a tangled network of lines. Yes, they might mean something, but so might almost any random tracing if looked at with the right eyes.

Voldemort laughed, then, and touched the neck of the basilisk at his feet. “Come,” he said in Parseltongue, and she lifted her head and gazed up at him with uttermost devotion. Harry winced. Of course, the Dark Lord must have told his pet not to hurt him, either. “I will breed you a mate.”

He turned away. Harry debated staying and witnessing the birth of this second basilisk, but he doubted that it would add anything to what he already knew. He had much more important information to provide to his allies: what sounded like notice of a major attack, and on the day when, of course, the balance between light and darkness would shift toward darkness—the day last year when Voldemort had yanked Regulus out of his head.

He pushed against the barriers of the dream until they split, this time becoming almost like the clouds of the last vision, and then tumbled back into his body.

Narcissa never had restricted his getting up early, and Harry had risen before the sun did and spent nearly half an hour pacing his bedroom. Both the pain and the amount of blood from his scar had been small, so he could concentrate on what “up from beneath” might mean.

Tunnels. Well, yes, tunnels, that’s obvious, but where? I don’t think there are that many tunnels under Hogwarts. Harry sighed, longing for a moment for the Marauder’s Map, which he had not seen since Voldemort in Sirius’s body had stolen it, along with his other maps, at the end of third year. But maybe I’m misremembering. And where would he want to attack but Hogwarts?

Then Harry halted, and drummed a hand against his forehead hard enough to make himself stagger.

He talked about Muggles, Harry, not wizards. He’s going to attack Muggles. And the basilisks would certainly fit, since they could slither through tunnels and squeeze out of unexpected places. Isn’t there a system of tunnels under London? At least, I think there is. Harry had to admit that he wasn’t that conversant with most aspects of the Muggle world, but he was sure that he had heard his mother mention the “London Underground” once or twice. He bit his lip, wondering who would be the best person to ask for advice on that.

As if one insight had sparked another, it didn’t take him nearly as long to come to the right conclusion this time. Griselda Marchbanks knows the southern goblins, and they know the tunnels under some parts of London, at least. They could probably figure out what portions connect to the Muggle ones and which would be in most danger. I’ll write a letter to Madam Marchbanks immediately.

Harry did that, describing his reasons for believing that Voldemort was coming through the Underground. He hesitated for a long moment over letting Madam Marchbanks know about his visions, but in the end, he decided there was no other way to go about it. She wouldn’t trust the word of Evan Rosier, not hardly, and it was absolutely imperative that Voldemort’s attack on the Muggles be prevented. At least they had almost two months to prepare for it.

When the letter was complete, Harry hesitated again, and then called for Fawkes. The phoenix appeared with a soft warble of complaint, and ostentatiously checked his shoulders, head tilted to the side as he hovered.

Harry rolled his eyes. “Argutus is still asleep in the bed, Fawkes,” he said. “And he’s never bothered you, anyway.” He found it odd that the phoenix, by so much the older and wiser of the two creatures, was the one who was having more trouble adapting to the situation.

Fawkes flicked out a trill that Harry knew meant basically the same thing as, “Hmmmph!” but settled on the bedside table and let Harry attach the letter to his leg. He vanished in a tiny ball of flames the moment Harry told him that the letter was destined for Madam Marchbanks.

“Why are you over there?”

Harry went back to the bed, and extended his right arm down for Argutus. The Omen snake, resting in the warmth of the depression he’d created in the bed, only looked back at him. His eyes shone with calmness. Harry could not decide if it came from natural serenity or a lack of knowledge about the world.

A moment later, he realized why Argutus wasn't moving, and put his left arm down. Argutus coiled happily about his left wrist, and Harry turned towards the door.

"You never answered me about why you were over there," said Argutus, looping a coil of his body around Harry's throat so that he could stay on for the ride.

"Attending to Fawkes," Harry said as he trotted down the stairs, wondering who he should speak to first. Narcissa, he decided. From the quiet in the downstairs rooms, Draco was still asleep, and Lucius would have next to no say in the decisions Harry now wanted made. Narcissa was the natural contact person for the rest of his allies, too. Even Laura Gloryflower had spoken first to her. "He doesn't want to come and sleep in the bed anymore, now that you're there."

"I would not eat him. He is too big. Can I have crickets for breakfast?"

Harry ignored the question as he opened the door to the morning parlor and found Narcissa there. She put down the Daily Prophet she was reading and stood at once, her face pale but courteous. "Harry. Has something happened?"

"I've just had another vision," said Harry. He told the details to her, as neatly and sparingly as he had related them in the letter to Madam Marchbanks. He didn't want Narcissa fussing over this, especially because he was about to ask her for a favor.

Narcissa smiled slightly. "A good thing that I was planning to send letters to most of your allies today anyway, reminding them of certain obligations they are committed to," she murmured. "And what else do you want me to do, Harry?"

Harry blinked. "Is it that obvious?"

"Written all over your face."

Harry nodded, deciding that he would worry about it later. “We should visit Grimmauld Place. Anything else there that’s a weapon, or even useful knowledge, should be gathered up, and we should start preparing the house as a base. I know that we said we’d do that, but we haven’t so far.”

“You know why, Harry,” said Narcissa, in a motherly way. “You’ve been—indisposed, and there were other things to worry about. I still don’t think that going outside the wards is safe for you.”

“I’m going to ask Regulus to lower the wards on Number Twelve for us, so that we can Apparate directly to the house,” said Harry. “Then we’ll be inside the wards there, and we should be able to get back here before anyone else notices us, don’t you think?” Regulus hadn’t been in his head much lately—the closer McGonagall got to re-Transfiguring his body, the more time Regulus found himself obliged to spend in the little wooden dog—but Harry reached out for him now. Regulus?

There was a long moment of silence, and then Regulus answered, voice weary. Yes, Harry?

Would you lower the wards around Grimmauld Place for us? Voldemort is preparing for his first major strike in this war, I think, and we need all the weapons and knowledge we can get.

Regulus took another long moment to answer, but his tone was warmer when he did. Of course, Harry. It’s done. It might not take that bitch Bellatrix long to notice, though, so please go quickly.

Of course. Harry opened his eyes and smiled at Narcissa. “The wards are down. Can we please go?”

Narcissa frowned and tapped her wand against her palm. Harry could see her weighing the risks in her mind.

“Why couldn’t I go there alone?” she asked, as Harry had expected she would.

"I can strengthen the house with my own magic," Harry said calmly. "There's one particular technique I used to ward my parents' old house at Godric's Hollow when I was there that would work especially well. And, of course, I might see something valuable that you don't recognize, even though you're of the Black bloodline. I've had training in that kind of thing."

Narcissa considered some more. Harry sat on his impatience, and put it behind steel bars. Yes, he wanted to go quickly, so as not to risk Bellatrix getting in, but Bellatrix was busy informing Voldemort's allies of his plan, and at least this waiting would have better consequences than some of the hasty actions he'd come up with last year. He was being an adult, and mature, and responsible, in consulting his allies. He knew he was.

At last, Narcissa nodded. "Let me send the letters, and then I will accompany you, Harry," she said.

"Excellent," Harry said, and couldn't stop his satisfied smile, nor the foot he tapped on the floor until Narcissa was finished. He did somewhat soothe his impatience by answering Argutus's questions about owls, and the rustling things humans attached to them, and why people would eat things other than crickets for breakfast.

Harry heard the song the moment he entered the house at Grimmauld Place. This time, it even overrode the surprisingly cordial greetings of the portrait of Capella Black in his ears.

Let me free. Let me go. I am meant to be free. We are meant to be free, in the manner of other creatures that you have loosed. Wake me, vates. Wake us, unbinder.

Harry was halfway up the stairs before he realized what was happening. Narcissa's hand came down on his shoulder, and then she cast a spell that Harry didn't recognize, but which made the song cease. He realized after a moment that she hadn't cast a spell to end the song, which might be impossible, but to muffle all sound from reaching his ears.

Narcissa lifted a brow and traced glowing red letters in the air with a wand. I am sorry to do this, Harry, but after how close that creature came to snaring you last time, I think it better to take no chances.

Harry nodded shakily. The creature trapped upstairs at Grimmauld Place was unique in his experience—something that fed only on the magic of powerful wizards, and which only an average one was able to bind or contain. Its song was the subtlest form of compulsion he had ever encountered, far stronger than Dumbledore's. Even when he thought he was free from it, it twined about his mind in silver strands and dragged his thoughts to its own purpose. The only things Harry knew about it other than that were the location of the door it was trapped behind and the sound of many legs scrambling together that he'd heard when he ventured to that door last time they were in the house.

He found it hard to ignore a magical creature's appeal to him in the name of vates, but he knew the consequences of unleashing that creature would be neither moral nor ethical. Besides, Narcissa was keeping a close eye on him, and had already traced the words I'll take the higher floors in the air.

Harry nodded sheepishly, and waited until she was up the stairs before he closed his eyes. Last time, he had come to Grimmauld Place specifically to look for Regulus. With him found now, Harry had a compelling motivation to look in other ways.

He could sense other people's magic, when he grew sufficiently familiar with them; he knew some of the characteristics of Draco's power, and Snape's, and James's and Connor's power had caused him fits last summer when he found it pressing on him in Lux Aeterna, leaving him unable to concentrate. Now, for the first time, he relaxed and tried to sense any trace of weaknesses in the wards of Grimmauld Place, or any unusually powerful magic. Perhaps it would lead him to something that Narcissa had overlooked, or something hidden in a place she'd never known about. Technically speaking, though Narcissa was of the Black line, she wouldn't be its heir unless both Regulus and Bellatrix died.

He gasped when he felt an old, odd echo of a familiar presence almost at once, dark and foreboding. And then it changed, and turned gray in his mind, overlaid with melancholy so strong that tears were burning his eyes when he opened them.

Harry let out a breath, and went slowly towards the kitchen. The portrait of Capella Black was probably still murmuring greetings and welcome. Harry didn't care. He walked through the kitchen as if he were dreaming, and then reached out and laid his hand on a portion of the wall that looked no different from all the rest.

A ward sparked softly at him. Harry hesitated, and wondered what he would have to do to get through it.

But even as he waited, the ward stopped sparking. Harry looked down to see a snake of light coiling around his hand. The silver tongue flickered out, touched the back of his wrist once, and then vanished, along with the rest of the serpent. Harry shivered, wondering which one of the mingled presences here had left the ward, and which the snake had recognized him as tied to.

The wall folded neatly out in a panel. Inside was a space about the size of a cupboard. Harry's chest tightened when he saw the familiar sheaf of paper on the top shelf, and he reached out and clasped it.

"I solemnly swear that I am up to no good," he said.

Nothing happened. Harry snorted, then reached into his pocket, levitating the map in the air, and drew out his wand. A touch of the wand and a whisper of the words worked, and he watched the familiar lines of the Marauder's Map race across the parchment. His chest ached fiercely for a moment. Voldemort, in Sirius's body, must have come here just after he'd stolen the maps and hidden them in a place he had reason to believe only he would have access to. Or perhaps he had sent Kreacher, the Blacks' old house elf, to bring them here.

For a moment, even though he knew he shouldn't feel it, a surge of fierce satisfaction coiled in Harry's heart. He'd destroyed Kreacher in the confrontation with Voldemort at the end of his third year, and he could not feel that bad about the death. It had been a just return for the danger the elf had caused both him and Draco during the year, and might have gone on causing them if he'd lived.

He looked up from the Marauder's Map, at the second shelf of the hidden cupboard. A Pensieve sat there, and Harry's chest tightened for a different reason this time. He'd had some bad experiences with Pensieves in the past. And considering who had last touched this cupboard, he wondered about whose memories this one might hold.

Inevitably, of course, he had to reach out, draw the Pensieve forth into the light, and carry it over to set on the kitchen table. It was brimful of silvery thoughts. Harry hesitated for a long moment before he lowered his head and plunged it into the liquid.

Almost at once he found himself in a dim place. He looked around, and, with a little shock, recognized the meadow at Godric's Hollow. His younger self was sprawled with a large book in one corner of the lawn, of course, and Connor and James were flying a kite in another. It was a scene Harry had seen several times in his own memories. But he knew it happened on a sunny day. A Pensieve memory, even filtered through Sirius's perspective, should have retained that light. Instead, it looked as though a murky gray mist had covered everything.

He understood after a moment's consideration, and after turning and seeing Sirius behind him, gaze desperate and haunted. Pensieves showed only the objective truth. This was the way things had really looked on that particular day; it was Harry's own memory that was false. The presence of Voldemort was in the back of Sirius's mind even then, though not the same piece of it that had controlled him just before his death. Evil magic slithered under the wards and tainted the air with its slime. And under Sirius's thoughts were the pained screams of Regulus. He had lived with his brother's torture in his head for twelve years. Everyone else, of course, thinking Regulus dead, had believed those were only nightmares.

Harry pulled his head out of the Pensieve, and closed his eyes. A surge of pity and renewed grief for his godfather touched him. Sirius had betrayed his friends and Connor and Harry near the end, but that was after more than a decade of fighting against Voldemort's mental pressures, suffering torture secondhand, and suffering from the guilt that sending Peter to Azkaban and claiming his brother was dead had caused. That he had broken only then, and kept on fighting to the point that Voldemort had to fight back to claim his mind, bespoke enormous strength. His greatest faults had been the pride and the guilt that wouldn't let him tell anyone the truth, not weakness.

Harry gently levitated the Pensieve into the air, and floated it behind him, along with the Marauder's Map, as he went towards the front door. He could sense the weaknesses in the wards more easily if he were just outside the house's magic, he thought.

I'm not going to forget you, Sirius, he thought, even as he worked to link Protego charms together and hang them around the house. What happened to you should never have to happen to anyone. Thank you for reminding me of part of the reason that I'm fighting Voldemort. And I'll look through the memories in the Pensieve, too, when I can bear to. Your life shouldn't go unshared any more.

Despite the tears he'd shed earlier, Harry felt stronger and more centered than he had since the interview with Madam Shiverwood. There was ground he was still uncertain on and must trip over when he walked—the ground of his healing was one patch, where every step he took seemed to be wrong, and to require ten more—but with defensive magic and what he was most committed to, he could dance. Harry returned to Malfoy Manor a little more hopeful than when he'd left it. He'd almost completely re-warded the house at Grimmauld Place, with some lines of defense that were keyed specifically to him and would yield otherwise only to Regulus—since he was the Blacks' heir, nothing Harry could do to the property would ultimately override his will. Narcissa had found a few more objects that might be weapons, and several books hidden in the walls. The song of the creature had not bothered him again. All in all, Harry thought, they might manage to launch this war on firm footing after all.

Then he entered his room, and saw Draco waiting with a set face, and saw the pile of letters on the table next to his bed. Harry hesitated, glanced at Draco, and waited.

Draco said nothing, simply stared at him. Harry decided to deal with the letters first. He picked up the first one and turned his back to Draco, frowning at the handwriting on the envelope. It looked familiar, but he couldn't remember where he'd seen it. Likewise, the letter at first afforded him no clues.

August 7th, 1995

Dear Harry:

I'm sorry that it took me so long to write you. I had no idea what to say. And then I realized that was stupid, because this is a letter to you and not a three-foot essay for Professor Snape, so I sat down and just started writing.

I mean—it's not that I don't think you're important. Of course I do. But I think you'll still forgive me if I say something stupid or wrong.

I'm so sorry for what you suffered at the hands of your parents. I really should have seen the signs of it, but I didn't. If you want books about it, just ask me, and I'll be happy to owl them to you. And of course I'll be happy to bring you books about it when we come back to school, too. I saw the announcement in the Prophet yesterday that the trial wouldn't be until the sixteenth of November. It'll feel like forever, I know.

And there I am, making pompous declarations again. I'm sorry. This is the kind of thing that comes out when I try to write a spontaneous, emotional letter.

I especially want to apologize for believing in Professor Dumbledore so much. I thought he must be wonderful, since he was in so many books and he had such an enlightened attitude about Muggleborns like me. But then I heard what he did, and...just because you have enlightened attitudes doesn't make you a good person. I'm so sorry, Harry. I hope you can forgive me for believing in him like I did.

I don't know how to end this, so I'm just ending it.

Sincerely,

Hermione Granger.

Harry closed his eyes. He didn't have any suspicions of Hermione, that she was only saying this to make herself look good or somehow get into his good opinion, or that she had some stake in making him admit that he'd been abused. That made her different from everyone else who'd tried to interview or write him. She deserved a careful, thought-out response that he would make later. He set her letter gently aside, and opened the next one.

This one had an actual seal on it, one bearing a cup in yellow wax. Harry frowned when he saw it, and again when he saw the handwriting—only vaguely familiar, though who was writing it became clear sooner.

August 6th, 1995

To Harry Potter, elder son and by all rights heir of the Potter family, balancer between Light and Dark, from Zacharias Smith, heir of the Smith line, last descendants of Helga Hufflepuff, Declared for Light.

I am writing to express my formal sympathies for your abuse, and for the current undignified way it is being played out in the papers. If there is anything I can do for one who has emerged from such tainted heritage so nobly shining, do not hesitate to let me know.

My Declaration for Light was a month ago, as I turned fifteen at that time, and my family holds to the older view of wizarding adulthood. As heir of my family, I have access to a good deal of money, and some small political capital that I intend to increase. For what good it might do, I am also Helga Hufflepuff's heir. All of this, or any other form of aid that you desire, may be asked for.

Sincerely,

Zacharias Smith.

Harry blinked as he laid that letter down, and only partly at Smith's pomposity. He had heard, years ago, of a witch named Hepzibah Smith who was Hufflepuff's heir—the last formally acknowledged as such, since the cup that was the last of Hufflepuff's heirlooms vanished after her death. Harry didn't know if being a Founder's heir carried any weight now, but at least he had it on his side if it did.

He had to admit that Zacharias's offer of monetary aid was even more tempting. Harry had no idea of what he was going to do for money if he exceeded the small store of Galleons that James had left for him in a personal vault at Gringotts. He wasn't the officially acknowledged Potter heir, no matter what Zacharias said, and so he had access neither to the main Potter vault nor any money that might be at Lux Aeterna. He would have to use his Galleons on his books and robes and other supplies for this year. At least Lily and James had paid for both he and Connor to attend Hogwarts in advance.

The last letter had handwriting that was very familiar, but not writing that Harry had ever expected to see again. His heart began to pound crazily as he read it.

Potter:

Please, please help me. Dad's gone crazy since the Dark Lord returned. He wants me to kill for him, and I don't want to. This note is dangerous, and I don't care. It's the first chance I've had to write all summer. Next year he wants me to attend Durmstrang, and then I'll be out of reach from you.

Please, help me somehow.

Vincent Crabbe.

Harry didn't stop to think, with this one. He drew out a sheet of parchment from his bedside table and scribbled as fast as he could, to try and keep up with his racing thoughts.

Dear Vince:

Hi. I was worried about you. I haven't heard from you in so long. How have you been?

I've been kind of bored this summer, with only Draco to talk to. I'd like to see the other Slytherin students, too, like you and Blaise. Could you meet me in Diagon Alley on the fourteenth of August? That's the day I'm going shopping for school supplies. I should be there between ten and eleven in the morning, and I'll probably stay for several hours. I'd love to talk with you.

Hope to see you soon,

Harry.

Harry folded the note and carried it over to Hedwig's perch, which was in the corner of his room nearest the window. She sat up and ruffled her feathers as she saw him, obviously noting the urgency of his stride.

"Carry this for me, girl," Harry murmured, levitating the twine that he needed to bind the letter firmly on without a second thought. "It needs to go to Vincent Crabbe, and it needs to go as soon as possible. Wait for a reply."

Hedwig gave an important hoot, and then swooped out. Harry clenched his hand and watched her dwindle in the sky, hoping against hope that Vince would understand his words. Harry didn't think it likely that a letter from Harry Potter would escape detection by Mr. Crabbe, and, in fact, he didn't want it to. The whole point was to let him know that Harry Potter was going to be in Diagon Alley on the morning of the fourteenth of August, and that he would be looking to meet his son there.

Harry had to get Vince close to him to help him, and he thought this was the best way to do so. Yes, he was using himself as bait in a trap, but it wasn't going to be a sacrifice. If everything went well, no one would even be wounded. Yes, Crabbe might pass the letter, and thus the privilege of killing Harry, on to someone else, but whoever else came would still have to escort Vince, to allay suspicion, and no one else would do that like his own father. If Harry didn't see Vince at all,

Mr. Crabbe would think, he would have no problem simply Apparating out if someone tried to kill him. All that speculation rode on Vince's letter having escaped his father's detection, but then, so did Vince's plea for help.

Harry considered the risk that he might have to deal with multiple Death Eaters. He accepted it. Vince's situation was currently several degrees more desperate than his own, especially since Harry had no idea where the Crabbes lived, and, while he might possibly be able to pass letters on to Vince at Durmstrang if the Rosier-Henlin children would agree to it, it would be much harder to actually remove him from the school.

"Now will you talk to me?"

Startled, Harry turned around, and found that Draco's face had gone more and more stone-like. He blinked. "You didn't seem to want to talk to me," he said. "So I waited. Was that the wrong decision?"

"Yes." Draco bit off the word. "The monitoring spell told me that you'd left the house, Harry, but not in time for me to stop you, because you were Apparating. You should have come and told me."

Harry blinked again. "I went with your mother, Draco."

"You still should have told me."

Harry braced himself. He'd thought he would hit one of these fences with his allies sooner or later, but he could have wished for anyone other than Draco to experience it with. Still and all, it was here, and he would have to face it. "I agreed to the monitoring spell because it was the punishment you wanted to impose," he said quietly. "I never said I thought it was a good idea."

Clouds moved across Draco's face, and then settled and darkened into a thunderhead. "You were humoring me?"

"Yes."

Draco shook his head. "This is something I've been meaning to discuss with you anyway, Harry," he said. "I don't feel that you give me enough. You do what I want only when it isn't really inconvenient. You never give me something just because you want to give it to me, other than birthday and Christmas gifts. I've given you an awful lot." He leaned forward and stared into Harry's eyes. "I don't even know if you're really in love with me, even though I've taken the risk of telling you that I am with you."

Harry waited. He expected to feel resentment or anger building in him.

Instead, he felt the same strange excitement he'd experienced the other day when Draco had said he would push Harry more, and he smiled. Draco stared at him, looking caught off balance, and then annoyed for having been caught off balance.

"I'm glad that you've decided to push," said Harry. "It'll make things more honest. And the last thing I want ever again is a relationship where I or the other person or both of us just ignore what's lying at the bottom of it." Because of the Pensieve, his mind went first to Sirius, but then he thought about Connor, and his parents, and Dumbledore, and Snape, and even Draco sometimes, and how much trouble had come from just not saying things. "I'm glad," he repeated.

Draco reoriented himself with what looked like an effort. "I am angry with you," he said.

"Good," Harry replied. "That means that I can say that I think the monitoring spell is a silly punishment. I'm not sneaking off anymore, Draco. I've kept that promise for nearly four weeks now, and I haven't complained about it before. But if you're going to get upset every time I leave Hogwarts or the Manor without asking you, specifically, even if I'm in the company of someone else, then it's not doing either of us any good. Think of something else that you want."

Draco's eyes narrowed. "I want you to think of something that you want to give me, and then give it to me, freely."

Harry felt a tremble of possible panic. He suppressed it. Draco was doing something that Harry respected him tremendously for, and it was the kind of challenge that Harry couldn't resist in other possible arenas. He would conquer it in this one, too. This was something he did want, no matter the obstacles in the way. He would jump them, because it was what he did.

"All right," he said. "Will you take the monitoring spell off, now?"

Draco eyed him cautiously, but drew his wand and did it without pause, to his credit. Harry sighed in relief when it was gone, though it hadn't been much more than a small chill presence he only noticed sometimes. He looked Draco in the eye when it was finished.

"When we're done walking some of the more difficult paths, you won't need something like that ever again, because I'm going to show you that you can trust me completely."

Hope like a slender ray of sunshine parted Draco's clouds. He did say, "It'll be hard."

"Good," said Harry, with a dryness he hadn't known he was capable of. "I don't know what I would do if it were easy."

And with that, Draco smiled, and Harry found his breath catching, almost in spite of himself.

But not quite.

I do, he could repeat to himself, and at the moment, the future looked as fiercely green as a summer meadow after rain. I do want this, and I'm going to fight the things that might get in my way, and I'm going to win.

No. We're going to win.

Chapter Thirteen: Securing the Tunnels

Harry relaxed when he'd read the letter once, but he couldn't quite help reading it a second time, just to make sure that everything was happening the way he'd wanted it to happen.

Dear Mr. Potter:

Given what you have told me about the attack on the London Underground, I am not inclined to discount the information. In fact, it will take relatively little to secure the tunnels from most convenient points of entrance from the wizarding world. But I would expect You-Know-Who to strike in Muggle territory itself. For persuading the goblins to take such an extra risk, your help would be extremely valuable. They feel they owe you honor, though no debt; the hanarz has been quite clear on the fact that their promise to change slowly and not inform the wizarding world at large of their freedom for some time settles that obligation. But they would at least listen, and you may be able to strike another bargain with them, to show them why they should care for Muggles at all. They expect to see you at Gringotts between the hours of eight and nine on the fourteenth of August.

Best wishes.

Griselda Marchbanks.

Harry sent back a short note, and went downstairs. He knew he was smirking. He couldn't help it. Argutus rode his shoulder, and sometimes touched his tongue to Harry's cheek, and sometimes asked what certain things they passed were and what they did. Harry told him when he thought the Omen snake could understand. It was already remarkable how much he could understand compared to two weeks ago. He even seemed to have some grasp on the nature of Harry's relationship with Draco, which was more than Harry could say about himself.

Now, he said, "You watch the pale one very often, and you smell of concern for him. Do you suspect something about him?"

Harry paused with one hand on the door of the reading room where Narcissa spent many of her evenings. "How did you know that, Argutus?" he murmured.

Argutus wound his body in a figure-eight pattern, which he'd chosen as his equivalent to a shrug after spending a whole afternoon asking about human gestures of uncertainty. "It seemed likely from the way that you look at him," he said. "And of course human scents express all kinds of information that you never think to conceal from snakes like me."

Harry nodded slowly. "I've been watching Draco because I think there's something he's not telling me," he murmured, keeping his voice low. He'd had occasion to reflect in the past few days, when he turned around and found Lucius staring at him, that there was another Parselmouth in the house. And one of the things he'd noticed from his observation was the careful, cold courtesy with which Lucius and Draco danced around each other. "But I want to figure it out on my own, and reassure him that he can tell me whatever he likes."

"Is that not true now?"

"Not yet," said Harry. "I don't think he'd believe me unless I already know what it is. This is the gift I'm giving him: showing that I know him as well as he knows me."

"Hmmm."

Harry shook his head at the snake's commentary and opened the door. Narcissa looked up at once from the letter she was writing, tense as a coiled basilisk, and then relaxed at the sight of him. "Harry," she said. "I thought—never mind. You had something that you wanted to say?"

Harry nodded. "I know that we were planning to go to Diagon Alley tomorrow anyway," he said. "Can we go a few hours earlier, though? Madam Marchbanks just sent me a letter. The southern goblins want to talk to me in Gringotts, between the hours of eight and nine."

Narcissa shook her head, and Harry's heart dipped for a moment, but then he realized it was a gesture of astonishment instead of refusal. "Only you would be able to do things like this, Harry," she said. "Yes. There are a few shops in Diagon Alley that I want to visit anyway, and I might as well do it in the cool of the morning as the heat of the afternoon."

That might be a problem, then, Harry thought, his mind working fast. If Vince is going to meet me between ten and eleven, I'll have to make sure that we stay in Diagon Alley until eleven at least.

He had not discounted the possibility that Vince's father had found out about his letter, of course. That did not matter, because Harry could handle a trap. The main thing he wanted was Vince close to him.

"I haven't been out of the Manor but a few times this summer, though," he said, and stared at the floor. "A battle, and the Ministry, and Grimmauld Place." He stared back up at her. "Can we please spend a few hours in Diagon Alley beyond that?"

Narcissa clasped one hand inside the other, a graceful gesture of worry that Harry had never seen her perform. "Is this part of the therapy that you discussed with Madam Shiverwood, Harry?" she asked.

I was supposed to do something pleasant or selfish for myself each day. It was the first time Harry had thought of the advice since he received it. But he had no intention of discarding such a useful tool as a plausible explanation.

"Well, staying in Diagon Alley a few hours longer would please me," he said. "But if you think it's too dangerous—"

Narcissa cut him off. "We can leave the moment it becomes dangerous, Harry. But the moment it becomes dangerous, do you understand?"

Harry nodded enthusiastically. It really would please him, and even though he was luring danger to him, he didn't think Narcissa would mind, because he never intended her to find out about it.

The only successful conspiracy is one that is never discovered. Lucius put the book of medical magic down on the chair beside him, and then crossed to his shelves. Most of the books on magical creatures were well-thumbed, since Harry and Draco both used them for research, but they put them back again when they were done. They knew that Lucius would not have been pleased if they did not.

Lucius's fingers drifted from spine to spine, until he found the one that interested him the most. Within: Magical Parasites. He drew it down, tapped it with his wand, and murmured the spell that would let him find the first occurrence of the word he wanted in the book.

That turned out to be only a glancing reference, so he had to search again, and then again. The third time was the lucky try. Lucius could feel his lips parting as he read, as Within confirmed what he had read in the book on medical magic. It seemed that a certain species of insect had once been used to treat the aftereffects of curses, feeding on and destroying the dangerous Dark magic. As spells had advanced to take their place, however, the Healers had gratefully abandoned them. The procedure to implant them was really most disgusting.

There was also an interesting bit of information on what they did when they were accidentally introduced into someone healthy, which Lucius read with careful attention, and then memorized.

He put the book back, and returned to his desk to write a polite letter to the Magical Menagerie. He doubted that they would have what he wanted on hand, but he would be in Diagon Alley tomorrow, and he requested the honor of an interview with the shop owner. She could surely order it for him.

He smiled as he sent that owl off, and allowed his gaze to linger on one drawer in the desk, where he had locked the return letter from Ollivander. The wand-maker had agreed to his plan. Of course, believing that he owed his life to Lucius, he had had little choice about it. He could have resisted if he had known the truth, but Lucius had no chance of letting him find that out.

He knew the saying about successful conspiracies.

Harry entered Gringotts with more confidence than he'd felt the first time he came there, his hand resting on one pocket in his robes, but that didn't last long. A goblin he hadn't seen before, wearing a silver chain around her neck that Harry also hadn't seen before, came up and bowed to him the moment he set foot in the bank.

"Mr. Potter?" she asked. "If you will follow me now?" To most of the wizards and witches around him, Harry supposed, it would sound like the typical polite greeting. But she met his eyes defiantly, which no goblin would have done before, and she didn't offer him her name, or any courtesies once he'd nodded. She turned around and walked on, and Narcissa and Draco, who came behind Harry, found themselves engaged with two goblins who moved so smoothly to intercept them that Harry didn't realize what was happening before it was done.

Harry followed the female goblin still, allaying his own fears. It was ridiculous to think that the goblins would try to kill or harm the wizards just because they were free of their web now. It was a prejudice that Albus Dumbledore would have been proud of. He should remember that he was dealing with proud, independent, free beings now, and, moreover, ones that had suffered abuses at the hands of wizards for centuries. He would just have to live with whatever discomfort that brought him. The goblins had borne worse.

They entered the back of the bank, and here, Harry found the differences even more pronounced. The goblins who passed him had a light, brisk trot, just fast enough to get their work done without tiring them. Most of them openly wore chains of silver or bronze or gold, and sometimes a stone ornament that none of them let Harry see closely once they realized he was human. Those seemed to be pendants with seven sides. Harry had no idea what they meant.

He wondered if he would feel this out of place in Muggle London. He experienced a sudden spasm of regret that he'd never got to go. He thought it would probably be good for him.

The female goblin led him into what was recognizably a cave, rather than the meeting room he'd seen the first time. The very rock of Gringotts was transforming around them, Harry thought, as he exchanged nods with the hanarz. He wondered what it would look like when the goblins broke free of their self-imposed slow change and made the wizarding world notice them.

I hope I'm here to see it.

"Mr. Potter." The hanarz leaned forward. Strings of metal glittered and flashed on her body, woven into her clothes, and, apparently, her skin. "Tell us more details of this attack that you say is going to take place on the autumnal equinox."

Harry willingly told her every detail of the dream, including the ones that hadn't been about the attack. Perhaps the goblins would know something about the wooden circles Bellatrix had been carving, or could direct him to someone who did. And when he mentioned the tangled pattern on them, the hanarz did indeed nod wisely.

"That represents the maze of tunnels that connect our world with the London Underground," she said. "It is ancient magic, the use of wood to triumph over the stone and metal of the tunnels. It can crack them even as tree roots can crack stone. Voldemort will put one on every tunnel entrance, seeking to split any protections on them and obtain easy passage for his army."

She could suggest nothing similar for the werewolves, but Harry had already written to the three Light werewolves turned in April by Fenrir Greyback's bites, and to Hawthorn. They had promised they would try to get in contact with other werewolves, but none of them had had much contact with any packs, let alone those Greyback would speak to. Harry had written to Remus, too, but post to the Sanctuary went so slowly that he wondered if Remus would arrive before it became a non-issue. He suspected that there was little to be done about the ones who would fight in Voldemort's ranks in any case. He could not offer a cure for lycanthropy, or anything else that would interest them in him immediately. Even his ability to provide Wolfsbane Potion was limited now that he didn't have much money.

“We will help you secure the tunnels.”

Harry blinked and looked up at the hanarz. “You will?” He had expected that it would take much more arguing to get her to agree, especially since Madam Marchbanks had said that the goblins didn’t consider themselves in debt to him.

“We are capable of recognizing dangers to our own world,” said the hanarz briskly, moving around the far side of the cave, in a path that never put her closer than about ten feet to Harry. “We still share this world with wizards, though they have done us little good—one witch and one wizard excepted.” Her gaze speared Harry for a moment. “We will help you on this, though we may not on the more isolated attacks.”

“That is all I can ask for,” Harry responded as he followed her, wondering what exactly they would do. Surely securing all the tunnels will take longer than the hour she asked to meet with me?

“At least you are polite,” said the hanarz. “And you have not deceived us.” She made a sharp snap of her fingers that echoed like clicking bones and resulted in two goblins, both with stone ornaments around their necks and quivers of arrows on their backs, instantly springing up to escort them. She glanced back at once Harry. “Have you found anything that would enable you to free our northern relatives?”

Harry shook his head. Even with the Light allies he now had, he was very far from being able to convince the Light pureblood families to give up their linchpins, their ancestral homes, and as long as those linchpins stood, then the net on the northern goblins would endure.

“Pity,” said the hanarz, and then led him down into the bank, yet another set of tunnels that Harry had not seen before.

The earth around them grew wilder and wilder, rougher and rougher, and Harry suspected they were getting into areas that no longer lay under Gringotts. Soon, though, he became unsure of what material actually surrounded them—soil, stone, or metal. It gleamed and flashed in the light that the silver chains on the hanarz began radiating, rather like steel. But Harry brushed against it once or twice, and found it warm, and as hard as rock. He shook his head, and decided that he wouldn't try to solve the mystery. So long as the goblins knew where they were going and would be able to prevent the attack that Voldemort planned to unleash from taking the Muggles, then Harry would rest content.

The hanarz turned around when they finally came to a door. "What you are about to see, no humans has ever seen," she said.

Harry drew in a startled breath, but she hadn't allowed him time to react. She turned away instead, and opened the door with a touch of her fingers. Harry thought he saw a chain link glimmering for a moment in her spread hand, but it was gone when he looked for it again.

The door opened.

The room beyond the door breathed. That was the only way Harry could think of to describe it. It was magic, he knew that, but it didn't feel like anything he'd ever touched, though it was as powerful as several of them—his own wandless magic, the corrupt truce-dance that Voldemort had employed in the graveyard, the Dark power of Walpurgis Night. It flowed out to welcome the goblins, though it hesitated over Harry until the hanarz shook one of the lengths of metal that Harry was now sure ran into her flesh. Then it enwrapped him, too, and it was like nothing so much as being swallowed by some enormous warm beast with no teeth.

Harry tried to grasp it, both with his own magic and with his understanding. They slipped again and again. Harry shivered—with excitement, not fear. This was magic he would never know, never learn, and that was all right. There should still be some mysteries left in the world.

The hanarz moved to stand in the center of the room. She held out her arms and turned her back to Harry and the door. One of the two goblins who had accompanied them at once hurried forward and removed the loose robes that were all she wore in the way of clothing.

That revealed her fully. Oddly, the first impression that Harry had of her, perhaps because of the dark gray of her skin, was of a dungeon. Lengths of chain were riveted to her shoulders and sewn under the skin of her back. One pair of conjoined manacles hung from the back of her right knee. Small, polished rubies winked along her spine like the eyes of rats hiding in corners. The silver chain around her neck was the only one that looked like an ornament. The rest was, Harry sensed, the ordinary armory of a working hanarz. He wondered how long it had been since the goblins had been like this, and how much longer since any human had caught a glimpse of what they could be.

He closed his eyes, humbled almost beyond belief.

He opened them quickly enough when the hanarz began to sing.

It was a song that would have done a raven proud, full of rolling, discordant noise, the clash of chains and thunder. Most of the chains on her body rose up and danced to it. The longest link, the one around her shoulders, lashed down and wrapped about her arms, drawing them behind her back and up over her head. The hanarz showed no sign of pain, even when Harry knew that one of her shoulders must be close to dislocation. She just kept singing, and the metal writhed around her and encased her.

Then she spun.

The chains duplicated themselves, perfect in every respect except that their copies weren't fastened to the hanarz. They followed her for a moment, and then sprouted more copies, and more, and more. Then they snapped outward.

Harry ducked as one of them flew at him. When he looked up, though, he could see it thinning like mist. It hit the wall and sailed right on through, vanishing. Harry stared after it, and wondered what sprouting illusions of chains would do.

"It is to secure the tunnels," the goblin standing behind him murmured, sounding a bit awed. Harry wondered if the emotion came from never having seen this himself. "She has sent the chains to the tunnels that stretch in all directions, from here to the Muggle world, and under us as well. They will lie in wait. If basilisks or any with the Dark Mark on their arms walk past them, then they will rise.”

He didn't elaborate on what they would do then. He didn't have to. Harry shivered, and was glad that the southern goblins were on his side.

He suspected that Draco and Narcissa would be unhappy about his having left them in the upper bank, but, as he watched the hanarz helped back into her robe, he thought seeing this had been worth it—just like the fragile thing in his pocket, which he touched to assure himself it was still there and unbroken, was worth the risk of their scoldings.

The world is changing. I know the goblins are ready for it, but I wonder if the wizards are.

Lucius found it easy to accompany his wife and son and Harry to Diagon Alley that morning, and to slip away during the time they went to Gringotts. After all, he did not need to withdraw money from the Malfoy vaults himself, and Narcissa accepted that he did not want to spend every minute with Harry the way that she and Draco did. And it was even more natural to walk into Ollivander's, and catch the old man's eye, and wait patiently until he dismissed his latest customer. Lucius concealed a sneer as the witch walked past. Any woman who found her wand so easily was hardly formidable.

Ollivander bustled about, closing his door and hanging dark curtains over the windows. As he did so, the lamps in the shop came to life, flames contained in heavily enchanted glass shells so that they stood no chance of lighting the wands on fire. Lucius curled his lip as he stared up at the boxes of wands and wands. There was no way that Ollivander could have made them all, and that would mean that most of them were worth far less than what he charged for them.

But then, that is the way of those who sell things for a living, Lucius thought, and turned away to find the older wizard regarding him with a certain air of resignation.

“It is ready?” he asked.

“It is, yes, sir.” Ollivander drew out a box from beneath the counter and put it reverently on the surface. He was slipping back into his seller’s persona, as Lucius had thought might happen. “A bit of crafting it cost me, but it will fit your hand perfectly and work for the spells that—”

“That I specified, yes.” Lucius did not wish Ollivander to speak their names aloud. There were, lately, rumors of Aurors using spells that let them draw out the memories of spoken words from the walls of a room. In that way, letters were much safer. Lucius did not intend to be caught.

He opened the box, and eyed the wand lying there.

It was made of ash, and Lucius knew it would have a dragon heartstring core, because he had asked for it. He lifted the wand from the box with his left hand, and felt a single thrum of deep, true magic shoot up his left arm. He smiled and graced Ollivander with a slight nod.

“It will do,” he said. “Since I do not intend to pay you for it, the creation of a blank wand must be reward enough.”

Ollivander bowed his head and was silent. He knew as well as Lucius that blank wands—wands created for only a single purpose, to be dropped and discarded when the task was done—were illegal, banned by the Ministry. They had no essential connection to the wizards who wielded them, not like their own wands, nor to their makers. When they were discarded, no spell could track them back to their owners, because they had never really been owners, only users.

A blank wand was perfect for what Lucius had in mind.

He slid the blank wand into his pocket and headed up the street at an easy walking pace, to find the Magical Menagerie.

The world is changing, and I will be a single small and unnoticed change in the middle of it. But I suspect I am the one that will cut the deepest.

Harry came out of Flourish and Blotts loaded down with books for the next school year. He was carrying half of them in the crook of his right arm, and half floating behind him, despite Draco's hints—due mostly, Harry was sure, to his agitation about being left behind in the bank—that that would cause people to notice him and stare at him more.

So let them stare. It's not like they're not already doing it.

Harry had felt the pressure of eyes from the moment they emerged from Gringotts. More wizards and witches were bustling about now than at the early hour of eight when they arrived, and most of them would have read the Prophet. They would be used to photographs of him, Harry thought glumly. After she'd refused his offer to conduct an interview with him, Skeeter had taken to talking about his exploits from the past year, and putting photographs of him as he was then under the grimmest details available to the public about his child abuse. She didn't do much more than that. She didn't have to. Harry had read those few of the articles he could stand to read. She was doing a much more effective job at smearing his parents and Dumbledore by her silent portrait of his survival than the gossip articles by Melinda Honeywhistle and her ilk, which often contradicted themselves the next day.

It didn't take long for the first motherly witch to come up to him, sniffing, and exclaim over the loss of his poor hand, and want to see his left wrist, because "my sister's a Healer at St. Mungo's, and I just know that I've inherited some of her Healing skill." Harry extended it to her, but pulled it back the instant she started to draw out her wand.

"That's all right," he said politely. "I think I'd like the name of your sister instead. Can I have it?"

He let the name slide through his head. He had no intention of going to that particular Healer, but it made the witch happy to think she was doing some good, and it got rid of the chance that she would cast dangerous magic on his stump.

That was only the beginning. One pureblood Light wizard exclaimed that Harry was too young to have suffered such a degrading wound, and offered to let him know about discount prices on artificial hands.

A few people wanted to “talk” to him about his abuse; those, Harry refused outright, knowing they would turn around and sell their stories to the papers. Others lingered and stared at him with pitying eyes, but hurried away when Draco stared back at them. Draco was getting twitchy, and Harry was wondering if the biggest obstacle to his plan to rescue Vince would actually be Draco’s determination to bundle him off home, rather than just staying in Diagon Alley until eleven that morning.

He spent a moment watching Draco glare at the back of one witch who had actually started to come up and open her mouth, but then had burst into sobs and veered off. There was no denying that Draco had grown taller, of course—Harry had finally, finally started to follow him there, at least—but it was more than that. He held himself more nervously now than he had at the start of summer. His hand was in his pocket and clasp his wand more often.

And he hadn’t mentioned his empathy very often. In fact, he hadn’t at all picked up on Harry’s smug excitement last night or this morning, though he’d noticed the time Harry spent alone in his room, studying maps of Diagon Alley.

Harry narrowed his eyes. The change that’s taken place has something to do with his empathy, I bet.

And then the things he’d been waiting for happened, and he had no more time to think about that.

Someone moved off to the left side of him, coming from between Flourish and Blotts and the stationary shop next to it. Harry spun towards it, his magic flickering up to shove his books out of the way. He was already murmuring Protego charms under his breath, and he knew they would be ready to deflect any hexes from coming at Narcissa and Draco and the other people in the Alley. Those maps had come in handy. He knew the best angle from every shop to hang his Shield Charm wards and cage him and his attackers in a private arena.

He didn’t hang any in front of himself. The whole point was to look unprepared.

A heavyset wizard with what Harry was sure must be a glamour cast on his face—he looked like Dumbledore—dashed from between the buildings, casting spells at him. Harry was already moving, though, his eyes wide open and his breath and his tension hammering in his chest and his lungs. He needed to find Vince, and he needed to make himself a target until the moment when he could safely rescue Vince and get away.

Two more people glamoured to look like Dumbledore were coming around Quality Quidditch Supplies, their wands pointing directly at him. Harry gasped, as if caught by surprise, and stopped. His magic reared up inside of him, but the ability he was unleashing wasn't something they would sense, or know how to stop.

Two hexes came at him at once, one a Body-Bind and one a Diffindo. Harry had to snort. He wondered if Voldemort wanted him captured or killed, or if the two Death Eaters were simply operating on different levels.

The snake of his magic-draining ability snapped out in front of him and swallowed the hexes. Harry was dodging, though, as if he had only escaped by pure luck. He made sure to utter a little scream, to show that he was frightened, at least supposedly. Sure enough, his two attackers pounded after him, joined a moment later by the third.

Harry listened to the screaming and scattering of the other people in the Alley, and waited until his opponents were directly in front of him.

Then he spat out the magic he'd swallowed, as a wave of pure force.

It slammed all three of them backwards, either into the walls of the nearest shops or the Shield Charms, which they bounced off of. Harry snorted and looked around once more. Vince, Vince, where is Vince?

He caught sight of a small, hooded figure standing motionless—with the kind of stillness that could only indicate a Petrificus Totalus—in one of the alleys next to a heavily cloaked wizard. The wizard pulled back the hood that covered the small figure's face, and revealed Vince. Harry nodded.

“How does it feel, Mr. Potter,” the wizard, who must be Mr. Crabbe, asked, “to know that your letter was intercepted and your plan known from the beginning?”

Harry didn’t bother replying. He had anticipated that this might happen, and that meant planning ahead. His hand was already drawing the object he’d brought from his robe pocket. It had survived unbroken.

He caught Mr. Crabbe’s attention with a Hotfoot spell, and sent the glass serpent whisking towards Vince, murmuring, “Portus!” to it as it tumbled.

A Portkey now, as it had always been since Draco had given it to him for his thirteenth birthday, it struck the motionless Vince, and he vanished. He would be safe behind the wards of Malfoy Manor now, Harry knew. That left him here, but that was the point. He was the one who had risked danger to himself and other people and property by luring the Death Eaters to the Alley in the first place.

It was up to him to clean it up.

Harry glanced over his shoulder. The three Death Eaters had climbed back to their feet, and Mr. Crabbe had finally managed to put out the stinging fire on his foot. Narcissa and Draco were still stuck behind the Shield Charms that made a cage of Harry’s part of the Alley, though pounding frantically as they tried to get in.

Harry half-closed his eyes. Really, it was flashy, and he usually disdained to throw his wandless magic around this way. There were better uses for it.

But it would catch the Death Eaters quickly. That was the main point of this exercise.

Harry concentrated, remembering the way he had trapped Dobby in order to get some answers out of him when the house elf came to find him in second year. Blue light surged and flooded out of him, and then fell around the Death Eaters like a rain, solidifying and rising up into hard walls of azure. The first two Death Eaters glamourised as Dumbledore were caught almost at once, and Harry spent a moment building up the cages firm and tight. If they could prevent a house elf's Apparition, then they could prevent a wizard's.

When he looked sideways, however, it was to find the two other cages empty. Mr. Crabbe and the unknown Death Eater had Apparated away.

Harry breathed out in disappointment, but he was, more truly, satisfied. The only damage looked to be a few impact marks on the nearest walls, and really, any ordinary housekeeping charm could repair those. And, of course, the Death Eaters were wounded, but Harry cared about them far less than he cared about the other people in the Alley, who had either run away or were staring at him.

He lifted the Shield Charms, opening the Alley once more, and then there was an awkward moment where both Draco and Narcissa had come up to him and tried to hug him at once.

"What happened?" demanded Draco. "I saw you throw something, but I couldn't see what it was from behind the wards."

Harry maintained his innocent expression. "I had my Portkey on me," he said. "The serpent that you gave me, Draco. I thought I'd bring it just in case we did run into danger here in the Alley. And when I saw that his father was holding Vince hostage—"

"He was?" Draco sounded disappointed. "I didn't see that, either."

Harry looked inquiringly at Narcissa, who shook her head. Harry relaxed. He'd had a moment's fear that his plan would be uncovered when Mr. Crabbe talked about intercepting his letter, but with all the screaming and the muffling effects of the Shield Charms, it wasn't surprising that neither Draco nor Narcissa had heard.

"Well, he did." Harry put a petulant tone into his voice, as though he were trying to deflect lectures about not using the Portkey to save himself. "I'd written to Vince and asked to see him the other day, but I had no idea that he would be here in the person of a hostage." There.

That tone of feigned innocence is perfect. “I’d just thought I could talk to him, see if he needed help. Unfortunately, his father must be reading his post, and he brought friends with him.” He sighed and dropped his head. “And then his father got away. I captured two of the others, though.” He gestured at the two caged Death Eaters.

“That was stupid of you, Harry,” Draco said, his face pale with anger. “You should have thought that Mr. Crabbe might read Vince’s post.”

Narcissa agreed with him, rather loudly. Harry accepted the scolding in humble silence. He would much rather receive a scolding for being stupid than one for risking his life.

He was aware that he was still breathing hard, and not from exertion. That had been a wilder rescue than he had thought it would be, filled with wild chances. Narcissa and Draco would have guessed his plan if they’d heard Mr. Crabbe’s words. Something could so easily have gone wrong, including the injury of others—at least if he hadn’t been good enough at defensive magic to hang the lines of Shield Charms that caged his pursuers in with him so fast. And if Harry hadn’t been prepared to use his wandless magic good and hard, then all the Death Eaters might have got away.

He found that he could hardly wait to do something like that again.

It’s like flying. You tilt down, and then all you can do is survive as hard as you can.

“Let us go home.”

Harry turned to find Lucius behind him. Most of the people in the Alley seemed to have recovered from their shock by now and were pressing forward, and Lucius obviously didn’t want to be questioned by the public, or by the Aurors when they showed up. For once, Harry thought, they were in perfect agreement.

He concealed a bright smile as he Apparated back to the Manor with Lucius, Narcissa coming behind him with Draco at her side. There’s going to be a lot of fallout from this, no doubt, but not nearly as much as there could have been. And at least Vince is safe.

And as long as they have a plausible tale on the surface—me not thinking—then they're not going to look underneath and see this as a calculated risk with my life.

Lucius shook his head in the moments before he walked up to his family and Harry and declared that the time had come to return to the Manor. He had just been coming out of the Magical Menagerie—the owner had been most obliging, and promised to order what he wanted the moment she could—when his one-time fellows attacked, and so he hadn't had a good view. Somehow, though, from the small smiles he surprised on Harry's face if nothing else, he was sure that Harry had planned this, and had it fall out just as he wanted.

In one stroke he rescues a classmate who probably appealed to him for help, appears a hero once more, and reduces his enemies by two. He plays a very risky game, but a risk achieved is a triumph worth any odds.

For the first time, Lucius thought there was a certain likeness between him and Harry Potter, and that he might like binding the boy to the family for more reasons than just his power and Draco's apparent infatuation with him. Not that he would tell the boy that, of course.

A plausible reason on the surface is worth any amount of lies.

Chapter Fourteen: Bearing Gifts

Conscience is like a scorpion, Harry thought.

It was a thought he was having only because he still lay awake, his hand folded behind his head. He wouldn't be having it if he could just close his eyes and go to sleep. He was being silly. Everything had worked out. Vince had been too much in shock to talk at first when they returned to the Manor, and later Harry had seen him alone and convinced him not to tell the Malfoys anything. Vince had agreed tamely. He kept staring around him with wide eyes, as if he believed that his father would appear from around a corner at any moment and kidnap him back.

Harry had awaited a summons to the Ministry with some dread, thinking he might have to account for his actions, or perhaps testify that his attackers were Death Eaters. The only communication, however, came via a polite owl from Scrimgeour, informing him that the Aurors had transported the cages of blue light back to the Ministry's new prison, Tullianum, and were currently keeping them there. The cages would be even more secure than prison cells for the Death Eaters, right now. They might summon him when they wanted the cages dissipated, but for the moment, everything was well.

Except that it wasn't.

Harry rolled over and closed his eyes more tightly, so that the very faint moonlight coming through the window didn't make any impressions on his eyelids. Argutus slithered briefly across him, reacting to the change in position, and then relaxed. Harry waited to go to sleep.

He didn't.

His conscience went on stinging him, whispering various truths that Harry had thought he would be able to bear better than he was currently bearing them. You know that you lied. You know that you took enormous risks. You know that Draco and Narcissa would see you as acting like a sacrifice again, though Lucius might not care.

But I wasn't acting like a sacrifice, Harry argued back strenuously. I never meant to die, and I wouldn't have given up my life to save Vince. I was sure that I could get him out.

How sure?

Fairly sure! Harry almost wondered if Regulus had come back, since he would argue and scold like this, too, but he also knew that he would have recognized the older wizard's world-weary voice.

But what would have happened if something went wrong?

Nothing did. And if I worry about the consequences to every action, then I'll only drive myself mad with the uncertainty, always wondering if I could have done something better or faster than I wound up doing it.

The voice fell silent, but it didn't need to speak. Harry's conscience could sting him with guilt alone, and that was what it was currently doing.

He had lied to Draco.

He felt guilty about it. He really wished it hadn't been necessary. On the other hand, if he told him about it now, Draco would rage, and if he had told him about it before he tried to rescue Vince, Draco would never have let the rescue happen at all—and then Vince would have gone on suffering Merlin knew what, and likely ended up with a brand on his arm. Harry didn't know what he could do, since it seemed he lost any way he turned, and this was just the smallest set of losses he could choose. Everything he did would offend Draco.

Then don't choose for him. Choose for you.

Harry went still, his eyes actually popping open. There was a new idea.

He'd been thinking in terms of losses. What would happen if he thought about it in terms of gain? If he stopped thinking for just one moment that every step he took would tip him into a pit, and started thinking about which would ease the sting on his conscience most?

Put like that, the way out was simple. It would make him feel best to tell Draco what had really happened today, and take the rage or the scolding that followed. Harry winced as he remembered what Sirius's pride and unwillingness to reveal what he had truly suffered had cost him. Speech led to suffering—he knew that, too, after what Snape's speaking had done to his parents—but silence led to greater suffering.

And there was a concrete goal, too, something to strive for other than just his own peace of mind. Harry smiled a bit as he stood, gently tucked the complaining Argutus into a corner of his left arm, and then made for the door. He would confront Draco right now, so that Lucius and Narcissa couldn't interfere and Draco would be a bit off-balance.

He wasn't the only one who had a silence to break.

Draco awoke immediately when Harry knocked on his door. He knew it was Harry without having to check, even though his empathy was only letting him feel the strongest of emotions now. He had been having odd dreams in which Harry featured prominently, and before that he had replayed the scene in Diagon Alley over and over in his head, trying to figure out what was missing. He knew something must be missing, but he could not figure out what. It was so typically Harry: not thinking before he did something to help a classmate, using weapons at hand, and using the Portkey that had been meant for his own safety to rescue Vince.

He opened the door for Harry, and was startled to find that he walked in with a decisive stride, his Omen snake coiled on his shoulder. Draco went to retrieve his wand so that he could cast a Lumos, but Harry flicked his hand, and the lamp beside the bed lit with a flash and a flare.

"Show-off," Draco muttered, turning and staring blearily at Harry. "What did you come to talk to me about?" He knew it must be talking; Harry would have been in much more of a hurry if the Manor had been attacked.

“About what happened in Diagon Alley today,” said Harry. “I lied to you.”

And just like that, Draco knew what the lie must be, and what it was about. He narrowed his eyes and took a long step away from Harry. Anger made his hands shake, but he clasped them behind his back and fixed Harry with a glare.

“I came to say that I’m sorry,” said Harry. “I shouldn’t have done it. I thought you wouldn’t let me go to rescue Vince if you knew, and that was the only plan I could think of that would let him get close to me. So I told you that I brought the serpent Portkey along just in case there was trouble, but I knew Vince and probably several Death Eaters would be there. I studied the angles of the alley so that I could hang Shield Charms that would trap me inside with their spells, but something still could have gone wrong. It was stupid, as well as wrong, and I’m sorry.” He paused, waiting for Draco to say something.

“There are times I hate you,” Draco whispered.

Harry winced, but waited.

“You always apologize too late, and you never seem really sorry for it,” said Draco, beginning to gather the wind into his wings. He could remember feeling more enraged with Harry, but not feeling this strong curdling of bitter disappointment at the bottom of the anger. “You know that I love you, yet other things seem to matter to you as much as I do, or more. You promise not to lie to me, and then do it again.” He knew what he said next wasn’t entirely fair, but he was angry. He was allowed to be unfair. “Sometimes you really are your father’s son.”

Harry’s eyes began to glitter, but he held his peace. That only made Draco angrier. Most people would begin shouting at him, and then he could have the satisfaction of knowing that a passion existed which matched his own. Harry only stayed quiet, and while that made it easier to yell at him in some ways, it also made him seem as if he were keeping his temper.

“And you keep doing stupid things, too,” said Draco. “When you realized that you’d been abused, I expected you to stop this, Harry—”

“Why?”

There it is. Harry’s voice carried a knife’s edge. Draco relaxed a bit. Angry as he still was, he knew that he was in control of the conversation now. He was making Harry respond, while his anger and disappointment were manageable.

“Because you aren’t just acting out unconscious training any more, that’s why!” Draco was startled to hear his own voice break in the middle, into a ragged, raw note of fury. Perhaps I’m less in control than I thought. “You know, and yet you keep putting yourself in the middle of dangerous situations. This wasn’t worth it, today.”

“What wasn’t worth it?” Harry moved a step forward, his head lowered and his gaze direct. Harry was still shorter than he was, but Draco nevertheless felt as if they stood eye-to-eye, and a good deal closer than they were now.

“You know what I’m talking about,” he said. “This rescue. Nearly sacrificing your life to save Vince. He wasn’t worth it—”

“That’s the line,” said Harry, and a brief burst of magic exploded from his body, sparking and then vanishing. “Other lives are as important to me as my own, Draco. Not more important. That’s the only difference, now. Would you have said the same thing if I were rescuing your Mum, or you?”

Draco hesitated. He had the impression that he’d just edged onto dangerous territory, but he didn’t know why. He persisted anyway. He knew he was right. Hadn’t Harry admitted he was wrong?

“No,” he said. “That’s because she’s my Mum and I love her, and of course I would want to be rescued. But I wouldn’t want you to die rescuing me, Harry!”

“Well, good,” said Harry, raising his eyebrows in an utterly infuriating way. “I’m not so eager to die anymore, either. But you’re saying that Vince isn’t important enough for me to take the risk, aren’t you?”

“You’re being unreasonable about it,” said Draco, retreating into the cold haughtiness that he had seen win an argument for his father several times. “It’s just that—well, he could be a spy, Harry.”

“Vince?”

Well, no. Draco had to admit, considering the clumsy, shy boy he’d known for most of his life, who had been closer to the older students than any of his yearmates after Gregory Goyle went to Durmstrang, that he found it hard to imagine. Vince was loyal in a typical Slytherin way, and he could keep things hidden behind a stoic mask, but he wasn’t able to interweave himself into someone’s trust the way that a spy would have to be. About the best he could hope to do was observe things unnoticed, and the chance that he’d be able to get the drop on Harry was very small.

Still, his father had no reason to know that about Harry. He might have sent Vince anyway.

“That doesn’t matter,” said Draco. “It could apply in other situations. What if you spared a Death Eater, Harry, and then he turned on you? You’d still be taking a risk when you didn’t have to. You’re still doing that, in fact,” he added, thinking of the cages of blue light that Harry had put around his attackers earlier that day. “You didn’t use any lethal spells against them. You just banged them around a bit and captured the ones you could.”

“I would prefer not to kill,” said Harry quietly, some of the angry light in his eyes dying. “I’ve done it three times, and that’s enough to make me hate it.”

“Three—“

“Rodolphus, Mulciber, Dragonsbane Parkinson.” Harry listed them all as if he spent time thinking about them at night.

Draco would almost have expected pity to overcome his rage, but the rage was way too strong. And a good thing, too, he thought. Harry needs to hear this. "You can't count Rodolphus and Mulciber."

"Can't I." Harry's voice was flat.

"They were both trying to kill you," Draco said. "Well, one was trying to kill you and the other one would have turned on you. It was self-defense, Harry."

Harry shook his head, his face gone calm and quiet. "There are things I'm willing to try and change, Draco," he said. "The lies I tell and the risks I take, for example—"

"You've said that before, too." Draco was unable to keep the bitterness out of his voice.

Harry nodded. "I have. And I suppose I'm asking you now if you think that I can really make the changes—if you trust me."

Draco turned away and paced to the other side of the room. His hands were still shaking when he lifted one to touch his hair in a gesture of nonchalance, and he wished he'd kept it behind his back. He had to swallow several tumbles of words that wouldn't have made sense before he could speak.

"Why is the decision always up to me?" he asked, words catching like a hook in his throat. "I'm the one who takes all the risks, Harry. I'm the one who has to do things like pull you back from the edge and convince you that you're worth something, each and every t-time. I'm the one who told you that I loved you first, and I've gone all this time without much reciprocation. And now you're asking me to trust you without any proof. To make another sacrifice. You're not just performing sacrifices, Harry, you're requiring sacrifices of me."

"Then you need to step away." Harry's response was instant. "You need to breathe your own air, and take your own risks, and stop concerning yourself with what movements I make. Think about what you're going to do for yourself, Draco. What NEWT subjects do you want to take? What do you want to do other than just sit in Malfoy Manor all day? That wasn't enough for your father. Will it be for you?"

Draco ground his teeth. "You still don't get it," he said. "That's another sacrifice, Harry, requiring me to give up your company."

Harry laughed.

Draco twisted around. "How dare you—"

"Because you're being ridiculous." Harry's words were crisp, and his voice light and cutting as a whip. "You've twisted the idea of sacrifice into an all-encompassing one, Draco. No matter what I do, you can say that you're always right. If I give you trust and love and promises, and keep them, you can say I'm making sacrifices that I don't really want to make. If things stay the same, they're sacrifices of both myself and you. If I move away so that you can grow in your own sunlight, that's another sacrifice of yourself. That's not something I can argue with, and it points to very little trust or faith in me. If you think I'm making a sacrifice of everything, if you believe that's always my motive, then it doesn't matter if I really change, does it? You'll always be distrusting me, waiting for me to change back."

"But you haven't really changed so far!" Draco shouted, feeling himself backed into a corner. It was inconceivable that Harry might win this argument. He was wrong. He'd said so. "And you keep saying that you might, and then never keeping your promise!"

"What kind of action would inspire you to trust me?" Harry asked. "And when would I stop being suspected and tried in your mind?"

"I don't want to tell you! That's the kind of thing that you should be coming up with on your own! You're the one in the wrong here, not me! You were the one who lied and put your life in danger!"

"And you're the one who's kept silent about a change in your empathy," Harry snapped.

Draco could feel his face pale. He honestly hadn't thought about himself as lying in that regard. It was just a lie of omission. He did plan to tell Harry the truth, as soon as he could find the right time to do it.

“This is an argument about you,” he tried.

“And it would have remained that way, if you hadn’t tried to take the moral high ground.” Harry’s voice went on whipping down. “I can accept that I was wrong, Draco. I can accept your conditions. I cannot accept that you’re blameless. If I owe you honesty and no sacrifices and somehow manage, impossibly, to both give you what you want and not involve you in the process of giving in any way, then you owe me the same fucking things.”

“I can’t,” said Draco. “You’re making me sacrifice.” But his voice had sunk, and his urge to turn his face to the wall was strong.

Harry threw up his arms. “If you’re not going to tell me, then we’re equally balanced, I think,” he said, with a snort. “We’ve both given sacrifices, and you’ve given me a lot more than that, while not involving me in the process of giving, you said. And now I’ve given you honesty, but you won’t hand that back. Fine, Draco. Stew in that. I’m going to bed.” He turned towards the door.

Draco felt a surge of astonishment. “You don’t walk away from arguments,” he said. “And you were wrong. You said so.”

Harry glanced over his shoulder. “Yes, I did. And now what?”

“I could punish you—“

“I am not a child, Draco, and you aren’t my parent,” Harry said, voice dropping into a growl that caused a not entirely unpleasant shiver to run up Draco’s spine. “The usual course among adults is to accept the apology or tell the person apologizing that that isn’t enough, and that they’ll need time or a specific action or whatever. Not punishment. You don’t get to put another monitoring spell on me. I’m sorry that I allowed the first one. It obviously set a dangerous precedent.”

“If I tell you what would make me forgive you, then I’m sacrificing again,” said Draco.

"I told you to get rid of that idea. It does no good. And you should decide what you think I am, too." Harry's face had settled into a scowl. "A child to be punished, and accept the punishment meekly, or someone old enough and strong enough to make harsh changes in himself and stick to them. I think what you want is someone who'll be silent under what you say, but also someone who'll guess your every want before you express it, and fulfill those desires. Probably silently, too."

The injustice of that claim fired Draco's blood again. "I never said that I wanted you to be quiet!"

"Then what do you want from me?" Harry leaned forward. "I am sick of this fucking guessing game. And oh, yes, start and stare at me because I'm using language that you don't want to hear. You've created a world where everything I do is wrong, Draco, everything is something you don't want me to do, and I'm sick of it. It works no better than the little games you played last year, waiting for me to guess your love instead of telling me straight out. I hate head games. I hate manipulation. I hate making honest efforts and being told that no, I don't know what I'm thinking, and it must be coming from some motive I didn't know I had. I've contributed to this mess. Now we can either stand here asking whose fault it is, which frankly strikes me as a boring way to spend an argument, or we can try to settle the mess. I'll show you what I want to give and to do, and you meet me halfway, Draco."

Draco could feel himself breathing faster. He felt as if he stood on the edge of a cliff, and were about to plunge off. He had no idea how Harry could keep going if he felt the same way. And if he didn't feel the same way, wasn't this just another sacrifice that he was demanding of Draco?

"I've done so much for you, Harry," he began.

"I'm not interested in discussing that." Now Harry's voice was a rapid staccato. "I've already chosen my direction, Draco—forward. Frankly, I think the only way we'll ever really love each other is to think about and deal with all of this. Constantly. That means that we speak about the future as well as the past, and right now, the future is more interesting to me.”

“But I want to talk about the past,” said Draco.

Harry folded his arms and stared at him with a measuring glance. “Then talk.”

Draco scowled. “I shouldn’t have to,” he said. “I know that you’ve done wrong things in the past, and I can’t trust that you won’t keep doing them, Harry. I just can’t.” He knew his voice sounded pathetic on the last word, but he was thinking of Harry dying in the War, or at the end of the War, or confronting Voldemort, and not dealing with it well.

Harry’s face didn’t soften. He just gave a short nod. “Then I can give you my promise and try to live one day at a time without getting into danger, Draco,” he said. “But there are two things that are not going to change. I’m never going to think that someone who hasn’t harmed me ‘isn’t worth it.’ And I’m never going to be comfortable with killing. I’ll do it because I have to. You can’t control my attitude towards it, and I won’t allow you to.”

“But you’ll be miserable otherwise,” said Draco, feeling frustration curl like a worm in his stomach. “You have to get used to it.”

“No, I don’t.”

“But that’s the way it is!” Draco exclaimed. He’d been reading the histories of the Dark Lord’s War—he supposed he should call it the First War, now, since Voldemort had returned again—and the things he’d learned sickened him. One thing was clear, though. Soldiers became numb and hardened, or they didn’t survive. “You’ll be bleeding from the heart with every wound, otherwise.”

“That’s how I’ll know I’m still alive,” Harry said. “And I’m not like other people, Draco. I thought we established this already. Now. We have to decide how to make sure that you can live the way you want to, without drowning in my shadow. I want to know what you like to do.”

Draco just stared at him, feeling hopeless. “I don’t know,” he mumbled at last. “I know a few things I like, like Arithmancy and Ancient Runes, but I haven’t thought about a career, if that’s what you mean. Malfoys don’t have to have careers.” He knew he sounded petulant. He didn’t care. He was trying to figure out what had gone wrong. A day ago, he thought, if Harry had been speaking these words, he would have been ecstatic. But something had changed between then and now. He wanted something else from Harry.

He couldn’t figure out what it was.

“I didn’t necessarily mean a career.” Harry’s tone was inflexible. “I mean what you want to be able to say at your death that you did. And that means besides loving me.”

Draco’s heart slowly started beating again. Knowing that Harry considered them as having a shared future helped immensely.

“I don’t know,” he said. “Most people don’t know right now.”

“But most people haven’t been as obsessed with a single person as you’ve been,” said Harry, his voice but not his words going soft. “They might have some idea. Wanting to travel to France, or become an Auror, or date a boy from Ravenclaw. They’re vague ambitions, they can change, but they have them. What are yours?”

Draco frowned. He was slowly moving past the fact that it was Harry asking him these things, and the part of his brain that demanded answers from himself was displeased. Did he really have no ambitions?

Well, no, that wasn’t true. There were some vague ambitions, as Harry said, though Draco hadn’t considered them worth anything because they didn’t have the rock-solidity of his own parents’ plans and dreams. And until tonight, he had thought more about the changes his soul had gone through than what the consequences of those changes might be. Grandiose visions of defying his father and becoming a hero in the War at Harry’s side—somehow—were as far as he’d got along that path.

Asked to solidify them, could he?

Of course I can. That's a silly thing to ask.

"I like history," he said. "And I'd like to be able to create spells, but I don't know if I have the talent for it."

"A lot of that is desire," said Harry at once. "Some is power, too, of course. Snape created his own spells, and he's powerful. But pressing need could drive you to make a spell." A shadow fell across his face for a moment, and then he shook his head and dispelled it. "There are books in your library on it. Why have you never read them?" He was definitely curious now.

"I don't know," Draco muttered. "I guess I thought I wasn't strong enough in magic, so it didn't matter if I read them or not."

"Read them," Harry advised.

"What, you aren't going to show them to me?" Draco demanded.

"No," said Harry, "for the same reason that I haven't included you in every vates negotiation I've ever had. That's a part of my life that I sometimes want to share, but not always, and some parts of it you can't follow me into. I want you to be able to have something of your own like that. I don't have any special interest in creating spells. I'll listen to what you really want to tell me, but I won't support you step by step. If nothing else, I'm not sure I'll have the time," he added dryly.

"If this were a normal relationship, we wouldn't have discussions like this," Draco muttered. "We'd just grow into it."

Harry covered the distance between them and put his hand under Draco's chin, lifting it. That wasn't fair, Draco thought, not when he was shorter. "This isn't normal, Draco," he said. "It never will be. If you want someone normal, then you should look away from me."

His eyes were calm and honest, and Draco wanted to slap him. "Don't you care at all?" he asked.

A faint smile quirked Harry's mouth. "You're doing it again," he said easily. "You expect someone to get angry about this, so you get upset when I don't. But I do care, Draco." His arms abruptly tightened around Draco in an embrace. "I don't want to lose you. But if it would be best for you to love someone normal, then yes, I would let you go. How could I keep you in prison, when I would hate it myself?"

Draco wondered for one moment if Harry was hugging him only because Draco might want him to, or because Harry really wanted to—

And then he wanted to smack himself in the forehead. That was what Harry was talking about. If Draco distrusted his every action because he thought the notion of sacrifice might lie behind it, then he couldn't really claim to trust Harry at all. He had to listen to his words and try to give Harry the second chances that he would have wanted extended to him.

"I don't want to love someone normal," he answered, gently pulling himself away from the embrace. "That means ordinary, and Malfoys don't do ordinary."

Harry laughed at him, and then waited. Draco enjoyed looking at him, but had the uneasy feeling that Harry expected him to say something.

"The thing about your empathy that you were hiding from me?" Harry prompted gently.

Draco shivered and closed his eyes. Harry would hate this. He just knew it.

On the other hand, he wanted to tell him. And Harry was right that he couldn't expect honesty where he wouldn't give it. And Harry had brought the topic back up, when it would have been easier on both of them to just let it go.

"My gift's mutated so that I can possess people," he admitted quietly. "I possessed a Death Eater during the battle at the Weasels', and made her Stun herself. Then I accidentally woke up in my father's body the other day. My empathy's getting smaller, so I think it turned into this. But it's really close to compulsion, and I knew that you'd hate me."

There. He'd said it.

He promised himself a full count of ten before he opened his eyes. But he cheated and peeked on four.

Harry was smiling gently at him, with a smile that Draco was almost sure he hadn't meant to let Draco see, trailing one finger just above the spot on his forehead where a scar like the lightning bolt would have been, if he'd had one. His face was tender, and open, and so full of love that Draco's throat started aching.

Harry blinked, and caught himself, and started to close his expression again. But he'd already noticed Draco's open eye by then. He hesitated, and relaxed his face into the smile again.

Draco almost forgot to be nervous.

"I don't blame you at all," Harry said quietly. "It's not like you asked for this, and it's not like you immediately started trying to use it to harm people. You need to practice with it, obviously, and get it under control."

"Who would let me possess his mind?" Draco asked bitterly.

"I would."

Draco started to open his mouth to say that of course Harry would do that, because he liked sacrifices, and paused. Could he really believe that someone with that expression on his face was only doing this because he would have done it for anyone?

"I trust you," Harry confirmed calmly. "And my mind's complex, reordered and rebuilt—good training for dealing with a simpler one. I know that I can fight back if I ever really feel threatened. It's the best solution. If you agree, of course."

Draco swallowed. He didn't really want to speak, because he was sure that any words would not have conveyed what he was feeling—the mixture of wary trust and gratitude and love.

He leaned forward and kissed Harry gently instead. Harry permitted it, even tilting his head to welcome him in. Draco felt himself becoming more composed as they kissed, and by the time he broke away, he knew that his cheeks weren't as flushed and his breathing was less rapid.

On the other hand, he was pleased to see, both of those things had happened to Harry.

Harry coughed and glanced away from him. "Is there anything else you can think of that we need to talk about?" he asked.

The way that you retreat from touching me? But Draco was more than content to wait for their next argument for that. This time, he would be the one who had the advantage over Harry, he thought. There was one part of their bond that was as much a competition as anything else. "Not until morning," he said.

Harry nodded to him, then said, "I'm still sorry, and I still think you should be," and marched to the door.

Draco sat down slowly on his bed, and, for the first time, allowed himself to think about the fact that they'd fought with words alone, not fists or magic, and that Harry had taken the initiative to come and tell him the truth, even though he hadn't had to; he could have distracted Draco thoroughly enough that he would let the nagging doubts go, especially in his own doubt about his possession gift.

But it hadn't happened that way.

It might not be normal, but I think it's better than that.

Interlude: A Need You Did Not Know You Had

August 11th, 1995

Dear Headmistress McGonagall:

I know that you have found no suitable candidate for the Defense Against the Dark Arts position at Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry. I am writing to offer you my services. I have long experience in both Dark magic and the ways of protecting against it, and I intend to teach the children practical spells and countercurses that none of their previous professors have managed. It is, of course, your choice whether to employ me, but I think you would prefer my presence to that of some of the strangers who must otherwise inevitably appear. You have met me before, and I know the school inside and out, and am committed to its protection. You may not think that you can trust me, but you can.

Acies Lestrangle.

August 12th, 1995

I am not interested in employing anyone with that last name, much less a Dark witch. Quite apart from the question of whether to trust you or not, no parent would let their child be taught by someone with your rather unfortunate relatives. Please be so kind as not to insult my intelligence by asking again.

Minerva McGonagall,

Headmistress, Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry.

August 12th, 1995

Dear Remus:

I hope that you will not think me unkind for appealing to you only now. I had heard nothing of you, and had hoped that you were happy, wherever you were.

Now I must ask that you come out of retirement. I have become Headmistress of Hogwarts, as you must have heard by now, and while I can juggle my duties as Transfiguration Professor with the help of some NEWT students until a suitable candidate can be found, I cannot continue to also be Head of Gryffindor House. I would like to ask you to return and take up this position.

I know that Ministry laws prevent werewolves from holding any paying employment. I have thought of a solution to get around this. I would offer you room and board at Hogwarts, as well as the Wolfsbane Potion that Severus brews, in exchange for your protection and counseling of the Gryffindor students.

Will this be acceptable? You are one of the gentlest men I know, and have a keen sense of right and wrong—sharpened, I think, by your experiences in recent years. I am sorry that I must ask you to return now, when two of your best friends and the previous Headmaster are awaiting trial, and Harry and Connor will be starting their fifth year. But I can think of no one else I would trust at this point in time.

Yours sincerely,

Minerva McGonagall.

August 14th, 1995

Dear Headmistress McGonagall:

I think you mistake me. I am going to teach at Hogwarts School this year. The position of Defense Against the Dark Arts would be the easiest for me to take, and I know that you have found no candidate for it. Would you truly try to take those classes on your own overloaded shoulders, or give them to someone whom you do not know and cannot trust? Now, with the War beginning and this subject the most crucial in the school? I cannot believe that you would have so little care for your students.

You need not worry about my last name. For years, I have maintained another identity, under my mother's family name: Acies Merryweather. Very few people know of me, or the truth of me. I will not alarm any parents by taking up the post, and I assure you that my teaching skills are up to par.

Acies Lestrangle.

August 14th, 1995

Dear Minerva:

I have been in the Seers' Sanctuary, and I am glad that they have lifted the shadows around their home for right now, so that owls may fly in and out swiftly. Otherwise, it is likely that your post wouldn't have reached me until after the school year had already begun, and my answer might take almost as long to return.

I am delighted to take up your offer. I want to be in the world again. I think it's time. The main concern I have is the level of general knowledge as to my lycanthropy. There might be parents who object even to a werewolf not actually teaching their students, as long as I'm in the school, and even if they cannot bring legal objections against us. Are you prepared to deal with this?

Sincerely,

Remus Lupin.

August 15th, 1995

You cannot be serious. You are still a Dark witch, and my other objections still stand. You have come cloaked to me every time I have seen you. How could you teach a class like that?

Minerva McGonagall.

August 15th, 1995

Dear Remus:

I am prepared to fight. Dumbledore's reputation is in all the papers, and the stories about him grow wilder and wilder. I must be seen to be a leader, not merely cringing in the shadow of what he has done, and that includes making my own decisions, as defiant as they might have to be. I have written a polite letter to the Minister, both to inform him of my intentions and to tell him not to interfere. The other storms, I will brave as they come. In certain ways, your return could not have been better timed. The Daily Prophet and the lesser incarnations of the gossip rags are still talking about Harry's parents, about Dumbledore, about the upcoming trial, about the return of You-Know-Who, and about the effects of all of this on the Boy-Who-Lived and the Young Hero, as they have come to call Harry.

Sincerely,

Minerva.

August 16th, 1995

Dear Headmistress McGonagall:

I can control myself for the length of time I have to teach classes. I will hold no student's gaze for more than a few minutes. That should make it all right. My eyes are the most dangerous part of me.

The Dark families who are likeliest to know me are all allies of Harry Potter. In fact, I myself am one of Mr. Potter's allies, though I must admit that I have not been in close contact with him lately. I have been speaking to the Deep Singers, whom you know as dragons.

They will be there to help when the storms come. So they have promised me.

Come, Headmistress. You have still not found a candidate, for all your frantic interviews. I have seen that. I have told you one of the prophecies that Dumbledore knew and took care to keep concealed, and I am outside the wards, so that I can see the weaknesses in them. You have need of me. I am ready to fulfill that need.

Acies Lestrangle.

August 16th, 1995

Dear Minerva:

That is all I needed to hear. Then I will come to Hogwarts. I ask only that you warn Harry and Connor about it in advance, so that they aren't shocked at seeing me. I should be there four days from now.

Sincerely,

Remus Lupin.

August 18th, 1995

Dear Remus:

Thank you. I will tell Harry and Connor about your return. I'll call Harry, at least, in to meet you a few days before the term starts. I think a face-to-face meeting would be more beneficial for him, and there is someone else I need him to forge a workable relationship with.

Sincerely,

Minerva.

August 20th, 1995

It seems I am not going to get rid of you, and I do need a Defense Against the Dark Arts professor. None of the other candidates have been remotely suitable. I warn you, Lestrage. One foot or talon out of line, and I will destroy you, with all the power that is in both me and Hogwarts. I see no reason to hide behind pretty words or trust that I do not have.

Minerva McGonagall,

Headmistress.

August 21st, 1995

Dear Headmistress:

I assure you, that is perfectly acceptable to me. You may confirm with Harry Potter that I am in fact his ally. I will see you in two days. There is a bit of establishing to be done with the Merryweather accounts first.

Acies Merryweather.

Chapter Fifteen: Sitting on Voldemort

“Ready?”

Draco breathed out slowly and wiped his hands on his shirt. Harry blinked. He had realized that Draco was nervous, but for some reason, he hadn't thought he was that nervous. “Yeah,” he said at last, voice lower than usual. “I am. What about you?”

“I wouldn't have asked if I wasn't,” said Harry. He kept his voice low, soothing. He could already see that most of the calmness and composure in this exercise would have to depend on him. Draco was going to do it, but he would be struggling against the weight of his own panic. Harry wouldn't give him any extra fear to worry him.

He leaned backward and fixed his eyes calmly on Draco's, keeping them open to their widest extent and putting all the trust he could in them. Draco shivered, once, and then took a deep breath and returned the gaze.

Harry felt an odd push on his mind. It wasn't like compulsion, which had always resembled a wind to him when he noticed it at all. He lowered some of his shields and let it through, and then Draco was inside his mind.

It was a clenched fist-like presence, uncomfortable. Harry kept looking at Draco's face, focusing on the details of the line of his nose and the wisps of pale hair around his head, to keep himself from panicking. Draco, of course, startled and tried to withdraw.

“No,” said Harry aloud, and let the negative ring in his thoughts, too. Draco hesitated. “I made the decision to open my mind to you,” said Harry, and thought of the swirling patterns in Argutus's scales, of unicorns dancing, of Fawkes singing some of his calmer songs. “I want you to stay until you manage to possess me, Draco.”

Draco didn't nod, because his body appeared to go utterly rigid when he was in possession of someone else's mind. They would have to do something about that if they were ever to use this power in battle,

Harry thought. Draco couldn't just abandon his body in the middle of the field, or someone would hex or kill him as he lay helpless.

Carefully, Draco reached out. Harry didn't know exactly what he was doing until his own hand rose into his field of vision. He certainly hadn't commanded it to do that. He breathed tightly, and knew that reaction, at least, was entirely his.

Draco moved his hand towards his face. Harry thought he was trying to make him scratch his nose.

Let him. It's all right. You trust him, don't you? And you know that he wouldn't hurt you. This is nothing like being bound in a web. This is more like being tangled in a net and trusting Draco to get you down.

Save that, this time, Draco was the one who had put him in the net, too. The fist-like pressure on his brain grew worse, as if Draco were gripping and squeezing some of his thoughts. Harry narrowed his focus to his breathing.

His hand scratched his nose on the second try; before that, it had almost poked him in the eye. Draco lowered it back to his side, and made Harry's throat swallow. Harry beat down the reflex of his Occlumency shields to grab Draco and throw him out of his head.

Tentatively, Harry's body took one step forward.

His right foot came down wrong, Draco obviously used to using a slightly longer leg, and he sprawled on the carpet. Harry lost control of his reflexes, and abruptly he was alone in his head save for the slight warm presence of Fawkes's bond, panting, while Draco's body shook, nearly sprawled itself, and then straightened with a gasp that indicated Draco was back in possession of his own mind.

He turned his head away, looking miserable. Harry took a moment to recover, then went over to him and hugged him tightly. Draco squeaked a bit as the air went out of his lungs, then relaxed and hugged Harry back.

"You don't—blame me for that?" he whispered.

“Of course not,” said Harry. “It’ll just take a little more time than we thought to work up to walking, that’s all.” He smiled as Draco huffed indignantly. “Next time, I should be sitting in a chair, and we’ll have you try other, smaller steps before you use so many of my muscles at once.”

“I could feel you fighting,” said Draco. “You didn’t like it. You don’t like being held and restrained.”

“Well, no,” Harry admitted, memories of being strapped down on the stone in the graveyard flashing through his head. “But that doesn’t mean that I can’t tolerate you in my head, Draco. It’ll get easier with time. I’ll relax and trust you even more than I do.”

Draco looked at him thoughtfully. Then, without speaking, he reached out and ran his hand down Harry’s cheek. Harry blinked at him in confusion. There didn’t seem to be any particular reason to do that. Granted, he couldn’t feel Draco’s emotions or even his presence in his head now, but he thought he could guess reasons for a shared touch pretty well.

Draco stepped behind him. Harry tensed, but waited. This was a silent test of trust, too, he thought. He didn’t believe Draco would ever stab him in the back, either figuratively or literally.

Fingers ran up Harry’s spine, then down and along his sides. Harry squirmed, but waited again. There surely had to be more to it than this. When Draco reached the point, then he would know what it was.

Draco leaned in and gently breathed on the back of his neck, then tightened his arms around Harry’s waist and moved his hair so that it brushed Harry’s. Harry shivered. The pressure was on the brink of turning into something else, something that he found harder to tolerate—

Something he couldn’t tolerate. He abruptly broke away from Draco and whirled around. Draco didn’t appear alarmed. He was only watching Harry, and nodding as if he had expected this.

“What?” Harry demanded.

“Something I’d suspected for a while, but not known for certain until I was in your head,” said Draco calmly. “It wasn’t really me making you uncomfortable, Harry, or even the fact of someone controlling your body. You were all right with that until I made you fall and your reflexes kicked in. It was the way you felt it. A touch.”

“Yes. So?” Harry folded his arms, feeling his panic subside as quickly as it had come. He didn’t really understand the reaction, either, but he didn’t think it important to talk about.

“You’re not comfortable with my touching you,” said Draco. “You put up with it. But when it turns pleasurable...” He shrugged, as if Harry should know exactly what he was talking about from those few clues.

Harry waited. Draco waited, and stared at him.

“I don’t understand.” Harry was aware that he was whining like a child, but he couldn’t help it. Draco wasn’t explaining this at all well. He turned away and stalked over to the far side of Draco’s bedroom, scowling at the door.

“You’re afraid of things that feel good,” said Draco, as if he were discussing the weather. “I suppose that’s only natural, Harry, after all the training your mother put you through. But it’s something damaging, something I don’t think can be allowed to stay the way it is.”

Harry stiffened and glanced over his shoulder. Draco only looked more serene than ever. How dare he? “It has to be something else. I would have rooted out that training when I rebuilt my mind.”

“You destroyed what you were aware of, Harry,” said Draco. “And even then, you still have to reinforce what you did with promises and conscious attempts to do better. I know. I read a little about Occlumency and Legilimency last year, when I researched my empathy, remember? You wanted me to learn how to shield. And I read that Legilimency works best with conscious thoughts and memories. You did a great thing, but I don’t think it’s complete yet.”

Harry was quiet. He could remember some aspects of his training that he supposed might have caused this, but he wasn't used to thinking of them that way. The year before Hogwarts, he'd learned to do without things like warmth after it rained, and he knew that he'd dulled the taste of chocolate in his own mouth until he couldn't understand the fuss others made over Chocolate Frogs. That was just to keep him from being distracted from his task of protecting Connor, though.

He had never thought that it might hinder him from feeling physical pleasure. Of course, he'd never planned on having a lover or spouse, either. There simply wouldn't be enough time, not with Connor as the focus and center of his life.

And now—

Now, his immediate impulse was to say that there wasn't time, either. He was a guardian, and a protector, and a teacher, and a vates, and a brother, and to some extent the Boy-Who-Lived, and Voldemort's enemy.

But he knew that wasn't true, and if it had been, he would never have kissed Draco, would have told him that he loved him but wasn't in love with him. That would have been lying on a level that Harry, at his least self-aware, didn't think he could have maintained, because it would cause too much hurt to Draco.

He slowly turned around again. Draco nodded before he could say anything.

"Yes," he said quietly. "This is part of the pushing I was talking about, Harry. I love competing with you and talking with you and trying to work out possession with you, Merlin knows, but I'd also like to go to bed with you at some point." He flushed, but didn't look away. Harry had the impression that he must have practiced these words, to give himself the courage to say them. "I'll let you think about it. But I'm not going to let you stop thinking about it, and I'm not going to give up just because you're uncomfortable feeling that good for right now."

Harry stamped on the panic that wanted to well up. He could do this. He would do this. What kinds of struggles had he been nerving himself to face when he rebuilt his mind, if not these?

And, on the other side of obligation to Draco and accepting this as a necessity of the bond they would have to have, there was the hope that he really could feel good someday, really do it for his own pleasure. Harry flushed as he thought about it. At least, though, he was thinking about it.

That that wasn't going to be enough...

Well, it just wasn't.

He met Draco's eyes and nodded.

Draco smiled at him. "I think I'm going to enjoy those lessons even more than the ones on possession," he said.

Harry flushed anew, but did his best to smile back.
"Tell me what you've been doing this week, Harry."

That was always the way Elfrida began one of their weekly meetings. This time, though, she'd added a new action, bringing Marian along and placing her gently in Harry's arms before he could object. Harry dandled her on his knee, blinking into her eyes. Marian already seemed changed from just a few weeks ago. She was more active now, her eyes going in several directions at once, but focusing longer on different things, too. She reached determinedly for his glasses, and Harry had to shift her about a bit to prevent her from reaching them; his hand was fully occupied in holding her head up. Marian stuck her lip out at him with a soft popping noise, as much to say that he was no fun.

Harry looked across the sitting room at Elfrida, who had taken one of the other chairs and was watching him in silent patience. She would be quite happy to go on watching him until Merlin woke, Harry thought.

“Studying, mostly,” said Harry. “And helping Draco study.” He hesitated for a moment, since he wasn’t going to tell Elfrida about the possession gift without Draco’s permission, but he could tell her about other things. “He wants to have some interests independent of me. So I find some books for him, and then he reads them. Sometimes he talks to me about them.” Harry cocked his head to the side, wondering if this was something he could ask Elfrida about. “How did you make sure that you didn’t drown in Adalrico and your children, Mrs. Bulstrode?”

Elfrida smiled. “I built myself around an impulse, Harry. The impulse to protect and to have my way in the house.” She blushed and lowered her eyes. “Of course I didn’t ever try to have my way in public. That wouldn’t be right, for a puellaris witch. But no one else in my family has such a strong desire to protect. Adalrico’s genius is for battle, and my girls are, of course, children, and still need protection themselves.” She gave an indulgent glance to Marian.

“And that never discontented you?” Harry asked, unable to imagine it.

“No. But I chose to become a puellaris witch. Are you encountering difficulties in trying to make Draco more independent?”

“Yes.” Harry shifted position, and then had to scramble to catch Marian when her legs went in a different direction. She only laughed, as if this were great good fun. “I don’t know how to make sure that I’m not doing things that will influence him unduly. And he wants to achieve ambitions of his own, but as long as he spends all this time with me, can he, ever?”

“I am not lost, though I know many people who would say so,” said Elfrida serenely. “What you must do, Harry, is attend to his choices, first and foremost. In the end, if he is not interested in certain things, then he will not choose to be interested in them. And if he chooses to focus most of his being on you, then that is the way it should be.”

Harry frowned. “It sounds like someone choosing to be a slave.”

“Do you think I am?”

Harry shook his head. "No. But you didn't meet your husband for years, did you, Mrs. Bulstrode? And then you could split your focus between him and your children, when you needed to." He looked down at Marian in his arms again. He wondered how anyone could avoid giving their full attention to a child this young.

Lily did when she raised you. She paid more attention to Dumbledore and the ideals she was sacrificing for.

Harry carefully skirted around the thoughts. They would only lead him to useless blaming of his mother. Sobbing and raging about the past was next to useless. Calm discussion would do the most good.

"All of that is true," said Elfrida, startling him and pulling his attention back to the present. "But if you truly fear that Draco is too bound to you, drowning in you, as you put it, then only give him the time and space to make his choices. That is all you can do, Harry. Sooner or later, you must stop distrusting someone else's motives. If Draco chooses to think a good deal of you even after time and space and prompting to do otherwise, then you must trust that that is what he wishes to do."

It sounded so similar to what he'd said about Draco needing to trust him and stop thinking he always acted out of motives of sacrifice that Harry flushed. He looked down at Marian, and nodded, and joggled her on his knee.

"Tell me what else you did." Elfrida's voice was gentle.

Harry obliged, but wondered, as he always did, what she was getting out of this. He didn't intend to ask. She had chosen to enter these sessions with him, and he had the feeling that her answer would only make him uncomfortable, in any case.

"How would you handle a battlefield like this?"

Harry leaned forward, intently studying the map Adalrico had put before him. It showed a wide, flat plain, with hills on the eastern edge of it, sloping down to meet the plain. On the west, the grass ended abruptly in a long fall to the seashore. Harry studied it carefully for several minutes, until he could be sure that there were no dots representing trees on the plain, and that the cliffs were too steep to let anyone else attack from that route, unless they were flying.

“As a known battlefield that someone else was trying to invest at the same time, or as ground I could choose?” he asked, glancing up from the map.

Adalrico stood slightly to the right of him, hands folded behind his back and eyes looking at Harry the way Harry had looked at the map. “As ground that you could choose,” he said.

Harry nodded, and let himself get absorbed in the map again. Adalrico had volunteered no more information about why he had chosen to take this teaching up than Elfrida had about their weekly sessions, and Harry supposed he could be contented with the motives he knew. Certainly, teaching him battle strategy could only be a good thing, at least from Adalrico’s point of view.

“I’d have a group of wizards and witches on brooms, ready to come over the cliff, where the enemy wouldn’t be looking,” he said. “Hopefully at noon, when they could dive out of the sun. The enemy would almost have to come out of the east, since the north and the south are too bereft of cover. I’d have prepared the plain with traps—spells designed to go off when someone steps on them, ordinary pit traps and tripwires that can’t be detected with magic, and some harmless attention-getting things like firecrackers, so they’d be off-balance and looking in other directions when we showed up. I’d probably have the army already lying in those areas clear of the traps, with Disillusionment Charms over them. Then they’d stand up and begin the battle the moment the traps started disordering the other side.”

“Why not just Apparate in?” Adalrico argued.

“I’d have spells around the plain already, to take care of Apparition,” said Harry. “Portkeys, too. It’d be difficult to do that if I didn’t know where the battle was going to be, but it’s one of the first steps I’d take the moment we chose the ground, so that our enemies couldn’t just show up beforehand and start harassing us. Force them to come to us at a certain time, too, since we also chose the ground. They'd have to gather their allies first."

"What if members of your own side started taking heavy casualties? Would you keep the anti-Apparition wards and the other defenses up?"

"For as long as I could," said Harry, and then an idea that hadn't shown up before occurred to him. "At least some of the wizards and witches waiting on brooms should be ready to take the wounded out of there. I'd want professional Quidditch players if I could possibly get them, since they'd be able to dodge spells better."

Adalrico was smiling slightly, but he still looked inclined to argue. "How heavy would the casualties have to be before you dropped the wards and gave the signal to retreat?"

Harry closed his eyes. "Half," he said. "Most of the time, at least. But it would also depend on how many losses the enemy was taking. If they were taking heavier, then I'd encourage my people to stay and fight them. If not, then we're not just losing people, but also morale." He hesitated.

"Say what you're going to say."

"And it would depend on if Voldemort was with them," Harry finished quietly. "He could break most of the spells on the battlefield, and kill people with a single strike." He braced himself and looked up at Adalrico. "Is it true that you helped him design the Black Plague spell, sir?"

Adalrico's face tightened for a long moment. Then he let out his breath. "Yes," he said. "That, and other things, to my everlasting shame." He paused, eyeing Harry. "You are asking if he would have a spell like that with him, to try and wipe out all our people?"

"Yes."

"It's possible," said Adalrico quietly. "My guess is that he won't use the Black Plague spell again. The Healers in St. Mungo's have come up with defenses against it, and last time it took us almost a year to grow the—spores it came from. All of those were destroyed or carried off by Death Eaters when our Lord fell.” He hesitated, then said, “I retrieved some of them, Harry. Would you—“

“No.”

“But you could—“

“No.”

Adalrico observed him narrowly for a moment, then shook his head. “You will have to use some spells you don’t want to, you know.”

“I know,” said Harry. “But not the spells that gave people nightmares during the First War. The Black Plague spell destroyed countless lives, countless families, countless Aurors. Most of the people I want to ally with me wouldn’t trust me if I used it.”

“Most of the Light families won’t trust you if you use Dark magic, either.” Adalrico folded his arms and studied him disapprovingly. “I think you have turned your back too strongly on sacrifice, Harry. You’ve decided to use Dark magic. I don’t see why this is so different.”

“It’s the specific spell,” said Harry calmly. “You said that it would take almost a year to grow the spores—“

“Not in the condition I’ve preserved them,” said Adalrico. “We could have a Plague inside a month.”

“It’s a spell that’s good only for killing,” said Harry. “Not for healing, not for growing, not for defending lives. I won’t use it for the same reason that I won’t use Cruciatus. They’re cruel and evil without any means of redemption. And what would you say about the person who used them?”

Adalrico’s eyes were shuttered. “I would say that there are many people like that in your ranks already, Potter.” Not a good sign that he’s retreated to my surname, Harry thought. “And I wonder how you will deal with having them as allies, if you truly think that some spells are evil and not just Dark.”

“Because they are people,” said Harry. “Not spells. And people can change their minds. Tell me, Adalrico. Is it a surprise to you that I won’t manufacture a Plague? That I would try to kill the Death Eaters only if I had to, bind them and bring them to a fair trial if I could, rather than just damning them with Voldemort?”

“Yes,” said Adalrico. “It is. I have seen more of your practical and pureblood side than your moral side, Potter. I thought you understood war better than this. You should use every advantage you have.”

“Only the ones that actually are advantages, not disadvantages that would prejudice some of my allies against me,” said Harry. “I won’t pay as high a price as I would have to for that single spell. I want to end the War, of course, but I don’t think you really understand me. Speed isn’t the most important factor. I don’t want to engender bitterness that would grow against me like the bitterness that’s grown against Voldemort and Dumbledore. They both did what’s efficient instead of what’s right. I won’t.”

Adalrico shook his head and turned away. “Some of your allies will not accept this,” he said in a warning voice.

Harry waited until he turned around again. Then he said, in a measured voice, holding Adalrico’s eyes all the while, “I am more than what my allies think of me, or even what the magical creatures think of me. I have my own goals, and my own things that I won’t do. For example, some of my allies are going to be Muggleborn.”

Perhaps it was just because Harry was watching for it, but he saw the expression of disgust flash across Adalrico’s face.

Harry nodded. “Think about the reasons you hate them. Really, truly think about them. You’ve come up with clever arguments why someone shouldn’t be prejudiced against you just because you were a Death Eater, or because you’re a pureblood, or a Dark wizard. Now turn that around and apply it to the Muggleborns.” Deciding he’d said all he could for right now, he turned and walked to the door of the small room Lucius had set aside for these weekly lessons.

“Some of us will need better answers than that,” said Adalrico to his back.

Harry turned around. “And some of you will have to learn to live with what you get,” he said gently, and then left the room.

“I have an aunt in France. I could go to her.”

Harry leaned back and looked hard at Vince for a moment. Vince didn’t meet his eyes. He was staring around the library instead, his expression set in misery, but his gaze seemingly unable to rest in one place.

“All right,” said Harry quietly. He ignored Draco’s shifting behind him. Harry and Vince were both sitting. Draco had insisted on standing. Harry wished he wouldn’t, since he thought that was increasing Vince’s nervousness, but he understood. Draco still didn’t think that Vince was an innocent victim, and judging from the binding charms that Lucius and Narcissa had put on him when they arrived back at the Manor—charms that wouldn’t allow him to do magic or wear any glamours as long as he was inside its walls—neither did they.

“It’s no trouble,” Vince whispered. “She can help me. She would have helped me, if she knew I was in trouble. But the letters I sent to her never made it. Only the one I sent to you did.” He stared hopelessly, appealingly, at Harry, and then looked away again. “And I thought my father didn’t find that one. Now I knew that he was trying to trap you, hoping you would arrange to meet me somewhere.”

Harry inclined his head. “I knew that.”

Vince stared at him, and Draco pressed down on his shoulder. “You did?” Vince asked in bewilderment.

“Of course,” said Harry. “Even if your letter got out without being noticed, I didn’t think mine would get in without your father seeing it. But I couldn’t think of any other way to get you to meet me. I didn’t know where you lived, and I don't think your father would have let you send a Floo name."

Vince shook his head, then rubbed his face with one hand. Harry didn't think he'd been sleeping well. Apart from the battle and the fact that he could have died, there was the distrust from the Malfoys and the idea that his father had been quite willing to sacrifice him, Harry thought. That had to hurt.

"No," Vince whispered. "He wouldn't."

"Are you going to be all right?" Harry asked.

"Yes," said Vince, with emphasis. "I'll go to Beauxbatons. It'll be lots better than Durmstrang." He looked at Harry again. "Thank you for saving my life."

It occurred to Harry, then, something he should have asked much earlier. "What about your mother, Vince? Does she need to be rescued, too?" Draco seemed as if he were now intent on grinding the bones in his shoulder together. Harry ignored him as best he could. This time, the rescue would be a lot less risky. Vince could give them details of the house and the best way to go in.

"No," Vince whispered. "She went away when You-Know-Who called my father back. I went into her bedroom when I came home from school, and it was just—abandoned. I don't know where she went. Maybe to my aunt. She's her sister."

Harry nodded, concealing his contempt for a woman who would run and abandon her own son like that. He hardly had space to talk about motherly behavior. "All right, then. When do you want to go to your aunt's house?"

"I'll owl her today."

Harry waited patiently for more, but Vince had lapsed into silence again, staring at things only he could see. Harry had to lean forward, feeling inexplicably like Madam Shiverwood as he did so, and ask quietly, "Vince? What happened? Can you speak about the things your father did to you?"

"It wasn't anything too bad," said Vince quickly, and rubbed at his eyes as if he were tired—or about to cry. "Just Imperio a few times, really, and talking about how I was going to become a Death Eater and have to kill D-Draco. He was trying to convert me before he tortured me." He shut his eyes. "I was just too afraid, and I didn't know how I would get away when I went to Durmstrang. The D-Death Eaters are strong there."

Harry nodded, remembering Karkaroff's claim that a nest of fledgling Death Eaters were in the school. "I can understand that." He hesitated again, then said, "And there's nothing I can do for you before you to go to your aunt's?"

"No," Vince whispered. "I know it doesn't sound like much." He said those words in a loud, abrupt voice, and stared at Draco as he said them. "Compared to what you've survived, I mean. But I was so terrified. I woke up and I went to bed in fear. My mother was gone, and my father was changed, and of course the house elves were no help. I had no one to depend on. I knew writing to you was risky, Harry, but it was the only thing I could think of."

"I understand," said Harry. And he did. People had different breaking points. Other people would have gone mad after the graveyard, and other people wouldn't have got quite so jumpy when Draco touched them. "I hope you'll be happy at your aunt's, Vince. I'll let you use Hedwig to write her."

Vince nodded to him, and then stood and walked unsteadily out of the library. Harry watched him until the door closed behind him, bringing the lecture that he expected from Draco.

"You can't trust him, Harry. He could still be lying, or maybe his father put him under Imperius and sent him here to do something."

"Your father's had the house elves watching him," said Harry. "Are you saying that they wouldn't have noticed evidence of things like that? Or that Vince is a good enough wizard to break your mother's and father's spells?" He leaned back and looked up at Draco, who pressed his lips together.

"No. Of course not. But—it just isn't right, that's all. Why did his father bring him along to Diagon Alley at all?"

"Because he wanted to torture him, I think," said Harry quietly. "And me, with the knowledge of my not being able to save him. Besides, remember that one of the Death Eaters acted like he wanted to capture me, and another like he wanted to hurt me. I think there are divisions in the Death Eaters, Draco."

As he had hoped, that got Draco off the subject of suspicions about Vince, suspicions that Harry saw no use in entertaining until metallic proof of them showed up. "Really?"

Harry nodded. "Yeah. Some of them would be happy with Voldemort, but others wouldn't. And then he dueled me, and got crippled. I think some of them will be less than impressed with that. Then there's Rosier turning. That might have put the thought into some others' minds. And their positions have changed, now. Some of them have different lives, where their Death Eater affiliation can't be suspected without its destroying them, and some of them won't be happy that Karkaroff has such a good position with Voldemort now. These Death Eaters aren't the same ones the Aurors faced in the First War."

Draco settled down to listen happily to Harry's tales of what he thought might happen, which Harry could speak in his sleep; they were largely what he'd thought of while lying awake at night. Meanwhile, his thoughts dwelled on Vince, and the thought of waking up and going to bed in fear, while a father he'd always loved did incomprehensible things to him, in the name of an even more incomprehensible loyalty.

I can only hope that he finds life in France happier.
Harry woke.

He opened his eyes slowly. He already knew that what woke him was nothing so ordinary as a knock at the door or a vision from Voldemort, or even Argutus slithering across him in an attempt to get warm. The room was full of the feeling of powerful magic, surging and breathing out like mist, like light.

Harry lay still, waiting. Whatever the magic was, he thought it would reveal itself sooner or later.

It did, coalescing near the foot of his bed, light after mote of light winging in and then becoming part of the body of something golden. Harry stared, wondering for a moment how the creature could have a cruel, curved beak and yet four legs. Then it turned its head and stared at him, and he realized it was a gryphon.

The gryphon came slowly forward on its lion-like legs, and stood staring down at him with fierce, eagle eyes, wings half-spread. Harry met its gaze. He didn't think it was a real gryphon—they were considerably bigger—but he longed to know what it was, and why it would have chosen to take the form of a gryphon.

The gryphon opened its beak, and breath deep and sweet as a roll in a meadow of summer flowers bathed Harry's face.

The breath did not carry words with it, nor visions like the ones that Fawkes's songs inspired, but Harry understood it nonetheless. This gryphon was a part of the Light magic that Voldemort had done a deep injury with his enslaving of the Midsummer sunset. It had finally risen in enough majesty and anger to pay him back, and it insisted that Harry come with it and see what that entailed.

Harry swallowed slightly. He understood that this was a command, not a request, and thoughts of delaying or asking for Draco to come along with them dissolved from his tongue. The Light magic was taking only him, though the gryphon eyed Argutus tolerantly when he climbed to Harry's left shoulder and coiled fiercely around his neck.

The raptor's beak descended, large enough to split open his skull in a single driving blow, and gently clamped around his waist. Harry was lifted irresistibly into the air, and then deposited on the gryphon's back, just where eagle feathers melted into leonine fur. He settled down, shivering a bit, but only in surprise. Unlike riding a broom, this was deeply warm.

The gryphon sprang into the air. Harry worried for a moment how it would get out of the Manor, and what the effects on the Manor might be of it spreading its wings inside such a small room as the one he had—

And then found he need not have worried. The magic that had him now was at least the equivalent of the wild Darkness of Walpurgis Night, but it was present in greater amounts and in different places. Light surrounded them, and tugged them, and Harry realized they were hurtling along beneath the stars, hundreds of feet off the ground, the dark mass of Britain passing beneath them. He saw how each individual starbeam slanted down to make the gryphon's wings, how it changed in color from gold to silver, and shivered again at the knowledge that only starlight was holding him up. He hoped no clouds came to cover it.

He need not have worried, though. The gryphon was faster than any cloud, and this was a clear summer night. It moved rapidly to the north, and then turned in a direction Harry still thought, though he was dazed by the speed, was west, from the moon. Still they rode from star to star, reformed and recreated from moment to moment. Harry felt the power surging around him all the while. Just because the Light magic chose to use its powers to create a steed and bear him along right now did not mean it wasn't mighty. Indeed, Harry thought that in some ways that the restraint holding it back, confining it to a human scale for the moment, was stronger than the wildness he had witnessed on Walpurgis Night.

Then they slanted down, falling rapidly past trees, and into rolling hills. Harry saw the shape of a house up ahead.

Voldemort and his Death Eaters were outside the house, standing around a blazing bonfire. Voldemort was laughing, and his own power rose around him, a deadly blot on the night.

The gryphon tucked its talons close to its breast. Harry realized they were about to hurtle downwards just in time to ready himself for it, the way that he would when diving on a broom.

The gryphon stooped in at a sharp angle, so sharp that few of the Death Eaters looked up in time to see it come. Of course, few people looked overhead anyway, Harry found. They ducked and cried out once they saw what it was, and Harry saw Voldemort alone calmly hold out his wand and cast a spell, the sound of which was lost in the screams and cries from around him.

The gryphon snapped its head forward, and the beak closed on a tendril of power just extending from Voldemort. Harry held on as the gryphon wheeled hard to the side, talons scraping through the top of the bonfire, drawing substance and strength from the light of the flames.

Magic unraveled from Voldemort along the path of that one trailing thread, and Harry watched in wonder mingled with fear as Voldemort began to lose more and more of the dark aura that had hovered around him. The gryphon rose higher, wings beating madly, scattering sparks from beneath it and starting small fires in the grass, which only built the gryphon's shape as the brightness built. Magic swirled around it, and Harry caught a sense of it, foul and perverted, just like all the power he had ever swallowed from Voldemort had tasted.

The gryphon swallowed it, and then spread its wings wider. The power unspooled from them, cleaned by the passage through its body. It didn't flow back to Voldemort, though, but soared up to the sky, in springing waterfalls and fountains that reminded Harry of the waterfalls and fountains of light when the unicorns were freed. The magic flew back towards the stars, the sun, the moon, the places it had come from first, before Voldemort did whatever he had done to steal it from the Light.

The gryphon had taken only as much magic from Voldemort as he stole, Harry thought, as they swung around again and then took off, soaring upward. It would not care to do more, because its sense of justice was strict. It would answer the crimes against itself. Others must claim their own share of justice. The Light could not judge for them.

Rather like me, with my parents and Dumbledore, Harry thought, driving his hand deeper into the fur and feathers as they flew. The Death Eaters were crying behind them. Voldemort was not dead, but he had been crippled. Harry found himself smiling. He could hope that this would produce even more divisions within their ranks, as some of them rallied around their Lord and others began to see him as weak—and Dark wizards and witches were not forgiving of weakness.

The gryphon soared from star to star, and it was not long before they reached Malfoy Manor again, and passed in that same ephemeral manner from the light of the stars to the soft moonlight falling through Harry's window. He landed softly in his own bed, lowered by the beak as he had been lifted, and stared into the gryphon's intense eyes.

"How did Voldemort get that magic in the first place?" he whispered. "What did he do?"

The gryphon breathed over his face again, and the answer came to Harry. Voldemort had pretended to be conducting the truce-dance with a being who stood high in the Light, rather like the house elves had once been, using illusion and glamour spells he'd produced even before his fall and had his Death Eaters add to. Pleased by the thought of one of their own dealing with him, and by the thought of a powerful Dark wizard turning to the Light, the ancient rituals had answered, giving him power linked to the sun and the solstices and equinoxes. The linkage to time they could not take back; Voldemort would keep on performing his corrupted truce-dance, sending gifts to the illusionary being at the proper times, and that meant he would gain the closeness to the seasons that any wizard in a similar ritual would. But they could take back the Light magic he had stolen and put to twisted uses, the magic that had kept Harry's own wandless power imprisoned in the graveyard.

Voldemort was still likely to time his attacks on the solstices and equinoxes, Harry understood, following the round of the sun. But the stolen magic meant his raids would no longer be the devastating force they could have been. He could no longer will something to happen at the moment of sunset as he had in the graveyard.

There was still Dark magic rising, still a storm coming, not least because the Dark magic did remember Voldemort's attempt to cage it at Walpurgis Night, and would not be so forgiving as the Light had been. Harry must watch out at Midsummer, of course, but Midwinter would be worst and wildest, the shortest day, the longest night, the night when the storm of unleashed Dark magic would come for Voldemort—and anyone else who might happen to be standing in its way.

And it would be worse than usual, because there would be no moon on that solstice, no light to counteract the Dark influence. Harry must watch out.

Harry blinked, and there was no gryphon standing in his room, only the moonlight. He let out a deep breath and rolled over, trying to think of what he should do.

For now, he decided at last, go back to sleep. He would wake and confirm the information, and decide what to do with it, in the morning.

"That was fascinating," Argutus said.

Harry jumped, sending his snake to the bed. He'd forgotten that Argutus was there. "You enjoyed it?" he asked.

"Yes. I like it. You are interesting, and you are around interesting things and forces. Interesting things happen to you." Argutus lifted his head back up and touched his tongue to the stump of Harry's left hand. "I like you. I choose you to be my friend."

Harry smiled, extended his arm for the Omen snake to climb up, and rolled over so that both his arms rested on his stomach. For right now, sharp, piercing exhaustion made him too tired for any grander gesture.

Chapter Sixteen: Guilty Until Proven Innocent

Harry grimaced in resignation as Lucius escorted him into the Ministry, one hand planted firmly on his back. Madam Shiverwood had sent an owl yesterday, “inviting” him to come see her today and have his second interrogation—what she would probably call a little talk. Narcissa, however, was gone this morning, talking to Henrietta Bulstrode, probably to answer some subtle questions about whether Harry was up to the ability of leading.

Harry wished he could have gone with her. Facing Henrietta Bulstrode was nothing next to facing Madam Shiverwood.

That left only Lucius to take him to the Ministry, of course, because everyone in the Manor had only given Harry a chilly stare when he suggested that he be allowed to go alone. Harry had bowed his head and not objected, but his heart boiled with objections. What good would one more hostage do in a battle? Voldemort or his Death Eaters could target the people who came with Harry in the sure and certain knowledge that he would die before he permitted them to be hurt. Harry didn’t see why he shouldn’t be allowed to go alone, and if Voldemort or the Death Eaters showed up to fight him again, then that was their problem, and his.

They went straight to the Department of Magical Family and Child Services, Lucius exchanging a few cool nods with those he passed. Harry watched him in amusement, to distract his mind from the upcoming questioning. Lucius had lost prestige in the Ministry when Fudge turned so hysterically to the Light, and the fact that the new Minister was Light-devoted also wouldn’t help him much. But even now there were people who might listen to money, Harry supposed, if not the words of a Dark wizard. And Scrimgeour wouldn’t mind that, even though he might mind Lucius, because Lucius was not a Lord and bribery was one of the means that ordinary wizards used to get things done. He would think it his duty to purge his Ministry of people who could be bribed.

“Here we are.” Lucius halted before Madam Shiverwood’s door. “I trust that you will emerge from your talk at eleven o’clock, Harry?”

“Yes, sir,” said Harry, and sighed, and put his hand on the door.

This time, though it swung open on the same room, it didn’t swing open on the same expression. Madam Shiverwood straightened behind her desk and eyed him sternly.

“Harry,” she said, with a brisk nod. “Please sit down.”

Harry took the chair in front of her desk, observing her thoughtfully. Her eyes tracked his every movement. She had her hands folded, and if anything, they only clamped more tightly on each other as she stared at him. She coughed, and while it was a gentle cough, Harry didn’t think that it marked any gentleness in store for him. Her eyes were too sharp for that.

“Please shut the door,” she said.

Harry gestured, and his wandless magic pushed the office door shut on Lucius’s distantly amused face.

“Yes, well.” Madam Shiverwood shuffled the papers across her desk for a moment, then leaned forward. “I have learned more about the abuse that you suffered, Harry. I have seen all the memories in the Pensieve now, as well as read the reports.” She paused a moment, her nostrils flaring, and then said, “Why didn’t you tell anyone?”

Harry didn’t know what had changed, but he found that he liked this new Madam Shiverwood better. She was certainly off balance, and she seemed to be less intelligent. Perhaps it was just seeing the memories that had disconcerted her. Still, he planned to take advantage of it. “Because my mother made sure the thought would never occur to me, madam,” he said. “She told me that it had to stay secret, so that no one would ever find out that Connor couldn’t do everything himself. And then she told me that no one outside the family would understand. They would say it was evil, but they would never understand how it looked to someone who was actually part of our family.” And that part is still true. “Besides, I never thought of it as abuse at the time.”

“Still, though, what she did to you—” Madam Shiverwood’s hands clenched on her papers. “When did you first start thinking of it as abuse?”

Harry tried to think. The word had occurred to him at the end of his second year, he thought, during those terrible moments in the Chamber of Secrets when the box had burst open and his silent self had eaten part of Voldemort’s magic. “A few months before I turned thirteen,” he said quietly.

“And it still didn’t occur to you to tell anyone?” Madam Shiverwood’s voice was shrill.

“No, for the reasons I laid out to you.” Harry shuffled around in his seat so that he was facing Madam Shiverwood more directly. His chair was still lower than her desk, which he didn’t like, but he was going to make sure that he held every advantage he could. “Why is this so hard to understand?” he added. “Last time, you seemed to know me better than I knew myself.”

“You were abused for so long,” said Madam Shiverwood softly, her hands now clenching on the edges of the desk. “I’m merely trying to understand how you could have reached the age of fourteen before it was reported.”

Harry felt a stirring of impatience. Well, if she’s acting irrational, then she can’t use my own supposed irrationality against me. “I didn’t want anyone to report it,” he said. “If I had my way, it would never have been reported. I can handle forgiving my parents and Dumbledore. There was no reason for anyone else to intrude into what was a private matter of forgiveness and reconciliation.”

“It’s not just about those!” Madam Shiverwood leaned forward across the desk as if she were going to lunge at him. “It’s about justice, and punishment, and seeing that those who hurt you get their due, Harry. Don’t you care that your parents would still have been walking about, free to do whatever they wanted, including hurting you again?”

“If they had hurt someone else, that would have been my fault, and I would have borne the guilt of it,” said Harry, sitting up in the chair and lifting his chin. "If they hurt me, then I could also bear that. I expected a few more wounds before I could heal them."

"The burden of healing them should never have been up to you," said Madam Shiverwood, softly again, and then looked away from him. Harry saw her wiping tears from her eyes with the corner of one sleeve, and stared. She really is getting too upset. She has to have the ability to stand back from this.

"Has something happened, Madam Shiverwood?" he asked, as gently as he could. "Do you need me to leave?"

Madam Shiverwood blinked at him. "I am crying over you," she said. "You don't seem inclined to shed tears over your own situation." Her eyes were fastened to his face as if nailed there again. "Have you done as I asked, indulging one pleasure or one whim of your own every day?"

Harry flushed, and knew that was answer enough.

"Harry." She whispered his name. "Why?"

"It's stupid," said Harry flatly. "It doesn't have anything to do with healing me. And I can't—" He stopped. What he was going to say next sounded stupid, but then, Madam Shiverwood was already upset. If he said it now, it would just be stupidity and not weakness in front of her, the way it would have been otherwise. "I can't think of that many things I want," he finished.

Madam Shiverwood's eyes grew more alert, though also, Harry thought, brighter with the sheen of tears. She drew a piece of parchment and a quill from her desk drawers and pushed them across the desk to him. Harry sat where he was and made no move to take them, staring at her all the while.

"Make a list of things you like," she said patiently, as though she had already given him the instructions once. "Then we can work out ways for you to have them."

Harry snorted, but leaned forward and floated the parchment and quill to him, bracing them on his leg as he used his hand to write. He saw Madam Shiverwood's eyes dart to the stump of his left wrist, and that same stricken look come over her face. Why? It's not like she had anything to do with the loss of it, and if she's pitying me for losing it, then I may just have to kick her. He lowered his head and began to scribble hard on the parchment.

Helping people.

Healing people.

Giving other people what they want.

After that, it grew harder. Harry hesitated, toying with the quill, and wondered what else he liked and wanted. Oh, of course.

Freeing magical creatures.

Breaking webs.

After that...well. Harry frowned at the parchment, and wondered if he really needed to write down anything else. There were some very minor pleasures that he indulged in sometimes, but a lot of them could be filed under one of those he'd already written. He heard Madam Shiverwood shifting and starting to draw in her breath, though, so he began writing hastily.

Brewing potions.

Flying.

He added that second one reluctantly. Except when he'd flown on his broom to stop the dragons last year, or tired to throw the Quidditch games for Connor, he couldn't really think of a time he'd used his flying to help people. That made it the exact kind of pleasure that Madam Shiverwood wanted him to list, of course, but all it felt to him was wasteful. Harry didn't think he'd be playing Quidditch this year. Why should he? He had other things to do, and catching the Snitch was a small rush of pleasure compared to the time that training took up.

He handed the parchment back to Madam Shiverwood, and she looked over it in silence. To Harry's irritation, she looked as if she were about to start crying again.

She glanced up at Harry, wiping her cheeks, and said, "We must try to get you a few more selfish pleasures, that's all."

"I don't see why." Harry shifted from side to side in the chair, and wished that he were alone. "If I'm supposed to be recovering from abuse, shouldn't I think about that instead?"

"Because of the unusual circumstances of your case, this does qualify as helping you to recover from abuse," said Madam Shiverwood gently. "I want you to be able to enjoy things for themselves, Harry, or for yourself. Your mother trained you to hate good things—"

"Not hate them," Harry interrupted, thinking this was an important distinction. Otherwise, they might try Lily for something she hadn't really done. "Just do without them. And sometimes panic if someone tries to introduce them to me too insistently." He thought uneasily about the tickling session that Draco had put him through last night. It had been all right until Draco's hands lingered on his skin too long, and then the fear had surged up inside him again.

But that's Draco's province to help me recover from. Not Madam Shiverwood's. Harry folded his arms and stared stubbornly at her.

"That is worse," said Madam Shiverwood quietly. "She has made a fifteen-year-old boy incapable of thinking about having fun." She considered his list again. "From now on, Harry, I want you to do at least one thing every day that pleases you and does not involve helping someone else."

"I can't brew potions or fly every day," Harry protested.

“For now, you can,” said Madam Shiverwood, and then sighed. “Although why I should expect you to obey me now, when you didn’t last time, and you no longer seem as eager about healing from abuse as you were...”

“I am eager,” Harry said. She really just doesn’t understand. “I do want to heal. But I can’t afford to do it in a way that takes up too much time. Lots of people are depending on me.” That ought not to surprise her, at least, if she’d seen the newspaper articles that the Prophet was publishing.

“Healing should be your most important priority right now, Harry,” said Madam Shiverwood. “Other people will understand if you have to wait to help them. And it’s the most important thing I can do, too.”

There is something strange happening here, though I don’t know what memory or magic could have caused it. Harry leaned back in his chair. “But you don’t just handle my case, madam. You handle others. I don’t think you’ll do a service to other abused children by concentrating so hard on me.”

“Right now, the other cases do not need so much of my personal involvement,” said Madam Shiverwood. “The children involved have good relationships with their guardians, or with the parent who did not abuse them, or with other relatives. You have no one who is connected to you in that way, Harry, except your guardian—”

“He’s not my guardian by choice,” said Harry shortly, feeling those uncontrollable emotions that boiled up in him whenever he thought about Snape. But Snape wasn’t here right now, and he would make himself look a fool if he went on about him in front of Madam Shiverwood. After some deep breathing, he managed to calm down and stare her in the eye. “I tried to ask the Minister to strip him of his guardianship. He wouldn’t do it.”

“You need caring adults about you, Harry,” said Madam Shiverwood. “That is becoming quite clear. If the Minister refused to take the office away from Severus Snape, I can only assume that he thinks the man is doing a good job.”

"A good job driving me mad," Harry muttered.

"Why?"

Harry peeked at her from the corner of one eye. This is just the kind of thing she wants to hear about, probably. Well, if I tell it to her, then maybe I can convince her that I do want to heal. The things she recommends that I do just aren't useful, that's all, and take up too much time.

"He probably knows me better than any other adult," Harry admitted grudgingly. "He's rescued me and saved me numerous times, and he doubtless thought he was doing it again." Harry ducked his head, so that the expression in his eyes wouldn't be as visible. "But because he knows me, he knew that I wouldn't forgive him for exposing my parents and Dumbledore to abuse charges. For other crimes, crimes that wouldn't have destroyed them, yes. I could understand why he would do that. But not this kind of crime. Not this kind of charge. It's—what he did is inhuman, and he shouldn't have done it, not when he knows I wouldn't like it."

"Then does that mean a guardian should only do what a child likes?" Madam Shiverwood asked, mild again.

Damn. I never saw that one coming. "No," Harry said. "But that's not the point. The point is that other children need guardians like that, because they can't take care of themselves or deal with the adults who hurt them on their own. Snape knows I could have. That just makes what he's done all the more unforgivable."

"You can forgive your parents, and yet you cannot forgive him?"

"They don't know me," said Harry impatiently. "They only know the boy they think I am, the child they believed they created. Snape knows me, and he went ahead and did it anyway."

"That suggests, to me," said Madam Shiverwood, folding her hands in front of her again, "that he was prepared to lose your love, and even your forgiveness, for the sake of seeing you safe. He took a great risk with this. You might have destroyed him, or done worse than yell at him, thanks to your magic and your raw emotions. You certainly have turned your back on him. But he will live to see you safe, even if it is not with him. That bespeaks a great love to me. If he does know you better than your parents, as you said he does, then he put the knowledge to good use.”

“If he really does love me, then he would have let me deal with this on my own,” said Harry. “He knew how badly I wanted to.” He was not going to admit that Madam Shiverwood might have a point. Of course, that didn’t prevent him from knowing what would come out of her mouth next.

“And being a guardian is not about indulging all a child’s whims,” she said gently. She leaned back in her chair and studied him. “I would also like you to think about Professor Snape, Harry,” she added. “It’s obvious that you haven’t, that you’ve pushed aside your emotions. Otherwise, I think you would be able to argue better for or against him than this.”

Harry swallowed, and felt as if there were knives in his throat. “And what should I think about, madam? Making him dangle by one hand over a pit of snakes until he apologizes to my parents and Dumbledore?”

“If that is what it takes to make you work through your emotions,” said Madam Shiverwood. “Understand, Harry. I am not saying that you must forgive him. I am only asking you to think about it. You have not done it, and it is obvious that that is slowing you down, and making you clumsy in your emotional responses to him. Healing from the wounds you believe that he inflicted on you is just another part of the healing process. Think about him, imagine conversations with him, dangle him above a snake pit if you must. I know that you are going back to school soon. How will you deal with him then, if you cannot deal with talking about him now?”

Harry had been wondering the same thing, in the back of his mind. But there were so many other things to think about—especially when he was at Malfoy Manor, and Draco was close by—that he tended to let it glide out of his mind, like flowing water. He sighed, and admitted she might have a point.

“All right, madam. I’ll try.”

Madam Shiverwood nodded, satisfied. “And what about indulging one pleasure or whim each day?”

Harry frowned at her. “I feel like I’m a little kid, and you’re telling me to go play outside.”

“I am not doing that, Harry, unless you wish to be outside,” said Madam Shiverwood. “I am encouraging you to go and have fun.”

“That sounds even more childish,” Harry complained.

Madam Shiverwood shook her head slightly. “And if you have looked into the Prophet, you will have noticed that you are a child to many people,” she said. “It is time that you learned to use that, Harry, instead of being difficult about it. If you do want to be more than an abused child, then you should be seizing this chance to grow past it, to learn to have fun and accept pleasure so that you can be a true adult. Unless you think that adults give up all chance of fun and pleasure when they turn eighteen?” she added, and Harry didn’t want to oblige her with a smile, but couldn’t quite resist.

“I suppose,” he said. He didn’t say it, but there was another reason that indulging himself could get to be a bad habit. What if he indulged himself the night before a battle, or when Voldemort made a sudden and violent move against the wizarding world? Then he might not have the concentration and emotional control that he needed in order to be ready for circumstances like that.

“I know it,” said Madam Shiverwood. “I would like you to write down your promise this time, Harry, and sign your name to it. Or your promises, rather, since I would also like you think about your guardian.” She pushed the parchment and quill back towards him.

Reluctantly, but cheered at the thought of actually pushing these stupid, crippling things behind him, Harry took up the parchment and wrote.

Lucius did not idle outside the door once he had given Harry over into Madam Shiverwood's tender care. He strolled down the hall, instead, reached the lifts, and casually took them to the Department for the Regulation and Control of Magical Creatures.

A few people stared at him as he walked in, but most of them didn't look up from their paperwork, or prudently pretended not to catch his eye. Lucius had a few friends here. Up until a year and a half ago, before Fudge's little attack of paranoia, he had even been a common sight on some days. Lucius didn't let either the stares or the carefully averted eyes bother him, of course, as he walked casually to the door of his closest friend in the Ministry and knocked.

Time to renew an old acquaintance.

The door opened almost at once. It was warded to do that if the person who knocked was one that Aurelius Flint trusted. Lucius didn't know what happened if someone knocked whom he distrusted. Perhaps it blew up in their faces. Aurelius was disturbingly good with hexes.

"Lucius," said Aurelius, looking up and regarding him with flat, blank black eyes. Lucius had to admire the man's control. It was like being looked at by a beetle. Not nearly as charming as Lucius's own coldness, of course, which he could adjust by several degrees of warmth as the situation required, but Aurelius didn't work in a position where he needed the charm. He was, to most appearances, merely a minor paper-pusher in his Department. To those who looked with knowing eyes, he was a source of information, a node in the web where many strands met. "What can I do for you?"

"Many things," said Lucius, and heard the door shut behind him. He sat down in front of Aurelius's desk, easy, not afraid, though he knew he was in a room the man sitting opposite him had covered with death traps. "For starters, do you know how closely allied I am to the Potters?"

Only a flicker in the deep eyes showed that that wasn't the question Aurelius was expecting. He sat back, though, and slung a leg over his desk, as casual as Lucius was. "Your son's pretty close friends with their older boy, I hear."

Lucius smiled. "Not just friends, Aurelius. They'll be joined one day."

"Who told you that? Boys never know their own feelings at that age." Aurelius was grimacing, no doubt remembering the disastrous marriage he'd nearly entered when he was sixteen. Lucius still thought it was the funniest story he'd ever heard.

"Narcissa."

After a moment's consideration, Aurelius inclined his head in acceptance. "And you want to see your in-laws, or the people who will be your in-laws, and congratulate them on having produced a son who can expect to be allied with a Malfoy?" he asked.

Lucius leaned closer. "Well, not congratulate them. That would be rather too strong a word. But I do think that we should be in communication. After all, I've never had a chance to talk to Lily or James Potter since we fought on opposite sides in that large misunderstanding of the War, when I was under Imperius." Aurelius's smile at that would have done a shark credit, Lucius thought. "Who can help me with that?"

Aurelius closed his eyes, no doubt rifling through the mental files in his head. It was remarkable, Lucius thought, how he kept the information organized like that. He never wrote anything about his contacts down, because he didn't need to. That, of course, contributed greatly to his not getting caught. He would know who could be bribed, who was in desperate need of a favor, who was on the brink of getting sacked for drinking, but he wouldn't have so much as a scrap of a note bearing that person's name anywhere in his office.

"Richard Nott," said Aurelius, opening his eyes. "He has a contact who's rotating as a guard on the Potter cells."

"And what would Nott want?" Lucius asked, cocking an eyebrow. He remembered Richard. A disappointment to his family when he became an Auror, especially when his first adventure in the field resulted in him acquiring a wound that couldn't be completely healed, and put him in the Ministry doing light work for the rest of his career. Of course, Richard wouldn't admit that he was wrong and come home, being pig-headed. All the Notts were like that.

"Why, just a bit of dragonweed," said Aurelius. "A bit more than he's supposed to have, thanks to his wound nagging him. Not much, you understand. Merlin knows that I don't want the poor fellow dead."

Lucius nodded, and let a faint smile grace his lips. He would provide Nott with his dragonweed, and Nott would get his contact on the cells—the nature of whose debt to Nott Lucius didn't know, and didn't need to—to make sure that Lucius could chat with James and Lily Potter to his heart's content. "No one would want that," he said, and stood, with a small inclination of his head to Aurelius. "Helpful as always, my old friend."

Aurelius simply nodded. He and Lucius were perhaps not friends, but Lucius genuinely had saved his life, and asked only to be included in his information web as payment for the debt that had incurred. Lucius kept doing small favors for him on occasion, of course, including insuring that his son Marcus had a little extra help on his NEWTS the second year he took them, so that he could actually pass and leave Hogwarts. No need to lose such a valuable friend.

Lucius left with a spring in his step to pick up Harry. Depending on when Nott's contact could get him in to see the Potters, he might have to be prepared on a moment's notice. That was no trouble. He had the blank wand, and the owner of the Magical Menagerie had owled him yesterday. A shipment of insects had arrived, bearing his name. Their food was included with them, so they would stay alive until he had need of them. He only needed to go to Diagon Alley and pick them up.

Everything is going well. Of course, why should it not? The world is ordered around the strong, and I am that.

Harry stood uneasily holding his Firebolt and studying the sky. It was clear, late afternoon, in the first throes of sunset. The only good thing about this therapy that Madam Shiverwood had ordered him to do was that it encouraged Narcissa to extend his bedtime past dusk. Harry had come to think that punishment more and more unfair as the summer advanced and the days grew shorter and shorter.

But now...

Now he had to go flying, and he wasn't sure what would happen when he did. Even granting that all the Malfoys were staying carefully in their Manor, and not looking out the windows to watch him, either, he was afraid of what they might see.

Harry was afraid that he would act like a child when he was flying, and that would undo at least some of the respect he'd built up in Lucius and Narcissa's eyes.

Or maybe he was just afraid to do something that felt pleasant, because that would undo other barriers he'd raised, and urge him on a quest for more, more, more.

Harry took a deep breath, slung a leg over his Firebolt, and took off.

He rose faster than he had intended to, and felt fear brush him for a moment. And then it was gone, and he was remembering the speed and strength of the Firebolt from the last time he'd ridden it, and the exaltation that had flooded him when he flew as a child lifted him up and cradled him.

He was laughing. It didn't matter. He circled under the summer sunset, and the gold and the green and the blue seemed to sink into him and pierce him like blades, and that didn't matter, either.

He flew in another circle, then dropped to the ground. The plunge was straight downward. Harry watched the grass grow clearer and more distinct, felt the wind whip tears from his eyes, and laughed and laughed and laughed.

At least he knew none of the Malfoys were watching now, or one of them would have been outside and screaming at him.

At the last moment, Harry flipped backwards, pulling the broom over and around with him, so that he tumbled bristles over head over bristles, and felt the grass kiss his hair like Draco sometimes liked to do, when he thought Harry wouldn't notice. Harry turned around, rolling, so close that he scraped his elbow on the ground, and then blasted back into the sky.

He felt his blood up, hammering through his veins and singing in his ears. For once, for once, that wasn't because of battle. He could almost see Madam Shiverwood's point in that moment, that perhaps sometimes he could be a child, and it wouldn't hurt, that it might even help him become a better adult...

He was back to racing across the sky, and the moment was lost, and he was glad. He didn't really want to think right now. He wanted to lift, then dive in a jagged, zigzagging pattern that made an owl setting out from the house dodge him and squawk. Harry chased her for a few moments, then rolled over and dropped towards the ground again, flying upside-down this time.

He gathered his strength and speed before he reached the grass, imagined the ground as a Bludger, and darted sideways so sharply that he felt his neck wrench. But that was all right, that was all right, it was all right as long as he could lift straight up and balance in the air, cocking his head to ease the pain and whirling twice. He didn't need to think about anything up here, and he wasn't afraid of falling or being hurt, because he knew how to fly. He could indulge his love for risk-taking here, and no one would yell at him.

Individual movements blended into a great flood of fiery sweetness then, and Harry didn't think like an adult until he landed back on the ground, as the sky was raining blue from above and the sun was setting. He laughed and bent over, wheezing, then rubbed the side of his neck, and realized he'd changed his mind.

As long as the Quidditch team still wanted him, he thought he'd be playing this year after all.

Chapter Seventeen: Like Rational Adults

"I don't know if I'll ever see you again."

Harry blinked and looked up from the letter McGonagall had sent him, then stood and extended his hand to Vince as he walked across the library. "I know," he said quietly. "I don't think that you'd be safe from your father as long as you stayed in England."

Vince nodded. "It—it wouldn't have been so bad if I'd just done something to embarrass him in private," he said. "But he can't stand being humiliated in public." He closed his eyes for a moment, then opened them. "Mr. Malfoy is going to open the Floo so that my aunt can come through at one. But you're going to be gone then, aren't you?"

"Yeah." Harry glanced at the letter he'd half-crumpled. "Headmistress McGonagall wants me to come to Hogwarts a little early and meet some people she's hiring for this school year. I already know them, but she thought I should have the time to get used to them." It was bizarre, what she'd written. Acies Lestrangle was teaching Defense Against the Dark Arts? Remus returning to be Head of Gryffindor was minor, next to that.

There was something else McGonagall had written, too, but Harry was only going to think about that when he had to.

"I almost wish I could stay," mused Vince, then straightened and shook his head. "Thank you for saving my life," he said formally. "I owe you a Life Debt, and if you ever call on me to fulfill it, then I will."

Harry nodded. He knew he wouldn't be claiming that debt, though. Vince was lucky to still be alive, and Harry wouldn't jeopardize his safety again. Let him enjoy as much peace as might be left in France while he could. Harry hoped to stop the war before it spread that far.

Vince looked as if he wanted to say something more, but in the end he shook his head and left. Harry picked up the letter and scanned the last lines one more time. They hadn't changed. He put it in his robe pocket.

“Harry?”

Draco’s head had popped up from one of the chairs in front of the hearth. Harry turned that way with a small grin. Draco had an anxious frown on his face, as if something had changed between them because he wouldn’t be accompanying Harry to Hogwarts that day; Narcissa would escort him instead.

“You understand?” Draco said now, just like he had earlier. “I’m sorry, but I really need a certain angle of sunlight for this spell to work the way I want it to, and I want to do it today—”

“Of course I understand,” said Harry, and he did. Draco had already modified a spell that he wanted to try, something to do with Ancient Runes and confining his mind in his own body. He’d said he could even adapt it to protect his body during battle, if and when he did manage to train himself to use the possession gift as a weapon. Harry was happy to see him taking the time and the care to develop an interest of his own. Elfrida might be right about Draco’s time apart from Harry being his own choice, but since he had made that choice before they knew anything about McGonagall’s letter, Harry wasn’t about to deprive him of it.

He hesitated for a moment then, but he had already decided that part of overcoming his fear was making the overcoming a casual part of everyday life. He walked over to Draco and kissed his forehead. When he drew back, Draco was staring at him with wide eyes.

Harry didn’t give him the chance to question. Narcissa was waiting by one of the other Floo connections to escort him to Hogwarts. He extended his left arm for Argutus, who had been curled on the back of Draco’s chair, enjoying the glimpses of the colored runes in the book he read. He coiled drowsily on Harry’s shoulder now. Harry hid a grin. The Omen snake would wake up fast enough when they bumped and jostled from fireplace to fireplace.

“Harry—”

Harry nodded at Draco. "Can't talk right now. Got to go." He hurried out of the library before he could let himself think about what he'd just done in either embarrassment or approval. Fawkes appeared above him, briefly, to flit a wing, and then soared away. The phoenix saw no reason to take a Floo journey with either Harry or that snake, Harry suspected.

"Mr. Potter. Thank you for coming."

Harry straightened from the bumpy fireplace crossing into the connecting room to the Headmistress's office, brushed soot off his robe, and listened in amusement to Argutus's outraged complaints while he nodded to McGonagall. "Thank you for inviting me, Pro—Headmistress." He hesitated a moment. "Are the people you wanted me to meet with here yet?"

McGonagall, who had been engaged in a staring contest with Narcissa, blinked and returned his gaze a moment later. Harry had taken in the room in the meantime. It was small and dusty, filled with odd objects that had little dust themselves. Harry recognized them as the silver instruments from Dumbledore's shelves, apparently heaped here because McGonagall had nowhere else to put them. There were no exits except the door she stood in front of and the hearth they'd come in by. Harry tensed minutely, but a voice from the Headmistress's office gave him something else to think about.

"I'm here at least, Harry, and looking forward to seeing you."

Harry edged forward and peered shyly—he couldn't help it—around McGonagall into the office.

Remus Lupin sat in a chair on the other side of the enormous desk that Dumbledore had so often used to make himself look stern, studying what looked like a Pensieve on the desktop. He glanced up swiftly at the small movement, though, and Harry froze at the sight of his face.

He looked so much more relaxed Harry could hardly believe it was him. His hair was covered in gray streaks, as it had been from the time he and Connor were children, but they looked natural now, as though Remus had finally accepted that they could make him look dignified. His eyes were a deep, pure amber that Harry couldn't entirely attribute to the full moon, since that was still almost two weeks away. And when he smiled and moved forward, holding his hand out, he had a confident stride that Harry had never associated with him. Remus had cringed most of the time, as if he were apologizing for existing. This man didn't cringe.

Harry took his hand and stared up at him (Remus, like most of the people Harry came into contact with, was still taller than he was, something that caused Harry no small edge of resentment).

"What—" Harry shook his head, embarrassed that awe was cutting off his voice, but sure that Remus would guess the question without needing to hear it.

Remus laughed, and the sound was one that Harry had never heard, either, though its closest resemblance was to Hawthorn's, since hers also ended in a little half-bay. "The Sanctuary, Harry. The Seers are very good with not only confronting someone with the truth of his soul, but making him face up to that truth, once he's accepted it. And, in this case, I decided that I wanted to reflect more of my strengths, instead of hiding them." He cocked his head and sniffed openly at Harry. "You smell of pain. It would have done you good to go there."

"I don't want to match what my soul looks like."

Remus shrugged, and then went back over to his chair to drop into it. Harry followed and sat across from him, barely aware of Narcissa coming to stand behind his seat and McGonagall taking her place behind her desk. "Sometimes we still have the choice, that's true," he said. "And I can understand your not wanting to be so separated from the world. But it was fine for me."

"What was it like?" Harry asked—unwilling, but thinking he had to.

Remus smiled. "Deeply peaceful," he answered. "I don't think I can paint a complete picture for someone who hasn't been there. And I think you're imagining fights of some kind, Harry, where the Seers try to confront someone with the mirror of his soul and don't let him turn away. It's nothing of the kind. You can rest and think of nothing until you're ready to think of healing."

He lifted his head, and his smile grew brighter, sharper. "They helped me remember that it's not my fault I'm a werewolf. I was bitten as a child, and I never asked to be. But I do know about the heightened anger that comes with having had the curse since I was so young. I do need to control that better. So I will." Remus didn't sound as if he were apologizing, simply stating a fact. "And they have learned how to brew the Wolfsbane Potion, and they have immense forests within the Sanctuary. I ran across them as a werewolf, and learned to glory in my strength and my speed." He laughed abruptly. "And I picked up a strange and serene manner of speaking that won't at all do for the rest of the wizarding world."

"It will do wonderfully for the Gryffindors, Remus," McGonagall murmured. "Never doubt that."

Remus nodded to her, and fixed his eyes on Harry, their amber going deep and sad once more. "I am going to ask your apologies for the weakness I once exhibited," he said. "Now, I can see it for what it was—too much love of my friends, impinging on what I should have done, and what I knew to be right. And though I loved Albus, though he was my mentor and the only person who knew what I was beforehand and welcomed me to Hogwarts anyway, I should have seen the depth of his corruption when he asked us to leave you defenseless in front of Voldemort." He had only the smallest twitch at the name, Harry was impressed to see. "So. Will you forgive me?"

"Yes," said Harry. "I didn't blame you, Remus, not nearly as much as I blamed—well, some of the others." No need to go about casting blame, when that would only hinder the healing. "And you've become the kind of person I think won't make those mistakes again." This time, he stood up and put out his arms.

Remus came and embraced him without further prompting. Harry was amused to hear the rasp of wood against cloth—Narcissa's wand coming forth from her pocket. Does she really think that I'm in danger with Remus? I would be in as much danger with Hawthorn.

“Where’s Peter?” he asked, when he could step away, Remus’s hands lingering on his back for an uncomfortably long time, and Remus had resumed his own seat with a quick, lithe movement.

Remus sighed. “He’s gone to the Aurors already. He thought about coming to Hogwarts and saying hello to you, but he was almost sure someone would see and report him, and then he would look like even more of a fugitive than he already does.” He paused, gazing deeply into Harry’s eyes. “You know the whole mess with Sirius will have to come out for him to have a chance at being free again?”

Harry nodded. “I understand.” He’d viewed a few more of the memories in Sirius’s Pensieve, this time ones from his childhood that showed how profoundly he’d been hurt and driven to try and rely on himself before anyone else, and he knew that Sirius—as he had been, really, before Voldemort possessed him—wouldn’t want Peter to keep silent and try to spare him pain. Sirius had gone where he couldn’t feel it.

“Good.” Remus smiled again. “I haven’t seen Connor yet, but Minerva is planning to make sure we can meet the first night before term and he can get an idea of me. Right now, it’s unsafe for him to leave his hiding place. Death Eaters have been prowling around it.”

Harry nodded with a faint frown. Sometimes, he wondered whether it wouldn’t be better if everyone knew the truth about his having been the one who deflected Voldemort’s curse. That would at least concentrate the Death Eaters’ attention on Harry himself, and make them leave his brother alone.

He put the idea in the back of his mind to think about later. Perhaps he could get Evan Rosier to spread the word among his former comrades for him. In the meantime, the door was opening.

“Thank you for coming in like a normal person, Acies.” McGonagall’s voice was perfectly correct, but she spoke with the same coolness that her stare to Narcissa conveyed. “Harry, this is Acies Lestrangle, who will be teaching Defense Against the Dark Arts as Acies Merryweather.” There was a question in her words that Harry thought he put to rest by standing, turning around, and bowing.

"It's good to see you again, Madam Lestrangle," he said, while Acies's cloaked figure leaned against the wall.

"And you, Mr. Potter." Acies tugged the hood of her cloak down.

Harry couldn't help tensing—the last time she had done that, in the meeting during Halloween last year when he had seen her for the first time, he had met a pair of eyes that seared him. Now, though, he could see that Acies Lestrangle was a pale-faced woman with long dark hair that had just the slightest hint of a metallic sheen to it when she turned her head, like scales. Her eyes were large and gray.

Briefly, they caught his. Harry jumped as he saw the same wildness he'd glimpsed last year.

"I can control my gaze," said Acies. "But it is difficult. I shall look no student in the eye for long when I teach my classes. Have you been practicing Defense, Mr. Potter? How good at it are you?"

Harry blinked, but answered, "About as good as could be expected, I suppose. None of the teachers except Remus ever really put us through our paces." He smiled at Remus, who gave him a comfortable grin back.

"Don't listen to Harry, Madam Merryweather," he said. He didn't even stumble on the name. Harry supposed he'd had a few days to get used to it, though. "He was excellent at all the spells I showed the class, as he is at all defensive magic. And, of course, he has more experience at identifying Light and Dark, and balancing between them, than any ten wizards."

"Is that so?" Acies's voice was low and thoughtful. "Then perhaps I will have to drill you a bit harder than the others, Mr. Potter."

"I would welcome the chance to learn more," said Harry, "now that the war is begun."

"Everyone knows the war has begun." Acies waved one hand as if to show that she thought little of such general knowledge, even as she tugged the hood of her cloak back over her face. "It is in the words of the Muggles, though they do not recognize the signs, and the songs of the sirens that throb through the water, and the bang of the mountain trolls' clubs upon the ground. And, of course, the dragons are singing with it."

"Have you been among the dragons, then?" Harry wondered if he dared ask for news of them. He had known no dragons but the three he freed last year, but he hoped they were well. No telling if they were the dragons that Acies had seen, though.

"Oh, yes," said Acies. "Wandering, and soaking in their music, and breathing it back to them. War and vates, war and vates, those are the substances of their talk. They see far and clearly, even as I do. They know that storms are coming." Harry, remembering what the Light had shown him about the storm coming on Midwinter night, started. "And they plan to be here to offer their help when the storms come. Their bodies are made of music, and they will need much music. But that will be no trouble for the wild Dark, and when Midsummer comes, the air itself will cry out the symphony."

Not at all sure what that meant, but comforted, Harry nodded. "It's going to be very interesting having you for a teacher, Madam Le—Merryweather," he said, deciding that he'd better get used to the name now.

"Is it?" Acies moved her head restlessly. "I would not know. I am not teaching myself, of course."

Harry could hear Narcissa making a low, puzzled noise behind him. He didn't know why. She was one of those who had first introduced him to Acies, after all, and she must have known her longer. He smiled, unable to help himself, and wondered what his yearmates would think of Acies. Perhaps she would be a perfectly ordinary teacher, but somehow, when she was talking about dragons and music with this intensity, he doubted it.

Then someone knocked on the door of the office.

And Harry remembered the last lines of McGonagall's letter, the other person she had said she wanted him here early to meet. He found his magic surging about him like grass whipped by the wind, and Acies cocked her head. Remus whispered, "Harry?" in a low, concerned voice, and Narcissa's hand gripped his shoulder.

"Since Harry is returning to Hogwarts," said McGonagall calmly, "I asked him to come here early to meet those professors he might be uncomfortable with. And that includes the one he is most uncomfortable with. I will have my teachers and Mr. Potter, since he is not a child, behave like rational adults." She stood and looked at Harry. "Are you ready, Mr. Potter?"

Her formal tone, and the name she called him, gave him time to steady himself. Harry glanced at Remus, Narcissa, and Acies. "I am, Headmistress. May I ask that I talk to Professor Snape alone?"

"No," said McGonagall, making Harry blink. "You will be around many other people at Hogwarts, Mr. Potter, including the students in your Potions class. I think it best for you to relearn how to interact in front of an audience immediately. I do not ask for warmth from you," she added, her voice dropping a notch. "Only rationality."

Harry thought he could do that. He'd lain awake thinking about Snape last night, and even talking to Argutus, and that had worn a little of his rage out. It helped that Argutus was crawling around on his shoulder to face the door now, flicking out his tongue and saying, "Am I going to see the one you were angry about? I wonder what he is like. I wonder what would happen if I squeezed around his wrist. But I shall only try to do that if he threatens you. It is useless to threaten without any reason." He sounded as if he were trying that one out as a philosophical pronouncement.

"All right," Harry said quietly.

"Come in, Severus," McGonagall called, and then the door opened, and Snape was there. Though he couldn't have known how they would be arranged in the room, his eyes went to Harry immediately and stayed there.

Harry stared back. Snape looked as he looked most of the time: pressed to the edges of his patience in having to continually deal with idiots. He bore a faint redness to his hands that Harry thought meant he must have scrubbed off the latest of a batch of Potions ingredients before he came to the Headmistress's office. Argutus flicked his tongue out and remarked, "He smells like dead things."

"He would not forgive you for saying so," Harry said, with his head turned towards the Omen snake, and then faced Snape again. He tried to keep his expression blank, his gaze and voice both as steady as always. "Hello, sir," he said.

"Hello, Harry." That was unfair, Harry thought, because Snape was not obeying the law McGonagall had laid down and acting entirely like a rational adult. He spoke with less than the warmth he would have displayed most of the time, but his voice was not cold, either. And he looked as if he were studying Harry, giving silent approval to the way he looked—as if he were worried about his health or his mental state or both, and were concerned about him when they'd been apart for the summer.

Harry ground his teeth. What right did Snape have to look at him that way? Even if Madam Shiverwood had a point and he had done the wrong thing for the moral motives, that didn't mean that he had to stare that way, as if he were a parent and Harry were his child. He was a guardian. That was all.

Except that if he did make a deliberate sacrifice of my love and respect, I doubt he thinks about it that distantly.

That just made him want to scream, so Harry shoved the thought away and locked it in a dark closet. He wondered what else he should say. The other people in the room all looked as if they thought the conversational burden should be on him, and Snape was apparently content to remain silent, his eyes devouring all sorts of little things about Harry that Harry had hoped he wouldn't be able to see.

Harry picked what he thought was a safe topic, after a moment of thinking. "How are you getting on with your potions brewing, sir?" he asked, and only heard his words after they were out and he saw McGonagall's quick disapproving look—sharp enough to cut glass. He winced and made some effort to relax his jaw.

“Well enough,” said Snape equitably. “I shall soon have the hospital wing restocked. One benefit of being at Hogwarts most of the summer, unable to leave because Death Eaters are hunting for me.”

And then he dropped the conversation again, and Harry had to choose something else. The silence rolled on like boulders. Finally, he said, “Are you eager for the term to begin, sir?”

“Of course,” said Snape, and now his eyes were sharper, and he was speaking as he might have if they were alone, which was also unfair, because he had taken care not to act like such a—such a parent when he and Harry were in front of an audience in the past. “Along with the idiots that I must teach, there are the few students who have both the interest in Potions and the skills to make teaching them worthwhile. And my ward returns to Hogwarts with them. I have missed him.”

Harry closed his eyes. He would have to calm down and not snap. McGonagall would not understand what was wrong if he snapped now. No one would, except perhaps Argutus and Remus, who could smell his emotions. They probably all thought this was kind, as close to caring as Snape ever got.

And it was. But it was not kind to do as he was now, speaking in a way that Harry wasn't ready to respond to, and couldn't answer honestly without sounding like a child.

A few more impatient, huffed breaths, and Harry was ready to step in a new direction. “How many students do you anticipate having in your NEWT class this year, Professor?” he asked. A safe topic. A neutral topic. A topic that Snape could not possibly twist back around to him, because Harry had not even taken his OWLS yet.

“Seven or eight,” said Snape. “Perhaps even a smaller number next year. But I am assured of at least three next year: Mr. Malfoy, Miss Granger, and yourself.”

Harry swallowed. Then he said, "Professor McGonagall, I trust that I've demonstrated my self-control to your satisfaction?" He turned his back on Snape. "I'd like to go home now, please, Narcissa." She'd told him to call her that, and he didn't often do it even now, but he just couldn't take any more of this. At least during Potions class, he and Snape wouldn't have time for this kind of private, killing conversation.

"Of course, Harry," said Narcissa, and escorted him back in the direction of the side room and the fireplace.

Harry tilted his head in response to Remus's soft farewell, but didn't show any reaction when Snape spoke his name—just once, with a deep mingling of several emotions in that single word. Madam Shiverwood might be right, but Snape could not simply demand forgiveness and have that forgiveness come to him. How could he? And why would he want to flay Harry alive with his words, if he were not taking pleasure in this?

I think she's overestimated Severus Snape. But Merlin knows I did that.

Snape stood still and watched Harry go with regret pressing against his heart like a knife-blade.

He knew, now, that he should have analyzed the ice of Harry's responses and met it with ice of his own. Then perhaps they could have eased past those awkward initial moments and forged the cool but working relationship the Headmistress wanted them to have. He could show how much he'd missed Harry, which was a perfectly sincere emotion, later in the school year.

Instead, he'd been tempted by the ice into thinking that Harry didn't realize his guardian missed him, and he'd lowered his defenses.

And now he hurt, and Harry probably thought him insincere.

Snape sighed. There was no easy path to take with a child like Harry, and no getting that easily out of what he had done. He knew that, intellectually, and yet he kept hoping for every confrontation to turn out better than it had.

Sometimes I am a fool.

But he was not so great a fool as to give up and retreat, or go cold again, the way he might have done last year. He would simply remain on the horizon, and not let Harry forget either what he had done or his motives for doing so. Harry looked healthy, but there was that depth in the back of his eyes that Snape knew spoke of loneliness, of too great a control. He obviously felt unwilling to simply let go of his emotions with the Malfoys the way he sometimes had with Snape.

He needs a guardian. He needs a parent. I will be there when he remembers or realizes that.

"It's not your fault, Severus." Lupin had actually stood and pressed his hand. "Harry's hurting right now, and the only thing he knows how to do is curl up and hide his pain. He'll come around eventually."

Snape wanted to snap at the bloody werewolf—just because Lupin had changed did not mean Snape had forgotten or forgiven what he had done the last time he was at Hogwarts—but he caught the Headmistress's frown and remembered what she had said about all the Hogwarts professors acting like rational adults. "Thank you, Lupin," he managed to say, between only slightly gritted teeth.

Draco studied the angle of sunlight coming through the window of the room he'd chosen for practice, and nodded once, wiping his hands off on his trousers as he stepped into the circle of runes he'd drawn on the floor. The runes were standard protection designs, but they weren't usually combined with ones for confinement; most protection circles kept people safe and baleful influences out, without caging those they defended like prisoners. Draco didn't know exactly what would happen when a circle was made to keep the baleful influence in with him.

He thought it would work. It was half a ring of protection combined with half a ring of confinement, though not as simply as having them meet in the middle; instead, Draco had drawn one kind of rune, then another, then the first kind again, until they were thoroughly mixed. It was the first idea he'd had, and he thought it was a good one.

He was sure it would work.

Well.

Pretty sure.

It was supposed to come alive when the sunlight struck the outer side of the ring of runes, which was an idea Draco had taken from Harry's description of the truce-dance. That was linked to sunlight and the passage of time, and it seemed to be pretty damn powerful magic. He wanted his rune circle to be the same way.

He watched. The sunlight crept across the floor, and crept, and crept, and then it struck the outermost rune of protection, falling at the same time on one of the runes of confinement.

The designs blazed, turning golden and white, so brilliant that Draco couldn't look at them. He sat down in the middle of the ring and closed his eyes, then tried to jump with his mind the way he'd practiced with Harry, reaching for his father—the only other person in the house right now, since Harry and his mother hadn't come back from Hogwarts yet, and Vince had already left with his aunt.

He bounced back, so hard that he went sprawling on the floor. Draco blinked and gasped, then grinned.

I did it. On my first try, I invented a spell! Well, a rune circle, not a spell, but still! I did it.

He sat up, flushed with success, and reached out to leave the circle. Since the runes had taken him so long to draw, he would leave them here, he thought, and use them again, testing and strengthening them.

The white-gold light bounced his arm back.

Frowning, Draco lunged forward with the full weight of his body behind his arm. This time, he nearly skidded to the other side of the circle. The confinement and protection runes beneath the place he'd tried to leave the ring were both lit, he saw, and only subsided into sparks as he remained still.

What he had done came to him quickly, of course. The confinement runes were working to keep his possession still, and didn't want his mind to leave the circle. The protection runes would hold his body safe in cases where someone outside the circle tried Imperius or a similar spell to get him to leave it, and they were identifying his possession gift as that kind of influence.

He couldn't just reach down and smudge the runes, either, since they spat sparks at him when he came near. He would have to wait until the sunlight moved across the circle, or perhaps until Harry came back and could use his magic to dispel the influence of the runes.

Draco sighed. Then he grinned, because he couldn't help grinning.

It almost worked perfectly. I still did it. I still made a spell circle. And I did it without Harry's help. Harry doesn't even know Ancient Runes.

He savored the small glow of pride that came with that, and sat down, patiently, to wait the sunlight or the passage of time out.

Chapter Eighteen: Hogwarts Again

Harry could feel his face turning red. He stepped back behind the corner of the hallway and blinked at nothingness.

Well. Of all the ways he had expected to come upon his brother, that hadn't been one of them.

He and Draco had arranged to come through one of the Malfoy fireplaces into the Headmistress's office. Harry had thought, probably with too much innocence, that they would be riding the Hogwarts Express to school. But Draco had given him a patient look, and Narcissa had explained that going to London just to ride the train was too dangerous for Harry, that of course it was much better to have him go into the school this way, where he could be protected. Lucius had said nothing at all. The expression, or rather non-expression, on his face proclaimed too clearly that Harry should have known better.

Harry had the feeling that he wouldn't be bored with the Malfoys, whatever else he might feel while he was with them. They simply changed too often to keep him other than occupied.

McGonagall had told him, smiling when he asked, that yes, Connor was already here. He'd been taken shopping in Diagon Alley yesterday under a glamour, and then come through a fireplace from his hiding spot, escorted by a veritable army of Weasleys. He'd met Remus already, and seemed happy enough about it. No, she didn't know where he was now, only that he'd taken his things up to Gryffindor Tower. Harry should seek him there, but hurry, because they really didn't have that much time before the Sorting Feast began.

Harry had asked Draco, with a smile that he knew usually made Draco do things for him, to take his things down to the dungeons. Draco had agreed before he realized what he was doing. Then he glared, but Harry was gone, hurrying towards the Tower. He didn't know the password, but he didn't have to. He'd wait outside the Fat Lady's portrait for Connor to come out if he had to, and knowing what she was like, he might even be able to charm her into letting him in.

Instead, he'd found Connor already outside the Tower, waiting in the corridor.

Well. Not waiting so much as snogging Parvati Patil.

Harry waited until he thought the wet sounds had stopped, and then casually put his head around the corner again. Connor was standing with his hands on Parvati's shoulders and his forehead resting against hers; at least Parvati was shorter than both of them, to Harry's intense delight. He whispered something to her. Parvati said something back, which, miraculously, did not seem to end in a giggle.

Harry decided that he could show himself now. He coughed and stepped into plain sight.

Connor jumped, and then he smiled, even as he flushed bright red. Parvati only laughed at the sight of Connor's face, at least until she turned around and saw who it was. Harry noticed that her eyes narrowed immediately and she turned on her heel, walking towards the portrait with a sharp shake of her head.

His brother hurried towards him, and Harry decided that questions could wait. Connor hugged him, and Harry hugged him back, hard. They hadn't parted under the best of circumstances last time. Letters were no substitute for the apologies that Harry wanted to make.

"Connor," he murmured. "I know I already wrote this, but I was wrong to say the things that I did to you at the Weasleys'." He pulled back, studying Connor's hazel eyes and wondering if he was forgiven.

Connor just rolled his eyes indulgently. "Of course you were wrong, Harry. You were so ridiculous that it was easy to forgive you. At least, well, it was once I got over being angry at you for doing something else stupid. Only you would go home and try to rebuild yourself entirely."

Harry sighed, and some part of him relaxed for the first time since the battle with Voldemort. He felt able to nod after Parvati now. "What is she doing here already?" he asked. "I thought she was going to ride the Hogwarts Express?"

Connor laughed. "She was, but she got her parents to fly her down on their brooms instead. She knew that I was going to be here early, and she wanted to see me." He lowered his head, and the flush grew fiercer. "She wasn't, ah, very happy that I couldn't see her all summer."

"I think I missed something," said Harry. He paused as Argutus wriggled out on his shoulder, but Connor just nodded at the Omen snake; thanks to the letters Harry had written him, he needed no introduction. Harry cocked his head at his brother. "I had no idea that you, well, fancied her that much. I thought you went with her to the Yule Ball and snogged her a few other times, and that was all."

"Um."

Harry wasn't about to let this go. It was the first time in months he'd had some sort of advantage over his brother, moral or otherwise, and he pressed down. "Perhaps there was some more snogging that I missed, then. Or even more than that. Perhaps there was a romantic proposal of marriage?"

"Shut up," Connor informed him. "No, there wasn't. I fancy her, sure, Harry, but I'm not going that far yet."

Harry just nodded, and tried to think up another good dig. Before he could, Connor added, "Besides which, I don't think that you have much room to talk. You might not want to write about it, but I knew that Malfoy fancied you last year before you did, and I didn't think he'd let it go. How has that been going, Harry?"

"I think the Feast is starting," said Harry, and walked away while he still had some dignity intact.
He hadn't realized it would be so hard.

Oh, yes, there were the newspaper articles, and there had been that embarrassing scene with so many people coming up to him in Diagon Alley. But since the start of summer—no, before that, since he had come back from the graveyard—Harry had only been around people who had done as much as they could to avoid staring at him, even when they pushed him to face harsh truths. He had forgotten that most of the students and professors in the Great Hall would have been devouring the news of the child abuse charges for two months now, that, to some of them, he was the main reason that Headmaster Dumbledore was now in prison.

He had even managed to forget that most of them still thought he had a left hand.

Heads turned to orient on him as he hurried in through the doors of the Great Hall and over to the Slytherin table, only a short distance behind the returning students from his House. Harry met pair after pair of eyes, and saw intense wonder, or intense pity, or, sometimes, disgust—usually on the faces of children from Light pureblood wizarding families. They had been Dumbledore's allies, he knew, and they had grown up revering him. Child abuse charges were horrific things, but they were also more distant to children than to parents. Some of them would understand only that the Headmaster, a hero of their youth, was gone.

Harry shook his head as he slid into his seat next to Draco. It's like Parvati's reaction. I suppose that she's upset and thinks I kept her from seeing Connor, but really, why did she have to glare and stamp off? And why are so many people looking at me that way? Surely they have lives. Things to do that don't involve me.

The Sorting began, amid extremes of emotion greater than usual. Each House clapped frantically when a new student joined it—except Slytherin, who, Harry thought as he imitated them, seemed to have decided on decorum by silent unanimous vote even before he arrived—as if they wanted to emphasize that they still existed in the midst of war. In between the time when one House name and another was called, though, people went on staring at and buzzing about Harry.

Harry tried to ignore the sensation of ants crawling on his skin, and slapped his hand politely on the table for each new Slytherin—three new girls and two new boys, so far. He wished they were allowed to eat before the Sorting ended. He would have had something to occupy him, and let him pretend as if those eyes didn't exist.

Especially the eyes from one particular direction. He knew McGonagall and Remus were only watching him with concern, but that made no difference to his hatred of attention.

And if Snape would look at someone else this century, Harry would be glad to be civil to him for the rest of the year.

The last first-year, Muggleborn Joshua Zinosi, went to Hufflepuff, and the applause died. Gratefully, Harry watched as Hagrid came forward and took the stool and the Sorting Hat away, and eyes turned to McGonagall as she rose to her feet.

This was her first speech as Headmistress, Harry realized with a start. Of course people would be looking to her, wondering what she would say. He wondered if she was as nervous as he would be in that situation.

Probably not, he had to think. Why the hell would she be nervous? She's been preparing for this all summer. She plans her lessons down to the minute. I'd think she'd do rather well with a speech.

But maybe not, Harry had to concede, as he caught just the faintest signs of strain on McGonagall's face. After all, she did have to follow a revered Headmaster, and she would be struggling to pull both Hogwarts and Gryffindor House out of the shame of ignominy. Harry winced at the thought of how hard it must have been for her to come to terms with knowing that a leader and friend and someone who shared her House had done all this. He wondered if there was some way he could help her.

"Students," said McGonagall then, her voice stern and loud. Harry didn't think she was using a Sonorus charm, but she calmed all traces of conversation in the Great Hall anyway. What Dumbledore did with reputation and majesty and perhaps just the slightest hint of compulsion, the Headmistress did with sheer unflinching reluctance to back down. Harry saw her eyes get fiercer and fiercer as they studied each House table. "Welcome back to another year at Hogwarts. As most of you know, I am now Headmistress of the school, following the disgrace and imprisonment of Albus Dumbledore.”

There was some mumbling at that. Of course there would be. Harry caught a glimpse of movement at the Hufflepuff table, and glanced over to see Hannah Abbott and a few of the other Muggleborn students debating intensely with the pureblood Ernie Macmillan. Zacharias Smith was listening to them, looking bored. As if feeling Harry’s eyes, he looked up and nodded once. Harry nodded back. However pompous his means of expressing it, Zacharias’s offer of alliance was not one to be turned down. Harry had written back taking him up on it, and they’d exchanged a few other stiff letters over the summer.

“I promise,” said McGonagall, “that Hogwarts will never again become a place where anyone tolerates child abuse, or the consequences of it.”

A few people gasped. Harry himself started back on the bench, and felt Draco put a comforting hand on his shoulder and squeeze. Millicent, who sat on his other side, whispered, “Didn’t know she was going to do that, either, Harry, but it’ll be all right. We won’t let you down.”

Harry nodded his thanks, and kept his gaze fixed on McGonagall.

“I will pull Gryffindor House out of its shame,” said McGonagall. “I will pull the school and all the Houses out of the muck and mire they have been splashing themselves in, and insure that we are ready to meet this war. From now on, rather than having them with only one other House, your classes will be mixed, including students from all four, though there will be still be two groups for each year.” She completely ignored the rising tide of outright suspicion and panic at that. “As well, since I am now Headmistress, I will be fulfilling my duties as Transfiguration teacher with the help of several of my NEWT students. And Remus Lupin, a Gryffindor himself, has returned to take my place as Head of Gryffindor House, so that I do not neglect any of my responsibilities.”

Remus rose to his feet with a small smile and nod to most of the students. Harry saw gaping mouths and stares from most of them in return. He winced, and wondered how many letters the Ministry or the newspapers or their parents would receive in the next week.

Well, it's as it must be. The Headmistress did say that she was ready to face this, or she would never have hired Remus to come here in the first place. And since she's not providing him with money, they can't legally complain.

"We have a new Defense Against the Dark Arts professor as well," McGonagall was saying, as Remus sat back down. "Her name is Acies Merryweather, and she should be—"

A loud song burst from the door of the Great Hall at that moment. Harry turned his eyes in that direction, and found himself staring. Acies was standing there, but she looked as different as possible from the cloaked figure he had briefly met in McGonagall's office, whose hair and eyes, if one looked closely enough, proclaimed her resemblance to Rodolphus and Rabastan Lestranger.

She wore no cloak at all, and flowing light green robes that were only an inch or two from a gown. Her hair was still black, but her eyes large and a blue so clear that Harry could see them from here, the color of lightning. She had a white bird of some kind on her hand. Harry thought it looked like a dove, but no dove sang that loudly, or that sweetly.

Acies lifted her hand, and let the dove soar towards the ceiling. Then she walked up the middle of the Great Hall towards the head table, as if she were unconscious of all the stares on her. Harry wondered how she could do that, and if she would manage to teach him to do it.

"Thank you, Headmistress," she said, when she reached the head table and could sink into a graceful curtsy, with her robes puddling around her. "That is quite a welcome, and more than I should think I would have, coming back to Hogwarts." Her voice had the same loud sweetness as the dove's cry. Without looking anyone in the eye for long, without saying it, Harry thought, she was proclaiming that she was a Light witch with every move she made.

He shook his head in amusement. If anything, parents would be writing to express their approval of McGonagall making sure she had hired a pureblood woman from a good family right after they'd had a traitor, a fool, a werewolf, and two Death Eaters in the position.

"You are quite welcome, Professor Merryweather." McGonagall herself appeared caught between pleasure in the deceit and disgust that it was necessary. "Please sit down, and then the Feast can begin."

There was a loud cheer from several of the students at that. Acies rose and took her seat. Harry rolled his eyes when he noticed that some of the students continued staring at her and dug into the food that appeared in front of him. Really, they would get to see her most of the weeks between now and June. What was the point of looking at her when there was something to eat?

"Guess what, Potter." Millicent elbowed him in the ribs, making him grunt.

"What?" Harry took a moment to recover his breath. Millicent, he was annoyed to see, was still taller than he was, and having her elbow him was no small matter.

"I've been made Prefect." Millicent showed off the badge clinging to her robe with undeniable smugness.

"So have I," said Blaise Zabini, leaning around her to show off his own. "And I notice that among the three boys left in our year, Professor Snape chose neither his ward nor his ward's boyfriend." He clucked his tongue. "I suppose that just proves that Professor Snape can recognize talent when he sees it."

"Careful, Blaise," said Harry, turning back to his plate. "You're going to stink like Snape's shit if you go on kissing his arse like that."

Millicent let out a shocked laugh, half-gasp and half-snicker. Blaise turned the color of tomatoes, but couldn't seem to get his breath back for a moment, and then couldn't think of a reply when he did. Harry raised his eyebrows in response to the older students smirking at him, and went on eating.

Draco's hand on his shoulder made him look to the side. Draco leaned close enough that someone else would probably think that he was kissing Harry. Harry tensed, then let himself remember it was all right if other people thought that.

"You would never make a crack like that about Snape ordinarily," Draco whispered. "Are you all right?"

"I'm fine where he's concerned," said Harry. "The Headmistress said that I had to be, so I am. I've put my emotions in the Occlumency pools. Doesn't mean I can't crack a joke when Blaise's being obnoxious, does it?"

Draco winced. "Harry," he said. "My empathy is declining, but I felt as if I were standing in the middle of a snowstorm when you said that. If that's putting your anger into the Occlumency pools, I'd hate to see what it was like before you did that."

Shit, he's right. Harry concentrated as hard as he could, stamping down on his emotions and drowning them in quicksilver. It didn't quite work. There was still the anger, and the confusion over the fact that Snape wasn't glaring at him. If he would just show anger and hurt in return, this would be so much easier.

And there was the growing, nagging consciousness that he wanted to forgive Snape, or at least have a private shouting session with his guardian, in which he made Snape understand, from beginning to end, exactly why Harry was so furious and why nothing like that would ever, ever happen again.

But that was impossible. Harry was aware of what he would admit, if he went through that shouting session and that forgiveness. He would be saying, at some level, that what Snape had done was the right thing to do, and that he accepted Snape's authority over him as a guardian.

And, well, it hadn't been right, and he didn't accept that Snape had any authority over him. Not now. Not ever again. He would keep the promises he made to adults, he would listen to their suggestions when they were good ones, and he would ask them for help.

But, he had decided after long consideration in the last days of the summer, he would not take any adult as a parent. It only resulted in bad things happening. He had no idea how to be a son. They either tried to control him when they thought of themselves as parents, or thought they had to look out for him by hurting other people. And until he figured out how to manage a new relationship with Snape that would tell the man in no uncertain terms that Harry wouldn't accept his authority as guardian back, then he would have to maintain the coldly polite, calm, rational manner that the Headmistress had asked as his least effort.

Like that, he got through dinner, and was just standing up to leave when Zacharias Smith came up to the Slytherin table and nodded at him. Harry had been vaguely aware that he'd gone to the Gryffindor table and talked with Hermione, who now stood beside Zacharias. She looked half-exasperated, half-fond. Harry imagined that he often wore the same expression when he was with Draco, such as when he and Narcissa arrived back from Hogwarts the other day to find Draco trapped and sheepish in his rune circle.

"Harry," said Zacharias.

"Zacharias," said Harry back, feeling a bit stupid, and hating that eyes were focused on him once more. Look, stare when I get on a broom and fly at dragons if you like, but this is just two friends talking. Odd as it might seem to you, I am not extraordinary all the fucking time. Go away. Stop looking at me.

"I wanted to ask you if you would train us in serious dueling this year," said Zacharias. "The history has been useful, particularly for Hermione here—"

"Who managed to stump you with a list of pureblood rituals that you didn't know?" Hermione said, not quite low enough to escape Harry's notice. Several of the Slytherins chuckled. Zacharias flushed, but continued on after just a small pause.

“And the other small spells served their purpose, too. But I’m talking about major dueling.” He leaned forward and held Harry’s eyes. “Offensive spells. The kind that Voldemort—“

This time, Hermione did look at him in admiration, and the attention of the Slytherins had become as intense as focused sunlight. Harry lifted his head and continued listening.

“—and his Death Eaters use,” Zacharias went on. He seemed to swell and gain under the attention, rather than look ridiculous from or despise it. “This is war, after all. I want to live through it.”

Harry felt some of the attention turn and reorient on him in a new way. Though he had never spoken openly with anyone but his yearmates about it, Harry knew that some of the people he shared a House with had Death Eater ties. The same thing would be true in other Houses, but a deeper secret. Crabbe and Goyle were gone, and their absences were as clear as an open wound. Others would follow, and the majority would come from Slytherin. Some of them were almost challenging him to make an open declaration of his allegiance now.

The only puzzle to Harry was why they might think that he feared to declare his allegiance.

“So do I,” he said quietly. “And I would welcome people I could trust fighting at my back, though I hope the War ends and the bastard dies before it comes to that. Of course, Zacharias. Now that I know these lessons are something people want, I’ll both continue and step them up.”

Zacharias inclined his head. The motion was grave, and in some ways extremely condescending, but Harry could see the grandeur in it, the kind of emotion that would have made Light pureblood wizards look imposing when they performed it.

“Good, Harry,” he said. “Or should I say Mr. Potter, my ally?” He lifted his eyebrows and looked around the Great Hall, raising his voice as he said that part, and Harry had no doubt that the announcement of their alliance was one of the reasons he had asked Harry about their little dueling club in public.

That brought more focused attention than ever, but Harry just shook his head and turned for the dungeons. There was at least one more confrontation waiting for him there, one person who had been conspicuously absent from dinner.

Someone bumped into him as he was leaving the Hall. Harry felt Draco's shoulder catch him, and he nodded his thanks before he turned and confronted the person who had jostled him.

"Watch where you're going, Potter," Montague said, curling his lip at Harry. His face was hard, and he certainly seemed to be paying more attention to Harry than he ever had. "We wouldn't want you to trip and break your little neck."

Harry narrowed his eyes. Montague's antagonism had at least a few probable causes. Of course, he could be getting ready to become a Death Eater himself, but he had also shown some interest, last year, in a person Harry had deeply hurt.

He chose the obvious route first. "Want to show me your left arm, Montague?" he asked, pitching his voice low enough not to carry.

Montague jerked as if stung, and then leaned nearer, every sense obviously on high alert. "You just keep telling yourself that you'll survive this war, Potter," he breathed, and hurried off.

Harry calmly watched him go. Nothing had been proven, after all, and it would be stupid of Voldemort to mark students still in Hogwarts as Death Eaters, especially Quidditch players, who would spend time changing into and out of their clothing in front of other people. He put Montague into the Unknown, possibly a threat category in his mind, and walked in the direction of the dungeons.

Draco walked at his side. He kept shaking his head. Harry finally glanced at him. "What?"

"I don't know how you can just shrug that off," Draco muttered. "He practically threatened you, and you threatened him back."

Only then did Harry realize that, for all his joking tone, Draco's lips were pale, and his teeth caused a faint but audible grinding when he pushed them together. Harry reached out to gently grip his hand. That would get more stares. He didn't care. Reassuring Draco was more important.

"Draco," he said quietly. "I've trained all my life to survive situations exactly like this. Evaluating people who might be either threats or allies is as easy as breathing, and so is retorting when they issue vague threats against my life." He sighed when Draco just looked at him in silent misery. "This is going to be harder for you than it is for me, isn't it?" he added, letting his hand brush Draco's cheek.

Draco turned his head into the touch, and then uttered a little desperate mutter. Harry could make it out when he strained his ears. "I hate seeing you in danger."

"I know," said Harry, and waited until Draco stepped in front of him to begin walking to the dungeons again. Then he put a hand on the small of his back, ignoring Draco's half-startled, half-indignant look, and ushered him along. "Don't worry, I'll protect you."

Draco obviously did not know which expression he ought to wear in response to that. Harry hummed in pleasure to himself, and thought he was doing quite well at fulfilling Madam Shiverwood's prescriptions, even though he hadn't written down that he liked reassuring Draco on the list she'd forced him to make. "Potter."

Harry sighed as he put down the book he'd just been pretending to read. Draco had gone upstairs already, to give him some privacy when this confrontation came. Of course he didn't deserve any more familiarity than she was going to give him with the cold pronunciation of his surname, but he'd been hoping for it anyway. "Parkinson," he said, meeting her on equal ground.

Pansy folded her arms and stared at him. She was wearing robes that enveloped her more completely than the usual school ones, leaving only her face and hands visible. Eventually, Harry knew, she would go about so that her face was entirely hidden, and only show it to her spouse and children. She wouldn't speak, either, save as such quick motions of her hands might speak, except on Halloween and Walpurgis Night.

She'd gone further down the road towards becoming a necromancer than Harry had thought she would, if she was wearing these robes now. Looking at her set, pale face, Harry thought she might just make it.

"I am choosing you to be one of my Speakers," said Pansy abruptly. "That means that you'll be one of the people who talks to those outside Slytherin House for me, the person who gives excuses to professors if I'm sick or studying, one of those I can choose to pass along messages once I stop speaking to most people and I absolutely need them to know something."

Harry caught his breath. He'd read about Speakers, but he would never have thought that Pansy would choose him to be one, not when he'd killed her father in the first place.

"I don't deserve this honor," he said quietly.

"No, you don't." Pansy folded her arms more tightly. "But each young necromancer chooses three Speakers, Potter—one whom she absolutely trusts, one whom she can vaguely trust, and one whom she hates. That allows her three degrees of distance from the world, to represent the distance she'll eventually have from almost everybody. Millicent and Montague are the others."

So, Montague might have been upset with me for hurting Pansy after all. Harry added that to his mental impression of the other boy, and nodded.

"All right then," he said. He had to do all he could to make things up to her and to support her in this path that was her own free choice, and Merlin knew, this was little enough.

“Because you’re a Speaker, I can talk to you honestly,” said Pansy, without seeming to notice his acceptance. “I want you to know that I hate you, Potter. The more I study, the more I see what D—Dragonsbane gave up, and the more I see what he attained. You took that all away in a single stroke. And yes, my mother’s talked to me and told me not to hate you, that I don’t understand. I don’t care. I don’t care if she’s allies with you. She can be allies with you all she wants. But you’ll never be anything to me now but the person who took my father away. Do you understand?”

Harry winced, but nodded. He was glad that Pansy could feel honest anger towards him, that her vacillating emotions had hardened over the summer into this rage and determination. It was better, healthier for her, than the sort of regret that he had felt when Sirius died, as if he hadn’t said enough to make clear his emotions while his godfather was alive. If he couldn’t do anything else for her, couldn’t open freedom to her in any other way, then Harry would be her Speaker and help her along the path that would let her become what she wished to be.

“I want to hear you say it,” said Pansy.

“I understand.”

Pansy tossed her hair inside her cowl, and then turned away from him. Harry sighed and sat back down on the couch. He’d lost his appetite for even the pretense of reading.

He didn’t know how long he’d sat there before an owl fluttered through the door of the common room, just opening at that moment to let some of the students out, and up to him. Harry eyed her in confusion as he accepted the letter. He didn’t know the owl, though of course that didn’t mean anything.

The letter was brief, but the handwriting told him at once who it was from.

My dear, dear Potter:

I hope that you do not find yourself too devastated with not hearing from me. Until now, however, I have had no news of great importance to send you, and one should always refrain from wearying owls when one has nothing to say. Then they bite one, and one must strike them dead with an Avada Kedavra, and that is a waste of a perfectly good owl.

You should know that my late unlamented colleague Mulciber did manage to cause some minor trouble last year, in between casting increasingly ineffective Imperius Curses at you. He gained access to the parchment book that contains the names of magical children destined for Hogwarts, by the simple expedient of asking to see it (I believe he had some tale of lessening the prejudice of purebloods against Muggleborns, but not wanting to ask the students outright if they were likely to hold those prejudices). He copied down some of the names of those not yet at the school, and passed them on to my Lord.

Some of my—call them friends—now insinuate that my Lord is attacking Muggleborn children younger than eleven, and draining them of their magic in order to strengthen himself. He used to not do such a thing, because eating one person's magic weakened him for days afterward. Since his return from the cauldron, however, he has been able to do this with much greater ease, which may be attributed to the bit of flesh and blood that he took from you. Good show, Potter, really, increasing that particular ability of his.

Why did I not tell you this before now? Because I did not feel like it. Now I do. Also, I have been a little too good to you, I think, and now deserve to watch you suffer and squirm.

Your dear, dear self-interested friend, who now needs to Apparate as his older friends are closing in,

Evan Rosier.

Harry crumpled the letter in his fist, and closed his eyes. He forced himself to do nothing but breathe for moments, and shove away as much of the guilt as he could. He had seen nothing in his visions that had let him guess Voldemort was doing this.

You've not exactly gone seeking the visions either, though. You wanted a quiet night's sleep more than you wanted the information.

Harry bowed his head. In fact, his major emotion, despite what he had done to make this possible for Voldemort, was not guilt, but a tight, tearless rage.

He had some interesting ideas now that he hadn't had at the beginning of the summer. They coalesced and slammed into him, growing in power and fury like a storm.

If there is ever going to be a time to turn that dream link into a weapon, that time is now.

Harry decided it was time to go to bed.

And hope like hell he dreamed.

Chapter Nineteen: On the Wings of War

Harry had never realized how hard it was to fall asleep deliberately. Of course, he couldn't remember ever being this desperate to do it before, even when he wanted Christmas or their birthday to come as a child so that he could see Connor open his presents. He lay with his hand clenched behind his head and waited for several minutes, not moving any of his muscles and breathing with perfect calm, and still nothing happened.

Well, when have I had the visions before?

That didn't answer the problem, though, because Harry knew full well he had tended to have the dreams at different times—when he was stressed, when he was relaxed, when he had expected nothing more than a night of ordinary sleep. He couldn't will or create a condition that would allow him to go to sleep and have a vision.

So reach through the scar link. It was what you planned to do when you were in Voldemort's head, anyway. Just do it now. Try to open it while you lie here.

Harry reached carefully through the shades and shadows of his own mind towards what he thought was the scar link, a piece of Occlumency-shaded pain that he didn't like to think about, and usually didn't until it exploded. Almost at once, he felt the warm, pulsing bond that Fawkes shared with him become active, and the phoenix appeared above his bed in a burst of light that brought complaints from Blaise and a sleepy half-mumble from Draco. Fawkes settled on his shoulder, the one where Argutus hadn't coiled, and warbled at him. In Harry's mind formed the distinct vision of not trying to go off and do anything by himself.

Even Regulus, whose connection with him grew fainter and fainter as more of McGonagall's work called him back to his body, was awake now, calling his name. Harry! Harry, what are you doing?

Harry grimly reached out and touched the scar link again. He could control it, he could bring it to life, he thought. He had simply never tried before, because he had never had the nerve.

Now he did. He should have had it some time since, because he was depending on it so much to help win this war, but he would forget about the guilt. He reached for it, and had a brief, flickering sensation of falling down a tunnel.

The warmth of his bond with Fawkes faded from his mind, and then the sound of the voice calling his name. Harry gathered his feet—they were paws, of course, which reassured him he had got some part of this right—and looked around, expecting to see Voldemort's bedroom, or maybe a pair of staring basilisk eyes or a gathering of Death Eaters.

Instead, he found himself in a very familiar stone corridor. Harry's whiskers twitched in surprise, and he gave a little hop forward; his missing left forepaw made him grateful that he wasn't missing a foot in his own body. This was Voldemort's mind, the tunnel that led to his imagined Chamber of Secrets. But why was he here? Had he not touched the right part of the link that bound them after all?

He considered, and dismissed, the idea that Voldemort would have allowed him to come this far only to trap him. This part of the corridor was too near the seat of the man's memory, which Harry had badly damaged before, sending him into a retreat and a coma for several days.

Harry wondered if lynxes could grin devilishly. If they could, then he would be doing so now. He didn't quite know how he had come here, but as long as he was here, then he could hurt Voldemort. He began working his way forward, past the mass of bones that announced the entrance to the Chamber.

A disturbance in the mind, shifting in the pool, and he lost track of what Bella was saying about their allies. He leaned back his head and closed his eyes, and he located the stirring at once, because was he not a master Legilimens? It would have been beneath him to take longer than a moment, and no one would ever say that Voldemort, the proper Dark Lord of Britain, had taken longer than a moment.

The presence was within his mind, close to the seat of his memories, and moving forwards with definite hostile intent.

Potter. There was no question in him, even before he saw the cat-form that Evan had told him had watched their plans several times. No other would have been so impudent as to bring pain and destruction here. Potter did not know what was right, or what was beautiful, and that included the sanctity of a Dark Lord's mind.

Of course, he had Potter on his own ground, and he, Lord Voldemort, was aware of him. That meant he could crush him to death in his mind, tightening the walls of the tunnel around him, and Potter would perish. It would take only a moment.

But that was not the way one of his enemies ought to die. It was not right, and it was not beautiful. He, Lord Voldemort, could feel himself smiling. He would show Potter how a true Lord treated his most persistent foes.

He reached, gently, down the tunnel that bound them both together, and then slipped inside Potter's mind, even as Potter padded through his.

Harry paused and flicked his ears. He'd had the impression that something had just brushed against his head and stung him lightly, like a biting fly, but he knew that nothing lived in this part of Voldemort's head, so he decided he might have imagined it. Or perhaps the sensations that lingered in another mind, when he had time to notice them and wasn't engaged in a frantic search for some way of crippling that mind's possessor, were different from those in the physical world. After all, he imagined most of the things he felt here, and his thoughts were prone to go in many strange directions.

He rounded the final corner before the doors to the Chamber, and then flattened himself to the ground and snarled. Before him, overwhelming the corridor, were the black-purple, overlapping coils of an immense snake. Voldemort had obviously imagined this guardian since the last time and put it here to protect his memory. Merlin knew what it was in reality—some sophisticated Occlumency technique, probably.

Harry shot his claws. He thought he could take the snake, with as much mental flexibility as he himself had, but he would prefer not to fight. He could make out no head, which made him think it was buried somewhere in those coils, and the snake might be asleep. If that was the case, then he could creep by with his back against the wall, and perhaps the giant creature would never notice him.

There was a slight corridor of clear stone and air to the left. Harry walked towards it, his claws retracting, grateful, and not for the first time, that his form here was feline. He could never have managed so soft a walk as he did on these padded paws, and the lynx body was much lighter than this own.

All seemed to be going well until he tried to take a step forward and found himself unable to move. He glanced over his shoulder, wondering what had trapped him.

He found a coil he hadn't even felt draped over his back, twitching slightly. It had the look of one near the tail, and, in fact, one end of it did first taper and then swell, into a purple bulb that Harry thought was a rattle.

It began to shake as he watched, and then the body in front of him moved gently and lazily, the head lifting out of the middle. Harry flattened himself, and let the magic he possessed here swell around him. He was healthy now, able to use his own power, which hadn't been the case the last time he was in Voldemort's mind. Besides, if the snake could touch him, then he could touch the snake, so he wouldn't be reduced to the frustrated impotency of vision.

The snake's head was a beautiful thing, moving slowly from side to side, much like the basilisk in the Chamber of Secrets. Harry saw no hint of a killing yellow gaze when it met his eyes, though, only one as deep a green as the forest of his own mind had once been. He hissed and prepared to spring.

The snake opened its mouth first, and loosed a cloudy spray of poison that darkened the tunnel and fell in a stinging spray upon Harry.

Pain like acid dug into his sides and shoulders, and Harry screamed. He felt his impudent enemy scream, and smiled in satisfaction. Then he was fully within his adversary's mind. He expected to see the hedge-maze he had taken such great delight in defiling last time. And he remembered the darting boy who had been the center and heart of Potter's sanity. This time, he would make sure to torture that boy, and let Potter watch it.

But there was no hedge-maze. There was no green and rustling depth that watched the Lord Voldemort suspiciously and tried to overwhelm him with stubborn, fragile life. Instead, Lord Voldemort found himself standing on one great metallic branch, one of many projecting from a slender tree of steel, which spread in all directions around him and rose up and out of sight.

Scan, turn his head, look carefully, tilt his head. Still the impression around him did not change. If it was an illusion that Potter had fabricated to conceal the reality of his mind—but no, any illusion would have shattered by now before the gaze of the great and mighty Lord Voldemort. This was the reality of his mind.

The metallic tree did bear living leaves, green shoots embedded in the steel, but not all of them were done growing. And around the Lord Voldemort was not emptiness, but darkness, constellations of memories and emotions and truths, with spaces that Potter had left blank to fill later. It looked for all the world like he had ripped down and rebuilt his mind, but that was not true, could not be true, because Legilimency could not be employed that way, and no wizard would attack his own thoughts.

He could only think that somehow, Potter had hit on an illusion that defied him, one that only seemed the more and more solid the more he looked, and his body was cold with rage and the rage was magnificent.

He heard a rustling sound above him, and glanced up. There was a small shape swinging on the branch above him. Lord Voldemort had no doubt that that was Potter's sanity. He would not have woven the illusion that well, then, and the boy was, on some level, no doubt, still running through a hedge-maze.

The Lord Voldemort aimed his wand.

And then Potter was in his mind with him, and things briefly became confused and then very chaotic.

Harry writhed, the pain of the venom worse than any he had experienced—

Well, no, that was not quite true. Whenever he was tempted to make extravagant comparisons, he remembered the pain of his left hand being cut off, and then he usually dropped them.

Still, he knew he couldn't stay here. He had to flee. The poison would kill him if he remained. It was frustrating to be forced to flee when he knew that Voldemort's most vulnerable memories were only a few spaces of thought away, but he could not reach them, and he would not die for this.

He jumped back to his own mind.

He became aware of the intruder at once. Voldemort had made no effort to disguise his presence, in the way that Harry had. He was caught out in the open, and he was taking aim at something, probably Harry's sanity or memories. Harry took in that much at a glance.

Then Voldemort became aware of him, and their perceptions twisted and bounded as they regarded each other. They had never been in such close contact before. When they first journeyed into each other's minds, they had left barely any awareness in their own thoughts, and Harry had always seen himself in the physical world when he was close to Voldemort in the visions.

Harry recovered first. And since he was on his home ground, his imaginings of what could happen here, his conceptions of possibility, were the stronger. He was used to his own mind. He knew what he usually thought about. He imagined Voldemort trapped, pinned, crushed and held down, unable to escape and get out of sight.

Voldemort, of course, slithered free of the trap, though not without a hiss of pain. He was concentrating on hiding himself now, but what Dumbledore had once told Harry held true: he was not as good an Occlumens as he was a Legilimens. Harry used that against him, turning the whole of his mind into transparent representations of the metallic tree and the silver pools that hovered around it, easily showing him the writhing wisp of Voldemort's alien intrusion.

From the Dark Lord came compulsion, like a blowing wind, trying to grab and control Harry.

And the whole of Harry's mind rose in revolt against that.

He heard himself snarl, and honestly wasn't sure if it had only happened in his head, or if he had done it physically. This time, he imagined arrows going after Voldemort, spike after spike of pain and hatred, pinning him and striking him and filling him with the same kind of agony that the snake's poison had given Harry. Gone were the thoughts of holding him prisoner or trying to figure out how the link between them worked. Harry only wanted him out of his head, now. Compulsion, a binding on his will, was not to be tolerated.

He heard, more distinctly this time, the hiss of pain, and then Voldemort said in that high cold voice Harry thought of as the embodiment of nightmare, "You have not killed me. I cannot be killed."

Harry didn't bother to answer. The warmth of his bond with Fawkes was rising around him now, and then the phoenix was there, flapping his wings strongly in Harry's head, the sunlight showering down. Voldemort could perhaps have stayed and fought, but he obviously saw no reason to challenge the fire of a phoenix. In moments, he was gone, slipped free from Harry's mind and back down the link to his own body.

The madness of his revulsion faded a moment later, and Harry lay panting, taking stock of his pain. He knew that some of his control over his emotions had been abraded; that was probably the practical effect of the snake's venom. He knew that his head felt simultaneously as if it were splitting and as if it were on fire—his scar again. But nothing else was hurt.

He rose slowly out of the dream, to find Fawkes sitting on his chest, Argutus curled up near his face, and Draco shaking him frantically. Regulus's voice lurched in and out of hearing, as if he were on a distant ship and calling to Harry through the wind and the waves. – hear me? Harry? Can you—damn it, don't do this—

I'm all right, Harry thought at him, and then ran his hand through the blood that slid down his cheek, grimacing. He hadn't had a vision that made his scar open like this for a while. He sighed and sat up slowly, rubbing at his face and trying to decide whether he should attempt medical magic on his head or not.

Draco didn't give him the chance to, since his worry had already gone straight into anger. "That was another stupid mistake, Harry," he said. "Wasn't it? I could feel what you were doing, although not see it clearly. It was like I was along for a ride in a dream."

Harry stared at him. Damn. Is this a side effect of his having possession? Or perhaps just a side effect of him practicing his possession in my head and only my head so far?

"I felt the pain," said Draco evenly, and then touched the side of his head. For the first time, Harry became aware that there was blood staining the white-blond hair, as if Draco had a lightning bolt scar of his own in a different place. "Good work, that," Draco said, and the drawl in his voice wasn't one Harry had heard in a long time. "You'll find ways to punish the people who love you even lying flat on your back in a bed, Harry. I can't wait for the day when you'll manage to make me bleed while you're brushing your teeth in the morning. That's something to look forward to."

"I didn't know that was going to happen!" The words broke forth from Harry, sparking from between his lips, before he could stop them. He immediately ducked his head and turned away, breathing harshly. He tried to slide the emotions into the Occlumency pools, but they weren't accepting them. He supposed that was of a piece with his degraded emotional control. He knew, he knew, he should be quiet, but it was hard when Draco went on.

"No, you didn't. But you knew it was a stupid idea to go hunting for Voldemort with your mind, and you did it anyway, without even warning me that it was a possibility. Why, Harry? Normally, you're not stupid." Draco paused. "Well, not as stupid as this, anyway," he corrected himself, with a small sigh.

"Will you shut up?" Blaise asked from the other side of the room. "We have Potions first thing tomorrow, and some of us can't count on the favor of the professor to make it through the class without doing anything."

Harry really, really didn't need the reminder that he would have to face Snape with his shields down in just a few hours. He put his head between his knees, and forced himself to concentrate on nothing more than the breath sliding in and out of his lungs. Fawkes, who'd fluttered up to sit on the pillow, let out a long, moaning note, and Argus flickered his tongue out to catch one of the tears on Harry's cheeks.

"You cry from pain," he noted. "You cry from anger. You cry from fear. I wonder if there is any emotion that you do not express by crying? What is it? I would like to know. The tears taste good. Do they always?"

"They always taste the same, I think," Harry whispered back in Parseltongue. "And no, I don't think there's any emotion that I don't cry from."

The intense pain in his head was finally beginning to recede, though his scar still felt like a fresh brand. Harry gathered himself with a small shake. He had deserved what Draco said, and he knew it. And he absolutely had to get his control back, or Merlin knew what would happen when he faced Snape.

Well, no, it didn't have to be just Merlin who would know. Harry knew. And it would be a scene of shouting, and quite correct accusations of childishness, and then Snape would go on thinking that he needed a guardian after all, even if Harry didn't end up forgiving him before the class was done. A scene like this would not do wonders for Harry's independent appearance and sense of good judgment.

His emotions shifted and wavered again, and the next one that surfaced struck Harry dumb with astonishment, though a moment before he'd been ready to apologize to Draco. He watched, from the distance that Snape had taught him with regard to his own mind, as it rushed through him and made him shake.

Need. Longing. Loneliness. He really just wanted to lean against someone for right now and let them take care of everything, wanted to go to sleep with no worries and rise up in the knowledge that that other person had helped arrange everything so that they would handle it, together.

Of all the emotions he could feel at the moment, this was the most dangerous, Harry knew, the one that could most easily lead to him reaching for that help. He was furious with himself for feeling it.

But no, no, he couldn't be furious, because that would just result in yelling at Draco, who didn't deserve it, and it was another opportunity for his mind to feed on wild and raw feeling. Harry had known how to master that feeling since long before he learned Occlumency. His training was no longer as instinctive as it had once been, but he remembered it.

He focused his entire attention on something else, let the smallness of his own need drown in the intensity and interest of that focus, and felt the tension ebb out of his body. He lifted his head and smiled at Draco, who just stared back at him, apparently thrown off stride by Harry's reaction.

"You were right," Harry whispered. "That was stupid of me. I won't do it again. I'm sorry." He sighed. "I endangered my own life, or at least my own sanity, and accomplished nothing. And now that I know some of the dangers of the possession gift, it would be completely irresponsible of me to do it again, since I would willingly pull you along with me." He took up Draco's hand and squeezed. "I'm sorry," he repeated.

Draco tore free. "You know that I'm still angry with you," he said.

Harry nodded. "I know."

"You know that I still think you could do that again, and that I won't really trust you not to repeat it for a while."

"I know."

Draco just frowned a little more, and then turned and walked back to his bed. "Clean the blood off your face, for Merlin's sake," he added, over his shoulder. "Unless you want to go down to breakfast like that in the morning and scare the first-years. And you're already doing a good enough job of frightening people."

Harry stayed still for a long moment, listening to Draco's sheets rustle as he climbed back into them, and hearing Fawkes croon, so distressed that only tattered visions from the sound appeared in Harry's head. When he was sure that he was calm, he climbed out of bed and went into the loo.

The sight of his own face in the mirror made him shake his head—blood-streaked, pale, grave. He'd failed, and yes, that had been a stupid idea. Since he hadn't accomplished anything, he could agree with Draco in that much. Insane risks should pay off.

But he took heart in the determination shining behind the defeat. At least he hadn't lost much, either. Even the pain from his scar was fading now. The worst that could happen was that Voldemort would try to exploit the link between them again, and this time Harry would be ready. More likely, he thought, the Dark Lord would leave it open, trying to lure Harry into entering his mind and a trap once more.

"I'll help Draco train his possession gift," he whispered to the reflection as he washed the blood off. "Who knows what he might be able to achieve, riding beside me in my dreams that way? Maybe even possessing Voldemort. And it'll show that I do trust him."

He went back to bed with twin goals: keeping a close watch on Draco tomorrow, so that he could know how he might make this mistake up to him, and keeping a close watch on himself. Harry did fear Draco's disappointment and anger, but more than that, he feared that that drowning need for companionship and protection would surface again.

It was his own nature that might make him forgive Snape before he was ready. Harry was master of himself, though, not the other way around, and no childish emotions were going to make him do what they wanted. He could so be a rational human being, an adult who could treat with other adults on equal footing and needed no one to guard him or injure others in the guarding of him. They would see.

"The first day is always a challenge, as I see how much you have forgotten over the summer." Snape was stalking in a circle around the classroom, his eyes lingering over the newly mixed group in the dungeon. Draco and Harry were still together, a fact that Harry found himself deeply grateful for, but Connor and Hermione were missing Ron, and in the back of the room sat Blaise, Padma Patil, a few other Ravenclaw girls whom Harry didn't know, Zacharias, Hannah, and Justin. "You will pull out your books and brew the potion on page 183." He had a slight smirk curling the corners of his mouth. Once, Harry would have found that intriguing, as he wondered what about the potion on page 183 was so awful that most people would have trouble brewing it.

Now, he felt only a faint stir of interest. Snape was outside him, no more important to him than any other professor. Granted, he was Harry's Head of House, but Harry refused to think that he had to find him interesting for that reason. Harry intended to go to Remus if he really felt that he needed to talk to an adult, and of course there was always the Headmistress, if it was just something as simple as preventing reporters from getting onto Hogwarts grounds.

He checked page 183 of the Potions book; he and Draco had partnered up, of course, leaving poor Blaise to pair with Padma. He saw the problem almost at once—or well, what would be a problem for most of the students in the class except him, Draco, and Hermione. The potion, which depended on numerical mysticism and was supposed to make it easier to calculate equations in one's head, required twice as much stirring as normal, and it went in alternating directions, once clockwise, once counter, twice clockwise, twice counter, and so on. One mistake in the count would mess up the whole potion.

“Do you want me to go get the ingredients?” Harry asked Draco. He could feel Snape looking at him, and then away. Now he was prowling the back of the classroom, pausing to check Justin’s cauldron and, from the sound of it, make a few sarcastic remarks.

“I don’t think so,” said Draco.

Harry blinked. “Why not?” Draco had an odd note in his voice, and he rose and leaned towards Harry as if he had some great confidence to impart. Harry watched him with a wrinkled brow. He’d apologized during breakfast, where other people could hear him, and endured much good-natured teasing from the others about what he might have to apologize to Draco for. He’d made it abundantly clear, on the private moments during the walk to Potions class, that he wasn’t about to do anything like that again. He’d already sent Hedwig with a note to McGonagall, explaining the trick that Mulciber had pulled last year and that he’d tried to do something about crippling Voldemort, but been unable to.

“Because I don’t think having you that close to Snape would be a good idea right now,” said Draco simply.

Harry blinked, smiled, and relaxed. So it wasn’t that Draco thought him in the wrong after all. He was merely trying to protect Harry. “He’s going to come over and want to see our potion eventually, you know,” he said.

“I know. But I think we can wait for him to come to us.” Draco’s hand squeezed his shoulder, and then he slipped off to the storage area to get their ingredients. Harry started preparing the cauldron.

He was involved in what he was doing, but he had known Snape for years now, and had had time to get used to the feel of his magic and the weight of his eyes. He knew long before Snape said anything that he was standing behind his chair, watching him.

“It seems that you’re taking a long time over the cauldron, Potter,” said Snape, a neutral observation. “Odd, for someone of your skill in this subject.”

Harry readied himself. He remembered that the worst thing he could do would be to betray excess emotion. So long as he didn’t let Snape get to him, then he would win this strange little game they were playing. He would have preferred it if Snape had just ignored him—he could have respected Snape for that—but he wanted to put Harry in emotional mazes, as he had with his odd statements about missing him in the Headmistress’s office the other day. Harry would thread the mazes and come out again.

He turned around and simply nodded at Snape, wearing the same face as he would have in Transfiguration or Herbology. “Professor Snape, sir,” he said. “I know that this particular potion can stick to the sides of the cauldron if one isn’t careful, so I wanted to cast the appropriate spells so it wouldn’t.” He held his hand over the inside surface and concentrated. The metal gleamed a moment later with the sheen of the spell settling into place. Harry thought a moment, then added one so that the ingredients wouldn’t clump, also a danger with this potion.

“Impressive, Mr. Potter,” Snape murmured. “Five points to Slytherin.”

Harry just nodded. Let any other teacher assign him points for his House, and he would accept them. Snape was just another teacher.

“I wonder,” Snape went on meditatively, “if other students will think to do that?”

Harry shrugged. “You could always tell them, sir.”

“Ah,” said Snape, his eyes focused intently on Harry. “But I prefer to use some potions as a test of more than just ordinary brewing skill. They often let me see which students of mine possess unusual intelligence or aptitude.”

There is no reason, Harry told himself, for you to be shaking inside, and so he didn't shake. He just nodded and murmured, "That's very interesting, sir."

He looked to the side as Draco approached with the three different kinds of stones they needed to crush for the potion, and smiled at him. He could feel Snape's wondering stare on the back of his neck.

This isn't that hard, Harry thought, as he began to crush the first stone in his pestle, bracing its base against the stump of his left hand. Snape makes his own rules, of course, but I can make my own, too. And I was acting like a child yesterday. So long as I keep the sarcastic comments and the emotional outbursts to myself, then some kind of bond might come back sooner, because I'll convince him that I'm not a child, and so he can't be a guardian.

Harry stepped out onto the grounds after dinner and stretched his arms over his head, yawning. It was an unexpectedly sunny day for September, and not chill, yet. Harry couldn't think of any better day to meet outside for the first formal assembly of their little dueling club. He was tired of abandoned classrooms, and this would give them a chance to discuss the meeting place and decide on a permanent one.

He walked towards the lake, more aware of the absence at his right shoulder than he wanted to be. Draco had excused himself from the dueling club on the grounds that he needed to look up a few more Arithmancy calculations for the next spell he wanted to perfect. Of course Harry hoped he had fun—and didn't get himself trapped in a rune circle this time—but he felt a bit lonely.

Stop it. You do not.

He still hadn't managed to slide his emotions all the way beneath the Occlumency pools yet, but he could concentrate on something else, and then he would stop feeling the way he did. Right now, he was concentrating on the unexpectedly large number of students gathered around the lake, some sitting, some standing, most talking quietly. They turned their heads as he came up to stand on the fringes of the group, and Harry shifted as he felt the intensity of their eyes.

There was an uninvited guest, too, as Harry found out when a loud cry interrupted his first attempt at speech. He looked up in annoyance. A white bird circled overhead, with another mocking screech, and then settled in a tree near the edge of the lake, fluffing its feathers at him. It was a gull, Harry saw, with dark shoulders and rather offensively bright eyes. It cocked its head at him and watched, then once again screamed when he opened his mouth.

Harry shrugged at it and went on. "All right. Most of you heard Zacharias Smith ask me about a dueling club, and some of you have been in the one we had last year." No more than half of the students there looked to have been regular attendees, though, Harry thought, as he met the eyes of people he knew only slightly or not at all. Cho Chang gave him a reassuring smile and a little wave from the middle of the Ravenclaw clump. After that, Harry used the trick of focusing more on those he did know to keep himself moving forward. "And you probably heard him ask me about offensive spells, too. I'll teach them to you."

He raised his eyebrows, and listened to the intense gasps that came from some of the people near the gull's tree. Was that the official seat for people who didn't think I'd dare do what Zacharias asked of me? "I'll teach them to you, if certain conditions are fulfilled," Harry emphasized. "First, if you practice them on other students outside the club and it's not a clear-cut case of defending yourself or a professor asking you to demonstrate, then you're out of the group. Permanently. Second, some of you will have to get permission from your parents to learn the Dark Arts spells—"

"You can't teach us Dark Arts," said a Ravenclaw girl Harry remembered distantly. He thought he'd had some trouble with her in second year, when she'd got upset with him for hexing one of her Housemates. Harry winced as he remembered Tom Riddle, in his head, turning the girl's hex back on her and sending her to the hospital wing. Her name was Margaret, he thought, and she had an impressive glare. "That's against the school rules."

Harry had prepared for that. All he'd had to do was ask Hermione, and she'd gone digging for the answer during lunch and given it to him at dinner. "Not technically, it isn't," he said. "Or we wouldn't have been able to learn them in Defense Against the Dark Arts last year. What it does mean is that we have to keep it in the class, and it has to be a teacher-student situation. And the parents have to agree to let their children learn them. There's a blanket exception for Defense, always has been. But if a student is younger than sixth year, he or she has to have direct permission to learn them anywhere else."

"That can't be right." Margaret looked ready to fight it out if need be. "How could that possibly be right? That's the kind of thing Headmaster Dumbledore fought to stop, the learning of Dark Arts at Hogwarts." She paused a moment later, as though she'd just realized what she'd said, but she gave Harry a hard, challenging glare.

Harry raised his eyebrows. "Yes, he did," he said quietly. "But he permitted them again last year. The Headmistress told me that she would continue that policy for as long as the war was in motion." And she isn't happy about it. McGonagall had sent him a long, stiff note that both thanked him for his warning about the Muggleborn children and outlined exactly what she would and would not tolerate in his little dueling club. "Things are different now. We have to fight. And I'm going to assume that everyone here wants to learn to fight. If you don't, you can stay out of the Dark Arts lessons."

Margaret sat down with a huff and folded arms. Harry shook his head at her, and turned and looked at the others. "Third, we have to have someone nearby who can cast medical magic, just in case someone gets hurt." He looked over his shoulder, and smiled when he saw the figure striding across the lawn from Hogwarts. "That would be the professor who's agreed to help supervise us, Remus Lupin."

A few of the students shrank as Remus came up, but not many. Too many of them remembered him as more of a Defense professor than a werewolf. Remus smiled at them all, but saved especial smiles for Connor, who sat with Parvati's hand tightly in his at the edge of the lake, and Harry. Harry felt a small ball of tension uncurl in his stomach. He liked to have an excuse to spend time with Remus, without pretending that he needed to be cared for.

"So," Harry went on. "For tonight, I'm just going to show you standard defensive magic. And Remus agreed to duel me." He grinned at Remus and pulled out his wand. He would be teaching people who used their wands, after all.

“Duel, indeed,” said Remus mildly, his own wand already in his grip. “I’m sure that it will be more like a demonstration in how to lose, Harry, with all the losing on your side.” His amber eyes glowed with a relaxed playfulness that Harry could easily see irradiating his wolf form, too.

“Oh, you think so, do you?” Harry asked, and then pointed his wand straight at Remus. “Tarantallegra!”

Remus had a Shield Charm up before the spell was more than half out of Harry’s mouth, using it nonverbally. Several of the students who hadn’t yet learned nonverbal magic gasped. Harry grinned as his own hex came right back at him, and held out his stump, around which he’d cast Haurio, letting everyone see and hear him doing it. The small jade-green shield ate the hex, and Harry took a moment to explain, vaguely aware of Remus circling around him, but not thinking he’d do anything while Harry was giving a vital lesson to the others.

“The difference between the Absorption Charm and the Shield Charm is how much you want to wound the people around you,” he said. “Protego bounces the spell right back at the caster. But the Absorption Charm eats them. That means that you don’t have the spell to reflect back, of course, but when you’re trying not to hurt a friend on the battlefield, it’s the better choice.”

Remus abruptly spoke from the side. “Pedita!”

Harry found himself trying to fight his limbs free of an invisible, snapping, flailing net, which was just as determined to snare and hold him. The Snare Spell did that, fiercer and nastier than any Body-Bind, and especially useful with holding a moving opponent; it would chase someone even if he moved away from the site of the spell.

Remus means it, then. The thought made gladness grow in Harry. He could use a little exercise.

He thought Finite Incantatem! At the same time, he cast, “Clangor incommodus!”

Remus promptly winced and clapped his hands over his ears. They would be buzzing and ringing, Harry knew, probably with a sound of many bells. And since Remus had a werewolf’s hearing, they would bother him even more than an ordinary wizard. It was a wonder that he managed to cast the next spell at all.

“Stupefy!”

A wonder, but not a wonderful spell, Harry thought as he rolled away from it. Then, because Remus obviously hadn’t managed to shake off the sound yet, and he wanted to show the other students how easy it was to incapacitate someone with a relatively simple spell, he chose variations of the Clangor incommodus spell, targeting Remus’s eyes and nose.

Remus gave a pained sound when the spells took effect, doubtless seeing—because Harry had wanted it for him—dozens of disagreeable little flies and smelling the reek of carrion. Harry took the time to add in another explanation around his panting.

“Even though the spells are minor, each one piles another distraction on him that he has to deal with as he tries to cast the Finite to end them. And, of course, each one needs a new spell to get rid of it—“

“Finite Incantatem!”

Remus cast so fiercely that Harry suspected he was fully recovered. He started moving at once, hoping a few of the students would take lessons from the way he kept his head up and his feet never in the same place for long, but so occupied and so happy that he didn’t much care if they paid attention or not. He could always explain things again later. This was a good beginning for their club, anyway. Nothing like a practical demonstration.

Remus narrowed his eyes, and Harry knew his next spell would be nonverbal. He began whispering Protego over and over under his breath, concentrating the Shield Charms around the silver bracelet with the Malfoy and Black family mottos united that he wore on his right arm.

Remus's spell came flying at him, a dark green ray that signaled a combination Harry had heard of Aurors using. It would both knock him unconscious and tie him up with ropes that no blade could cut.

If it hit, of course.

Harry lifted his arm, and the hex slammed into the combined Shield Charms on his bracelet. For a moment, the green light clung, shimmering, as if it would force its way through after all; it was a powerful spell, and Remus had doubtless been annoyed when he cast it.

Then it turned around and flew back at Remus, who, a moment later, was stunned and tied up, the ropes binding his arms together behind his back and his legs out in front of him. Harry heard a few students gasping, others laughing or clapping, but most of them just stared in stunned silence.

Harry turned around and bowed his head. "Another useful defense is nested Shield Charms," he said casually. "They'll provide more strength and protection, even against really nasty hexes and Dark Arts, than just one will. Of course, you've got to have the time to cast them, and you have to be powerful to cast and maintain several in a row. Focusing them on an object helps." He displayed the bracelet, and thought, Weaving them in between isolation wards at your old abandoned house works, too.

"I want to know how to do that," Hermione demanded. "I've never heard of it."

Harry glanced at poor Remus. "Let me get Professor Lupin revived first, and then I'll teach you all you like," he said, and concentrated on making the ropes vanish and Remus return to consciousness. Remus was properly embarrassed about it all, but held no grudge, and settled down to working with the students who wanted to try the Absorption Charm. Harry kept an eye on them, and was satisfied that even those who first stared at Remus and trembled soon warmed up to him.

He kept making circles of the group, adjusting dueling partners when one of the pair got the spell right away or was too obviously powerful, patiently coaching Neville not to stutter on the Protego incantation, reminding two third-years who wanted to learn Dark Arts that he needed their parents' permission. It was on his fourth or fifth circle that he became aware of someone near the other side of the lake, watching, and turned to look.

He scowled when he saw Snape, and turned away. He doesn't need to watch. I'm not going to get myself killed, not with Remus here. And he should go talk to Pansy, anyway. She needs his help, and she'd talk to him, since he's Head of Slytherin House.

I think I'll suggest that to him when we have to go inside, in fact.

Harry would have felt better about his little joke if the speed with which darkness fell hadn't reminded him of the nearness of the autumnal equinox, and the attack that Voldemort intended to launch then.

Entertaining, Honoria Pemberley decided, stretching out her wings and shaking them once as she saw the dueling club breaking up to go back inside Hogwarts. Our little leader is a good teacher, too.

She'd carefully watched everything from the time she got there in her gull form—well, at least from the time she'd stopped deciding it was fun to interrupt Harry as he talked. Yes, he was a leader. He was alert enough to know when his opponent was going to cast a nonverbal spell, and to prepare an all-purpose defense against it. He faced and met challenges head-on. And even his very interesting scowl at the Potions Master didn't interrupt his pace or his talk; Harry's voice was still as low and placid, his stride as firm, as before. He really did like helping others, Honoria thought, as she saw him absorbed in the teaching. He went outside himself, forgot whatever troubles plagued him, and became more interested in others' efforts than Honoria had managed to be even when she was a student.

She wondered if that was such a good thing or not, then clacked her break. Tybalt and John and I will just watch out for him if he can't watch out for himself.

She took off across the lake, debating her course as she went. Shoulder or hair? Shoulder or hair?

In the end, the wind made the decision for her as she passed above the Potions Master and lifted her tail. The white splatter she meant to hit his hair blew sideways and struck the shoulder of his robes instead. Snape reared back, glaring, and pointed his wand at her, but Honoria was already out of reach, cackling the gull-laughter she knew most people despised.

That's for too many Potions exams that you marked down, she thought, as she wheeled home, as well as for whatever upset you've caused our beloved and glorious leader.

She couldn't wait to get home and contact Tybalt. He would wonder how she got onto Hogwarts grounds and stayed there so undetected.

Honoria would smile, and smile, and never tell.

Chapter Twenty: Like a Very Chiron

Harry could not say how relieved he was when Acies finally swept into the Defense classroom. He was sure that these mixed classes of McGonagall's were a good idea. He could cling to that in the abstract, and, of course, he could always take comfort in the fact that there were a few other Slytherins with him; McGonagall seemed to have arranged things so that Harry always attended class with at least two of his yearmates.

But for him personally, most of the classes were a stew of violent emotion. There were always people with pity on their faces. There were a few people who asked him each time why he had accused Dumbledore of child abuse, why it couldn't have been handled more quietly, and their numbers were growing. There were those who grumbled and muttered and questioned why Harry himself appeared to have been so instrumental in the Dark Lord's return, and Harry thought he could almost see their emotions spreading from one to another like a disease. He would have thought it was a spell, but no spell he knew of answered the description of this.

He put most of the emotions down to his oversensitivity, which thought any mutter lately had to do with him, and did his best to relax and calm himself. But Defense, he knew, was going to be particularly bad, and it was only the first class they'd had. Margaret from Ravenclaw was in that class, and Millicent and Pansy, but not Draco. Margaret was stirring up suspicion of him, currently, by telling others that Harry intended to teach Dark Arts in the meetings of the dueling club, and Pansy was a cold stiff presence at his side.

Harry could feel himself relax when Acies walked through the door. She was still wearing the pale, gown-like robes she had since the first day at school, but this time, Harry could see that the sleeves were tipped with green, a Slytherin color. He frowned, wondering how many people would note the subtle symbolism, both of the hue and of the two colors working together. Together, they signaled the end of winter and the coming of spring.

Never mind that this is entirely the wrong season of the year to be wearing them, Harry thought, and lifted his eyes to Acies's face. For just a moment, her gaze met his—not enough to flash the wild power he knew was in it down his throat. Instead, Acies turned away and paced to the front of the room. Most of the students were silent, watching her. Harry knew they were curious about this Professor Merryweather. The reports coming out of the other classes had been strangely mixed. Some of them liked her, and some of them were terrified.

“I will ask you to tell me,” Acies said abruptly, voice breaking the silence with a low hiss, “what you know of the nature of sacrifice.”

Harry told himself that most heads did not turn to look at him. That was just his oversensitivity at work again.

Pansy clasped his arm. Harry leaned towards her, and she said into his ear, “I wish you to tell the professor that I know sacrifice very well. It is at the core of the necromantic arts. Without giving up our ability to speak, and our names, and our connections with the outside world, we would not gain the privilege and honor of speaking with the dead.” She paused, with a slight sneer. “Make sure that she knows the answer comes from me.”

Harry nodded, and then turned towards Acies and raised his hand. More people stared. Harry ignored that, and concentrated on not looking Acies too directly in the face when she called on him, relating what Pansy had said word for word.

“Three points to Slytherin,” said Acies, and that was another thing they had heard about her, Harry remembered, that she always gave points in threes. “Ask Miss Parkinson if she knows why giving up these particular sacrifices is so powerful, Mr. Potter.”

Pansy was ready with the answer when Harry turned to her. “Because they’re things that normal people can’t do, and necromancers have to give up being normal people.”

Acies just shook her head when Harry repeated that, though. “No. Any sacrifice would do. These happen to be the ones that the studies demand, and have demanded over long years, so that they are hallowed by tradition. But the most important nature of the sacrifices, one way to separate them from what the Dark Lord did in cutting Mr. Potter's hand off, is their willingness. A willing sacrifice is always more powerful."

Harry flushed as more people turned to look at him, but kept his head high. He'd been the one who chose not to wear a glamour.

And what Acies was saying made sense, and was ancient magical theory. A shame so many people, even Margaret from Ravenclaw, were scrambling to write it down as if it were new, he thought.

"A life laid down," Acies said, pacing back and forth in front of the class with a swirl of her robes, "a limb cut off willingly, a privilege yielded without grumbling, forms the corner and the core of all sacrifices that most wizards trust. Without that corner and that core, sacrifice is usually seen as evil, or, at most, dubious magic. What can be done with blood and flesh and other things not given willingly? A great deal, but not as much as can be done with that yielded. The wizard's will adds its own sanction to the spell or the potion or the ritual performed with that willing sacrifice." Her eyes lingered on Harry's face for a moment. "The one the sacrifice is performed for grows more willing himself, more able, more powerful. Perhaps he will even be able to survive whatever storm comes after that yielding."

Harry's heart was beating oddly. Though he had lived with sacrifice all his life, he hadn't thought about that particular aspect in any depth, no more than he thought about making wands because he carried one. He wondered, in a sudden, searing realization, if Sirius's and Sylaana's willingly given lives had been one reason he was able to fight and defeat Voldemort after they died.

"I want you, all of you," said Acies, "to think about what you have given up yourself, and whether it was willing or not. Make me a list." She drew a parchment from no place Harry could see, perhaps one of the long sleeves, and slammed it down in the middle of the table before her. "Tell me now."

More people scrambled for quills, Harry among them. He braced the paper with the stump of his left hand and began to write. Some of them, like his hand and the loss of time to help other people, were easy.

Others, he had to think about. Was it really a sacrifice, for example, what he had done for Connor? Sometimes it seemed that way, and sometimes it seemed as though it could not have been because he'd been tricked into it, not allowed to truly make up his mind about what he wanted to yield to help his brother. But that would just be an unwilling sacrifice, he supposed. He bit his lip and wrote.

"Read your list aloud to me," said Acies after about five minutes, and pointed a finger at the back of the classroom. "You."

Harry turned, and was distantly amused to see that Acies had called on Margaret. She flushed and started to read in a mumble, but Acies cut her off. "Stand and read in a loud, clear voice," she said. "I will not have you crouch in a corner and talk as if you are ashamed. This class is not the place for anyone ashamed of what they are. You have made sacrifices, taken from you or willingly laid down. We are going to talk about them in a spirit of defiance and pride."

Sidelong glances towards Professor Merryweather were becoming more and more frequent. Harry could see now why everyone, from the sixth-year students to the first-years, had such a mixed opinion of her. Some would regard her with awe. Some would think she wasn't being serious and would look for the joke, only to realize slowly that there wasn't one.

Margaret coughed, and stood. She began to read out an ordinary litany of parents' time surrendered to younger siblings, toys broken or lost, privileges revoked when she'd become sulky. Harry tried to listen, but most of his attention was on Acies, standing with her hands behind her back like a soldier.

Then Margaret read out, "And a day's time of study and classes lost in my second year, because Potter cast my hex back at me, and sent me to the hospital wing." She lowered her list and scowled at Harry.

Harry looked back at her. He didn't know what to say. But then, lately, that wasn't an uncommon occurrence. With Snape and with Draco, he didn't know what to say, either, and as he watched McGonagall's face grow grimmer over breakfast and Fawkes scolded him for his foolishness in entering Voldemort's mind every day, he felt increasingly lost.

"Mr. Potter?"

Harry blinked and glanced over at Acies. "Yes, Professor Merryweather?" He was glad that he'd practiced her name, or he would probably have called her Professor Lestrangle without thought. It wasn't every Light witch that could look that commanding.

"What Miss Parsons says," said Acies implacably. "Is it true? Did you cause her to lose a day of her time in the hospital wing?"

Harry was grateful just to be able to say a solid, "Yes," without wavering. That part of it was objective fact, and most people knew it, though right now they were murmuring as if the reminder could not have come at a worse—or better—time. He waited, never looking away from Acies, even to meet Margaret's glare.

For a moment, he caught a glimpse of dragon. Then Acies looked back at Margaret, and asked, "And what were your motives for doing so, Mr. Potter?"

Here's the tricky part. But Harry knew that if he lied now, or even said anything less evil than the truth, no one would believe him. And even after just a week, he was sick of drifting frantically among the shards of his emotions and wondering what to say. Everyone—Draco, Snape, Remus, Argutus, Fawkes, Pansy, Regulus—advised something different, told him that I'm sorry wasn't enough but wanted it said, or desired something from him that Harry didn't know how to give, mostly Snape. Harry had kept this weakness quiet, since every time he did reach out, he got all those contradictory answers.

"At the time, I was possessed," he said quietly. "That was the year several students were paralyzed and placed in the hospital wing. For the first part of the year, I carried the possessor, Tom Riddle, in my head. He was the one who turned the hex. I didn't know how to do it."

The class buzzed and sang. Harry sat still and watched Acies's eyes.

"Liar," said Margaret loudly, stirring a bit of anger in Harry. He had spoken the truth. What did she want or expect him to say? That he'd hated her personally, enough to want to hex her into pain? "You don't need another presence in your head to want to do that," she continued. "You carry enough evil to do it all on your own."

Harry wondered if he should say something in response to that—both Millicent and Pansy were staring at him as if he should—but Acies got to it first, as she swung her head crisply around to face Margaret.

"You cannot lie to me," she said. "None of you can lie to me. My eyes see truth. I am named for insight, keenness of mind. And I know that you do not believe what you are saying right now, Miss Parsons. I see the lie resting in your mind, the frightened worm crouching behind your eyes. You heard the rumors of possession later in the year, and believed them.

"Even as Mr. Potter should respect your sacrifice, and know what he cost other people around him, you should respect his, and know what evil he was condemned to carry in his head. Making a sacrifice does not exempt you from acknowledging that other people have done the same." Acies held her hand above her head, and her fingers began moving oddly, as though something were trapped in her palm. Harry saw a feathered head project above her knuckles a moment later, and then a green bird was perched there, a bird whose feathers, if you looked at them too closely, resembled scales. It had a blue crest of feathers, which it laid back as it screamed at the startled students, and brilliant red eyes, mad in the way that only a bird's eyes could be mad. It took off and fluttered towards the ceiling of the room, not distracting attention from Acies's words but seeming to draw the students back towards them.

"I created that bird from my magic. If any of you were to destroy it now, you would be wasting my sacrifice and not respecting it.

"This is what we are prone to forget. As we move through the world, caught up in what we have given and will give, we forget that others have made sacrifices similar to ours, sometimes larger, sometimes more willing. We compare, and always find ourselves in the favored positions, those who have given the most and deserve to be treated with the most respect. Or we degrade ourselves, and say that others have given more, but imagine that some reward for the degradation still awaits us. We will show them, someday. Someday, the people we gave up the sacrifices for will turn to us with tears and love in their eyes. The idea of future reward makes far too many gifts less valuable than they should be.

“Remembering that sacrifice lies everywhere, threaded and torn through every soul, and forgetting to compare, is what I will teach you this term.”

The green bird dropped down from the ceiling and circled Acies’s head. She lifted up her arms. For a moment, just a moment, Harry had the impression that the shadow of enormous wings was passing over him, even though he could not actually see it. He saw the way Acies looked at the bird, and knew one of her sacrifices, at that moment, as surely as if she had told him.

Acies carried part of a dragon within her, and with that, she had given up part of what it meant to be human.

Harry closed his eyes. Awe, an emotion he hadn’t felt in far too long a time, was beating in his ears like a drum. He had been lifted and transported out of himself, far away from the confusing, dizzying assault of emotions, and he had badly needed it. For a moment, he thought he could catch a glimpse of the gifts and the sacrifices around him, and he was filled with wonder.

“On Thursday,” said Acies, “I will begin to teach you the meaning of sacrificial ethics, and how easily they can be twisted, and what the Dark Arts do to those who give up too much of themselves. Class dismissed.”

Harry shook his head and slowly stood, still caught in a waking dream. Thus, it did not seem strange when Millicent, whom he’d asked to be his delegate to the centaurs last year, leaned over to him and whispered, “Potter, one of the centaurs contacted me this morning.

He wants you to meet with him in the Forbidden Forest at sunset tonight. His name is Firenze.”

“I know him,” Harry said, and felt his heart pick up the pace, bounding, quickening. He did not know what the centaurs wanted, but at the moment, he felt more bound to them than he had in a long time—and with no evil, wizard-planted web, either, but with the common interest he’d once told the Seer Vera he felt. The wonder, that other people existed in the world and were what they were, beat in his throat like a second pulse.

On the way out of the classroom, he glanced at Acies. She had the green bird in her hands, and was staring at it. She smelled of smoke and fire, and one of her sleeves was partially singed away.

Harry smiled slightly. He suspected that a mixed report of this class would spread around, too.

Harry walked calmly through the edge of the Forest, Draco at his side. He’d told Draco what he intended to do at sunset, and asked if he wanted to come with him. Draco had chosen to do so at once, though scolding Harry, all the while, about taking another potentially stupid risk.

The words rolled off Harry as they would not have only a few hours earlier. He was remembering Draco’s own sacrifices, the danger he’d put him in by going into Voldemort’s mind a week ago, and feeling his affection surge, keen and strong as sunlight on the waves. That was the best reason to avoid taking that kind of risk. Not because someone else would be angry at him if he did something stupid, but because he knew it would mark and endanger another person in a way that Harry didn’t want him marked and endangered. Add that it was Draco, and Harry wanted him to have even more freedom and choice than he might want for others, and Harry knew, with a quiet strength that impressed him, that that kind of risk would not be happening again.

The steady beat of hooves made Harry lift his head from the path of crumpled, faded leaves at his feet. The centaur Firenze stood in front of them, tail swishing slightly. He had a palomino body and blue eyes that marked and pierced Harry from where he stood. Harry stared back, and felt the double heartbeat of anticipation and wonder pick up in him.

“Harry Potter,” said Firenze. “The stars are bright tonight, and we have found how to lift our web.”

Harry had suspected something like this when Firenze took the trouble to notify Millicent. He didn’t shout out objections, like the one Scrimgeour had given him, about the centaurs raping people if they were freed. This was too sacred for that. He just nodded.

“Show me,” he said.

Firenze reared, planting his hooves solidly when he came down, and then wheeled and trotted into the Forest. Harry followed, feeling Draco, behind him, reach out and place a hand on the small of his back, much the way he had done when escorting him towards the dungeons last week. He smiled slightly and leaned into the pressure, but kept his eyes always ahead, on Firenze’s swishing, pale tail.

They turned away from the parts of the Forest that Harry was familiar with—the clearing where he had once dueled Voldemort, the bend in the path where he had seen Quirrell drinking unicorn’s blood, the hill where rocks like a gallows awaited. They walked for a long time, long enough that darkness fell and Harry called Lumos into being on the end of his wand. Draco kept muttering words, but they were low enough under his breath that Harry thought he was frightened.

He didn’t turn and reassure him, though. Draco wouldn’t want this kind of fear acknowledged.

At last, the trail dipped violently, and Harry realized they were heading into a wide hollow, on a considerably lower level than the rest of the Forest. Draco stumbled. Harry reached back, gripping his arm and holding him upright, even as he stared, trying to make out the dimensions of the place they’d come into.

The sides of it were stone, the tree roots running out about halfway down the wall. The more he looked, the more Harry thought those stones, though they looked natural, had still been cut and fitted into place. They shone fiercely, and here and there a rippling shadow like a four-legged shape slid across them and was gone. The path down into the made valley was also meant for a being with four legs and not two, Harry thought, as they carefully negotiated it. Draco had drawn his wand, but luckily wasn't aiming it at anything.

Firenze waited for them at the bottom of the trail. His hooves were planted deeply in lush grass that Harry could smell summer leaking from. He paused and looked up at Firenze in question.

"We were given this place," said Firenze, his voice seeming to echo from the stones. "We were not meant to stray from here. It is summer here, and there are enchanting sounds and sights that were supposed to contribute to keeping us prisoner." He reared, and he did not look at all like a horse—or, if he did, Harry thought, it was a warhorse, trained to bite and kick and trample, as dangerous as its rider. "We have not stayed here, but we find ourselves drawn back. That ends tonight." He walked towards the center of the valley.

Harry could sense the glamours trailing them as they followed. Glimpses of indescribable beauty appeared and brushed against his face—seas, high and lonely deserts, hills shining with rain. Draco's pace slackened once or twice, but Harry always pulled gently and got him moving again. Draco muttered each time, to say that he hadn't been fooled and was coming, just a minute.

Something awaited them in the middle of the valley. Harry studied it as they drew nearer, but only when they were a foot or two away from it did all the impressions seem to rush together and show him what it was at once.

A vaguely familiar chestnut centaur was kneeling between two upright stones, his forelegs folded under his chest. Ropes held up his arms and tied them to the stones. Harry remembered the noose that the centaurs had used on Draco that first year, and suspected that this was more of the same stuff. Above the stones, from one to the other, ran a metal crossbar, and more ropes extended from it, lashed around the centaur's hind legs, which were splayed behind him.

The centaur glanced up. Harry struggled to recall the name that belonged with those dark hair and blackberry eyes, and finally managed to say, "Coran."

"The same," said Coran. "You have come, vates, in sight of the stars and in sight of the stones."

The moment he finished speaking, a kind of magic Harry had never felt before sang out from the rocks. Harry shivered. This was not precisely music, but stabbing spikes of sound that drove in through his eyes and ears both and made the teeth ring in his head, shrill and alien as the—

As the tap of hooves on metal.

Harry turned his head to the side as similar sounds answered the music of the magic. Centaurs were coming out of the trees, each one wearing a steel drum on a strap around his neck. The strap was long enough to let the instrument dangle nearly to the level of his hooves, and so each one would advance a step, then curl up one foreleg and bring it down on the drum's surface, then advance another step. The magic fed from the sounds, and Harry's breath grew short as the power dizzied him.

"What the hell is going on?" Draco whispered.

"The breaking of our web," said Firenze, hearing and answering him. He gestured to the bound and helpless Coran. "We have looked at our web, and we know what the power of a willing sacrifice can do. We wish to alter our nature. When we are no longer a danger to others, then we can be free, and we will harm no one." For a moment, he turned his head, his blue eyes catching Harry's. "The vates will no longer hesitate for fear of our committing rape."

"I would fear to set you free when such freedom seems a submission to the wizards who bound you, though," said Harry quietly. "If you change what you are, then will they not have won?"

"We were bound long, long ago," said Firenze in return, even as the centaurs halted and there came an end to the painful drumbeats, though not the piercing, sticking sensation of the magic. “We cannot remember precisely what we were when free. Freedom alone is what remains in our memories, as a dream hungered and hoped for and sent from the stars. We have changed, Harry Potter, vates. We know what we are now, and what we are would not wish to rape. We know only that we would, set free. And so long as you fear that would happen, you will not break our net.”

Harry had to nod. That much was true. He would not impinge on the free will and safety of others by simply snapping the centaurs’ web when he knew the consequences that followed would be his fault.

“So we have chosen,” said Firenze. “Legend after legend, across the centuries, bespeaks the power of sacrifice. And one of the legends bespeaks more. There was a centaur named Chiron, it is said—almost alone among the centaurs of Greece, wise and kind, while the others were drunkards and rapists.” Harry darted a quick glance at Firenze’s face, but it was blank, and his voice as he spoke was calm. “And he was immortal, and a tutor of heroes. But he took a wound at the hands of Heracles, and because he could not die, he suffered from it endlessly. In the end, he sacrificed his immortality and earned peace from his pain—but he used the sacrifice to free Prometheus the bound and suffering, to insure that someone else could continue in painless life.”

Firenze slammed a hoof into the earth. “So says that legend. Other legends speak of different motives for Chiron, and even immortality coming to him after death. But we are not immortal, and we choose to take this legend as our inspiration.. We are centaurs, we wish to be free, and we have chosen to change ourselves to become like Chiron. Every one of us has freely consented.” He turned his head again, and his eyes were fiercer and brighter than Harry had ever seen them. “That consent is part of the sacrifice, that we give up part of what we were to transform ourselves into something new. And the other part of it is a willing death, and a willing hand to take that life.” He was staring at Harry without blinking now.

Harry swallowed. “You want me to kill Coran,” he said, not making it a question.

"You can't do that," said Draco angrily, from behind his shoulder. "You can't make him do that."

"No," said Firenze. "No one can make a vates do anything, or he becomes less than a vates. We can but ask."

Harry studied the centaur's face, aware of Draco taking furious breaths behind him, and his own emotions, a boiling mixture. He wondered how long it had taken the centaurs to decide this, and Coran to come to the notion of sacrificing his life. He had no doubt they were telling the truth, though. If they were not, then the magic would fail. Something like this had to be willing. Acies was perfectly right. Willing sacrifices raised the power of the spell. Conceivably, someone could take Coran's blood against his will and attempt the transformation, but the ritual would be much weaker.

So, now, what they waited on was his consent.

Harry looked at Coran. He had not known him very well. He hated the thought of killing. He hated the thought that his hand would take a life even in war, which was the reason he had tried not to fight any of the Death Eaters but Voldemort with lethal force. And perhaps if he had never killed at all, he would have found this impossible.

As it was, he had no innocence to lose. And he knew what murder looked like. Murder had stared at him with bulging eyes as shards of silver sliced his throat open, and broken apart in a rain of ashes over the lake.

This was not murder. This was a task that they were asking him to fulfill.

Acies's words about respecting sacrifice rang in his head, and Harry nodded. "Tell me what I must do," he said, bringing his eyes back to Firenze's.

Draco grabbed his shoulder and spun him around. "Harry," he whispered. "You can't. It'll destroy you." His face was pale and strained. "I ought to stun you and drag you back to Hogwarts."

“Draco, you wouldn’t get out of here alive if you did that,” said Harry, knowing he spoke the truth. The centaurs had been ready to hang Draco in first year to test Harry. They would not kill out of malice, but they would bring about the death of anyone who interfered in this ritual, because it was too sacred to be disturbed. “And I want to do it.”

“Why, Harry, for Merlin’s sake?”

Harry found himself smiling. He thought it must be an odd smile, from the way Draco stared at him. He didn’t care. “Because I respect them,” he said. “And I honor them, and I can only imagine the honor they’re doing me, the only wizard they felt able to call on for help.” He gentled his voice when he saw the frantic concern in Draco’s eyes. For the first time in a week, the lingering remnants of anger had come down from between them, and Harry knew that Draco was purely worried for him. It felt, sneakily, wonderful. “I promise that I’ll be all right, Draco. I wouldn’t do this if I thought it could destroy me.”

“You tend to overestimate what you think you can bear, Harry.” Draco’s hand settled on his shoulder again. “Please, don’t do this.”

Harry raised his eyebrows. “That’s true, Draco, but in this case, they’re also making sacrifices, ones that are dependent on and entwined with the ones that I make. I won’t fail them.”

Draco clenched his wand, and Harry could see the notion of interfering flicker across his face. Then he looked around at the centaurs, and closed his eyes and gave a little grimace.

“Promise me that you’ll pull out of there if you think you’re faltering,” he whispered.

“I would have to,” said Harry, and reached up to kiss his forehead. “I wouldn’t have a choice. That would just waste Coran’s life and their commitment.”

Draco nodded, but turned his head aside as Harry walked towards the stones, as if he couldn’t watch. Harry understood that. He knelt down in front of Coran, facing him, according to Firenze’s soft instructions.

Coran looked back at him. He was not quite calm, the white of his eyes standing out like a horse's, but he had an expression of fierce determination on his face. Harry felt near helpless with admiration.

"Here is the blade."

Firenze gave Harry a knife. Harry moved it through a patch of moonlight, and blinked as it seemed to disappear. Then it reappeared again when he held it towards Coran, a thin edge of blue-silver. Made of light, he thought. Could a blade made of light hurt someone?

Then he thought of sunshine focused through a prism, and how it could burn, and nodded. It can if it's intense enough.

"First you must cut a lock of his hair," said Firenze. "It was a custom of mourning, to cut the hair. It says farewell to the past, and what we have been. Cut by your hand, taken from his head, symbolizing our decision, it binds all three of the sacrifices undertaken this day." He was chanting the words by the end, and when he stopped, the tapping of the hooves on the metal drums began again.

Harry nodded, then reached up, bracing his stump against Coran's forehead, to cut the nearest dark lock. The knife severed it almost before he knew what was happening, and it fell into the heel of his hand as he tilted it hastily to catch the slight weight.

It should have been slight weight, at least. Harry gasped. The lock felt like a stone instead, weighing his hand down, moving it towards the center of the world. He knelt again, and felt the air thicken, the magic dancing around him like a wind, like a storm. The only sensation he could compare it to was that of a prophecy coming true.

"The hair is taken," Firenze intoned. "It must be placed into the mouth of the sacrifice."

Harry stood up. Coran had his mouth open. Harry gently placed the piece of hair between his teeth, and Coran closed his lips and held on.

"We do this in memory of Chiron," Firenze chanted. "And as he was a healer in life, he dealt with blood, and he bled before he could die. Take the blood of the sacrifice from the right shoulder, where we believe Chiron was wounded."

Harry took a deep breath, and then turned and sliced the knife across Coran's shoulder. He winced at the first sight of the blood, but forced himself to glance at Firenze, who had trotted forward to stand beside him. Firenze's gaze was ancient, cold, emotionless as the stars themselves, looking from above.

"Smear your hand with the blood," he told Harry, "and anoint his throat."

Harry obeyed, curling his fingers awkwardly to keep from dropping the knife. The blood felt odd, warmer on his hand than it should have. He found Coran looking at him as he smeared it into place, and he stared back, wondering all the while what kind of life the young centaur had had. What had made him decide to do this? Love for what his people could be? Desire for freedom? Because he could do nothing else?

Harry was never going to know, and that increased his awe and his sorrow, so that they bled into and fed off each other, and increased his determination to do this right.

The magic closed in with a roll when Harry finished smearing all the blood. Now all Harry could see was himself, Coran, the device of stones and rope that bound Coran, and Firenze.

"We do this in memory of Chiron," Firenze repeated. "And now the hair is placed in the sacrifice's mouth, and the blood is smeared upon the sacrifice's throat. Coran, whose very name resembles Chiron's, has given his life. We have given our will." The pressure of the magic grew so tight that Harry could hardly breathe. "And the vates gives his consent."

"I do," said Harry, unsure if he should speak, but finding the words pulled from him.

“Then cut the sacrifice’s throat,” Firenze whispered. “Follow the path of the blood.”

Harry shivered, and stood to his full height. Even with Coran kneeling, it still wasn’t easy to reach his throat. Harry wished he was taller, and then felt an odd spasm of amusement. This was certainly the strangest reason he would ever have to wish that he had grown already, he thought.

He let his breath rush in and out of his lungs, and listened to Coran’s breathing, and recalled Acies’s words. As we move through the world, caught up in what we have given and will give, we forget that others have made sacrifices similar to ours, sometimes larger, sometimes more willing.

Coran’s sacrifice was willing. Harry had to trust that, and to think that there was no reason he would try to trick Harry, and the same thing with the centaurs’ giving their consent to this.

Wonder made him squeeze his eyes shut. When all that had been given, dare he falter now and refuse to do his part, or claim that he could find a better way of doing things? He had to recognize his limitations sometimes, had to yield his judgment to the will of others sometimes.

He reached up, and Coran tilted back his head, showing the path of the blood clearly in the strange, intense, limited light they were enclosed within. Luckily, the path of the smear included his jugular vein.

Harry took a last deep breath, feeling as if he were drawing it for both of them, and then sliced along the path.

Blood rushed forward.

The life flickered once in Coran’s blackberry eyes, but the intensity never ended until he did. Then his head dropped forward, holding the sliced throat.

Silence rushed over them.

Harry found himself utterly alone. Darkness was above him, and darkness below, and clouds pressed in on his ears and his chest and his heart. The knife had slipped from his fingers; he did not know where it had gone. Above him, when he tilted his head back, he saw the stars gleaming, in the image of a centaur with something in his arms.

Centaurus, he thought, distantly. The constellation Chiron was made into.

The darkness and silence broke apart, and noise and light returned with a crash.

Harry cried out as he felt the magic snap past him like a newly released flood. Part of it came from him, he thought, fueled by his will, and another part from the body of Coran hanging by its ropes, and another part from the centaurs grouped in the clearing. It slammed together, and leaped and cut through itself like foaming waves, and then it turned and dug into the centaurs.

Harry could feel the emotion propelling the rush: stern and unrelenting joy. He drew in breath that was hurried and frenzied, both because he could not take in enough of air that had joy, and not wind, as its supreme element, and because the magic continued to draw ruthlessly from him. He had promised to this, committed to this, and so had Coran, and so had the centaurs.

Made threefold, given three times over, this was not a flow of will that could be stopped or turned aside.

Harry felt the moment when the centaurs changed, when the magic performed the transformation they had committed to, took away the wild brutality that made them rape, and made them wise and gentle. It was a wrenching sideways snap, out of a world that had been and into a new one. It was a birth. It was an awakening, and a rising of a phoenix on fire-born wings. The centaurs cried out, and their voices changed as they did so.

The power pierced Harry again, and pulled more and more magic from him like blood. For the first time, he felt it working completely independently of him, to undo the web that bound the centaurs. He had promised, and meant the promise, and that was all he had had to do. The centaurs had promised, and meant the promise, and they were changed. Now the magic glimmered, tracing out the threads of the web in white fire, and then sinking into and burning them from the outside, raising inner flames that made them implode at the same time. Harry felt that stern joy dismiss the strands of the web as something ugly, unneeded, and unable to stand against the power that it could summon.

And then it was over, too abruptly. Harry felt as if he were in freefall for a moment, until he landed. He found himself panting, kneeling again, back in his human body, and the light was gone. He swallowed to keep from crying out at the loss.

He lifted his head to find the clearing transformed. The walls were roots and dirt now, and looked the better for it. The grass was as brown as it should be with the approach of autumn, and covered with dead leaves.

Coran's body hung on the stones, and glimmered, the last remnants of the joy withdrawing into him. He looked nothing more, and nothing less, than dead.

Firenze's hoofbeats recalled Harry's attention to him. The centaur had a smile on his face, a true smile, the first time Harry could remember seeing one. He scooped Harry gently up in his arms and set him on his back.

"We are more of this world now," he said, "more of the earth than the stars, though they shall always speak to us. Come, vates. Let us get you home." Harry looked around for Draco, and saw another centaur kneeling to collect him. He nodded, and clung to Firenze's mane, and closed his eyes.

Awe was still shaking him, a continuation of that humility that had snatched him out of himself in Defense, but deeper, darker, more radiant, more sacred. Harry found himself keenly alive to the centaurs around them, wondering what they were thinking. Did they miss what they had been? Or would they, once the shock and thrill of the newness wore off?

It was good of Firenze and his fellow to let Harry and Draco ride them back, a generous gift, a sign of pride and honor. Harry felt part of his awe turn into gratitude.

What was Draco thinking? Harry found that he could not wait to know. He would ask once they got back to Hogwarts, and give what assurances were needed. Perhaps he would do the same thing with other people, if they had questions. Would Millicent still want to be his delegate to the centaurs? Perhaps they would not need one. What was Pansy thinking about this? Would McGonagall be relieved to know that she no longer had to worry about the centaurs attacking people who went into the Forest?

What was Snape thinking?

Harry blinked, and licked his lips, and opened his eyes to see the edge of the Forest looming closer.

He did not feel like someone who had just killed, whose parents were on trial for child abuse, who had felt betrayed by his guardian only that morning. He was exalted, at peace, lifted into the heights and wrapped in comforting darkness.

He had been reminded that there was a world outside himself again, one he could take a vital and active interest in, and that one mistake did not mean the end of everything.

On anyone's part. No one's mistake means the end of everything. We can inflict deep wounds, but the wounds can heal.

Harry nodded, a small, decisive movement of his head against Firenze's neck, and closed his eyes. The resolve he made then had worry behind it, of course, but also its own stern, deep joy.

I'll talk to Snape tomorrow. It is time I respected his sacrifice.

Chapter Twenty-One: Forgiveness and Mercy

Harry suspected that Snape wouldn't want him to wait for the morning, although Draco, walking behind him, uttered a little groan of disappointment when they passed the door to the Slytherin common room.

Harry glanced at him over his shoulder. "Are you sure that you don't want to stay behind?"

"Not if you're going where I think you're going." Draco squared his shoulders, as if he thought that would somehow diminish his weariness. "You'll probably come out of this fight just as tired as I am, and I'll need to carry you back to Slytherin." For a moment, his face brightened. "I'd enjoy that."

"I don't know," said Harry thoughtfully. "I've seen sense. Perhaps Snape will manage to see some."

"Sometimes, you're no fun," said Draco.

Harry frowned at him, but Draco refused to explain what he meant. Harry shrugged. "Just don't interfere in the fight, please, Draco," he said. "Snape and I need to—" He paused, then waved a hand vaguely before him, hoping that it would stand in for the words he didn't know how to pronounce. "Really fight," he said. "Really talk. Smash the barriers. If we don't, then I can't expect him to understand what I felt out in the Forest tonight."

"I still don't understand how whatever you felt in the Forest encouraged you to forgive Professor Snape," Draco muttered as they turned the final corner and came to a halt before the door of Snape's office. Harry hadn't been here in months, and, for a moment, the knowledge dizzied him. He'd spent the summer away from Snape and Hogwarts before, but then he'd been back inside this office a day after returning to school. He shook his head and knocked.

"If I can understand what drove a sacrifice like Coran's, then I can understand what drove a sacrifice like Snape's," said Harry. "That doesn't mean I'm suddenly going to fall into his arms sobbing, but—"

“Mr. Potter. Mr. Malfoy.”

And there was Snape, and suddenly this was harder than Harry had known it would be. He took a deep breath and faced his guardian. “Hello, sir,” he said quietly. He didn’t know which emotion would come out in his voice, but it turned out to be a mild one—regret, or possibly melancholy. “I have something to say to you, and Draco wants to witness it. Can we come in?”

Snape stared at him. Harry knew the emotion in his eyes: hope. And why not? This was the first time that Harry had treated him with less than severe coldness since his parents’ arrest.

“Come in,” said Snape, almost as if he were repeating Harry’s words rather than issuing an invitation. He moved aside and gestured for Harry to take a seat on one of the chairs. Harry walked into the office, but remained standing. He didn’t want Snape to think they weren’t on equal footing, and Snape already had a height advantage.

“Sir,” he murmured, “I want to tell you that I understand, a bit better now, what you were giving up in sending the information about my parents and Dumbledore to the Ministry. You thought I would hate you, didn’t you? You expected that you’d forfeited the right to be my guardian, any trace of a bond beyond teacher and student.”

Snape’s eyes were large and dark in his pale face. Harry wondered how much sleep he’d been getting. It was a question he would have been unable to picture himself giving a damn about this morning, unless he were considering Snape and other sleep-deprived victims together.

“I did think that, Harry,” said Snape. “But I kept hoping that you would forgive me, and I would not have sacrificed so much after all.” He clenched his teeth down as if he would prevent himself from saying the next words, but they crept out anyway. “Are you forgiving me? Is this what that is?”

Harry flinched a bit. The commitment that had carried him out of the Forest, the remembrance of Snape’s sacrifices, was currently battling with the remembrance of the churning hostility that Snape's announcement of the crimes had released. Many people seemed to believe that Dumbledore could not be guilty, or else that it should have been handled privately. Perhaps they were right? Harry knew that he would have preferred it that way, at least.

"I'm not as angry as I was," he said, choosing the most sincere response. "That doesn't mean I'm not still angry."

Snape nodded, as if unsurprised. His eyes were drawing in the sight of Harry's face, soaking it in. Harry felt another tremor overtake him. He had not realized how much Snape had missed him.

That's what he was trying to say in McGonagall's office. He really did miss you. It wasn't a plot to pull an emotional reaction from you after all.

Harry rubbed his eyes. The wonder and awe he had felt—he had to keep his mind focused on that. He'd come here intending to tell Snape the whole truth, about how things had to fall out between them now. He couldn't just suffer shock after shock and stare open-mouthed. Perhaps this would be a bit harder than he'd assumed, with more obscure emotions swirling around in his mind like dragonweed in clean water and destroying his distance from the situation, but he had to keep pushing forward.

"I—" said Harry, and then shook his head. "I was tempted to forgive you even before this." He felt Draco shift behind him, as if about to speak, but luckily he kept his mouth shut. "But I didn't know how to tell you what I thought our new standing should be. I don't need a guardian any more."

Snape's eyes grew piercing. "Then that is an enduring disagreement," he said.

Harry sighed. "Why would you want to act as a guardian to me, sir?" he asked. "I haven't been a very good ward."

"All that I have done, I have done for love of you." Harry blinked. That Snape had managed to say the word with both him and Draco there was astounding. "And I have been a guardian," Snape continued steadily. "My role where you are concerned is defending and protecting you, Harry. And I have put you into some danger that I did not intend with my actions, given how many people seem willing to defend their precious Light Lord." Snape gave that familiar sneer. "I am surprised that there are so many fools in the wizarding world. I do not know why. My life should have taught me not to be an optimist."

He took one of the chairs, which left his eyes more on a level with Harry's. "I can at least protect you from the dangers of my own making, and I wish to protect you from others as well."

"I don't have a good track record with parents," said Harry, deciding he might as well lay this out in the open. "I don't believe that you would ever abuse me the way Lily has, Professor, or look aside from abuse the way James did; you've already proven that. But you've also proven that you wouldn't hesitate to hurt other people, even though I've asked you not to, in the name of keeping me safe." He glanced at Draco over his shoulder as he said that.

"I am sorry for the compulsion I placed on you," Snape said, addressing Draco. "And Harry, I am sorry for lying to you about it. I am not sorry, and will not be, for what I have done to your parents and Dumbledore."

I didn't expect him to be sorry for it. I didn't. Harry told himself that until he believed it. He held Snape's gaze. "But you understand why I don't want you to be my guardian again, sir," he said. "You must. Your definition of the best way to handle my protection and mine do not match up."

"Of course they don't," said Snape. "I imagine that most guardians do not think the same way as the children they protect."

Harry swallowed. He couldn't object that he wasn't a child, or Snape was likely to retort that saying that proved that he was acting childish, and required someone to defend him. "Sir, I'd want to be involved in any future decisions that you make about my protection," he said. "And I don't know if you would allow me that."

"It would depend." Snape seemed to have recovered his balance already, which irritated Harry. He'd come in so determined, so poised on the wings of his revelation in the Forest. Why couldn't he have retained that exalted distance? Instead, he was crawling in the midst of his emotions again. "If I thought that you could understand and react to the situation rationally, I would certainly consult you. I did not this time because I thought you would insist on leaving your parents and Dumbledore free. If a situation like that arises in the future, no, I would not delay saving you because you might not like it." Snape folded his hands. "I am sorry for the consequences of my decision that have had a negative impact on you, Harry. I am not sorry for making it in the first place. What else would you have suggested I do?"

The question was mild, not biting, and Harry seized the chance to talk about it. Perhaps he could convince Snape and bring him around to his side after all. "Handle it privately," he said firmly. "Even with a sudden confrontation. There are things I could have done to confine Dumbledore's magic for a short time, and of course my parents would have been no trouble to handle. Bind them and hold them in a room with us, and I think we could have forced them into acknowledging that what they have done is wrong."

Snape gave a single, sharp cluck of his tongue. "And yet, I heard from the Minister that an attempt to talk to your father resulted in him blaming you for the situation, Harry?"

"He was upset," said Harry evenly. "He didn't know what he was saying. And of course, once the abuse charges were filed, it was probably too late. If we could have done it beforehand—"

"Look me in the eye," said Snape, leaning forward. "You know it is very hard to lie to a Legilimens like that, Harry. Look me in the eye and tell me that you believe your parents and Dumbledore would have changed their minds if you could speak to them privately."

Harry shook his head. "It doesn't matter if I'm a bit uncertain," he said. "I still think it would have been a better method than this."

“Why, if all it did was warn them and not convince them anyway?” Snape was at his calmest. Harry could feel himself edging towards an explosion. He took the anger, crushed it into a small ball, and dropped into one of the Occlumency pools. Some of it leaked back, though, and so Harry counted to ten under his breath before he responded.

“I still think it would have been the best course,” he said. “No need to get the Ministry involved, to have dozens of people upset at the loss of their leader. And we would still have Dumbledore on our side to fight against Voldemort.”

“I believe he would have manipulated you rather than fight the Dark Lord,” said Snape quietly. “He fears you more than him.”

Harry blinked, once, then twice. That hadn’t occurred to him. Of course, Snape is an idiot about things like this sometimes. He’s probably exaggerating, and waiting to see if I notice. “Come off it.”

Snape’s eyebrows rose, and an expression that was neither smile nor scowl curved his mouth. “I am not lying, Mr. Potter, nor even stretching the truth. Albus Dumbledore does fear you. Nothing—not a confrontation, not reasoning, not a promise or an Unbreakable Vow—would have stopped his attempts to gain control of you. Nothing will but his death or the loss of his magic. Either of those is a probable outcome of the trial. I will be satisfied with either.”

Harry went briefly cold inside. He had forgotten that while his revelation in the Forest might have taught him respect and wonder and awe for other souls, Snape hadn’t thought the same thing.

“You made the charges child abuse for that reason, didn’t you?” he asked, voice breaking.

“I made them because that is what they did,” said Snape, his voice snapping like an ice floe. “But yes, I knew that execution was a probable consequence of those particular accusations.”

Harry shook his head. “You’re still a person,” he said. “I’m trying to understand why you did what you did because denying you forgiveness when you acted out of your personal convictions is silly. And my parents and Dumbledore are still people. I'm not going to try to free them or stop the trial, but—it's just—execution is too extreme a punishment for anything."

He tilted his head back, eyes on Snape's face. "There are people who would have wanted you dead for being a Death Eater," he said quietly. "You didn't deserve it. How can you say that someone else deserves death?"

"Because I feel they do." Snape did not turn a hair. "And I am not the one who does the judging from this point forward, Harry. The Wizengamot will. You have not listened to what I said. I did not bring these charges against your parents and the Headmaster to murder them. If I only cared about their deaths, then I would have killed them myself. I merely knew this could happen, and didn't flinch from it. That is the difference. It is important to me that they be punished. What form the punishment takes is less important."

"It is important to me," said Harry. "I want to stop the Wizengamot from executing anyone. Life in Tullianum, loss of their magic—" He flinched at the thought of his father's face looking like his mother's in the moments after the justice ritual had taken her power, but pushed ahead. "Those would be things I could live with. But not their deaths."

Snape nodded. "I understand."

"But you aren't willing to do anything to change it," said Harry, turning his gaze away.

"Plead for them to live? Drop the charges? Not testify against them?" Snape's voice was becoming sharper and sharper. "No, I am not."

Harry closed his eyes and stood in silence, reminding himself to breathe, striving to recapture the sense of calm clarity he'd had in the Forest. He needed to respect Snape's decision, Snape's sacrifice. Snape had made this decision knowing what it would cost him, and that he and Harry would clash over it, possibly forever. The conviction that must have driven him forward in the face of that was immense.

He did it out of love. Surely you can appreciate that?

I could appreciate it better if not for its being me, Harry thought, and felt a brief flash of amusement. Here we go again. What he did would have been admirable if he were rescuing Draco or Neville or anyone else. But that love of me might cause someone else to die—it's very hard to accept.

"I am glad to be in the same room with the sensation that you don't hate me," Snape said, breaking into Harry's reverie. "Regardless of what you may have thought, Harry, I was not trying to provoke or hurt you with my comments during the first week of school. Merely unwilling to let you withdraw into a cold shell and pretend that I didn't exist."

Harry nodded. "I know that now."

Silence returned. Harry could see Draco looking back and forth between them, obviously trying to read their faces and uneasy about what would happen next. He probably has the right to be, Harry thought. I don't know myself. The fury he'd felt towards Snape was gone, slid and dissolved into a roiling mass of other emotions, but of those emotions—understanding, pity, love, anger, regret, the wish that things could be different—none was dominant enough to tell him how to react towards Snape.

"Perhaps you could tell me what you are willing to accept from me, Harry," Snape said. "I have said that I will not stop defending you. I will not. But I will attempt to consult with you before I make any move so drastic again. I held off on filing the charges for a long period of time, because I wished to do so only when I thought you were being abused and would not defend yourself. Hopefully, that situation will never arise."

Harry hesitated. Then he said, "I suppose I should—I could use your help with Occlumency and Legilimency. I tried to take on the Dark Lord in his mind the other night. He slipped past my defenses and came into my mind instead, and some of my emotional control was abraded by what looked like a snake in his thoughts."

Snape hissed. "That link between the two of you is dangerous," he said. "It should be shut. I believe that you possess the Occlumency to do so, Harry."

Harry stiffened his shoulders. Here was another thing they were going to disagree about, then. "I can't," he said. "The visions are useful in strategy for the war. Thanks to them, we know that he's planning an attack for the autumnal equinox. If I shut the link, then we won't have any idea of what he's doing."

Snape closed his eyes. "I cannot force you to do this," he murmured.

"So glad you realize that." Harry's anger slipped out again, but he swallowed it, and went on. "There are things I don't understand about my own mind anymore, since I had to strip down and rebuild it so thoroughly. I would appreciate your help with that end of things."

Snape nodded once. "I was not there to help you with that madness," he said. "At least I can make sure that you do not suffer from it."

Harry fought down the urge to say that he wouldn't have had to rebuild at all if not for Snape's insistence on exposing his past to the world. "I'd also like access to some of your potions ingredients when I need to brew more Wolfsbane," he said. "I don't have much money left in my personal vault now, and ordering the ingredients from the apothecary would probably get the price raised, thanks to my—notoriety. Would you be willing to permit me to do that?"

"Harry!" Draco exclaimed before Snape could respond. "Why didn't you tell me that you needed money? You're more than welcome to anything the Malfoys have, you know that."

Harry could feel his face heating up. "I'm not poor, Draco," he said. "I don't need charity. Potions ingredients would serve me better than money." He looked up into Snape's face. "And I'm willing to perform chores around the lab or help him with potions, whatever he needs, in order to make up for the ingredients."

“Harry.” Snape’s voice was soft. Harry wished it wasn’t so soft. He had to close his eyes and turn his face away. “I consider you welcome to all the contents of my potions lab, as well.”

“But the ingredients for Wolfsbane are hard to replace,” Harry argued. “I’d feel better if you let me make up for them somehow.”

Snape sighed. “And if I asked you to be honest with me, and speak with me about your reaction to the trial and the charges? That is what I would want from you, Harry. I will not ask that you forgive or understand everything I have done, not immediately. But since I have unleashed these consequences, the very least I want to do is help you through the suffering of them.”

Harry swallowed. He could fool Madam Shiverwood, who didn’t know him very well. He knew he couldn’t fool Snape. If Snape asked him the right questions, he would uncover things like Harry’s carefully hidden weariness with all the volatile emotions and blame around him. It would be making himself vulnerable, and speeding up the reconciliation process that Harry wanted to take slowly.

“You need not,” said Snape. “You need not, Harry. I only asked to see if you were willing. You are still welcome in my lab and my office without that.”

Harry felt the most ridiculous urge to cry. That passed, luckily, but then came the more familiar urge to curl up and hide. He didn’t want Snape to make offers like that. It moved them into a land beyond debt and obligation and sacrifice, and all the epiphanies that Harry might have in Defense Against the Dark Arts in the course of a year would not be enough to handle it. He was used to loving other people like this, without expectation of return. To know that he was loved like that...

It made him feel vulnerable and prickly all over. He could deal with it as long as it wasn’t actually pushed into his face, but now it had been.

Draco’s arms slid around him, and that intensified the vulnerable feeling. Harry took a deep breath and managed to stand free of the embrace and meet Snape's eyes, troubled though he was that they might look right through him.

"Thank you," he said quietly.

Snape sighed. "Harry, have you spoken to anyone but Madam Shiverwood about this?" He didn't identify this, but Harry knew what it meant well enough.

"No," said Harry. "I don't want to," he added defiantly when Snape opened his mouth. "There's enough happening that I don't think I have to. Rebuilding my mind let me accept that, yes, it was abuse, and yes, what they did to me was wrong. And now I'm reconciling with you, and that will also be a help. But most of the time, talking about it just makes me tired. And as long as I've accepted that it was abuse and it was wrong, then what—"

"So much else, Harry." Snape leaned back in his chair and kept his gaze steady. "I already know about most of it, thanks to my training you in Legilimency and having Dumbledore's memories of your training. If you do decide to confide in me, I will at least not have to ask you many questions."

Harry nodded. "Madam Shiverwood knows all about it, too," he said. "She's seen the Pensieve, and read the scrolls."

"That's good." Snape looked resigned. He knows that he can't really push, Harry thought. He knows that we aren't reconciled all the way yet, and he doesn't have the right to say these things to me. "Please, Harry," he murmured. "When you are ready to speak, then let me know."

Harry caught a frightening glimpse, then, of how much further he might have to change himself—private things about himself. He'd accepted that he'd need to change his stance in relation to others, especially the more he thought about how he hadn't recognized or respected their sacrifices enough. And specific behaviors, like not running off and endangering other people, were candidates for change, too. But altering the way he thought about specific memories...

Snape still wants to change the way I think.

Harry caught the fear before it could run away from him. He always did. You know that. You know that he's wished you thought differently about the abuse since last year. There's no reason to get upset about it now.

"If I ever change my mind, then I'll let you know, sir," he said, raising his eyes to Snape's and emphasizing his words carefully. "In the meantime, it'll be enough to spend some time brewing Wolfsbane with you, I think. Unless there is something else you would like in return?" he added hopefully.

"No, Harry."

Snape was a Legilimens, good enough to read someone's thoughts with a look into their eyes—and Harry was returning his gaze directly now. He most likely knew exactly what Harry was feeling, and yet he refused to make him more comfortable. He wouldn't let Harry retreat into a bond based on debts and sacrifices.

Perhaps, someday, I can even be grateful for that.

"All right, sir," he said, and walked towards the door. He paused to give Snape a fleeting smile. "I know that we haven't talked everything out, but I think I've said everything I'm ready to say. I understand what you did. I'm not as angry as I was. I just can't quite accept it, yet."

Snape's glance was steady. "That is more than I ever hoped for, Harry," he said.

Harry lowered his head and slipped out of the office. Draco followed close on his heels, and spoke once they were most of the way back to the Slytherin common room.

"Harry," he murmured, and then reached out, putting a hand on Harry's shoulder and tugging him to a stop. Harry turned around, and found himself engulfed in an embrace.

"Some of us do love you without any need for something in return," Draco murmured into his ear. "I'll wait until you can acknowledge that. I'll be patient. But I thought you ought to know."

Harry struggled against the urge to pull away. Some of this was a sacrifice on Draco's part, too; he'd put up with so much while waiting for Harry to struggle through abuse and forced love for his brother and other obstacles in the way. "Thank you," he said, voice strangled.

Draco sighed, just a little puff of air against his neck, but it was enough to spark a fiery chain of thought in Harry's head.

Perhaps Snape is right. Perhaps there are things I need to change, still, within myself. Harry felt an enormous weariness at the thought, the same weariness he got after he spoke with Madam Shiverwood, but he had dragged himself through worse than this. It won't be as bad as the rebuilding. And I'd much rather do this by myself than in front of anyone else. If I can cure it on my own, then no one else will have a reason to worry about me.

It would mean considering memories he'd never wanted to reconsider, tearing open wounds he'd wanted to leave closed, forcing himself through grief and worry and pain. But the only alternative appeared to be sharing that grief and worry and pain. Harry hated the very thought. He'd do this, and perhaps, in the end, he really would be the better for it, healed of some of the effects of the abuse that were probably still influencing him in subtle ways.

Free, and able to respond to what Draco and Snape and other people do for me with a lighter heart.

"Flagello!"

Harry recognized the spell the moment it was spoken. It was one he'd used to train himself when he was a child. He rolled, depending on instincts drilled into him over years, and managed to get both Draco and himself out of range of the blue pain curse as it sped down the corridor and clashed in a spate of sparks against the wall.

Harry turned, already knowing the curse had come from behind them and further up the tunnel. A girl's shape moved into view, hissing in rage, and Harry recognized Margaret Parsons, from Ravenclaw. He narrowed his eyes before he could stop himself, and tried to soothe his own anger. She must dislike him very much to have come into Slytherin territory by herself.

"Parsons," he said. "What was that?"

"I'm sick and tired of everyone pretending that they're too scared of you to strike back," said Margaret. Her hand shook as she pointed her wand at him, but Harry knew it was anger and not fear that made it tremble. "You can be taken down. You're only human, just a wizard. So what if you have Lord-level power? The weak can strike back at the strong. You showed that when you took down Headmaster Dumbledore." And now the loathing in her voice was violently painted all across her face. Harry winced at the way it distorted her features.

"Don't you read the newspapers, Parsons?" Draco was scrambling back into the fight, of course, so mad he actually was spitting as he talked. "Don't you realize what your precious Headmaster did, and ordered done, to Harry?"

"They're lies, most of them," said Margaret. "They have to be. Headmaster Dumbledore would never do something like that." Her wand had steadied now. "Tell your boyfriend to move out of the way, Potter. This is between you and me."

Harry felt a surge of frustration. He was sure that Draco would go mad in trying to protect him, not taking into account that Margaret was simply an idiot. And his own emotions were so volatile that he didn't really want to duel. Besides, whatever he did to her would just make more people look at him slant-eyed and whisper when it came out, the way that his reflecting back the hex at her in second year had.

No, wait. Defensive magic might be the best choice. I'm sure that some people will take it as an indication that I'm a coward, but I'd much rather be accused of that than bullying.

“Defigo repulsu Harry Potter et Draco Malfoy,” he said quietly, and let her hear him say it, and follow the gestures of his wand. Margaret looked astonished for half a moment, until the spell took effect, and she would feel the tingling in her body. She screamed, a wordless, incoherent sound of rage, and pointed her wand at him again.

“Flagello!”

Harry didn’t bother dodging the curse this time. It simply sizzled and went out on the end of her wand. Margaret backed up a step, fear as violent as the anger had been shading her face.

“What in Merlin’s name did you do to me, Potter?” she whispered.

“Used a reflecting spell so that you can’t use any magic on me or Draco,” said Harry calmly. “It just turns the spell back into the wand, as though it had met the countercurse on its way.” He shrugged apologetically as her fear turned back into anger. “It’s not used all that often, since it also prevents the person it’s cast on from doing anything to aid or heal the people the magic is bound against, but I thought it best. And you can look it up, Parsons. It’s not illegal or banned, or even Dark magic. You just can’t reverse it, or get anyone else to reverse it for you.”

“Why?” Margaret’s scowl was inhuman. Harry had to wonder what was making her act this way. Perhaps her parents had just raised her to worship Dumbledore.

“Because I’m too powerful,” said Harry. “And the Finite Incantatem cast on the wand would just get reflected, too. Sorry.”

Margaret whispered, “Other people are going to hear about this, Potter,” and stamped back up the hallway. Harry shook his head as he watched her go.

“Snape won’t be in bed yet,” said Draco darkly. “We can report this, and—“

“No.”

“Harry.”

It was Harry’s turn to take Draco by the arm and force him to look into his eyes. “Draco,” he said calmly. “What do you think would happen if people heard about this, from whatever whispers Margaret might make to people who already hate me? I know about the emotions twisting around the school right now. It’d start a conflagration, people for me and people against me. I’m not going to divide Hogwarts like that. I don’t think Parsons wants to, either, or she would have attacked me in front of witnesses and forced me to respond in public. If she tells the story to the teachers now, she’ll just look bad. Oh, she can prove it, sure, by showing off the curse on her wand, but she’d get in trouble. This was private revenge.”

“She attacked you, Harry!”

“Us,” Harry corrected, though he suspected the Whip Curse had indeed been aimed at him. “And I’ve handled it, Draco.”

“I don’t like this,” Draco said, his face pale and unhappy.

“Tell me,” said Harry, tilting his head, “what exactly would happen if we got Snape involved now.”

“He’d make sure that Parsons couldn’t hurt you again, and—” Draco stopped.

“However he had to,” Harry finished grimly. “Yes, I don’t entirely trust him to be rational about this. And it would still divide the school. We’re in the middle of a war, and we can’t afford that. At the very least, Slytherin can’t afford to be seen as the instigator.” He let out a soothing breath, though he wasn’t sure who it was intended to soothe, and rubbed Draco’s arm. “It’s only about two months until my parents’ trial.”

“And Dumbledore’s trial is set for March.” Draco leaned forward and stared at him. “Can you survive until then, Harry?”

"I'll just have to, won't I?" Harry shrugged, and found his thoughts once again wandering towards a spell. Could a spell be making Margaret and the others act irrational about him?

But then, why would other people, like Draco and Snape, still have compassion for me? And the most irrational behavior does seem to be confined to children from Light pureblood families, and not even all of them, or Zacharias wouldn't have become my ally. No, this is just a consequence of the frenzy the papers have put everyone in. Hopefully, by the time my parents' trial is done, they'll calm down a bit. They can't have much new to report about this.

Harry shook his head, and returned to the present. "I promise I'll be careful, Draco," he said quietly. "I hardly want to die either." He had a sudden flash of inspiration. "And I'll tell Remus. I think he'd be the person best qualified to watch out for her. He's not a teacher, so it wouldn't disrupt a class for him to scold her, and he's not a Slytherin."

Draco nodded, obviously unsatisfied but taking what he could get. Harry rolled his eyes slightly as they took their path back to the Slytherin door, careful not to let Draco see. Voldemort is hunting me, and the wizarding world eats any tidbit about me as if it were a stoat sandwich. One frustrated Ravenclaw student casting a spell at me just doesn't matter that much in the scheme of things.

Intermission: Raised in Light

Ignifer winced as her excitement from dueling the latest Vipertooth finally died down, and allowed her to feel the difference in the air between Peru and Britain. She ran a hand through her hair, tugging her head irritably back, and narrowed her eyes, trying to convince herself she was imagining it.

I am not.

There was something different about the air here. Britain always felt colder after being in South America, of course, but this wasn't that. In Peru, Ignifer had felt her head clear, and she had fallen into her old routine of sharp thoughts and quick movements. Coming back felt like stepping into a room of blankets. She felt something gently, inexorably steering her thoughts.

It was familiar. Ignifer knew she had felt it more than once. But she needed to track the sensation to a specific place, or the nagging familiarity would do her no good. Ignifer despised people who acted on faint and likely false memories, and caused irreparable damage to themselves and everyone around them. She closed her eyes, driving her mind back, whispering the old incantations that made images of flames spring up in her head and go diving into her brain, to locate specific memories. Her father would insist that those spells were only for the children of Light families, but Ignifer had not spontaneously lost the ability to use them when she Declared for Dark, nor even when he cursed her.

She walked through image after image of fire, letting the tongues of flame coil around and shape the sensation of control. Where had she sensed it? What spell did it originate from? How far did it extend? When had she felt before?

That last question was the key. Ignifer stepped out of one of the imagined hearths, and found herself in her bedroom, the neatly furnished one she'd had when she was a witch of eight. She knelt on her carpet, her eyes half-lidded and her breath passing in and out of her lungs at a regular rhythm.

Behind her stood her father, one hand resting on her shoulder and his eyes closed.

Ignifer tensed at the sight of him, but that was all she did. The days were long past when she had been unable to bear even the sight of his portrait without trying to smash it, and her strongest feeling towards him now was the same arrogant scorn he showed towards her. She watched as he bent down towards her ear—no, the ear of his still-obedient, still-young daughter—and whispered something. Ignifer stepped closer, attempting to hear what he was saying.

“Converto intellegentiam de Aurelius Gloryflower! Converto animadversionem ab intellegentia!”

Ignifer watched her younger self shudder, and then open her eyes and stare straight ahead. Her father knelt behind her, and turned her head around. Ignifer watched in silent fascination. This was not a memory she could consciously remember having, and she was not sure why. Surely it wasn’t traumatic enough that her mind would have tried to lock it away?

She remembered Aurelius Gloryflower—once the head of that illustrious Light pureblooded line, he’d quarreled with her father over the Muggleborn issue in such stupid ways that even now, when she’d shed most of her family’s prejudices, Ignifer couldn’t help despising him. She had no idea why her father would have wanted to speak a spell to her containing his name.

“Ignifer,” her father said in the memory.

Her younger self just looked at him.

“What do you feel about Aurelius Gloryflower?” her father asked.

“I don’t like him,” said the girl, and then shuddered, her face twisting violently. “I hate him,” she whispered.

Her father nodded, and smiled, and rose to his feet. “That is right. You should hate him. He is an enemy of our family.”

Ignifer's eyes widened as she took in her own expression. Had she ever really looked like that? She'd had no particular reason to do more than dislike Aurelius Gloryflower. But it seemed that at one point, she'd felt incredible, even passionate, loathing for him.

It's a result of that damned spell. He encouraged me in my hatred somehow. Ignifer opened her own eyes, not the eyes of her imagined self, and rose to her feet, frowning. That spell influences perception. It must exaggerate emotions, too. One small feeling becomes a much larger one.

More disturbing than all that, to Ignifer, was the fact that she hadn't remembered this until now. Her father had of course cast spells on her when she was younger, as many pureblood Light families did when preparing their children to endure the trials of the wizarding world, but he'd never seen a reason to hide that he was doing it. Why in the world had she forgotten this one?

Was he ashamed to admit that he needed the help, perhaps? Ignifer paced back and forth in her main room, slapping her wand into one palm. He liked convincing his family of his philosophy on his own. Maybe he didn't want me to know that he'd been reduced to using mental magic.

But he hadn't laid a Memory Charm on her, either. If he had, the simple incantations to amplify childhood memories wouldn't have managed to recover this one.

And then there was the feeling hanging in the air around her now. As though someone had cast the spell again, but with much greater reach and range, power and subtlety.

Ignifer narrowed her eyes. And it hasn't reached Peru, she thought, her conclusions flying to their targets like arrows. That's the reason the air in Britain feels differently than the air in Peru.

She wheeled and made for her owlery, where her owl, Athena, waited. She would send word and warning to her allies. She did not know who the focus of this particular spell was, but it was likely affecting all of them. And if Harry Potter was sincere in his promises of aid to her, then she had to be sincere back.

Potter. Ignifer shook her head. The newspaper stories concerning him filled her with regular doses of rage. She had to put them down and go for long walks each time she finished reading one, or to Peru for one of her duels. The thoughts of what he had endured made her want to draw her wand, go to the Ministry, and attempt to punish his parents and the former Headmaster of Hogwarts for their actions, when they weren't making her coldly satisfied that her decision to withdraw from Light wizards was the right one.

She never had gone to the Ministry—not yet. The irrationality of her emotions frightened her and made her ashamed. She would probably be arrested if she even attempted to harm the so-called helpless prisoners, and of course Potter himself would not be pleased.

She entered the owlery and extended her hand with a little whistle. Athena took off from her perch and landed on Ignifer's arm, nestling against her with an affectionate butt of her head.

Ignifer closed her eyes. She wondered if her mother would firecall her today, as she hadn't yet, but that was a foregone conclusion. Of course she would, and try to pretend that a decade and a half of forced loathing could be cured with Ignifer simply kneeling at her father's feet.

On the other hand, if Ignifer wasn't there to receive the firecall, then her mother might think she was a coward, and Ignifer would not endure insults that were not true. She should be back in her house to open the Floo, not playing with Athena, pleasant as she found the owl's company. She sent her back to her perch with a soft compliment and a treat from one of her robe pockets.

Then she hurried back towards the house, her spine stiff and her boots hitting the ground with clacking sounds. She sucked in a deep breath of clean air to brace herself for the upcoming argument, and then paused.

Didn't I think there was something strange about the air, a moment ago? And have a memory that was connected to the sensation?

Ignifer puzzled about it, then shrugged. Obviously, if the thought had slipped her mind so easily, it was nothing really important. She would endure her mother's firecall, and then perhaps she would owl Potter, and see how well he was holding up under the constant onslaught of newspaper articles, the poor boy.

Chapter Twenty-Two: Welcome to the Real World

“...not sure he’s not a Dark Lord, anyway.”

Harry turned around as he and Draco left the Great Hall, craning his neck to listen to the two chattering Ravenclaw students. He couldn’t be sure they were talking about him, no more than the girl who spoke could be sure about the Dark Lord identity. But he was afraid they were.

You’re paranoid, he told himself sharply, and faced forward again. Everybody’s not really focusing on you and talking about you. You just think they are. And if someone does mention you, so what? Those damn newspaper articles and your teaching the dueling club are enough to keep their eyes on you.

Harry was more tired of the articles than he would care to admit. It seemed that every headline in the Daily Prophet still referred to him, and they were raking over minor details of his childhood now that Harry couldn’t think were of interest to anyone but the Wizengamot members—if them. Skeeter’s articles were probably the best of the bunch, since they did do something other than remind people that he had been abused at some point in his life, but Harry wanted all of them to just stop talking about it.

Or maybe you’re nervous because there’s a week to go until Voldemort’s attack on the equinox, and you don’t have a better plan than the one you’ve come up with, yet, he tried to reason with himself.

“It’s all right, Harry.”

Harry jumped sideways when a hand settled on his shoulder, and whipped his magic up around him. He winced when he saw the incredulous expression on Draco’s face, and shook his head, shoving his power back behind the barriers that he most often used.

“It’s all right, Harry,” Draco repeated, and then laughed a little. “Though I guess it really isn’t, if you flinch like that.” Behind the joking tone in his voice, his eyes were bright with concern, and he watched Harry with an intensity that hadn’t been there a moment before.

“Sorry,” Harry said. “I just feel like everyone’s staring at me, and I wish it would stop.”

“Harry.”

Harry started, this time because he hadn’t expected Headmistress McGonagall sweeping up to him. Her face was flushed and hectic—no surprise, really, since she carried so many burdens on her shoulders now—but she was smiling, too, and Harry felt his curiosity stir.

“What is it, Headmistress?” he asked.

“I’ve managed to divine how to reverse the Transfiguration spells on that little wooden dog you gave me, Harry,” said McGonagall, lowering her voice as a few curious students, heading in to dinner late, passed them. “I’m just about ready to bring him back. Would you like to be up in my office to meet him?”

Harry felt his worry drain away into relief, of more than one kind. Finally, finally, Regulus would be free, and Harry would get to meet him, and this was a welcome distraction from the crawling fear that filled his skin. “I would, Headmistress,” he murmured. “And could Draco come, too? Regulus should have some family there to welcome him, and I don’t know if you want to wait until I could owl Narcissa.”

McGonagall pursed her lips and looked at Draco for a long moment. Draco tried to appear ingratiating, but that had never worked on McGonagall when she was only Transfiguration Professor, and it wasn’t working now, either.

“Very well,” she said, and Harry exchanged a grin with Draco. When the Headmistress swept towards her office, they both hurried right behind her.

Harry’s heart beat erratically. Some of it was concern—the Transfiguration could still go wrong, of course, especially since they were dealing with Voldemort’s magic. Some of it was curiosity—what would this man he had known for so long only as a voice in his head look like? And some of it was hope.

Perhaps Regulus can be an ally, someone not affected by the newspaper articles and the temptation to whisper about me. He knows everything already. No need for him to get all excited.

"The re-Transfiguration was easy enough once I started paying attention to the construction of the spells," McGonagall was saying as Harry and Draco stood in front of her desk. She placed the small wooden dog carved with Regulus's initials on the floor next to the desk. "The preservation spells weren't there to keep him from bleeding to death, and I would have seen that sooner if I hadn't been so convinced they were." She made a face to show how disgusted with herself she was, then went on. "They were to keep him looking exactly the way he did when You-Know-Who—" She took a deep breath, bit her lips, and said, "Voldemort. When Voldemort Transfigured him."

Harry, distracted from his visions of Regulus emerging from the dog, jerked his head up and stared at her. "You mean—you mean that he still looks nineteen, then?" Harry assumed that Regulus would be nineteen, at least, or perhaps twenty, given how long he had managed to stay free before the Transfiguration.

McGonagall nodded. "He hasn't aged," she said quietly. "It's one of the reasons that reversing the spells is so difficult." She closed her eyes and said, "I must have absolute quiet for this, boys."

She pointed her wand at the wooden dog, and Harry guessed that she must have uttered a nonverbal incantation. The dog shuddered, and a blue glow spread around it, a sharp, slicing color of blue that Harry had never seen before. The white outlines of letters, Regulus's initials, stood out from the dog's belly. Harry wondered if Regulus would bear them as scars when he returned, and then tried not to think that, lest even distracting thoughts keep McGonagall from doing the best she could.

"Cieo!"

Harry jumped at the sound of the Headmistress's voice, cracking down like a whip. Then he looked at her in awe. He had never heard one voice sound so—focused was the only word he could find for it. McGonagall still had her eyes tightly closed. Writhing strands of light were dancing around her, lazily forming pictures. Harry stared for a moment before realizing that the strands were all red and gold, Gryffindor colors, and that a complementary light was coming from the dog, silver and green, the colors of Slytherin.

The silver and green lights wrapped around each other, nudging slender, tapered heads like the heads of serpents together, and then abruptly struck towards McGonagall. She opened her eyes and glared at them, and they collapsed uselessly to the floor, Transfigured into ribbons without so much as a word.

The red and gold light spread down and enveloped the wooden dog, and McGonagall repeated, voice as stern as when she'd encouraged Harry to tell her about his past in second year, "Cieo. Cieo Regulus Black."

The dog was now the center of a maelstrom of light, and Harry saw other dark ropes burn into being and then vanish, seemingly consumed by the Gryffindor-colored radiance. McGonagall was reaching deep, he thought, and her magic sang with finesse, perfectly balanced and perfectly controlled. Harry was impressed. McGonagall might not be as good at Potions as Snape, or as strong as Dumbledore, but she had made Transfiguration her absolute specialty, and Harry highly doubted that either of the two wizards could have challenged her in this branch of magic.

"Transformo!" was McGonagall's next incantation, and then she murmured, gently, as if coaxing the toy to yield up the man who had occupied it for so long, "Catellus ab viro!"

The toy appeared to turn in on itself. Harry leaned forward, his hand clenching into a fist, and felt a jab of phantom pain from the imaginary left hand that he sometimes seemed to carry on the end of his stump. Draco gripped his arm as if to keep him from going closer. Harry sent him an impatient glance. He knew not to go close. He was just bracing himself not to scream if he felt more pain of the kind with which Regulus had first introduced himself.

But no pain occurred, and the dog, lifting from the floor now and turning somersaults inside the writhing light, didn't scream. Instead, with what sounded like a cough more than anything else, it whirled and became a silhouette, and that silhouette was suddenly much larger than it had been, panting and bowing its head, with four limbs that were definitely arms and legs.

The light faded. McGonagall slumped to the side, catching herself on her desk. The signs of spell exhaustion glimmered on her face. Harry gave her a concerned glance, but couldn't quite convince himself to look away from Regulus for long.

If it was him. Quite apart from the afterimages burning in Harry's eyes, there was the fact that this man was kneeling with his head bowed, a long curtain of tangled dark hair falling over his face and concealing it.

"Regulus?" Harry whispered.

The man whipped around, moving quickly, and then halted, staring at him. "Harry?" he whispered. "Merlin, it feels so strange to see you from the outside. It's been more than a year since I have."

Harry didn't respond, because he couldn't. This man was definitely Sirius's brother, and the sight of those familiar Black features, accented and turned slightly different by the fact that they were relatives but not the same person, had stolen his breath. Harry stared into gray eyes larger than Sirius's, a nose slightly longer than his, and, of course, features younger than his had ever been in Harry's conscious memory. Regulus really was a young man of nineteen or twenty, just the way that the Headmistress had said he would be.

"It feels strange having a body back, too," Regulus commented, and patted at himself with his hands, small, fluttering motions, as though he were trying and failing to wake himself from a vivid dream.

That made Harry step forward. He might feel hesitant seeing Regulus with a memory, and his voice sounded different from the one in Harry's head, but this was still the man who had shared his head for over a year, who had comforted him and seen his worst memories and offered Harry what help he could and told him when he was being an idiot. Harry hesitantly held out his arms.

Regulus closed his eyes, released a sigh that had more than a little relief in it, and then grabbed Harry around the waist and hauled him close for an embrace. Harry stiffened in surprise for just a moment. Then he decided that, sod it, Regulus needed the hug even if it made him uncomfortable, and let himself relax.

"It's so good to really meet you at last," Regulus whispered, finally letting Harry go and sitting back so that he could look at him. He shook his head, and smoothed Harry's hair away from the lightning bolt scar. "You need a lot more sleep than I thought you did, from the looks of your face."

Harry was not prepared to listen to silly speeches about dark circles under his eyes or the like, because a polite cough at his shoulder had reminded him that someone else was still in the room, someone who had only heard Regulus's voice in his head once or twice, during the times he was mentally connected with Harry. He pulled Draco forward. "Regulus, may I present Draco Malfoy, your—well, cousin of some degree, anyway." He didn't know the Black family tree well enough to say just how related Regulus and Draco were.

Regulus smiled and held out his hand to Draco, who was obviously drawing on polished pureblood manners as he clasped it. Harry doubted he was actually prepared to meet a cousin who had spent a good portion of his life as a wooden dog, and there was probably no pureblood ritual that covered it, either, but Draco did his best, using the greeting that would welcome back an exile. "Greetings, cousin," he said. "You have long wandered in the spaces between the stars, and we are glad to have you back in the starry spaces with us."

Regulus grinned. "No need to be that formal, cousin. I feel like I know you, too." He ruffled Draco's hair, which made Draco blink and lift one hand as if to make sure it was still there. "You've been an enormous help to Harry, and that makes you a friend in my book. Even better than a cousin, considering what some of my cousins are,” he added darkly. Harry knew he was thinking of Bellatrix.

He rose to his feet, brushed off his clothes—which had once been Death Eater robes, Harry realized abruptly, though now they were tattered almost beyond recognition—and then turned and bowed to McGonagall.

“Headmistress,” he said softly. “I can never thank you properly for everything you’ve done for me. Please let me know if there is anything I can do. I have already determined to aid you all I can in your war to recover Hogwarts’ respectability. I have few formal duties of my own, other than protecting Harry—”

“What?” Harry asked blankly. He knows that I don’t need another guardian. At least, I thought he did. And he’s only a few years older than I am, so he’s too young to be a guardian anyway. I think.

Regulus merrily ignored him. “And I would be interested in seeing that Dumbledore’s new reputation does not damage Hogwarts unnecessarily. The happiest years of my life were spent here.” He grimaced and rubbed his left forearm. Harry found that he could just see the edge of the Dark Mark under Regulus’s sleeve. “I don’t have much political influence just at the moment, but I have the Black fortune, and the Black family estates. Please consider their aid yours.”

McGonagall nodded, a dazed expression coming over her face. Harry waited a moment to be sure that she was not going to speak, then leaned forward. The words about the Black estates had reminded him of something. “Regulus,” he said, and had the small thrill of seeing another face look back at him, rather than just hearing an answer in his own head. He suspected it would take him some time to get used to that. “Now that you’re back in your body, you should raise the wards on Wayhouse, if you can. I don’t know if they’ll listen to you, but I know that Narcissa found Bellatrix there, and if she thinks she can get in any time...”

Regulus closed his eyes. Harry felt a brief ripple of power travel over him, and then into him, as if members of the Black family had their own private, personal web. Regulus opened his eyes, grinning. "That's so much easier and more satisfying when I have a body," he murmured. "And yes, they listened to me this time, Harry. Right now, the only people who can pass the wards into any of the houses are you, me, and Narcissa."

Harry nodded, happy that Regulus now trusted Narcissa enough to permit her free access to the Black estates; there was a time not so long ago when he hadn't. "I should owl my allies," he murmured, mind jumping to what kind of difference this might make in their plans for Voldemort's equinox attack. "They'll want to meet you, and of course, now that you're back, we know that we'll have some safe places to retreat to." He paused and eyed Regulus. "If you trust them enough to let them into the houses. I suppose that's another reason to have you meet them."

"I can already tell you that I don't trust all of them," said Regulus promptly. "But I think it's a good idea to have a meeting, Harry. Some of them might improve with a closer acquaintance. And Merlin knows, I'd like the opportunity to talk to Lucius and Narcissa again." His gray eyes gleamed. "And Severus, of course."

Harry blinked for a moment before he realized Regulus was talking about Snape. "You were both Death Eaters at the same time," he said. That's one bond that they'll share.

Regulus gave him a searching glance. "And he hasn't told you anything more than that?"

What more is there to tell? But if Snape hadn't mentioned it so far, then it probably wasn't a story that Harry was supposed to ask about. Instead, he just said, "No."

"Then I suppose I'll leave it up to him to tell you," said Regulus. "But we can also talk about guardianship for you, Harry. I don't want to force Severus to give up custody of you. He's been doing too good a job of protecting you. Since he still holds the formal legal guardianship, however, I'll need his permission to make you the Black heir. And—"

“Wait a moment.” Harry held up his hand and his stump. Regulus’s gaze darted to the stump, and his lips tightened. Harry lowered his left wrist hastily. If Regulus turns out as overprotective as Snape, then I really will have to scream. “Who said anything about your making me Black heir?”

“I did,” said Regulus. “I distinctly just heard myself say it.”

Draco snickered. Harry turned to glare at him. Draco simply grinned back. “I think I like him, Harry,” he said. “And there’s the solution to your money troubles solved, as well as another place that you could be safe when you aren’t in school.”

Harry shook his head with a scowl that he meant to take in everyone in the room, possibly including McGonagall, if she also thought this idiocy was a good idea. “Regulus, you can’t make me your heir.”

“Well, not yet,” Regulus admitted, finally showing a small sign of doubt in a thoughtful frown. “I told you, there’s Snape to agree with me first, and I’ll have to convince the Ministry I’m not dead, and that I am who I say I am—though that shouldn’t be hard, with the Black wards all responding to me—and then I’ll have to sign the papers, and we’ll have to do something about the singing creature in Grimmauld Place, so you can visit safely, and—“

“I just—there are blood heirs of the family alive,” said Harry. “What about Narcissa? What about Draco?”

“I’ll be Malfoy heir, Harry,” said Draco, who sounded like he was enjoying all of this enormously. “That’s enough for me. I never expected to get the Black estates and monies, anyway, since Cousin Sirius was still alive, even when I thought Cousin Regulus was dead.” He said “Cousin Regulus” with a sort of sadistic glee.

“I’m sure Narcissa will agree,” said Regulus, with an idle flap of his hand, as if he thought that wouldn’t be a problem. “And what Bellatrix thinks doesn’t matter anyway. I’ll set some money aside for Andromeda and her daughter, of course, but they wouldn’t want to live in Grimmauld Place or any of the other houses, anyway, not if I know Andromeda.” He smiled at Harry. “So that’s all settled.”

“Look,” said Harry, fighting down the urge to scream. Being around self-satisfied people who insisted on giving him gifts outside the boundaries of a truce-dance or other ritual was not his idea of a good time. “What if you want to get married and have children of your own, or if you adopt a magical heir? You’re still young, Regulus. You could do it.”

“Yes, but right now I don’t have anyone in mind,” said Regulus. “Stop fighting this, Harry. I made up my mind during all those days I was getting reacquainted with my preserved body and had nothing else to think about. You do best when you have some responsibility that you don’t feel you can shirk, and you need a home and a vault that can be absolutely your own.” He sneered suddenly, and Harry shivered at the way the expression looked on his face. “I don’t think that you’d really want anything your parents deigned to leave you, anyway.”

Harry waved his hand, trying to make Regulus understand what he didn’t have the words to encompass. “It’s too much. I could understand if you wanted to leave me a few artifacts, Regulus, or—” “No, even a place like Wayhouse is too much. “Or something,” he finished lamely. “But not all this.”

“And that’s your only objection?” Regulus sounded interested, but not really worried, which only irritated Harry all over again.

“Isn’t that enough?”

“No, not particularly,” said Regulus. “I can still make my will out to whoever I like. People do, you know, even when one child wants to be left out of the inheritance altogether. If I die in the War and it’s yours, then you can do whatever you like with it, Harry. I would never bind you to dispose of it in any particular way, or to keep it if it really bothered you. But I do want a responsible heir, and one I trust and want to honor, and you’re it.” Regulus grinned at him. “I assure you, the burden’s not really so heavy as you make it out to be.”

Harry just closed his eyes and shook his head, not really sure what else he could say to refuse the estates and money, and horribly tempted to just give in. At the very least, he wouldn’t have to worry about purchasing his school supplies for the rest of the time he was at Hogwarts, or buying ingredients to brew for the Wolfsbane Potion.

And why was he struggling so much against this, anyway?

Maybe it's irrational, but it makes me uncomfortable, he thought, then opened his eyes and looked at Regulus. "I'll owl my allies," he said. "I'm not sure how long it will take them to get here." He hesitated, and looked over at McGonagall, who had recovered from the spell exhaustion and was simply watching them with a distantly amused expression on her face. "And, of course, I need the Headmistress's permission to bring them onto the grounds at all," he murmured.

McGonagall shook her head. "It's all right with me, Harry," she said. "In fact, I should attend the meeting myself, if only to represent Hogwarts."

Harry nodded, and looked back at Regulus. "I am happy that you're here," he said, feeling he needed to emphasize that. "I would be just as glad to let you keep the money and the houses, though."

"I like sharing," said Regulus.

Harry eyed him in resignation, once again hearing Draco snicker behind him. Just what I needed. Another bloody guardian. And one who maybe knows me even better than Snape does. Joy.

Harry sat bolt upright in his chair next to McGonagall's desk, aware that he probably looked as if he were going to levitate at any moment, but unable to relax. Most of his allies had answered with unexpected swiftness, and though it was now Saturday, and only two days after he had owled them, he was expecting them for a meeting in the Headmistress's office.

Regulus had spent the day before wandering around the school, talking with Snape about Merlin knew what, and Apparating to the various houses to make sure all the wards were holding. He had also apparently gone to the Ministry. That was the one journey Harry really wished he could have shared, if only to see the expressions on the record-keepers' faces when they realized just who was standing before them.

Harry had spent the day before not relaxing. The lead article on Friday morning had been particularly inflammatory, running under a byline Harry didn't recognize, and strongly hinting that Dumbledore had been right in suspecting that Harry might become a Dark Lord. Harry had seen the stares and the scowls directed his way all morning and all afternoon. It had been enough to put him off his appetite entirely, and he had retreated to the Slytherin common room during the evening.

That was when he had realized that one of the Slytherin seventh-years was gone, and when he asked about her, everyone else averted their gazes.

She went to join Voldemort. Of course, he probably wants as many people with him as possible when he makes his attack on the equinox.

Harry hadn't slept much last night, and not due to visions. The overwhelming weight had crashed down on him, and he'd spent hours drifting in and out of various restless dozes. In his waking periods, he fought against the temptation to creep across the bedroom and wake Draco up, or to go and find Snape, or Remus. He wanted to talk to someone.

About what, though? They know everything already.

That thought had kept him just where he was, and now...now his allies were coming, and he was jumpy.

"It's all right."

Once again, Harry started violently as Draco's hand came down on his shoulder, but he didn't jump out of the chair. He forced himself to relax as Draco leaned over from the chair next to his and rubbed his back roughly.

"You'll take them all down, Harry," Draco whispered. "I know you will. You've done harder things than this, and lived through it."

Harry closed his eyes and allowed himself to lean back into that touch and those murmured words, just for a moment. Then the door to the Headmistress's office opened, and he slid smoothly down from the chair to resume his feet. It wouldn't do to be sitting when his allies entered. It was too great a sign of disrespect.

Henrietta Bulstrode, to Harry's utter unsurprise, was the first one who entered. She had a faint half-smile on her face, which only deepened when she saw Draco scrambling to mimic Harry.

"Potter," she said. "Am I to understand that we are finally plotting our first attack in this war, rather than making vague plans about the Black estates and the weapons that might or might not be lying around in them?"

"I mean to answer our enemies' attack on the equinox, yes," said Harry, with a quick inclination of his head to the people entering behind Henrietta—Ignifer, Honoria, and Mortimer Belville. "I believed it was time that we formalized our strategy."

"Such strong words," said Henrietta softly, taking the chair across from Harry's. The chairs were arranged in a semicircle facing him, but Harry realized abruptly that, like it or not, he'd set it up so that he was separated from his allies, along with Draco, McGonagall, Snape, and Regulus. Henrietta seemed to notice at the same moment, and her face brightened with amusement. "You really ought to have a gilded throne," she told him conversationally, "to complete the atmosphere."

"What a good idea," said Honoria, and waved a hand. Illusions curled around Harry's chair, turning the wood to apparent gold. Then Honoria frowned, and the gold brightened to diamond. She nodded, pleased, as banners draped the back of the chair—the crests of all the families allied with him, Harry realized with growing horror. Honoria turned a bright, expectant smile on him when she was done, waiting for praise.

Harry realized he had a few choices here. He could drop his head and flush in embarrassment, or he could make the choice that would allow his allies to respect him. He had to worry about impressing more of them than just Henrietta. Mortimer's eyes, and those of Charles, who had just entered and made his way to the end of the row of chairs, were too sharp, too calculating.

"It still needs a cushion," he told Honoria. "Could you make one that has Voldemort's face on it?" Everyone in the room flinched, and Harry lifted his chin, with a small smile and growing confidence. "I rather enjoy the idea of sitting on him."

Honoria laughed in delight, and waved a hand. Harry glanced over his shoulder, and saw a cushion forming with an exaggerated face on it, more snake than human. It wasn't at all what Voldemort looked like, but then, he could hardly expect Honoria to know that. It was a good enough approximation.

"Thank you," he told her earnestly, and then motioned for Edward Burke and Thomas Rhagnara, both hesitating in the doorway, to come in. The Malfoys followed behind them, and then Hawthorn and Adalrico. Adalrico inclined his head when he saw Harry.

"My wife sends her apologies," he said. "Marian is sick, and she must stay home with her."

Harry frowned. "The illness isn't serious, I hope?"

"It is not, thank Merlin," said Adalrico, and Harry realized he was attempting to keep a grin off his face. "Merely a bit of accidental magic expression that wearied her and made her vulnerable to a cold." He was darting glances around the room, to see, Harry supposed, who was taking notice that his daughter could perform accidental magic so young. Harry smothered a grin, and then studied the door, knowing that more people had yet to arrive.

He was quietly satisfied when Arabella Zabini stepped into the room and sank into a full-blown curtsy. When she stood up again, the bells in her hair rang softly. Thomas was staring at her in rapt fascination, and he actually started talking before Arabella could get a word in edgewise.

"You're a Songstress, aren't you?" he asked. "How long did you train?"

Arabella gave him a cool glance, seemingly torn between pleasure that someone had recognized her and consternation that he had. "Sixteen years, in total," she said. "And I consider myself still in training. I learn something new every day."

Thomas clasped his hands together. "What a wonderful philosophy! I consider myself the same way. When I made the decision to Declare for Dark, it was the result of long years of careful consideration. When I—"

Harry cut Thomas off, regretting that his wife wasn't here to curb him. "You're most welcome here, Mrs. Zabini," he said. "I hope that you can aid us in our endeavors to counter Voldemort."

"I will most certainly try," Arabella said, and took a seat on the far end of the row, near Charles. He was staring at her, too. Harry hoped he didn't try Legilimency on her. He didn't want to have to settle disagreements like that among his allies.

Snape, Regulus, and McGonagall arrived in short order. Harry was amused to see Edward Burke lean forward the moment Regulus took his seat on the other side of Harry from Draco and eye him in slowly dawning shock. The shock turned to recognition when Harry placed a hand on his shoulder and said, "Permit me to introduce my newest ally, Regulus Black."

Surprise, shock, interest, and amusement in various degrees showed up on the faces across from him. Burke was the only one who actually dared to demand—or perhaps the only one rattled enough to demand—"How is this possible?"

"The Dark Lord Transfigured me into a wooden dog," said Regulus, sounding far more pleased with himself than Harry would have thought advisable in the circumstances. "I was bound to my brother's mind for a time, but when the Dark Lord possessed him, he knocked me loose, and I latched onto Harry, as the person in the area most strongly affected by—Voldemort's magic." He had to take a deep breath before the name, but he said it. "I've been a voice in his head for the past year. Luckily, he finally located my body, and I've been restored to myself by the good offices of Headmistress McGonagall." He bowed to McGonagall. "And I am heir of the Black estates."

"I don't believe it." Burke's voice was quick, rapid. "Prove yourself."

Regulus grinned at him. "I filed the paperwork at the Ministry yesterday. I'm sure the story will be in the Prophet by this evening or tomorrow morning. You can read all about it there."

"That doesn't prove anything." Burke glanced around at the other allies, as though looking for support. "Why do you think Potter's trotted this impostor out?" he demanded. "To prove that he has some kind of claim to the Black estates, when everyone knows that by right of descent they should go to me."

"Not as long as I am alive, Burke," Narcissa said, in a flat, calm voice. "And after me comes my son."

"You know very well that if the Ministry officials had listened to reason half a century ago—" Burke began.

"Be that as it may," Regulus cut him off, "I'm the eldest son left alive in direct line of descent. And I've made Harry my heir."

Henrietta narrowed her eyes and gave Harry a look more calculating than ever at that. Honoria giggled and clapped her hands in delight. Most of the others again wore some expression in the middle of surprise.

Burke went mad.

Leaping to his feet, he pointed one trembling finger at Harry. "This is a lie," he breathed. "The Black estates should go to me. Everyone who actually matters knows that. I will not tolerate this—"

"Shut up, Burke," said Harry. He didn't realize how hard his voice would be until he said it. Burke stared at him in shock, and Harry went on, not daring to back off now that he'd started this, keeping his tone low and measured. "If you cannot accept that Regulus Black is who he says he is, and the rightful heir of the Black estates, then you may leave, and consider our alliance officially broken. I see little to no value in an ally who chooses to bring up obscure legal disputes on the eve of battle, let alone one who will not listen to reasonable explanations."

Burke's face went through several different colors in the space of half a minute. Then he sank slowly back down in his chair, and stared at the floor.

"I do want to matter," he whispered. "I do want to be part of this alliance."

Harry narrowed his eyes at him. "Then control yourself," he hissed, and glanced at the others. "Does anyone else have a problem with this?"

None of them did. A strange half-smile lingered on Henrietta's face, but other than that, there was not even a halfway objectionable expression. Harry nodded, and took his chair, finally.

"Voldemort is attacking the Muggles through their underground system," he said, deciding to lay it out in blunt terms, so that no one else could raise more objections to imaginary obstacles. "He's using wooden disks to do so—disks that will crack apart the stone at the easiest points between the Muggle and the wizarding sections of the tunnels, to permit his Death Eaters entrance. I've spoken with the southern goblins, and they did agree to use their magic to protect the tunnels. But I don't know everything about Voldemort's plan, like why he's attacking Muggles in particular, and I think we should be on our guard." He hesitated, but decided that he had to reveal the next piece of information. If he didn't, then he might get some of his allies killed. "I've also heard, though not confirmed as yet, that Voldemort is attacking Muggleborn children who are too young to attend Hogwarts. He got their names thanks to Mulciber entering the school last year. He can drain their magic and make his own stronger."

"No, he can't," said Mortimer, rather pompously. "There were no reports of that during the First War."

"How would you know?" Charles asked, his voice soft and dangerous. "You weren't in the country at the time."

Mortimer flushed, and Harry decided that it was time to intervene again. "His draining ability has grown stronger since his resurrection," he said. "As I said, I haven't been able to confirm this as yet, but it could mean that he'll be considerably stronger than we ever expected. Retreat, if he's there. Leave him up to me."

"Potter."

Harry glanced questioningly at Ignifer, who was leaning forward. "Why are you so confident that you can handle him?" she demanded. "We're your allies. Let us help you."

Harry sighed. He would have to bring this up, too, it seemed. "I can do the same thing, if need be," he said. "I've swallowed some of his magic in the past, and made it part of my own."

"Then you could take power in the same way," said Mortimer. "Find a few willing volunteers of your own. Problem solved."

Harry saw his older allies—the Malfoys, Hawthorn, Adalrico—shake their heads sadly. Harry tried as best he could to keep his temper while answering. Mortimer was valuable mostly as a contact point among other families, Narcissa had told him, since he was the heir of an important pureblood line, for though he was. That meant Harry had to treat him well. It didn't mean that he had to have any real respect for his intelligence, only seem as if he had. "I would rather not do that. No wizard or witch would like having his or her magic drained, and I don't think as many would be willing to become volunteers as you think."

"If it's for the good of the wizarding world, they should," said Mortimer.

Harry raised his eyebrows. "Are you volunteering?"

Mortimer recoiled. "I am a pureblood heir," he spluttered. "I was thinking—Muggleborns or something." He waved a hand. "Someone who doesn't matter all that much to the future of our world."

"I don't see a difference between Muggleborns and purebloods," said Harry mildly. He was aware of several of his allies' gazes sharpening. He did not care. He would make this clear, too. In a way, he found it hard to imagine that they hadn't already known it. "I would take magic only from someone like Voldemort who's proven himself all but irredeemable, or from someone who willingly offered it to me. I've only ever used my draining ability to defend myself. It will stay that way."

A silence succeeded his words. Then Ignifer asked, "So what exactly do you want us to do, Potter?"

Harry let out a small sigh. No open complaints. That's progress, of a sort. "Work with me," he said. "We need to set up a strategy to confine the Death Eaters if they do break through. I need to know more about what each of you can do, beyond the obvious, to know where best to put you."

Ignifer volunteered first, as Harry had suspected she would. "I am best with fire magic," she said softly. "I can call flame hot enough to burn stone, if that's necessary."

"I'd like to have you at one of the entrances to the London Underground, then," Harry told her. "If worst comes to worst, we might need you to bring one of the tunnels down on the Death Eaters' heads. Do you have any objection to working with goblins?"

Ignifer shook her head. Harry nodded back. "I'll owl the hanarz and ask her to fix you a position, then."

"Illusions are my strength," said Honoria. "And I can—well, I can pass very quickly between point and point, if that's what you need someone to do." She looked pleased with herself, and disinclined to reveal what about her might permit her to do that.

Harry glanced at Snape, whose eyes were narrowed. Snape gave him a barely perceptible nod. He'd used enough Legilimency to see that Honoria wasn't lying or exaggerating, then.

"You're messenger," Harry told her, and Honoria squeaked as if that pleased her. "Secondary line of defense." He turned expectantly to the others.

Slowly, he worked out where they would be best placed. Most of them would be best guarding the critical junction points in the tunnels, Harry decided. The biggest problem was that they had no idea how many points Voldemort might strike at, and he would certainly have more Death Eaters than Harry had defenders. So they would keep their strategy light and fast-moving, with everyone ready to retreat and call on the goblins for help if too many Death Eaters managed to break through, and they would stay connected by means of Honoria and a messenger spell that Lucius quietly offered to teach everyone else. Regulus and Snape would act as guards for Harry. Harry wasn't happy about that part of it, but had the sense to keep his objections quiet, since he knew neither Regulus nor Snape would be moved.

Regulus was grinning by the time they were done, his gray eyes sparkling in a way that reminded Harry painfully of Sirius's. "I have some toys at home that might just help," he mused.

Harry could feel himself relaxing, just a bit, as the realization that they had a strategy pushed into him. It still wasn't perfect. Voldemort would still be hard to defeat. But Harry thought now, with some hope, of everyone actually managing to survive the equinox, and the Muggles being safe.

If everyone just does as we hope they will do. If we can manage to hold this together.

"Oh, by the way, Harry," Regulus told him casually, as the rest of his allies were filing out the door, "I thought you should know that Severus agreed to let you become my heir."

Harry shot Snape a betrayed look, and got a flat glare in retaliation, which promised detention if he opened his mouth. Harry huffed, and kept quiet, but he was already thinking up ways to convince Regulus otherwise.

It's one thing for me to have guards in the middle of battle. I'm probably Voldemort's primary target, by now. But for Merlin's sake, Regulus needs to get over this silly idea. He could still meet someone whom he wants to marry, or a child he wants to adopt.

I was right. It is like having two guardians, and neither one of them listens to me.

Chapter Twenty-Three: Up From Beneath

The first thing Harry noticed when he woke on the morning of the autumnal equinox was that Argutus was blue.

He blinked and reached for his glasses, slipping them on before he looked again. But no, his eyes had not deceived him. The little Omen snake was swarming with blue, color that bent and rippled and ran over his scales with his movement, as though he were a moving mirror pointed at an ocean scene.

Harry murmured, "Why do you look like that?"

Argutus woke and tilted his head to look down at his body. "I must be foretelling a vision of the future," he said, sounding pleased with himself. "I don't know what it means yet. I think I will in a few months. Do you know what it means?" He nudged Harry's hand with an affectionate push of his neck.

Harry tried to pick him up, but Argutus slithered free easily and waited until Harry lowered his left arm and let him crawl up it. "No," he said. "And do you mean that you'll know what this glimpse of the future means in a few months, or how to sense what a vision means then?"

"What a vision means." Argutus wriggled and got comfortable on Harry's shoulder as Harry went towards the loo. He liked the sensation of hot water cascading over his scales, and would not listen when Harry told him that he was a decadent little snake. "I can almost grasp the meaning right now, but it's floating just out of reach. I am only a young Omen snake as yet. Give me time."

Young, but curious and arrogant as hell, Harry thought, with a shake of his head. Argutus regularly left his shoulder now to slither around the school and "investigate" what other people were doing. Since he couldn't understand English, he came back with all kinds of wild and preposterous tales. If Harry could believe Argutus, half the school was plotting against him, and every spell was practiced for the sole purpose of either affecting Harry somehow or affecting an innocent Omen snake who was only trying to find interesting things to see.

He dwelt on the thoughts as long as he could. They were amusing, and they might help to keep his mind away from the battle that would be rising soon.

Any moment, he kept expecting a letter from Madam Marchbanks or the hanarz telling him that the attack had begun, but he got through breakfast—and another inflammatory article from the reporter he didn't recognize, this time hinting that Harry had used Dark magic on his parents—without one arriving. Now they were in Defense Against the Dark Arts, and Acies was having them write down all the definitions of Dark they knew so far. She'd given no reason for it.

Well, I know the reason, Harry thought, as he finished his list and racked his brain for one more possibility. She'll probably tell us how inadequate they are in a moment.

Wildness, solitary magic, compulsion, deception...those were the four definitions of Dark magic he knew, and everything else he'd come up with was a variation on those. Harry frowned at his parchment, and hoped against hope that his brain might conjure more if he just concentrated.

Halfway through a period of intense concentration, he realized that he was reviewing the battle plans in his head, and gave up with a little sigh. Pansy glanced quickly at him, then looked away, as though trying to pretend that he wasn't of interest to her. Harry sat back and thought about the plans one more time.

Snape and Regulus, who was due in an hour, would remain in the school with him until the attack actually began, and then go with him to the battlefield—or battle tunnel, as Harry supposed it might more properly be called. Honoria was acting as messenger. Most of his allies, the ones without Dark Marks on their arms, were holding positions in the junctions between the Muggle world and the wizarding one. Lucius, Hawthorn, and Adalrico had chosen those wizarding tunnels most likely to be attacked, and were well away from the hanarz's chains, which would otherwise strike at them.

He wasn't forgetting anything. That was what they had planned. No one had sent him a letter saying that he couldn't do his part. Harry had discreetly warned the Ministry, through Madam Marchbanks, that something momentous might happen today. He didn't dare be too open, with any of his Light allies. The balance between them and his Dark allies was shaky, the more so with all the opposition stirring against Harry among the Light purebloods. Besides, many in the Ministry would go slightly mad if they knew the southern goblins were free to make their own decisions about protecting the tunnels under Muggle London like that.

"Read me your list, Miss Bulstrode."

Harry sat up, blinking, and flushing a bit as Acies's dangerous eyes passed across his face and he realized that she had surely noticed his distraction. That's the bad thing about having a professor with a mind that's partially a dragon's. You can't fool her.

Millicent cleared her throat and began to read. If she had been at all startled by their professor's abrupt demand, she hid it well. "Dark is often wildness," she said. "Examples are the magic that appears on Walpurgis Night, the magic in birthing rituals, and the use of Dark creatures like dragons. At the same time, Dark Arts often rely on compulsion. Webs, for example." There was probably no force on earth that could have kept her from winking at Harry at that point, and Harry didn't try to stop her. "These forces are usually seen as coming together in the wildness of the caster's will. They restrain others so that they may be free and unrestrained themselves."

"Very good, Miss Bulstrode," said Acies softly. "Three points to Slytherin. And do any of you know how the spells often considered Dark Arts—the Unforgivable Curses, for example—fit in with these definitions?"

There were a few shrugs and mutters. Harry cocked his head in curiosity. Remus had been the first Defense professor to teach them some of the theory behind Dark Arts, and of course the disguised Mulciber had shown them the Unforgivable Curses, but Harry hadn't known that the theory could account for specific spells so well. He'd got used to wielding what magic needed to be wielded, and then working out the theoretical ramifications of what he'd done later.

“Dark Arts represent a partial sacrifice of will,” said Acies. “Many wizards and witches are safe even with those spells called evil if they do not surrender their whole wills, if they remember that the use of some curses may mean time in Azkaban or the death and ruin of people they love. But when they give themselves up completely, trade free will for wildness, then they are likely to cast a Crucio where a far milder pain spell would do instead.”

She swept her head around to stare at the rest of the class. “When we begin practicing with Dark Arts, I will expect you to keep this in mind. Retain your free will, always. No amount of power can make up for its sacrifice.”

“Professor Merryweather,” said Susan Bones, her voice both fascinated and horrified. “Are you saying that—that Dark Arts are all right as long as we don’t lose ourselves completely?”

“I am considering them from the perspective of the wielder, Miss Bones,” said Acies, implacably. “From the perspective of the victim, they are of course different. But it seems that you are considering that a pain curse must be a Dark Arts spell. Does that include Anapneo?”

Susan frowned. “But that just helps someone who’s choking. It’s not a pain curse!”

“Yes, it is,” said Acies. “It causes pain.”

“That’s different from something like Crucio,” Susan argued.

“Three points to Hufflepuff,” Acies said. “You are distinguishing among them already. That is an integral part of Defense Against the Dark Arts, the inner defense and ability to think rationally about spells, no matter their effects. Another way to sacrifice free will is to give in to fear.” Harry told himself that Acies wasn’t looking significantly in Margaret’s direction, that he’d just imagined it. “When one begins to scream in fear of Dark Arts, one has surrendered and made a whole sacrifice where a partial one—that of caution—is required.”

Harry heard Margaret make a rude sound under her breath, but he didn’t get to hear more than that as his scar erupted in pain.

Even as he went to one knee, seeing Millicent reach out towards him and Pansy make an aborted movement, Harry remained calm. I expected this. This is probably the first sign of the attack. Voldemort is so excited that he can't control his glee any more, and the link between us is open.

He quickly realized he was mistaken when he opened his eyes again and saw, not the Defense classroom, but a misty dreamworld, like the vision he'd had of the Weasley house when Voldemort attacked it. He stood up quickly, and stared in several directions. He was on a beach, near the rolling sea.

He recognized it—the beach in Northumberland where Death Eaters had attacked him, where he had run with unicorns, where he and his father and Connor had celebrated Midsummer.

“Potter,” said Voldemort from behind him, his voice laced with self-satisfaction. “I had looked forward to meeting you here. But I see that you have guessed wrong. How disappointing. Up from beneath, Harry. Any moment now, the Muggles will hear the singing come from their river.”

The pain in his scar grew intense then, and the dreamworld broke apart around him. Harry came to on the floor, with Millicent and Acies bending over him, sheltering him from the too-curious gazes of his other classmates.

Harry lay paralyzed for a moment, trying to work out what Voldemort meant, why the hell he would be on a beach instead of in London, why he would be talking about singing, of all things—

And then Argutus crawled towards his face, hissing in concern, and Harry caught another glimpse of his blue and shifting scales.

The color of water reflecting the sky.

An attack by water. Not the tunnels.

Singing.

The sirens Voldemort freed!

Harry, gasping, felt his mind leap over several steps to arrive at the logical conclusion. He'd heard the words "up from beneath" in his vision of Voldemort, and simply assumed that they meant an attack through tunnels. He'd had no real proof that they did. And Bellatrix had been speaking of telling their allies about the attack, allies to whom Voldemort had promised the aid of the basilisks, but only if they needed it.

I was a fool, Harry thought grimly, his new crystalline thoughts unfurling quickly. And "their river." Voldemort's sending the sirens up the Thames.

Harry let his magic flood through him, dimming the pain and raising him to his feet so quickly that both Millicent and Acies had to scramble out of the way. His mind was still racing, and he didn't immediately move, other than to wipe away the blood pouring from his scar, because it was getting in his way.

Those wooden disks he used—perhaps the tangle of lines on them represented rivers, after all, and not tunnels. That doesn't tell me where he is, though, does it? He could be anywhere in London. He might be somewhere else entirely, contacting and controlling the sirens by means of those disks, and I won't know. So what's the best course to find him?

A Death Eater can Apparate to his side.

Harry started out of the Defense classroom, with the intent of finding Snape. Plans raced around his head and chattered a mile a minute. He knew what he would do the moment he found Snape, and he knew what weapons he would fetch from the trunk in his room, and he knew which of his allies he would try to contact—the only ones whom he had the means to contact.

"Harry."

He blinked and turned around. It was so hard to remember that Millicent might be concerned for him. The knowledge that he had been wrong, his allies all in place to counteract a plan that Voldemort had no intention of using, seemed to have moved him into a different world, and if she had something useful to say, then she should say it and be done. Harry stared at Millicent, and she looked quickly away from him, as though his eyes frightened her.

“Good luck,” she said softly.

Harry nodded once, and then sprinted out of the Defense classroom, heading for the dungeons. His mind dragged up information he had noted but not thought of consciously until now, when it might prove useful. Snape’s teaching Potions right now. The classroom, not his office.

He ran. He had not used his training in sheer speed very often lately, but he hadn’t let himself go, either. He knew the best way of taking stairs, of sliding quickly around corners with an eye as to whether anyone was coming towards him or not, and how to let himself fall and roll when it was the best way to get somewhere quickly. He was at the door of the Potions classroom before he had known he could be.

Before he could knock, someone grabbed his shoulder, and he whipped around, though his magic didn’t rise in defense. The touch of the hand was too familiar for that.

It was Connor, grimacing and touching his forehead. “I felt him,” he said quietly. “He’s happy, isn’t he? And I know that he was talking to you. I figured you’d go to Snape.”

Harry considered Connor for a single rapid moment. His brother had never fought, not in a proper battle, and it might be suicide to take him along.

On the other hand, Connor’s jaw was set, indicating he wasn’t going anywhere, and there was the chance, if only a chance, that his compulsion gift could be useful in reversing the sirens’ voices.

“He’s attacking with the sirens,” said Harry. “Not in the tunnels, the way I thought.” He put his shoulder to the door of the Potions classroom and banged it open, interrupting Snape in mid-speech.

Snape caught his eye and didn’t waste his breath on anything as trivial as a scolding for the interruption, instead taking several long steps forward. Harry met him next to a table full of wide-eyed third-year Hufflepuffs and Ravenclaws, and motioned curtly with his head for him to bend down. Some guardian part of his mind had warned him that it would be for the best if everyone around them didn’t have the idea that Snape carried the Dark Mark on his forearm. It was known, of course, but students this young didn’t need the reminder.

“Voldemort’s attacking London, but with the sirens, not up the tunnels,” said Harry. “I need you to Apparate me to him, following your brand. I’ll fetch a few things, and then we’ll go.”

Snape did not argue. Rather, he turned to his class, snapped, “Write me a foot-long essay on the properties of Calming Potions, due tomorrow,” and then followed Harry out of the classroom. Harry lengthened his steps the moment they were out of sight of the silent and staring third-years. The common room was his goal now, and the gifts his allies had given him which might help in battle. He had the means to summon at least two of his allies from their mistaken positions in London, and they could tell the others. Harry only hoped that they would be willing to follow the sudden change in plans, as well as willing to let former Death Eaters Side-Along Apparate them.

“How did you find out about this?” Snape demanded behind him.

“He contacted me in the middle of Defense,” said Harry, and wiped at another stubborn blob of blood creeping down his face. Damn scar. It’s rather annoying. “Just had to laugh and brag about his victory, I suppose, and not seeing me there.”

That was something else Harry hadn’t considered.

He expected to see me there. He expected me to have figured out his plan.

There was proof positive that he suspected Harry was spying on him in his visions. Harry grimaced in resignation. I can't trust the scar link to give me reliable information on his movements anymore.

I suppose that I'll just have to take on the war on the offensive, then. Well, let's. You won't know what bit you, Tom.

They reached the door of the Slytherin common room, and Harry snapped, "Pureblood dignity," making it slide back. A few students with free periods, lounging about the place, stared at him as he walked past. Their stares only intensified when their Head of House and a Gryffindor followed.

Harry ignored them. It was hardly a secret that Snape opposed Voldemort anymore, not when he'd openly attacked Bellatrix at the end of third year. He was more concerned right now in running over the things he could take with him to the battle. Any slim advantage he had over Voldemort right now would be helpful.

He walked over to his trunk the moment he entered his room. Fawkes, sitting on his bed, opened one eye and gave a sleepy chirp, and then sat up again and chirped more forcefully when he saw Harry kneel down and start rifling through his belongings.

Out came Honoria's whistle, which Harry hung around his neck, and the dragon scale Ignifer had given him. Harry hesitated, thought about waving it right now to summon her, and then shook his head and stuck it in his pocket. If he waved it now, she couldn't come to him anyway through Hogwarts's anti-Apparition wards. Better to do it once he reached the scene of the battle, and then there would be a person beyond the former Death Eaters who knew where to find him.

He drew out the flowering vine that Hawthorn had given him for Christmas last year, and leaned towards one of the blossoms. He had to hope it would work when she wasn't at home, but crouched in one of the tunnels beneath London, getting ready to deflect an attack she thought was coming at any second.

"Hawthorn?" he asked.

He heard a startled breath, but though he stared hard into the flower, he couldn't see anything. Well, she had only told him it would transmit voices, and she presumably knew her own enchantment. Hawthorn responded a moment later, her voice intense. "Harry? You're using the vine I gave you?"

"Yes," said Harry, as he sorted through other items in his trunk, using his stump to move them and his hand to actually pick them up. Alliance compass—I don't need it, but Connor might, if he gets separated from the others in the battle and needs to know which direction to head in. He tossed the compass to his brother, who caught it, looking startled. Books, robes, maps, no, no, no—ah, the knife that Adalrico gave me! Harry hung that at his belt as he continued talking to Hawthorn. "Plan's changed. Voldemort's not attacking the tunnels. He's sending sirens up the Thames, and maybe other rivers, to sing at the Muggles. I don't know where he is, but you can find him through your Dark Mark, can't you? I need you to alert the others, and Apparate the ones who have no Mark to the site of the battle."

No complaints, no hesitation, no remarks about Hawthorn standing a good chance of being killed if she went into a nest of Death Eaters. She said only, "Of course, Harry," and then there came the sound of quick footsteps on stone, an odd thing to hear through the blossoms of a plant.

"Thank you," Harry said, not knowing if she heard him or not, and then put the vine aside and scanned the rest of his trunk. The glass serpent caught his eye, glowing almost completely blue, and he scooped that out and into his pocket. A good thing to have an emergency Portkey around, whether it was for him or someone else. He was sure it would work to transport someone else to Malfoy Manor, since it had worked for Vince.

Draco.

Harry hesitated. He knew that Draco had Ancient Runes right now. The classroom wasn't that far away, and since Harry had no idea if the attack had already begun or not, and was doing his best not to act like an idiot and dash into things, he knew he had the time to take him along.

Do I want to? He would be going into danger—

Then Harry shook his head, remembering the conversation he'd had with Draco last year on the day he freed the unicorns and Draco made him understand exactly what his love felt like. No. I told him I would never make him wait behind like some soldier's spouse who couldn't fight. He can fight, and he would want to come with me. At the very least, I've got to offer him the choice.

He slid to his feet, closed the trunk, and glanced down at Argutus. "Do you want to stay here?"

"No! This is interesting." The little Omen snake sounded rapturous. Harry shook his head and held his arm up for Fawkes, who flew to his shoulder.

"We're stopping by the Ancient Runes classroom to fetch Draco," he said. "And then we need to go briefly into the Forbidden Forest."

"Do we have time?" Connor demanded, his eyes flaring with a courage that struck Harry as inescapably Gryffindor. "There could be innocent people dying right now."

"There could be," said Harry steadily, hoping that his brother paid attention to his words and not the death glare Snape was throwing him. "But I don't know that, and I'd rather not rush into this. I don't even know where Voldemort is, not for certain. We've got to go, yes, but we have some time."

"Harry is correct," said Snape, in his softest voice. "I, for one, would rather see him take care with his safety than rush blindly into things on the mere hope that he could save someone's life."

Harry arched his eyebrows at him. "See? I do learn," he said, and then he was out of the room, running across the Slytherin common room, then towards the stairs out of the dungeons and up to the Ancient Runes class. Plans were still running around his mind, chattering at him, but some of them would necessarily be held in abeyance until he saw what the battlefield looked like.

He didn't bother begging the professor's pardon when he finally stepped into the middle of Ancient Runes, just locked eyes with Draco, who was sitting across the classroom in a straight line from the door, and said, "We're going to do battle with the Dark Lord. Are you coming?"

Draco blinked once, such a hard blink that it seemed to clear out most of his surprise. Then he nodded, stood, and scooped up his wand from his bag, following Harry out. Harry waited for him to come up and stand at his right shoulder, unable to express the satisfaction he felt in mere words.

He did give Draco one fierce smile, which Draco returned with interest. Then they were off again, and Harry felt the smile drop from his face as he raced through calculations of time and distance, and concluded that they had a few minutes to spare. He would ask for aid, but if the question couldn't travel fast enough through the Forbidden Forest, then they would have to depart.

Fawkes sat up on his shoulder and gave a deep warble. Harry smiled at him.

"Can you tell the Many that I'd like their help?" he asked.

Fawkes uttered a resigned sound at having to deal with snakes, and then rose and vanished in a ball of flame. Harry focused on reaching the doors out of the school, his mind throwing possibilities at him.

What happens if Voldemort's in London? Then we battle him in front of a bunch of Muggles, I suppose, and it's work for the Obliviators later. I'd still rather use magic in front of Muggles than sacrifice their lives.

What happens if he's somewhere else? It should be near water. We'll have to depend on our magic, and hope that he doesn't have a large number of Death Eaters with him.

What happens if Draco or Connor gets hurt?

Harry narrowed his eyes. Then Voldemort, or whatever Death Eater did it, gets to know what pain feels like.

Can we count on any other aid from magical creatures? No, I don't think so. I know I can transport the Many, but I couldn't take more than a few Runespoors, and the centaurs are too big for us to Apparate. The unicorns might aid us, I suppose, but that's entirely their own affair, and we can't count on it.

Do we have a way to contact Regulus? I guess we can hope he feels something strange through the Dark Mark and comes to us, but we can't count on that, either. I should have thought of firecalling him while I was in the school, but I didn't, and it would have meant a side trip, anyway. If we all survive this, then I'll make sure we have some faster way of contacting each other. A mirror might do the trick.

Harry was a bit surprised that he hadn't tried this method of planning before he leaped before. It wasn't really simple, but it worked. Of course, it was probably only working because he had no idea if Voldemort was already snaring and torturing innocent Muggles or not.

And why is he attacking Muggles anyway? What does he want from them?

It doesn't really matter, I suppose. Nothing good.

They reached the edge of the Forbidden Forest, in time to meet a proud Fawkes and a writhing tangle of the Many. Harry knelt down, thinking just in time to pull Argutus into the collar of his robes.

The tiny green-gold cobras poured up his body and coiled around his legs, his chest, his neck, and his face, hissing greetings all the while. One of them hung around Harry's throat, ignoring Argutus as if he were a piece of string, and said, "We have come, because you helped free us from the web that would have taken us. It took you a long time to decide that you wanted repayment for that debt."

“Well, I want it now,” said Harry simply, and then glanced up at Snape to make sure that he was speaking English. “Do you think that you can Apparate me with the snakes clinging to me?”

Snape nodded, and then looked at Draco and Connor, who wore identical mutinous expressions. “I will come back for you,” he said. “Do not try to follow, or what you receive from me will make being splinched look amusing.”

Connor cowered. Draco just glared at him, a steady look that said Snape had better come back.

Harry shook his head and turned away again, this time heading for Hogsmeade and the edge of the wards around the school. The shape of the Portkey in his pocket bumped and jostled, and so did the unfamiliar weight of the blade at his belt and the whistle around his neck, which the Many were curiously twining around. I hope these will be useful after all.

They reached the edge of the wards. Harry glanced once at Snape, who seized his left arm with his right hand. He shook his own left sleeve, and his Dark Mark came free, gleaming black.

“Can you still Apparate to him even though he hasn’t summoned you?” Harry asked, abruptly realizing that there might be a flaw in his plan.

“We can find him, if we concentrate,” said Snape quietly. “It is not widely-known, but we may go to him even when he does not summon us, if we are willing to expend the necessary magic.” He narrowed his eyes. “He may be actively keeping me away, of course, and then this will not work, but I do not think so. He wants you there, Harry.”

His eyes conveyed a different message. Endanger your own life on purpose, and you will have to deal with me.

Harry nodded, in response to both messages, and then leaned close to Snape. The Many and Argutus both hissed encouragement. Harry saw Snape close his eyes, and his face became pale and strained.

The snake on his arm, black and slickly gleaming, unwound from the skull, and conducted an obscene little dance towards Snape's elbow. Harry stared, and then the world around them vanished and whirled around and squeezed him through a tight tunnel, and he was landing on sand and heard the roar of the surf in the background.

He wasn't that surprised to find himself on the Northumberland beach. He grimaced. Bastard. Probably chose the place on purpose, hoping to throw me off balance.

Harry didn't feel thrown off balance. He felt focused, sharp, his mind clear and rich with purpose. He answered the squeeze of Snape's hand on his shoulder with a quick nod, and then turned around, looking for Voldemort, even as he drew Ignifer's dragon scale from his pocket and gave it a quick wave.

He caught the sensation of familiar magic, a powerful glamour, and stared at it. His own power went to work, wearing it away. When it fell, he could see Voldemort standing with a circle of wooden disks spread around him, one hand extended and a low humming noise rising from his throat, or perhaps his robes. The purple shapes of two basilisks coiled at his feet. Behind him crouched two naked Death Eaters, one man and one woman. Harry opened his mouth in a snarl. Greyback and Whitecheek.

Voldemort looked at him, and smiled.

And then his magic rose and unfolded around him.

He had been feeding on Muggleborn children, Harry knew at once, or at least on someone. The feeling of dark, vicious magic that rose from him like greasy smoke was immeasurably stronger than it had been at the Burrow, perhaps twice as powerful. Harry knew it when the magic turned, coiling like one of the basilisks, and then shot straight at them.

At him, and at Snape, who still had not Disapparated.

"Go!" Harry screamed, and then reached out and poured his will into the goal of getting Snape to go back to Hogwarts for Draco and Connor, the way he had once forced Evan Rosier to go back to his lord. He heard the crack of Snape vanishing, and had a moment to feel satisfied.

Then Voldemort's magic struck him like a whale's back.

Harry went sprawling, and found he couldn't get a breath. The magic held him down, lying on top of him, squeezing every bit of air out of his lungs, flowing and overflowing and draping and slamming down. There was more, always more, and Voldemort pinned him and yet had the power to do whatever spell to command the sirens he was pouring through the wooden disks.

"You thought you could challenge me, Harry," Harry heard Voldemort whisper, beyond the ringing in his ears and the blackness teasing at his vision from the lack of breath. "How wrong you were, how wrong all the challengers to Lord Voldemort's power always are."

"Flagellum Ardoris!"

Harry heard a scream, smelled smoke, saw a burst of light. Then the pressure on him eased, enough that he could draw in a breath. Air had never tasted so sweet. He rolled over and drew his own magic up, weaving linked Shield Charms around himself, so that he wouldn't get taken by such surprise again.

When he turned his head, he saw Ignifer Apollonis dancing around Voldemort's circle of wooden disks, igniting one after another. In her hand was a whip of flame, glowing red and orange and gold, and white where it ran into her clenched fist, and cracking down with enormous force at the slightest twist of her arm. Everywhere it touched, it burned, and already four or five of the disks were gone.

She saved my life.

And Voldemort was about to take hers, now that he was past the shock of surprise and drawing back his magic for another strike. He had his wand leveled, Harry saw. He could and would cast a Killing Curse without hesitation.

Harry focused on Voldemort's wand and thought, Expelliarmus!

It probably only worked because Voldemort hadn't been expecting an attack from that angle, but Harry didn't care. The yew wand still soared from Voldemort's hand to his. Harry quickly threw it down on the sand behind him and took a step backwards, trying to snap it in half. It resisted the weight of his foot, though. Voldemort had probably enchanted it to protect itself against such a simple tactic. Pity.

"What shall we do?"

Harry started. He'd forgotten about the Many, involved in the battle as he was. "Attack the large snakes and the ones in the circle who smell like wolves," he said. "Bite them, spit into their eyes, do whatever you can to make sure that they don't interfere."

He heard the cracks of Apparition as more people arrived—allies or Death Eaters, he couldn't tell. The Many left his body in a glorious wave, pouring directly towards the circle. Voldemort was hissing to the basilisks now, commanding them to the attack, and Harry could only hope the hive cobras would survive. They had one enormous advantage: their mind was collective, and could move to any body in the hive at an instant's notice, which meant the basilisks would have to kill them all to actually defeat them.

Harry felt a weight against his shoulder, and Draco whispered, "I'm here. What should I do?"

"Cover your ears," Harry suggested, and blew Honoria's whistle.

Someone roared with laughter behind him. Harry turned to see Karkaroff sagging, his arms wrapped around his belly as he tried, gamely, to stifle his laughter and take a few more steps forward. Behind him were other Death Eaters, though it looked as though Hawthorn and at least one of his allies were hastening over the small hills and down to the beach.

The basilisks were engaged with the Many, and Greyback and Whitecheek were among the whistle's victims.

But Voldemort was free to pay attention to other things now, and his gaze locked with Harry's.

Harry felt his scar blaze into life. He gritted his teeth and moved forward, trying to retain the clear head that had brought him here. Voldemort was working some sort of spell with the wooden disks. Harry thought it was to control the sirens, though he had only his guess. That meant the disks had to be destroyed. Of course, Voldemort's magic was coiling protectively around them now, making that easier said than done.

Needs must, Harry thought, reluctantly, and began to siphon Voldemort's magic.

Voldemort realized what was happening at once, of course, but the moment he moved to defend himself, Harry flicked his gaze to one of the disks that Ignifer—helpless with laughter, just like the rest of them—hadn't managed to destroy, and thought, Reducto!

The disk blasted apart. Voldemort narrowed his eyes, and the pain in Harry's scar increased until he sagged to his knees. He felt Draco put his arms around him from behind, and leaned back into that comforting embrace, even as his body flooded with foul, tainted power.

Harry hated the feeling of it. He was drowning in slime and ashes, and he couldn't imagine making that magic part of himself. But he knew that he had to keep on drawing it. Voldemort was too strong. In a moment, he'd come up with some way to both defend the circle of disks and fight Harry, and then the battle would turn in the Death Eaters' favor.

The relentless roar and hiss of the waves surged up in Harry's mind between the silence of one thought and the next, giving him his answer.

He took a deep breath and opened himself wide, the jaws of the snake inside him stretching and stretching. He dropped all the other magic, even the Shield Charms he'd strung around himself.

Voldemort could have taken him in that moment, if he'd reacted fast enough.

He didn't. Harry seized his magic instead, and opened the siphon at the other end, pulling Voldemort's power from him and dumping it directly into the sea.

In moments, the feeling of slime and ashes diminished, and so did the sensation that the magic he'd swallowed was about to get out of control. Harry was vaguely aware of figures fighting around him—someone must have worked a Finite Incantatem to end the spell of Honoria's whistle—but he was much more interested in draining all of Voldemort's magic that he could.

Voldemort started to reach for Harry's own power, and then hesitated, obviously worried about the safety of the disks. Harry made him pay dearly for that moment, ripping into his core, digging into the magic that Voldemort had been born with, and tearing part of it away.

His enemy roared.

And the pain in Harry's scar increased until it became the world.

Sand and sea and Draco's arms and the pale, red-eyed face in front of him vanished. Harry knew that, yes, this was worse than the pain he'd endured when Bellatrix cut off his hand, and still he kept swallowing. He didn't think he could stop at this point, or close the siphon—one end in him, the other in the ocean, the one pulling, the other dumping.

"Reducto!"

Merlin only knew how that spell got through to him, when nothing else had, but it might have had something to do with Voldemort's attention turning elsewhere. Harry lifted his head, blinking, dazed, and saw Draco in front of him, shattering a second wooden disk as he watched.

Voldemort was narrowing his eyes, obviously unable to believe that a boy had done this, had dared to defy him—

And then he paused, and laughed softly in Harry's direction. "This is the boy that was at the center of your mind," he said, in a voice weakened by pain and rage. "The one you care about. I shall take such pleasure in destroying him."

Voldemort's gloating was a mistake, Harry thought, in at least two ways. First, it gave Harry the anger to rip off another great swathe of Voldemort's unnatural magic, and send it running away into the sea.

Second, it gave Lucius Malfoy time to get there.

"Cremo!"

The rest of Voldemort's wooden disks burst into flame. Voldemort screamed like something dying, like something wounded, and wheeled to face Lucius, who had just lowered his wand and was looking at his former lord with no expression whatsoever on his face.

Harry gathered himself. Voldemort's magic was building, shifting, no doubt aiming at Lucius. His wand had gone soaring back to his hand by now, and while his wandless power might be drained, he was still dangerous. An Avada Kedavra could still lay Lucius low.

Harry imagined his enemy utterly drained of magic, and struck out wildly with his will, aiming straight at everything Voldemort was.

It didn't work, as Harry had thought it wouldn't, ripping an intense wound but not a mortal one. Voldemort turned around, his eyes narrowed, and then reached out and pinched Harry's siphon shut. Harry gasped at the pain, but felt a healthy dose of satisfaction to go with it. He should have done that long since. We rattled him. And we utterly destroyed whatever plan he had to capture or kill the Muggles. I hope.

A voice spoke from behind Harry, saying his name. Connor's voice.

Voldemort turned. He spoke no word, but a boiling black light left his wand, a spell Harry didn't recognize, aimed straight at Connor. Harry wasn't quick enough to stop it.

Harry did have the time to think about what should happen in the next few moments, as the chattering plans in his head shut up and one voice alone remained, one that assessed the risk. It was an unknown curse, one that Connor was more than likely not to survive. And if Connor died or was destroyed, then Harry knew he would not long survive his brother. The guilt alone would tear him apart.

On the other hand, he had at least a chance of being able to survive the curse, whatever it did, since his magic was so much stronger than Connor's, and Voldemort had been seriously weakened. And he had former Death Eaters among his allies. There was a chance that one of them had seen Voldemort use this curse before and would know how to counteract it. They would have the motivation to help him where they might not want to help Connor.

Sometimes, his training in sacrifice was a wonderful thing, to let him make such decisions so fast and so clearly.

He rose and flung himself in the way of the curse.

Black walls snapped shut around him, his mind closed in on itself, and then he tumbled into darkness, and silence, and cold.

Chapter Twenty-Four: Psychology on the Wing

Henrietta had to admit some disappointment when she finally recovered from the spell of that stupid whistle and found herself with only inexperienced Death Eaters to fight—students from Durmstrang, by the look of them. She shrugged as she gestured with her wand for them to come ahead. One thing opponents like this were good for was practicing her experimental spellwork.

“Avada Kedavra,” she said, mildly enough, but she swept her wand in a long wave, left to right, as she spoke the spell, trying as hard as she could to kill two with just the one curse.

It didn’t quite work. One of the boys facing her dropped dead, and the other sagged, but came back to his feet, since just the edge of the green light had hit him. Henrietta frowned. That’s disappointing. She put him under Crucio to soothe her feelings, and turned to the rest of them.

She found it hard to look at the center of the battlefield, where Potter battled the Dark Lord. It was too much like looking into the heart of the sun. Magic flared there, as attractive as the light that flared from the sun, and as dazzling. Pay too much attention to it, and Henrietta would be tempted to dash forward and hurl herself into the circle, just to feel that much power blaze around her in the moments before it consumed her.

Instincts dropped her to one knee as a Cutting Curse went over her head. She turned and gestured once, speaking the spell nonverbally, and another young Durmstrang Death Eater was swimming in his own intestines. Henrietta rolled her eyes. Children these days. Did no one teach him to shield?

Someone roared in front of her. Henrietta looked up in interest as a burly Death Eater came towards her, his face nearly black with rage. Well. This looks like a more interesting opponent.

She rose and bowed her head slightly, the formal invitation to a duel. He ignored her, and just attacked. There was a lot of raw power behind the hexes he chose, but that gave him problems when Henrietta bounced them off her Shield Charm and sent them back at him. Then he backed up, and neglected to watch his footing in the shifting sand, and went down.

Henrietta sighed. Not a challenge after all. I wish Evan Rosier were here. He was a challenge. She smiled a bit. Rosier had been the only Death Eater who'd tried to "recruit" her during the First War and still managed to escape; she'd killed the others. She started off restlessly across the beach, looking for someone like that, someone who appeared experienced and competent.

Her allies, such as they were, had already taken all the best pickings. Henrietta frowned as she watched Honoria dueling a tall woman with long blonde hair. The girl sent ridiculous illusions after her, and never failed to make her enemy flinch, each time. She was playing with her. Henrietta shook her head. Of course Honoria's illusions were powerful, but she was a halfblood, and, worse in Henrietta's eyes, the daughter of a Light-inclined wizard. She didn't deserve the opponent that chance and the vagaries of battle had gifted her with.

She drew closer to the center of the battle, after all, though she kept a solid wall of fighters between her and the Dark Lord so that she wasn't tempted to rush in. As she absently killed a Death Eater or two, she studied Potter. He was kneeling there, not doing anything much on the physical plane, but obviously draining power from the Dark Lord on the magical one. Henrietta could feel immense amounts of magic sliding through him.

And yet, Potter doesn't swallow and keep it. Remarkable.

Perhaps not so much remarkable as stupid, when you get right down to it.

Then Lucius's son destroyed one of those wooden disks the Dark Lord was so fond of, and the Dark Lord just had to take a moment to pause and gloat about what he would do to the boy. Henrietta nodded slowly. Yes, it seemed that she had made the right choice to follow Potter after all. The Dark Lord could not be depended on to keep his mind on the battle.

But it would be so much better if there was a way of gaining control of Potter, if I could make him do what I told him to do.

As she watched, Lucius arrived and set the rest of the disks on fire, and then a boy who was Potter's brother, from the pictures in the papers, became the target of the Dark Lord's next curse.

And Potter stepped in the way.

Henrietta narrowed her eyes as she watched him fall. The papers were correct. He was raised, trained, to sacrifice himself for that boy gaping like a turkey with its mouth open to the rain.

The seed of a plan stirred to life in her mind. She knew the end result, and the psychology of Potter's that she would manipulate, though she did not know as yet how she would achieve it.

As she had thought would happen, the Dark Lord took the moment to fold his wounded dignity around him and flee the battlefield. Perhaps he did not believe his curse would keep Potter out for long—though Potter currently lay motionless on the sand, with his brother and Lucius's son tugging frantically at his arms and Lucius himself striding towards them, hissing at them to move away. Then the green-golden snakes added to the confusion by flooding back towards Potter, away from the dead bodies of two basilisks, and as the Death Eaters Apparated out and followed their master, the rest of Potter's minions came shoving forward to gawk.

No one was paying attention to Henrietta, even when she noiselessly slid between Honoria and Burke, and no one else saw what she saw, lying free on the sand not far from Potter's head.

She stooped and picked the objects up, thought becoming action the moment she had it, and slid them into a pocket.

She did not know if she would manage to keep her little prizes undetected throughout the aftermath of the battle, which would surely involve taking Potter back to Hogwarts and hovering over his bed like good little minions. There might be someone who had seen her take them, and then she would have to hand them over. That was all right, if it happened. She would be able to pretend she'd been looking out for Potter's safety and only his safety. In fact, she should look at them more closely anyway, before she used them. They might be worthless.

But if she could keep them, and they were worth something, then she had her plan.

Henrietta smiled, and then looked back up the beach as screams echoed through the silence. I suppose I should remove the Cruciatus Curse now.

She went back up the beach, removed the curse, and casually dispatched the silly young Death Eater. It was doing a favor to the Dark Lord, really, to reap his ranks of the untried and the witless. He ought to thank her.

Charles narrowed his eyes as he watched the others crowd in around Potter, and Snape order them away with little more than a snap of his robes as he seemed to Apparate in to Potter's side. Charles did not speak—he did not often speak in situations like this—but stood and listened to Burke and Belville converse in hushed, agitated voices.

“...give himself up for his brother, rather than one of us, what good is he?” Belville was demanding.

“Exactly my thoughts. Exactly my thoughts.” Charles didn't need to look to know that Burke would be nodding fiercely, his jowls flapping. He hadn't met the man often, but in this case, that was long enough to take his measure. “He'd sacrifice himself for family. Very noble. Very admirable, in fact, if he were the head of a pureblood family and doing that for his heir. But he's a war-leader. He has to think of his body and his magic as the king on the chessboard, not as pawns.”

Belville murmured some agreement that Charles did not deign to listen to. He turned to follow, instead, while Snape and Malfoy, walking side by side, carried Potter's body back to Hogwarts.

Charles hated to be shoved. He made up his mind slowly. He knew himself for a cautious man. Medusa had sometimes teased him about how cautious he was, and how often he might have accomplished more than he did, if he'd just been a bit more quick-witted and clever on his feet.

But he'd had a clear glimpse of Potter and that black curse, and he was a father of two twin boys. He'd seen the calculation in Potter's eyes, the imperceptible moment before he'd arched up and taken the brunt of the spell. Potter had known exactly what he was doing. He'd taken that curse for Connor Potter the way that Owen would have to save Michael. Owen was protective of his younger brother to a fault; Charles had known that since their first year at Durmstrang, when Headmaster Karkaroff had called him in to discuss Owen's punishment for cursing a professor who'd failed Michael's History of the Dark Arts project and yelled at him. Owen had given the professor a second head that yelled constant abuse in his ears.

Potter was being a brother in that moment, not a sacrifice, and that was an impulse that Charles would not have wanted him cured of, lest he turn into another Lord. Lords, Charles had decided long ago, were those who would put their own power and their own lives even above their own flesh and blood.

Connor Potter was not yet, perhaps, at the point of knowing when he should die for his brother. Harry Potter, though, was exactly where he should be. That was enough for Charles. He would watch their young leader's back.

And that meant watching the greatest threat to him, which in this group was Henrietta Bulstrode. She'd stooped down and picked something up. Charles found himself very much wanting to know what it was.

Lucius kept his head bowed as Severus argued with him about the curse, its causes, and its effects. He didn't need to argue back. He knew he was right. He had seen the Dark Lord use that curse before—usually on his enemies, but sometimes on his Death Eaters, for practice. Lucius had twice seen it cured. He knew what was needed, and why their Lord had sought to hit Harry's brother and not Harry himself with it. Though the procedure would be somewhat difficult considering how stubborn young Harry was, it was not impossible that someone should enter his mind and remove the curse.

And Lucius already knew it had to be him. This was the point of view that Severus hadn't quite come around to yet, even now that they'd Apparated back to the outskirts of Hogsmeade and were skirting the village, headed for the Forbidden Forest. He still thought, poor fool, that he could enter Harry's mind and pull him out of this.

Lucius spared a moment to thank Merlin that he loved only his wife and son as much as Severus loved Harry, and that neither Narcissa nor Draco would expect him to take the kind of insane risk that Severus was talking about just because of his relationship to them. Love made men foolish. Lucius knew when to step back and step aside. If that curse had hit Narcissa, and Severus could have rescued her, then he would let Severus enter her mind, and never complained in the first place.

A deliberate footstep sounded to his left a few moments after the green-and-gold snakes flooded off Potter's body and into the trees. Lucius turned and met Narcissa's eyes. A glance told him everything he needed to know. She walked with a limp that indicated a recently healed wound. Lucius raised his eyebrows.

Narcissa smiled. "Dead," she said, meaning the Death Eater who had done that to her.

Lucius nodded. "You knew him?"

Narcissa shrugged. "A student at Durmstrang. I could describe him."

"Do so," said Lucius, and set himself to listen to recollections of dark hair, unusual height, and, most importantly, a distinctive jut to the collarbone, as if it had once been broken. Easy enough to find out his family from that description, and Lucius would find out how he could hurt them, and he would.

"Lucius, are you even listening to me?"

Lucius turned and glanced at Severus. Thanks to Narcissa's description and the crunch of fallen leaves under their feet as they walked through the Forest, it had been easy enough to ignore his chatter. “No, Severus. You are repeating yourself, and that will not help our Potter. You know what has to be done. You know that you cannot do it. And no,” he continued, before Severus could say anything, “nor can Hawthorn, nor Black, nor Adalrico. You care too much about him. I am the only Marked one who stands a chance of bringing him out.”

Severus glared at him. Lucius returned his gaze calmly. Severus was a force to be reckoned with on the battlefield; he had all but ripped apart the three Death Eaters keeping him from Potter. But his temper had its disadvantages. Now he obviously longed, wished, yearned for, the ability to tell Lucius to go to hell.

But he had no choice save to bow his head in a single curt nod.

“Father?”

Lucius glanced over his shoulder. Draco had not said a word since they rescued Potter and the Dark Lord vanished, which was as it should be. His voice would have broken, betrayed emotion too intense, so it was right that he keep silent. But his face and his eyes spoke for him, and Lucius did not like that at all. Sooner or later, Draco will have to learn to control his emotions.

“You can save him?” Draco asked.

Several dozen different things to say sprang to Lucius’s lips, among them warnings to Draco for doubting him. However, he decided that perhaps his son could be allowed this one—one—moment of doubt. He had not seen the curse before, he did not know how it worked, and since Severus and Lucius both did, it wasn’t information they’d included in their argument.

“I can,” he said.

Draco closed his eyes and looked away, shaking lightly. Lucius narrowed his eyes. He should trust Potter to take care of himself more. I know that he took the curse because he trusted that he could survive it. He was right.

The rest of the walk back to the school was boring enough—most of their uneasy alliance kept their mouths shut, and the people who talked, Hawthorn and Narcissa, said nothing interesting—that Lucius observed Connor Potter. He trudged nearly at the end of the line, his head down, obscuring the famous heart-shaped scar that supposedly proclaimed his defeat of the Dark Lord when a child. Lucius knew something more about that, now, and knew that Harry had been the one, not Connor, to deflect the Killing Curse.

The boy had done nothing in the battle, and now he must think that he was the reason Harry was lying pale and motionless in Severus's arms, unable to see anything other than the world the curse had constructed for him, inside his own head.

Well, good. Lucius hoped that meant the boy would grow up. So far, Connor Potter had proven a disappointment. If he could become good enough to fight at Harry's side, then he would serve a purpose. If he did not, then Lucius would do what he could to carefully, discreetly, separate Harry from his brother.

Our Potter needs to think of the future, not the past, and stop considering himself a sacrifice. Connor Potter could die, and the world would not stop turning. Harry Potter could die, and many things would become—uncomfortable.

Snape laid Harry gently in the bed in the hospital wing, only half-listening to Poppy Pomfrey's chatter as she tried to ascertain what was wrong with him. She would find magical exhaustion, of course, and more ordinary fatigue from resisting the pain that Voldemort had put him through. But the Mark Mirror Curse affected the mind, not the body, and not all of Poppy's spells would show her how to counter that. It was the Dark Lord's invention, his special plaything.

And Snape knew that Lucius was right, and he was the best candidate for bringing Harry out of it.

Snape smoothed Harry's hair away from his forehead, and stared at the angry red flare of the lightning bolt scar. He should have insisted that Harry shut that link with Occlumency long since. It was not worth it to keep it open, not when it cost him so much in pain and nightmares.

But Harry had been stubborn, and then angry with him, and Snape had not been able to insist.

Now, he would.

He thought about everything else. And in the end, he still endangered himself. Recklessly. Without caring what it would do to the rest of us. Snape felt the anger begin to burn, at least as hot as the pain that had flared through him when he saw Harry make the decision to put his body in front of his brother's once more. That will end. I will make it end. And Regulus will help me.

"How is he?"

Snape moved out of the way so that Regulus could approach the bed. He had sensed his old friend hovering in a corner of the hospital wing the moment they entered it. Regulus had felt no calling—Voldemort had obviously not thought it worthwhile to summon his still-loyal Death Eaters when he believed he had enough magic to take Harry—so he would have come to Hogwarts at the time they were supposed to set off for the tunnels and found no one there. Snape imagined him Apparating to London and racing frantically through the checkpoints, discovering them all gone. He shook his head. Harry should think about what he has done to him, as well as to the rest of us—Draco, and I, and even his more distant allies.

"He will recover," he said softly to Regulus. "You did not try to use your Mark to find and follow us. Good."

Regulus sighed and stared down at the Mark on his arm. Snape glared at it with more loathing than he reserved for his own. Regulus had revealed, as Snape had long suspected, that the Dark Lord had used it as a conduit for the pain he had suffered, before finally being Transfigured into a dog. He'd also left—traps in it, of a kind that Snape didn't understand, and which had nearly destroyed him when he tried to look at them last week. Regulus didn't dare try to use the Mark for anything, including finding Voldemort, unless he wanted to die.

Snape had had to spend some time conjuring and destroying delicate glass containers after Regulus left him last week. If those he cared for suffered pain that he could help, then he would help it. He hated, above all things, feeling helpless before a power greater than his own.

Perhaps there is something to the research Lucius has been doing after all, trying to find a way to destroy the Mark. Snape resolved to ask him later, and then looked up at the sound of a throat being politely cleared.

Lucius stood beside Harry's head, his own Dark Mark bared and gleaming. Poppy had gone—somewhere. Snape hoped in irritation that Lucius hadn't Obliviated her. Memory Charms often didn't interact well with minds tuned to medical magic. "The Dark Lord used the Mark Mirror Curse," he said. "This is a mental spell of his own devising, which constructs a reality for the victim so pleasant that he will not want to leave it. Someone who wears a Dark Mark and feels affection for the victim may pull him out. However, too much affection will lead to a desire not to smash apart that imagined reality, and the rescuer will become part of it. I believe I am the best candidate to bring Mr. Potter out of his coma without becoming trapped myself, as I will administer a short, sharp shock better than anyone in this room. Does anyone disagree?"

No one did, Snape saw, with a quick glance around. Even if Regulus had wanted to rescue Harry himself—and he could certainly argue for a superior knowledge of Harry's mind—his poisoned Mark would insure his death if he tried. Right now, he was staring at the floor and clenching his left arm as if he would like to tear it off.

Lucius nodded, pressed his Mark to Harry's left temple, and closed his eyes. His breathing halted for a moment. When it began once more, it matched Harry's. Snape felt the tickle of a mental sliding against his Occlumency shields, and knew that Lucius had passed out of his mind and into Harry's.

Narcissa came up to grasp her husband's hand. No one said anything, though Draco leaned on the edge of the bed, looking stricken, and most of Harry's allies watched with various expressions of interest. Regulus's voice seemed loud in the silence that had fallen.

"When he comes back, I am going to give him such a talking-to."

Snape gave Regulus a tight smirk. In this, as in so many other things fifteen years ago, they were in accord. Now that Snape could be sure this was the true Regulus, and not merely a sliced-off shard of Voldemort's madness floating free in Harry's head, he was fully prepared to welcome help in dealing with his recalcitrant charge.

Harry walked the halls of Hogwarts, and it was wonderful. People hurried past him on the way to class, calling to their friends and comparing notes hastily; Professor Merryweather had announced a simultaneous exam for all her Defense Against the Dark Arts classes that week, and no one felt ready. Hermione bumped into Harry and murmured an apology, not looking up from the book she read. A cloud of smoke further up the corridor indicated that Fred and George Weasley had discovered another item certain to be confiscated the moment Filch proved it existed.

Voices churned and swelled and talked about ordinary things, only slightly touched by the tension of the war. When someone did look ready to cry, they only had to glance up the hall, and then their gaze would alight on Connor Potter, calm and steady. He always had the right word to soothe fears or remind people that Voldemort wasn't so formidable, not if a baby could survive him. Right now, he ruffled the hair of a first-year Ravenclaw and said something that made her smile shyly up at him.

And no one noticed Harry.

No one stared at him as if they expected him to help them, though they didn't know how. No one glared with the disapproval that said they knew abuse charges should never have been filed against his parents and Dumbledore. No one wanted things of him that Harry didn't know how to give, normal obedience and trust and belief. When people approached him, they conducted practical transactions, running on the rituals of promises and debts and obligations. Harry had gained several Dark pureblood families as allies for Connor through those bargains. The people who mattered knew who Harry was, and what they wanted of him, Harry knew how to give.

It was a bit of a shock to turn and see Lucius Malfoy standing in the middle of corridor, observing him. People brushed past him as if he weren't there. Harry felt a frisson of unease glide up his spine. He inclined his head in a bow to Lucius, making it exactly the proper depth for a respected, if not trusted, ally. He danced well with Mr. Malfoy.

Yes, I do, he thought firmly, and beat away the memories that told him of times outside the dances, times when his life wasn't so simple. The halls of Hogwarts wavered around him for a moment, then came back, strengthened by his will and desire to believe them real. Harry let out a little breath, and said, "Welcome, Mr. Malfoy. Is there something I can do for you?"

"Mr. Potter." Lucius paused a moment, as if considering his next move, and Harry waited. Entirely proper, for a dance. "Harry."

No. That's not fair. He can't expect this of me, not when I've got everything so nicely settled, when I don't have to argue with anybody and I know I'm not failing them because they're not asking me to be just like everyone else. Harry lowered his head and tensed. His magic soared up around him. He remembered, vaguely, that it had been stronger at one point. Memories of tearing webs and eating power and so on tried to present themselves to him. He shoved them away. This was the reality. He would make it be so.

Lucius hissed, as though he didn't like the stones of Hogwarts firming under his feet. His eyes had taken on a hard sheen that Harry hated, because Lucius was letting him see that he was angry. That wasn't part of a dance. Lucius was supposed to remain emotionless. "Harry. Stop this nonsense immediately. Voldemort has enslaved your will, but you are too intelligent to think this is real, since you have two contradictory sets of memories."

“But I want this to be the real set,” Harry replied, and Hogwarts became more present around him. It was easier to lock the memories up in a closet and refuse to let them out. Connor’s laughter rang down the hall, and Harry could forget, if he wanted, that he’d ever heard his voice uncertain, pleading, forced to question his place and presence in the world.

Lucius leaned towards him. “So you would be a coward? You would leave my son to suffer, and your brother, and your guardian, and all those you profess to care about?”

Harry flinched and closed his eyes. “I can’t give them what they want,” he said. “I know that now. Everything I do is wrong. I can’t love Draco the way he deserves. No one’s going to believe that I made the decision to risk my life for my brother’s, instead of just leaping blindly into the path of the curse. If I go back, Snape and Regulus will be disappointed in me. I keep struggling to show people that I can learn, I can change, I can be something other than an abused child, and they keep shoving me back into the mold of what they think I am. I don’t believe that I’m ever going to break that mold. They’ll always see me as something other than what I really am, or they’ll want something from me that they deserve but that I can’t give them—like Draco. And they won’t trust me to lead them, and that will cost lives. At least here I know exactly what I can do.”

He hadn’t known he was going to say all that until it poured out. Lucius said nothing. Harry opened his eyes at last, driven by intolerable curiosity, and saw Lucius staring at him thoughtfully.

“It is no wonder that the Dark Lord’s spell chose this particular reality for you to inhabit,” Lucius breathed. “The curse works with your deepest desires. And your deepest desire is for your life to be simple and uncomplicated, though you know it cannot be.”

Harry scowled at him. “It can be as complicated as it likes. But I’m so sick and tired of failing everybody. Here, I know that I won’t fail them.”

“But you are,” Lucius pointed out. “You deprive us of our best chance to fight the Dark Lord while you remain here.”

"I no longer believe that I can be the leader you need," Harry said quietly. "The moment I risked my life for my brother, I realized how other people would see it—as a deliberate sacrifice. It wasn't, but try convincing Snape of that." Anger and bitterness choked his voice for a moment. He swallowed, and managed to continue. "And there are other decisions I'll never make that they want me to make. Adalrico, for example. He wanted me to use the Black Plague Curse. Others will want me to look aside as they make inroads in the Ministry, or discriminate against Muggleborns, or go right on enslaving and using magical creatures—and I never would. I never could. If I can't give them what they want, what kind of leader am I?"

Lucius blinked, once or twice. Then he said, "The art of leadership is not about surrendering your own desires for the good of others, Harry. It is about learning to judge. If you believe something to be a good decision, then you make it." He cocked his head to the side, and his eyes were bright with an amusement Harry had never seen them show. "I cannot imagine you compliant. I would not want to. If you feel that we are shoving you, pushing you against your will, then shove back."

"I don't want to impose my will on others—"

"And true leadership is also a very long way from that," Lucius said calmly. He was smiling now. "Wizards have long made those with Lord-level magic leaders. You have Lord-level magic. Very well. You cannot change that. Now make yourself a leader. No one has said that you must obey everything that another person asks of you. If Severus insults your principles, insult his back. He hates that. Balance my son's desires with your own. I know Draco. He would not want you to bed him merely because he desired it." Harry felt his face heat up, but Lucius might have been talking about applied Arithmancy versus the theoretical, from the calmness of his tone. "Dance this dizzy and complicated path, and if you chose to risk your life for your brother's by calculation rather than blind instinct, then come out of this dreamworld and tell them that. No one will know it, not for certain, if you remain here."

"You could go back and tell them," said Harry, with a last feeble hope.

Lucius's smile turned to a more familiar one, all teeth. "I will most certainly back you, if you come out."

"Sometimes, I don't like you," Harry told him, even as the imaginary Hogwarts around him began to fade.

Lucius laughed, a full-throated sound that Harry would have imagined Voldemort capable of making before Lucius. "I underestimated you, Harry," he murmured. "You would have come out on your own, I think. Even you know this is not real, and these objections are only the last feeble gasp of beliefs that you have almost put aside. You were hiding, but you would have put your head out of your shell."

Harry closed his eyes reluctantly. He was tired, he thought mutinously. He'd wanted to go somewhere nobody would bother him or demand normal, impossible things of him, and his mind had obliged.

But he didn't think he could have quite escaped the second set of memories or the knowledge that this was Voldemort's curse, and that his decision to choose Connor's life over his own meant nothing if he didn't come out of the coma the curse had put him in.

That doesn't mean I have to like Lucius, though.

Henrietta had to admit to a bit of disappointment when Malfoy opened his eyes and said, with a faint smile, "He will live. He is coming out of the coma, though it might take him some time to return to full consciousness."

Malfoy's son went white in the face and put his head down on the sheets next to Potter. Henrietta curled her lip. Edith would never behave so. She did what her mother asked of her, because she was better-trained than Malfoy obviously kept his heir.

She moved quietly towards the door of the hospital wing, not hurrying, not being obvious. Her eyes marked out, meanwhile, that Belville had tightened his lips and Burke looked sullen. Henrietta smiled. She already knew whom she would ask to aid her in her plan. It was convenient that the two most dissatisfied with Potter were also the weakest of the circle surrounding him. She could control vain Mortimer and dear Edward without a problem.

“Bulstrode.”

Henrietta turned around and gave a pretty little nod to Charles Rosier-Henlin. “Greetings. Aren’t you glad that Potter will live? I know that I am. My future is now more secure.”

“I want what you took from the beach.”

Henrietta widened her eyes, and then dropped them to the floor. She sighed as she pulled the knife with the dark hilt and blade of Light from her robe pocket. “I was only keeping it for him,” she said meekly, as she handed it over to Rosier-Henlin.

He did not make even a pretense of believing her, but then, Henrietta hadn’t tried to be very believable. As he accepted the blade, Henrietta waited, keeping her eyes down, wondering if he would ask...

“I will tell Potter about this. He deserves to know who—rescued—his knife for him.”

Henrietta nodded, knowing Rosier-Henlin meant to warn Potter about her. That was quite all right. If he just didn’t ask...

Rosier-Henlin turned away.

Triumph burst into Henrietta’s heart, but she kept her face blank and calm as she asked Hawthorn Parkinson to convey her best wishes to Potter, and then turned and hurried out of the room. She had training in masks of serenity. She would not betray herself.

He only saw me pick up the one object, not the other.

Before she let herself get too excited, though, she made sure to pause in a remote corner of Hogwarts and consider the small curl of dark hair in her pocket. When she was satisfied it was Potter’s, she went on her way, her expression grave and her step light.

She had been no slouch at Potions when she was a student. She knew how to brew Polyjuice.

Harry opened his eyes, slowly, and blinked. When he turned his head, he saw Snape sitting in a chair on the right side of the bed, and Regulus on the other. Harry tried to speak, but had a goblet of water held to his lips before he could. He rolled his eyes and obediently drank.

“Draco?” he whispered.

“Survived unwounded,” Snape said smoothly. “He’s sleeping right now. It’s the middle of the night.”

“And Connor?” Harry asked, knowing this was the calm before the storm, but holding fast to what Lucius had told him. Lucius, of all people. I wonder if he was as surprised as I was to learn that he can actually think in moral terms?

“Likewise, survived unwounded.” That was Regulus, and his voice was a snarl that would have done Sirius credit. Harry rolled his head to face him, knowing before he looked that Regulus would wear a stern expression. “We are going to have a little talk about your risk-taking, Harry, the moment you’re well enough to bear it,” he said.

Harry raised his eyebrows. I know my motives for what I did. They might not believe in them, but that doesn’t mean they aren’t valid. “I imagine we are,” he said.

Regulus sat back and frowned at him, as if unable to comprehend why Harry didn’t look guilty and terrified, but Harry closed his eyes before he could ask another question. The guilt was still there, of course—there never had been the terror that Regulus had imagined—but he believed he was, finally, ready to deal with it.

If I want them to treat me like an adult, I have to act like one. If I want them to have a real leader, I have to be one, and that doesn’t mean selfishly hiding in my mind, or adopting plans just because they want me to. If I want them to see what I really am, I have to show them that I’ll never be normal, and why.

Lucius was right, and that was the last gasp of those particular beliefs. I don't think I could have abandoned the people who love me. Say I take them on trust for once, and believe that they really do love me unconditionally. Then they can bear a few disappointments, like my arguing with them instead of just submitting.

This should be fun.

Interlude: Wax Wings and Missing Muggles

September 22nd, 1995

Dear Harry:

Really, you disappoint me again. You had soared so close to perfection, too, so close to the sun. Of course, the sun melts wax wings, and your wings are nothing but wax, as you have shown in this latest silly escapade. Are you burned? I hope so. One hopes for a burn when a child has done a silly thing. Were I there, I would hold your hand in the fire myself until you learned.

Did I contact you about this attack? No. Did you listen to the warning that I did issue, about my Lord feeding on Muggleborn children? No.

When will you overcome your pride and listen to your elders and betters, Harry? Had you done so, then you would have listened to my silence and known this was a trap—and not bothered going. As it is, my Lord managed to capture several dozen Muggles with his sirens, luring them into the water and the clutch of the pretty creatures. The Obliviators are hard at work, trying to contain knowledge of the magical world and come up with a cover story for that many missing Muggles.

Many missing Muggles. I can use alliteration when I want to, do you see? One day I may hope to rank myself with the greatest poets.

What does he want the Muggles for? Well, at one time I might have told you, but now I won't. You need to fly on your own again for a time, and learn to read the silence. What can a Dark Lord gain from Muggles? Ask yourself that, Harry, and you will have the answer.

You have been luckier than you deserve, escaping with your life like that. And my Lord has been unluckier than he deserves. I can say that my life is quite interesting, with this contest between the two of you, but it does remain ultimately disappointing that you will not listen to good advice.

Do not fly so close to the sun, or I will come and hold your hand in the fire myself, to teach you a lesson. Children must learn their place.

In the game,

Evan Rosier.

Intermission: Vengeance and Trauma

Lucius stroked the top of the small cage sitting on the library desk as he read the message he'd received from the Ministry over again.

September 22nd, 1995

Dear Mr. Malfoy:

I of course understand your concern that new laws impacting on the activities of Dark wizards might be made without your input and consent. Since your family has traditionally been considered Dark, these laws must be expected to lay a greater burden on you than proclaimed Light families such as Gloryflower and Opalline. I am flattered that you have taken the trouble to contact me about it. It is true that I come from a Dark pureblooded family on my mother's side, and though I myself have not Declared, I have a sentimental regard for many of the old dances. If you would like to visit my office on the sixteenth of October, then I would be happy to explain the new laws to you, and why I believe the Dark families have nothing to worry about.

Yours sincerely,

Auror Edmund Wilmot.

Lucius curled his lip slightly. Wilmot was no pureblooded name that he was familiar with. More than likely, this Auror was a halfblood, his father perhaps even a Muggle. And he was probably lying about his mother coming from a Dark pureblooded family. Lucius didn't know any Dark pureblooded witch who would lower herself by marrying like that.

Then, of course, he had to remember that he was related by marriage to Andromeda Black Tonks, who had done that exact thing.

Lucius shook his head briskly and folded the letter. He had already written Wilmot back, accepting the invitation. He trusted Wilmot—who was Nott's contact on the cells, the one who would arrange to get Lucius to Lily and James Potter—to take care of things from there. If anyone questioned him about Lucius's presence, that would be Wilmot's fault, and not Lucius's.

Lucius stroked the top of the cage again, then crouched down to look in through the close-set bars. One of the insects inside jumped hungrily forward at him, only to crash against the bars and fall back. Lucius chuckled. He caught a glimpse of long black legs, seven of them, and fluttering wings, dark but deeply sheened with green, and barbed pincers. He tried to imagine the pain that would result when one of those insects dug into a healthy, living body.

He found that he could not imagine the pain.

That was all right. James Potter would imagine it soon enough.

Lucius rose and walked across the library to select a book from the shelf. He had the outline of the curse that he intended to use for Lily Potter all ready. However, the curse was eminently flexible, and Lucius could place other spells within it, all of which would affect her mind at intervals that he controlled. There might be an incantation perfect for expressing his displeasure that he hadn't yet found, or had forgotten, or had dismissed as not worthy of his notice and should reconsider.

He opened the book, flipped through a few pages, and began reading. Ten minutes later, he sat up, staring intently at the words.

Yes. Yes. That would be appropriate, and I do not believe that I left it this long.

Of course, Lucius mused, he might have encountered this spell before he hit on the idea of the flexible curse, and discounted it. Usually, Neco Identidem could not be cast in concert with other spells; it required time and mental space in which to work. With the curses all joined in a round, however, that problem was eliminated. Lucius sat back to read again about the effects of the curse, a warm glow growing in his stomach.

It will never be enough for what they have done, but it will be enough for my share of the vengeance.

The door of the library opened, and Narcissa entered. Lucius looked up at her and raised an eyebrow when he realized that she wore red robes, rather than her more usual black or dark green.

"A special occasion?" he asked.

"I do not wish the blood to show." Narcissa smoothed the red robes down once, then turned and showed him the side view. "What do you think? Do I look suitably terrifying? An angel of vengeance?"

"A very phoenix of vengeance, my dear," Lucius assured her, and had the satisfaction of hearing Narcissa laugh softly.

"Very good." Narcissa came forward and bent to kiss him, deliberately not touching any part of his body with her hands. Lucius took care of that, winding his right hand in her hair and pulling her head back. Narcissa watched him with a peaceful smile. She knew that she could die on her hunt, and Lucius knew it. When he bent and kissed her, he put all that bloody wisdom in his kiss. Narcissa had her eyes shut when he pulled back.

"I wish I could stay," she murmured. "But my sister will be so disappointed if I don't keep our lunch date."

Lucius breathed out over her lips and let her go. Narcissa moved to the door, and paused a moment to look at him. If she died, she would leave him a memory of herself in glory and strength, and that, Lucius thought as he stared into her eyes, blue shining against the pale skin of her face, was more than enough.

She departed, then, and Lucius turned back to the book. When he was sure he fully understood Neco Identidem, he rose and went to write a letter to an acquaintance whom he kept employed as a fact-hound. It was time to find out which Dark pureblood family on the Continent, or in Britain for that matter, had had a son who went to Durmstrang, was tall, and had cracked his collarbone at some point in his life.

The letter was soon written, and Lucius went back to his library shelves. His hand hovered over the books that he had used to choose spells for vengeance on the Potters, but moved on a few moments later. The whole point of his revenge on Harry's parents was that it should be inconspicuous, so that no one would ever learn how much they had suffered.

When punishing the family of the man who had tried to kill his wife, he need not use the same finesse.

And Lucius wanted blood.

Narcissa Apparated once she was outside the Malfoy Manor wards, and landed in a place familiar to her from scattered days of childhood and one long summer, when her parents had simultaneously decided that they wanted to take their daughters away from home but didn't want to risk Wayhouse's odd sense of humor. Narcissa felt her face relax into a smile. She hadn't grown up by the sea, but she loved it, and the scent of salt air and the roar of waves worked as a balm on her. She stood enjoying them for a moment before she walked towards the house.

Cobley-by-the-Sea was the largest of the Black family estates, except for Number Twelve Grimmauld Place. The house rambled along high cliffs on the coast of Cornwall, with the sea leaping and roaring beneath. Magic gleamed on the windows and the doors, spreading out in subtle webs that made most Muggles think Cobley was just part of the cliff. Narcissa would have had a hard time seeing it if she wasn't a Black. Distrustful people, her ancestors, to be so wary of other wizards and witches.

Narcissa wasn't surprised that Bellatrix had been sighted here. Cobley was a dreaming house, old and rich in additions, and it had long been family rumor that there were entrances into it which the wards didn't comprehend. Bellatrix would look to find one of those entrances. She might be days at it, but the treasures inside Cobley—not weapons, but treasures—made the effort worthwhile.

Tertian Brown had been the one to write to her and inform Narcissa that he'd seen her sister nearby on one of his herb-gathering expeditions. Narcissa was still impressed that he'd had the courage to defy his formidable wife, Henrietta Bulstrode, and start a secret correspondence with her. And it must be secret, or Henrietta would have made sure to trade the information to Narcissa for a higher price.

Narcissa let the Atlantic spray soak her hair. For a moment, she stood on the edge of the cliff and relived a moment in her childhood when she might almost have believed that everything was all right, that death and madness didn't lie in the future. Andromeda had conjured a rope ladder for them to descend the cliffs and look for gulls' eggs. They'd climbed down, and seen a bright shape soaring overhead that Narcissa had always believed, privately, was a phoenix. Even Bella had gone silent with awe. The instant lingered in Narcissa's mind as a perfect mingling of sea and fire, wind and stone.

She heard the expected movement behind her a moment later. Narcissa smiled as she whirled around, her wand securely in her hand. She had known that standing on the edge of the cliff like that, clearly outlined against the horizon, would draw Bella. Her sister always struck at weakness.

Or perceived weakness, in this case, because Narcissa was ready with her conjured bonds, and Bellatrix went down a moment later, shrieking and spitting.

Narcissa walked towards her, biting her lip thoughtfully. She'd sworn to make Bella suffer, and so she would. However, Narcissa wanted to claim another permanent price from her, the way that last time she'd deprived Bella of her left hand. What should it be, though? It had to be something crippling, painful, and symbolic.

Oh, yes. I know.

Narcissa smiled, and crouched down beside her sister. Bella whipped her head around and tried to bite her. Narcissa didn't move, since the teeth snapped an inch short of her fingers. She'd judged the slack in the ropes very carefully.

"You don't have a greeting for your Cissy?" she asked, affecting hurt. "You don't think that I deserve a polite word and a kiss? We haven't seen each other in months, after all."

"Come near me," Bella said, voice as dark as her eyes, "and I will give you a kiss that will eat straight through your cheeks."

"Mother would have liked you to offer a real kiss," said Narcissa, as she drew a silver knife from her pocket. She'd found the knife in Grimmauld Place, and, after a few experiments, revealed the enchantment. The blade cut only human flesh when it was spoken to, and so was largely useless outside of torture, but since that was what Narcissa had planned for today, it would make a useful helper. She whispered a Levitation Charm, and the knife rose from her hand, vibrating slightly. "On the other hand, she's dead, and I suppose you don't have to worry any longer about disappointing her, Bella. But you do have to worry about disappointing me, and I am very much alive."

"Not for much longer," Bella spat. "My Lord will destroy you, Cissy. You should have bowed to him when you had the chance. He might have let you live after multiple Crucios. And now he won't! He won't, and it's all your fault! You've doomed yourself!" She gave a good imitation of her old cackle.

"How disappointing," Narcissa said, and began to walk in a circle around her sister, tracing her wand lazily above Bella's body. The knife followed her motions, and then sank, cutting through her sister's robes to expose her belly. "I did so want to be in the good graces of a raving madman with a face like a snake's and eyes like a rat's. Tell me, Bella, does he bed you? Is he good at eating you? I suppose that would be one advantage to his having no nose, at least."

Bella promptly began screaming incoherently and trying to bite her again. Narcissa had been waiting for that. She spoke a soft plea to the hovering knife.

It stabbed down, twisting through one fold of flesh and then out again. Bella's screams acquired a tinge of pain, but only a tinge. Narcissa knew she was too far gone in madness to react to the cutting as others would have.

That was all right. Narcissa could continue cutting her for a long time. She admired the sheen of blood on Bella's pale skin, and then whispered, "Up." The knife rose and spun, twisted and sank, sliced open Bella's belly and then cut up to her stomach. All the time, Bella screamed, and Narcissa knew she would have tried to grab her ankle and harm her, if her sister were in reach.

Narcissa never intended to be. The red robes were just a precaution. She kept moving, and the knife did the work for her, inflicting such wounds as Bella could never hope to survive if Narcissa weren't carrying potions to heal her and replenish her blood.

And finally, Narcissa did hear her sister scream as Harry must have screamed that night in the graveyard. Her eyes fluttered shut, and her mouth hang open in a devastating, silent cry. The knife kept her conscious.

Narcissa stepped cautiously close and poured the proper potions into her mouth. Bella choked and gagged and swallowed. Her wounds closed. Her body twitched as it made new blood to replace the lost liquid. Narcissa smiled and stepped back. She resumed her circle.

The knife resumed its work, slicing and severing and cutting. Narcissa had not yet decided whether she wanted to leave scars. She might, she thought. Harry had enough scars on the stump of his left hand and on his mind, soul, and emotions. A pity that Narcissa couldn't be sure she would scar her sister the same way by this treatment. Even when they were children, she had to make Bella physically suffer if she wanted to hurt her. She only reacted to taunts and insults by getting angry.

After three more healings, Narcissa thought a small dent was made in the threefold debt Bellatrix owed Harry, and called the knife back to her pocket with a small wave of her wand. She whispered a thanks. The knife stopped vibrating and again became an ordinary blade. Narcissa turned to face Bella.

Her sister took some moments to recover her breath and her lucidity—Narcissa would not say “sanity”—enough to notice her. Then she sneered. “What’s the matter, Cissy? Don’t you have the guts to kill me?”

“You have to stay alive and suffer,” said Narcissa calmly. “That’s the only way I’ll keep the vow I swore. I do feel sorry for you, though, Bella. It must not be very fulfilling following a man whose plans crumble when he faces a fifteen-year-old boy. And he really isn’t any good in bed, is he? Or you wouldn’t be so frustrated.”

As expected, that made Bella shriek and lunge against her bonds. This time, though, she wasn’t crying out in pain. Narcissa hoped to get some information from her before she made Bella pay the permanent price she had in mind.

Bella said a great many things that were of no use or no moment, mostly praising Lord Voldemort. Then she said, “And it’s not as though you’ll stop him from using Woodhouse or his old home all he likes, you know! You won’t! You can’t! His plans are too grand!”

Narcissa smiled. She had no idea where Woodhouse or “his old home” were, but Lucius might. And, even better, Bella didn’t seem to realize she’d given any important information away.

“Thank you, Bella,” she said sweetly, and then lifted her wand. Curiosity filled her like the scent of mint. She’d always wanted to try this spell, since the Slytherin girls’ rooms were full of the rumor of it during her Hogwarts years, but it wasn’t the kind of thing one practiced casually. Someone always knew someone else who had done it, a cousin’s sister’s friend or the like. It would be interesting to have first-hand experience of it. “Abrumpo mamillas!”

Bella let out a long, knife-edged wail of agony. Narcissa was grateful that she had made the knife cut her robes loose, or she would not have had the pleasure of seeing what was happening now—Bella’s breasts shriveling and turning soft and spongy, sagging on her chest into mushroom-like lumps. They broke off her chest a moment later, and rolled down her sides in clouds of dust. Bella went on screaming.

Narcissa chuckled. That was worth waiting to see. Quick, of course, but it has such a permanent effect.

“Stay safe, Bella,” she said. “And give my regards to your Lord. I suspect that even if you do like him bedding you, he might not like you so much anymore.”

She waved cheerfully to her sister, and then walked away to Apparate back to the Manor. There was still the chance that Bellatrix could cause grief and pain, of course—though Narcissa hardly thought she would do so today—but there was always that chance with her bitch of a sister; there was that chance with any Death Eater. And Narcissa might die in their next encounter. There was always that risk, too.

But it was the price she paid for the vengeance she wanted, consuming Bella piece by piece, maiming her steadily, until she had paid threefold for what she had done to Harry. The old vows of revenge were solemn things, not to be entered into lightly, and Narcissa had known what she was doing when she accepted this one.

When she has paid threefold, then she may die. But that will not be for some time yet.

“Remus? Can I talk to you a minute?”

Remus lifted his head and turned to face Connor, blinking. He’d been awake, of course—no chance of sleeping, not when he’d heard about Harry’s participation in the battle and slow recovery, and then had to talk softly to several Gryffindors frightened by the rumors of the war—but he was still surprised that his godson had come to talk to him this late at night.

He understood a moment later, when he saw Connor’s face. Humiliation and anger and grief chased themselves across his expression, and his scent, thick with emotion, challenged the constant smell of the torches. Remus knew Connor could not have slept while feeling like that.

He opened his arms, and Connor bolted across the room with a little sob and caught him close. Remus stroked his hair, and moved gently towards the back of his office. Minerva had given him a comfortable room, with several padded chairs where Gryffindors could collapse and yell or sob out their grief and their complaints to their Head of House. It was furnished in red and gold, which colors seemed to calm most of his charges down.

Perhaps they would even have calmed Connor down, Remus thought sadly, if the boy had lifted his head from his godfather's chest to see them. He kept his face buried in cloth, though, clutching Remus's robes and crying. They sat down together. Remus kept up a constant soft murmur, mixing encouraging words with questions about what was wrong.

He thought he could guess, of course. Minerva had got the story from Severus, and told him. Both Harry and Connor had gone to the battle on the beach, from which You-Know-Who was controlling sirens who had swum up the rivers miles away, especially in London, and lured Muggles into the water. The Daily Prophet had a story about it already, temporarily displacing the stories of the abuse case from the front page. Connor had not been in London to see helpless men, women, and children fall prey to the sirens' compelling songs, but he had seen curses hurled at close range. He had seen death. He had seen his brother take a curse for him.

The wonder, Remus thought as his hands stroked down Connor's back, is that he lasted this long before breaking. It was almost ten at night.

Finally, the tears stopped, and Connor lifted his face, gone red and blotchy. Remus already had a cloth ready; he'd laid in quite a supply of them after his first day talking to first-years who missed their homes and their mums. Connor wiped at his eyes, blew his nose, and gave a crooked smile.

"I suppose that you think I'm silly, huh?" he croaked, as he moved away and collapsed into another chair.

“Not at all,” said Remus quietly. His heart ached. Oh, of course Connor had known troubles before—even if they weren’t as deep and long-lasting as Harry’s problems, that didn’t mean they weren’t important—but never on this scale. The parents he had loved and the Headmaster he had once trusted and revered were in prison. He’d spent the summer apart from his brother, getting battle training from the elder Weasleys. He was struggling through his first bond with a girlfriend whom, Remus knew, he genuinely liked but who didn’t like Harry much. Today he’d had the war press itself viciously on his awareness, and he’d seen just what Harry was prepared to do for him.

Connor was Connor, untrained to face trouble the way Harry did, by pushing it behind a silent mask and channeling his energy and his magic into helping others. It was not surprising that he needed comfort.

And thank Merlin, Remus found himself thinking, as he studied Connor and saw the lines of grief starting to carve the immaturity off him. Thank Merlin. I love Harry, but I would not wish his training on his brother. Harry lives scarred. He will always carry those scars. Connor might weep now and then, but the tear tracks won’t burn themselves as deep.

“I just felt useless, you know?”

Remus fixed his attention on Connor again, and not on his past. “Why?” he asked softly.

“I—I thought I could do something if I went along.” Connor wiped at his eyes again and then shrugged, crumpling the cloth in his fist. “Use my compulsion, use the spells that Bill and Mr. Weasley taught me, fight the Death Eaters, something. But I only managed to get off a few spells, and those were mostly hexes and jinxes that bounced off the Death Eaters’ Shield Charms. And then I stepped up behind Harry and said his name like a fool, because I was worried about him, and Voldemort tried to fire a spell at me, and Harry got in the way.” Connor stared at the cloth, now knotted around both his hands. “I want to hug Harry. And I want to slap him.”

Remus laughed. "That's a common reaction around Harry, Connor. And I don't think you were a fool. You survived a battle against Death Eaters. It isn't many people my age, let alone yours, who can say that."

"But I got Harry hurt."

Remus sighed. What he might be about to say was harsh, perhaps, but it would free Connor of self-blame, and that was all to the good at this point. "No, Connor. Lily got Harry hurt. I do think that Harry did the best he could with limited time to spare, but she was the one who trained those sacrificial instincts into him. He thinks the best way he can protect you is by endangering his own safety, so that's what he does."

"I wish he wouldn't," said Connor, a harsh expression on his face "It's annoying."

"Yes, it is," said Remus.

"There are times I wish she wouldn't have existed," Connor went on, staring at his feet. "And there are times I'm jealous of Harry, you know? Because I know his life is hard, but he never falters for long. He just keeps going. He does what he has to do to survive, and he also helps other people. I could never do that, even though I'm supposed to." He made a frustrated noise. "And then I see times like today, and I'm so grateful I'm not him that I can't breathe." He stared up from under his fringe at Remus. "Does that make any sense? I'm not sure it makes any sense."

"It does," said Remus. "I don't think you need to be ashamed of either emotion, Connor. Harry is—someone I can admire, someone I love deeply, but not someone I would wish anyone else to grow up to be. He's paid too high a price for what he's achieved. I think he might experience joys the rest of us are never going to know, but he has pains the rest of us are never going to know, too. The way he got his training—" Remus shook his head. If he thought for too long about the abuse, even now, his anger rose, and the wolf with it. "I would rather you were you," he told Connor. "I would rather that Harry was more like you than the other way around."

Connor was quiet for a few moments, before he nodded. "Yeah. Yeah, I can see that." He scuffed with his foot at the floor for a second, then said, "I just wonder if I should be more like Harry sometimes. I'm supposed to be a hero, you know? And I don't feel like one."

Remus leaned forward and hugged him. Connor stiffened slightly in surprise, but Remus didn't let him go, though the movement had been impulsive.

"In just over two years," he said softly into Connor's ear, "you've survived possession by You-Know-Who, seen one of your adopted uncles die in front of you, had to revise or reverse truths you've known most of your life, and seen your parents accused of abuse and Harry emerge as someone completely different than who you thought he was. You've come out of that alive, with your sanity intact. I don't know a better beginning for a hero, Connor."

Connor's hands came up and clutched tightly at his shoulders. Remus thought he might cry again for a moment, but he didn't, just sat there holding him. When he drew back at last, his smile was shy, but there.

"Thanks, Remus," he said softly. "I'll remember that. And now I've got to go back to Parvati, or she'll wonder where I got to."

He stood and left. Remus watched him go, some of his own pain gradually melting into peace.

They've both had to suffer, and it isn't fair. But they're both still alive. They both have the chance to change, and to live.
"Draco?"

Draco blinked and lifted his head, groaning as a crick in his neck warned him not to turn too fast. He rubbed it gently as he looked up at Harry. He stared witlessly before realizing Harry was awake.

Draco felt his tongue freeze for a moment; there were so many things he wanted to say that he choked trying to say them all. As it turned out, that was probably a wise thing. Harry smiled slightly and reached out to clasp his hand.

"I was hoping you would be alone with me when I woke up," Harry said quietly. "There's something I want to tell you. And—" He hesitated, then shrugged and forced the words out as though through a barrier in his throat. "I don't want to say it to anyone else, yet."

Draco felt as though he had stepped into sunlight. There had been a time when he would have adored this sign that Harry valued him above other people. As it was, he knew Harry was capable of giving more, and he wanted that, but this was still pretty damn nice.

"Well?" he prompted, when Harry sat in silence and stared at the far wall of the hospital wing.

Harry spoke without looking at him. His hand, though, remained steady, rubbing small, comforting circles on Draco's knuckles. "Did your father explain to you what Voldemort's curse did?"

"Created a reality so pleasant that you wouldn't want to leave it," said Draco at once. "Yes." He swallowed. He could imagine dozens of realities, or hundreds, better than the one Harry lived with every day. He had been terrified that his father wouldn't be able to bring Harry out, though he hadn't dared show that.

"Did he say what mine was?" And now those green eyes were locked on him, and Draco didn't feel much more comfortable than he would have confronted with a Hungarian Horntail. He shook his head.

Harry closed his eyes. "Good. That's what I wanted to tell you. I thought about keeping it secret, but—well. You keep saying you love me. I think it's about time I trusted that, instead of automatically assuming you'll be disappointed in what I think or feel."

Draco didn't speak. To speak would have been to mess this up. He took Harry's hand in both of his, forcing it to stop its rubbing, and squeezed as hard as he could. Harry tilted his head towards him, and smiled slightly.

"I dreamed about a Hogwarts where I barely existed," Harry said softly. "The war was still happening, but other students went to Connor for reassurance. And he bore it well. He could comfort them without even thinking about it. They came to me when they needed more specific, concrete help, but he was their emotional guide and guardian. The only set of rules I had to remember was the pureblood rituals. When someone walked away after I finished helping him, I knew he wasn't going to demand that I help him in any other way.

"I was happy. Merlin, Draco, I was so happy. You have no idea. I defended and served and protected people, and they smiled at me—and then I slipped away, and they ignored me, or didn't remember that I'd ever been there. No one stared at me. That's what I want, that kind of reality. No Prophet articles, no expectations I can't fulfill, no one interested in seeing my soul, because why would they be interested? Just ordinariness for me. That's what I want," Harry repeated, his voice sinking at the end.

Draco wondered what the hell to say. He felt only revulsion at the thought, and wanted to ask questions. Hadn't he been in the dream-Hogwarts with Harry? Hadn't Harry thought that if someone else wanted to see his soul, they should be able to do that? Didn't Harry have any ambition at all, even for gratitude? How could he lack a thirst to be acknowledged?

Harry took a deep breath, and his next words came out in a rush, like the unfolding of wings. "That's what I want. But I know it's not what I have." He opened his eyes, and Draco wondered what to make of his smile, because it seemed so unnatural, given what he'd just been talking about. "And it's silly to give up everything I have, everything you've given me, for the sake of a fantasy that can't come to pass. I know what I am now—or, well, at least I know it better than I did. I chose to put my life in danger for Connor's, it wasn't a blind sacrifice, but a few minutes after I woke up in the dream, I knew how you'd view it. That's why I couldn't stay there. I've accepted this reality into my blood and bone. Merlin only knows why I've ended up in this position, but the least I can do is try to understand it, not run from it, and try not to let the staring and the seeing flay me from the inside."

He leaned forward, holding Draco's gaze. "And you've said that you love me without the need for me to give something in return. You've said that you won't stop loving me because I make a mistake, or because I show that I'm less than perfect. It's about time that I trusted you to mean that, isn't it? So I told you about the dream. I knew you might not like it, but I wanted you to know. And I love you. I wanted you to know that, too."

Harry's breath was coming a bit faster, and Draco realized he was terrified, though struggling with all his might not to show it. And why wouldn't he be? Pureblood rituals didn't apply here, and Harry, unlike most other children, hadn't been taught any other way of functioning. He had trusted Draco enough to leap off a cliff, but he couldn't be completely sure that there was a bottom to it.

Draco showed him there was by leaning forward and kissing him fiercely. Their kisses to this point had been gentle, chaste, often because Draco worried that he would frighten Harry away if he moved too quickly. Not now. They'd been comrades in battle, they'd both survived, and Harry had shown Draco a proof of love that wasn't a sacrifice. That called for a fierce celebration.

Harry started, but from the way he relaxed a moment later, Draco thought it was from surprise, not fear. Then he made a noise in the back of his throat that might have been a muffled ah!, as though he'd suddenly grasped the solution to a complicated Arithmancy problem, and leaned into the kiss, giving as good as he got. Draco found himself grinning. Harry would hardly be content to sit there like some sort of passive maiden from the old history songs.

Harry did draw back a few moments later, and then shook his head and settled himself. "Thank you," he said.

Draco finally found something to say that didn't sound stupid. "I wish you had more ambition, Harry, but that's not the same thing as hating you for dreaming that dream."

Harry snorted with laughter. "I know that now. Can you believe how long it took me to figure it out?"

Draco stamped out a flare of anger towards the people whose fault that had been. Instead, he murmured, as he watched Harry's eyelids droop again, "Madam Pomfrey said you should stay here a while, for the spell exhaustion if nothing else. Passing that much magic through your body wore you out. Go to sleep. Do you want me to wake you at any particular time?"

"If you're still here when Snape and Regulus both come in," murmured Harry, his words slurring. "I have some things to say to them."

Draco promptly made a resolve to stay awake for that, if he could. The ring of steel in Harry's voice promised an interesting confrontation.

He waited, listening to Harry's breathing until he was certainly asleep. Then Draco leaned back, closed his eyes, and, for the first time in seventeen hours, let himself really believe that Harry's newfound ability to plan was not just a fluke, but the sign of a deeper, more profound, beautiful, and welcomed change.

Chapter Twenty-Five: The Razor Claws of Consequence

Harry woke to a light touch on his shoulder. He opened his eyes, and met Snape's gaze, harsh and unyielding.

Of course it is, Harry thought, and braced himself. He knew at least part of the confrontation that was coming. Snape, from the way he spoke in a quiet, assured voice with anger beneath the surface, didn't.

"Harry. It's Friday afternoon now, and Madam Pomfrey reassures me you have slept enough to be on the road to health. We have much to discuss about your behavior in the battle," said Snape, and sounded as if he believed it—and, more to the point, believed that all the discussion would be on his side. Harry felt his own anger stretch steely wings and uncoil within him. He sat up so that he leaned against the pillows, and squarely met Snape's gaze. He was a Legilimens. He would be able to see Harry's emotions, and read the truth of them.

Snape sat back slightly, staring at him. Harry heard a movement off to the side, and turned to see Regulus in the chair on the other side of the bed. He was just shutting his mouth with a faint click, as if he'd had it open to comment on the interplay between Harry and Snape.

"I know what you saw my gesture to defend Connor as," said Harry. They could start out with rationality and reason, he supposed, though they wouldn't stay there. "I realized it the moment the curse took me. I can tell you it wasn't what it might have looked like. I reasoned out the best course. I took the curse because the loss of my brother would have killed me. And he would have been lost, wouldn't he? No Death Eater cares enough about him to go into his mind and pull him out of a dream-world." He'd awoken again before dawn, before Snape and Regulus came, and pulled the rest of the information on the Mark Mirror Curse from Draco.

"It was still a sacrificial gesture," said Snape. "You could have cast a shield that would have deflected the curse, Harry—"

"When I was so exhausted? Without knowing what the curse was, and how strong I would have to make the shield?"

"You are making excuses," Snape hissed. "You prefer to use your body as a shield. You think of your own flesh, your own will, your own life, as sacrifices to protect your brother."

"You're wrong," said Harry, a little startled at how cool his own voice was. But then, he had known what would happen. "I did work out what might have happened, and decided to take the risk. There were other elements to the decision. I'm magically stronger than Connor. I thought I could likely survive it. He couldn't."

"I cannot believe that, Harry," Regulus said softly. "I spent time in your head, remember? I know how strong your impulses towards sacrifice are—probably stronger than you know yourself. Even when you do have time to work out what you're going to do, you choose that course rather than any other."

"Snape can tell if I'm lying," said Harry, with a jerk of his head at his guardian. "Have him look."

"I would see that you are telling the truth if you believe it to be so, Harry." Snape's voice was infuriatingly calm. Bastard probably had a chance to recover while I was talking to Regulus, Harry thought, and turned around again, determined not to give Snape any more chances like that. "For what it's worth, I agree with Regulus. You made the best decision you thought you could, but it is still not a decision that you should have made. It was a sacrifice."

Harry ground his teeth, and used the noise to calm himself. If I'm violent on my teeth, I don't need to be violent on Regulus and Snape. "It was not. I calculated the risks, I told you. And if I had conjured a shield and the curse struck Connor anyway, then what would you say? That I'd done the right thing? That wouldn't have compensated for the loss of my brother."

"We are not talking about hypothetical situations here, Harry." Snape's voice sounded like grinding ice again, much to Harry's pleasure. "We are talking about what actually happened."

“Except that you want to replace what actually happened with one of your hypothetical situations,” Harry shot back. “Either I should have done something different, or I actually did something different than what I’m saying. You distrust my motives constantly, you know—you think every step I take and every breath I draw comes from some warping my mind took from my abuse. It’s about time that that stopped. I am capable of trust. Ask Draco. And I’m getting sick and tired of not receiving any of it in return.”

“Harry, what are you talking about?” Regulus’s voice was soft and bewildered. Harry didn’t look at him, though, not wanting to back down from his silent staring contest with Snape. “Of course we trust you. But it is true that you refused to acknowledge your abuse for a long, long time. Can you blame us for thinking it does drive more of your behavior?”

“So, fine. Think it.” Harry heard how clipped his own voice was becoming, and didn’t care. He’d started out with the rational explanation, and made no headway. He would have to try the harsher road. “But then I’ll tell you otherwise. And you’ll go right on thinking it does, won’t you? That’s what I mean by distrust. It’s like being thought mad no matter what sense I speak. I am not an invalid. If I say that I’m thinking clearly, then be so good as to accept that.”

“Do you think you would still have done as you did if not for your training?” Snape asked, obviously trying to keep back a snap.

“Yes,” said Harry. “I love my brother. And he’s not the only one I’d risk my life for, not any more. If that curse was heading for you, then I would have done the same thing.”

“That is not what I want to hear.” Snape leaned towards him and spoke softly and intensely. “I want to hear that you value your own life enough to think of another course.”

“My life is mine,” said Harry. “Yes, I’m trying to think of other things that I might accomplish with it. No, I don’t want to mindlessly give it up to save an ant colony. Yes, I know that it might leave other people around me floundering if I died. But I will not, I cannot, consider that my life is more important than someone else's in the way you mean. I was fairly certain I'd survive that curse. And if I ever have to make a similar decision, and it's between damage to me and near-certain death for someone else, then I'd do the same thing."

Snape shook his head. "You cannot even conceive how much more important you are than your brother, can you?" he whispered.

Harry felt as though someone had slapped him across the face with a fistful of ice shards. He drew back from Snape and turned away, facing Regulus again. He didn't really see him, though. His mind was speaking the words over and over in his head, in numb shock.

I know that he cares more for me than Connor. I know that he doesn't really like my brother. But to say that I'm more important than he is, that my life will always matter more than his does...

And this is the thinking he wants me to share.

"Harry?" Regulus said softly.

Harry shook himself and drew his walls up again with a snap. He had survived Snape's being a git before. He could do the same thing now. And it only gave a stronger push to the half-formed suspicion he'd carried before, that, no matter what his objective need for a guardian was, Snape was not the best choice for the role. He'd sacrificed much to protect Harry, yes, but he could not rule Harry's affections, or his mind, or his thoughts.

"Now I know where you stand," he told Snape, keeping his voice flat and smooth. "Thank you for confirming that."

Snape looked at him oddly. Harry supposed he had no idea what the hell he'd just done. To him, the statement of Harry and Connor's respective values would be a normal part of his thinking, a small statement no more worthy of notice than many other truths that circulated in his mind every day.

To Harry, it symbolized everything that was wrong between them. He breathed through a tight throat, and supposed he should make an attempt to tell Snape that. Keeping silent out of pride or shame was a bad thing. He had seen that enough in his life. Sirius had died because of it. His parents and Dumbledore had sent Peter to Azkaban because they could not admit to something they had done—something they had even thought was right, but did not believe they could chance anyone else discovering. And Harry wouldn't allow Snape to go away under a misapprehension.

"I'll never think the way you do," he told Snape. "My brother is as important to me as my own safety and well-being are. You and Draco and Regulus are all important." Yes, damn it, even you, he thought, as he watched a brief spasm of emotion cross Snape's face. "But I'm not more important. And now you're going to try to punish me, aren't you, for what you think of as sacrificing my life." He didn't make it a question, because he didn't need to.

Snape's face tightened. "Yes," he said. "But not just for that, Harry. This is a sign of deeper problems that need to be corrected."

Harry felt his fury sink cold claws into his brain. I knew it. The way I think is wrong. The way I am is wrong. Snape wants to change my mind about things. Well, he can't. My actions are one thing. When I endanger other people the way I endangered Draco when I dragged him along in my attack on Voldemort's mind, then I'm wrong. That was stupid. But the way I think is mine. And I know that I made the decision to protect Connor based on the right principles. I know it, even if the two of them won't believe it.

He did shoot a glance at Regulus, to see if he believed differently from Snape. But the half-wry, half-sad smile on his lips as he gazed at Harry told the truth. He believed the same things. He thought that because he'd spent time in Harry's mind, he understood what was "wrong," what needed to be "corrected."

Harry shook his head.

"What?" Snape asked, with a frown at him.

"You don't have the right to punish me," said Harry softly. "I know exactly why I did what I did, whether you believe me or not. I know that I've changed and healed—not all the way, but enough that I'm on the right road, and I can continue pulling myself forward. I don't need detention or whatever it is that you've got planned for me.”

“Detention for a start,” said Snape. “But it is time when you can speak to me, Harry. You're right. I don't understand what possible motives you could have had for this action beyond self-sacrifice. But if you speak to me, convince me, then you might yet settle my mind and make me admit that you're right.” His face was calm again, damn him, while Harry's fury made it feel as though Voldemort's magic were passing through him once more.

“Why should I have to convince you?” Harry glanced over his shoulder at Regulus. “Why should I have to convince either one of you? I've told you the truth. I know my own mind, I think. I was the only one in my head when I made that decision. I've told you my reasoning, and you haven't accepted it. I don't see why I should spend more time telling you things you refuse to accept.” He turned away from Snape and pulled back the blankets on his bed. He still felt tired, but no more than he would after a hard day of Quidditch practice. He was going back to the Slytherin common room.

Regulus caught his arm. “Harry, we want to understand,” he said.

“I've told you the truth. Understand that.” Harry pulled his arm free.

“We wish to heal you because we care about you.” Snape's voice was frustrated. “I've seen the memories that Dumbledore had of your training, Harry. I know what he did to you. I know—”

“Did it ever occur to you,” said Harry, turning around and throwing the words like knives so that Snape would leave him alone, damn it, “that I'm more than those memories, that I'm more than just an abused child? I could never have recovered as far as I have if that's all there was to my mind. I have my own will, and my own ability to change. I am going to be a leader in this war, and a vates, and many, many other things than a victim. And yet, a victim is all you see, every time you look at me. I'm sick of it.”

"You acknowledge the other things," said Snape, his voice turning harsh. "You do not accept that you were ever a victim, Harry. Have you even spoken to anyone about the abuse you endured, except for your interviews with Madam Shiverwood?"

"You see what happens when I try?" Harry gestured at him. "You assume that's all there is to me. I try to distinguish between the motives my mother gave me and the ones I chose, and you discount my choice entirely."

"Harry—"

He wasn't in the mood to listen to Snape any more. Harry slipped out of the bed and left the hospital wing. His emotions were still cold, very far from the boiling point. It felt rather as though a chill, white mist had filled him, one through which he could see clearly and feel glittering, icicle-edged emotions.

"Mr. Potter."

Harry turned quickly. Charles Rosier-Henlin, who'd been leaning against the wall, straightened from his slouch and nodded to him, then drew a knife. Harry brought up defensive magic before he realized that the knife was his familiar one, with the dark hilt and the blade made of Light, and that Charles was holding it towards him with the hilt first.

"Henrietta Bulstrode found this on the beach after the battle," said Charles, his voice entirely neutral. "She wanted it returned to you."

Harry smiled and accepted the knife, sliding it into his belt. "And she didn't have help in the returning?"

Charles had either a very faint smile or the trick of smiling with his eyes and not his lips, Harry thought. "I wouldn't know, I'm sure." Then he cocked his head. "I was thinking that one of our major problems in this battle is communication. I dislike only former Death Eaters being able to find the man I've sworn myself to follow. I did create a spell some time ago which might solve the problem. I've never spread it around, because I didn't want anyone taking advantage of it. I use it to communicate with my sons at Durmstrang. Would it benefit you to know this spell?"

"Enormously," said Harry. "What can I do in return—"

"Remain as you are," said Charles fiercely, even as he drew his wand. "Care for your brother. I know why you did that, and it is a motive I can only approve of. Family is important. Be savage, and be fierce, and be free-willed. Do not become a Lord."

Harry let his lips quirk. "I think I can manage that. What is the spell?"

Charles nodded. "It needs to be cast on both of us at first," he said. "After that, you need only to speak the spell with my name in it and it will work." He reached out and tapped Harry's left wrist carefully with his wand. Harry watched his face closely, but he showed no revulsion at the sight of the stump. "Adoro braccio de Harry Potter!"

Harry blinked as an odd tingling ran up his arm. It didn't feel quite like anything he'd sensed before, unless it was a slow lightning bolt. He watched as Charles stepped back and touched his own wrist, this time murmuring the spell with both of their names in it. Then Charles walked around the corner of the hall, leaving Harry feeling a bit silly, just standing outside the hospital wing. He could hear Snape and Regulus arguing quietly inside, and guessed it was the reason that one of them hadn't yet come after him.

A sound of phoenix song came from just above his left wrist. Harry jumped, and realized Charles hadn't told him what to do when this happened. He cleared his throat tentatively, and asked, "Mr. Rosier-Henlin?"

"I hear you, Mr. Potter." Charles's voice was deep and self-assured, and seemed to emerge from just above his left wrist. Harry stared at his stump in fascination. "The bond between us works now. When you cast the spell with my name, I will be able to hear you, at a distance of up to several hundred miles."

Harry nodded, then realized Charles couldn't see him, and said, "I understand. This is fascinating. Where did you come up with it?"

"I studied Muggles for a while," said Charles, even as another slow lightning bolt traveled up Harry's arm and his voice only emerged from around the corner. He stepped back into sight again, looking quite pleased with himself. "I knew that anything a Muggle could do, a wizard could do better, and Muggles have a way of communicating with each other across distances, called telephones. I created a spell that could do the same thing."

Harry hesitated.

"You may share the spell with others now," said Charles, correctly interpreting his hesitation, "as long as you believe that they won't use it against our alliance. I am quite anxious to win this war, Mr. Potter." This time, the smile that showed up only in his eyes was colder. "I lost a nephew to the Dark Lord. My sons are not going to serve him, or to grow up in a world he rules."

Harry nodded. "If you don't mind my asking—well, I thought only powerful wizards could create spells of their own, Mr. Rosier-Henlin, and I didn't feel your strength plunging that deep."

"Concealment spells," said Charles comfortably. "No one alive but my wife and sons knows how strong I am. And it will remain that way for a time, Mr. Potter. I trust you with very many things, but family secrets are private and should remain that way." He paused, his eyes never looking away from Harry's. "I am sorry that yours have been spread all over the papers."

Harry grimaced. "Not as sorry as I have been. It should have been handled privately."

"I have no doubt of that," said Charles, and then bowed. "I will see you again, Mr. Potter. Speak to me every time you have need of something I can do." He strode up the hallway before Harry could think to ask him another question.

Perhaps it was just as well, because Regulus chose that moment to emerge from the hospital wing, and lean against the wall near the doors. He waited for Harry to acknowledge him. Harry didn't. He started on his way towards the Slytherin common room again, wondering absently where Argutus was. Probably out exploring, he thought. He would have lain still long enough to be boring to the Omen snake, and he was sure Draco would have told him if Argutus had died in the battle.

“Harry.”

Reluctantly, Harry pulled up and let Regulus walk beside him. It was late Friday afternoon, from the angle of the light, and he thought most of the students would be in their common rooms or on the way to dinner, but that didn't mean that he wanted everyone to see Regulus chasing after him. He cast a measured glance up at him. “Well?”

“You realize that both Severus and I care deeply for you?” Regulus scanned his face.

“Yes.” That only made this all the harder, in Harry's opinion. It would have been easy to ignore Regulus and Snape if they were condescending people only doing this for the good of some abstract abused child, or if Snape were acting out of his grudge against James, as Harry was convinced had been the case when he was first Sorted into Slytherin. As it was, he had to listen to them even when he was coldly furious with them, and give them a fair hearing. That didn't mean that he was going to change his mind, or admit that he had been wrong to do what he had done for Connor.

“And I think that you do need to heal more than you've allowed yourself,” Regulus continued softly. “You said that you'd do the same thing again, if it was a choice between damage for yourself and near-certain death for someone else. But what about situations that aren't as desperate? Do you think that you could change your mind about them, and act in different ways?”

“I would try,” said Harry. “But you and Snape would still think that I'm acting from stupid motives.”

“Harry, no.” Regulus gripped his shoulders and sank down in front of him. His eyes were gentle, but not mocking. “It's true that I don't believe you. I've seen how deep the wounds go, remember, even in your rebuilt mind. But I could come to believe you. And you are certainly allowed to go on reaching for love, for comfort, for the people who love you, outside of battle. That's the reason I wanted to make you my heir—to give you a place, places, to belong, and show you how much I care for you."

Harry narrowed his eyes. "And I don't need houses or money as a proof of that emotion, Regulus. That's why I'm asking you to find another heir. I don't want them."

"Why not?" Regulus persisted.

"I just don't."

"Tell me why."

Harry shook his head, thinking that if he spoke what he honestly felt, he would hurt Regulus—and then he remembered that he was supposed to trust them and speak what he felt, wasn't he? He let out a windy sigh between clenched teeth. "I feel like they're an encumbrance," he said. "I think most possessions are, unless they can actually help me in battle or they mean something to both me and the person who gave them."

"This fits that last category, Harry."

"But it's too heavy." Harry didn't know a better word than that, though it was obvious from Regulus's expression that he didn't understand. "I get uneasy with a few birthday gifts, Regulus. I never cared that much about becoming heir of Lux Aeterna, even. I always assumed James would make Connor his heir. I just don't care. They're not things I value."

"And you think that—"

"I wouldn't make a good heir if I don't value the houses and money and possessions." Harry made an attempt to soften his voice as he saw Regulus's stricken expression. "I value the offer more than I can express, Regulus. But that's not what's needed to take care of a house like Number Twelve Grimmauld Place. And you do have other people who could accept it, or you might meet someone who could. What you want to give me deserves better care than I would give it."

"You value them, and yet you don't value them." Regulus shook his head. "There's a contradiction in your thinking there, Harry."

"I value them for other people. Not for me."

"You think you don't deserve them?" Regulus cocked his head. "Yes, I understand what you mean about heaviness now. I felt some of that on your birthday. You kept wanting to push the gifts back. You were embarrassed about receiving them at all. You don't think you deserve them, do you?"

Harry hissed between his teeth. "This is silly."

"I don't think so. Not when I still want to make you my heir, Harry."

"I won't accept it."

"I'll make the will." Regulus looked absurdly calm as he rose to his feet. "What you do with them when they pass to you is your affair."

"And if I chose to let Bellatrix have them?"

Regulus gave him a patient look.

"All right, so I wouldn't really do that," Harry admitted, flushing. "And it wasn't even a good lie. But I don't want them."

"Someday, I'll help you figure out why," said Regulus. "I'm not like Severus, Harry, and that's the reason that he sent me out after you. I can be more patient with you, and perhaps I can even convince him that we do need to listen to you instead of just demanding explanations we'll dismiss. Not to mention that I have a better sense of humor, and am far more devilishly handsome." He struck a pose that made Harry's breath unexpectedly catch; for a moment, Sirius was alive all over again.

“I meant what I said,” said Harry, when he could speak. “All of it. About not wanting the houses and the money, and about not wanting to explain to either of you about my motives, when all you do is misinterpret them.”

Regulus nodded, with another patient look. “And we’re both going to be here, Harry, to argue and yell and give you houses, until you realize that we meant it when we said we loved you.”

“I know that—“

But Regulus had ruffled his hair and was setting off up the hall again. Harry scowled at his back, and walked towards the Slytherin common room nursing his wounded dignity.

They still think that I’m suffering consequences of the abuse. Regulus is nicer about it, that’s all. And any promise I make to think things over isn’t going to be good enough, because they’ll still believe that my real motives come from abuse. Harry ground his teeth, and his magic rose and sparked about him until he forced it back under his skin. I’ll just have to show them that they don’t, by showing them how well I’m healing, and that it isn’t due to stupid little talks with Madam Shiverwood.

He reached the door, entered the common room, and almost immediately drew any number of curious glances as he moved across it towards his bedroom. Harry ignored the glances. Yes, so he had gone off and battled the Dark Lord. Big fucking deal. Right now, he had something more important in mind.

He entered the bedroom, and glanced around to find Blaise gone. Good. Now, is Draco here, or—

A rustle in the curtains of Draco’s bed answered that question, and he poked his head out. At once, a smile grew on his face. “Harry! I didn’t know you were awake, or I would have come to the hospital wing myself.”

“That’s all right,” said Harry. “You had to go to classes, didn’t you?”

Draco immediately flopped back on the bed and folded his arms behind his head, snorting. "Yeah. Can you believe it? I want to know why Transfiguration is more important than sitting with you."

"Snape and Regulus were there," Harry said.

Draco turned his head at once, but said nothing. His eyes were intense, though, inviting Harry to talk more.

"It went badly," Harry added, drawing towards the bed. He felt a faint stir of nervousness, given what he was about to ask, but pushed it away. "They simply refused to accept that I really did make a conscious decision, rather than saying, 'Oh, goody, a curse!' and jumping in front of it."

Draco snickered in spite of himself. Harry smiled, and knew it was a fierce smile. "They still think I'm a victim," he said. "And that's all they seem to see. At least, it's the source they trace all my actions back to right now." He cocked his head at Draco. "And I know that's not true, because I'm making efforts to overcome my training. And right now I'm irritated, and I'd like to show them up, and I'd like you to touch me, please."

Draco's mouth fell open. Harry sat down on the bed beside him and took his glasses off, leaning over to drop them on Draco's trunk. "I know it's not necessarily the best motivation," he added. "But I'd like it. Please."

"No need to ask three times," said Draco, his voice gone a little hoarse, and then moved behind him. Harry closed his eyes and waited, trying to relax his shoulders from the tense hunch they'd automatically adopted.

Draco's hands came down on his back. Harry sighed. This didn't feel much different than Madam Pomfrey applying salves to soothe bruises from a Quidditch injury. He thought he could—

And then Draco slipped his hands beneath Harry's shirt, touching bare skin, and began to run them up and down.

Harry shivered.

"I know my hands aren't that cold," Draco murmured.

"Not cold," said Harry, and closed his eyes, trying to hold on to the burst of courage that had driven him here in the first place. He moved a bit, unsure if he wanted to get away or get closer. Draco settled the matter by slipping one hand free, putting his left arm around Harry's chest, and drawing him backwards.

Harry gave a gasp as he abruptly rested against Draco, and tilted his head back. Draco leaned over him, eyes a clear gray, bright with unmistakable pleasure. He really seems to like touching me, Harry thought, and didn't know which emotion was making his head so clouded. But I know something he would like more.

He raised his hand and ran it over Draco's face, then into his hair, stroking awkwardly; this wasn't a good position for him to reach much more than the back of Draco's neck. Draco gave a great huffing breath and went still for just a moment. Harry supposed it did feel good.

He himself wasn't sure what he felt as Draco's fingers worked over his back. It was all right, not cold, warm, and it made his head cloudy. He wasn't sure if it actually felt good—

And then it did, it felt too good, and ingrained instincts made Harry gasp and roll away, pulling free of Draco's arms entirely. "Sorry," he murmured into Draco's sheets, wondering if he should be more apprehensive. He closed his eyes and panted for a moment, willing the pleasure and the misty feeling to go away.

Draco hooked his arms around Harry's waist, in a gesture too old and familiar to be panicking. "That was all right," he said calmly. "Not nearly as much as I wanted, but an excellent start."

Harry swallowed. It was all right. He's not angry. He said he'd push, but he's not going to push me off a cliff.

He was able to sit up and rest his head on Draco's shoulder, before he drew away and said, "What was it like today? Did the others cheer you as a hero of the battle?"

"Half of them don't think that we battled Voldemort," said Draco at once, face flooding with disgust. "Oh, most of the Slytherins know, but there are a bunch of Ravenclaws, with that Parsons bint in the middle of them, declaring that we couldn't have, or we wouldn't have come back alive. I told you to let me hex her, Harry. We—"

Harry relaxed by degrees. It was all right. Draco didn't scorn Harry for being afraid of pleasure the way his mother had trained him to be. It was silly to think he would have. Snape and Regulus might be impossible at the moment, but Draco wasn't, and Harry was a little giddy with the emotions that flooded him at that realization.

And, oddly, that made him all the more determined to shatter this stupid training.

I'm not going to let my mother win. She did this to me, but it serves no purpose anymore, and I don't want it, and Draco doesn't want it. So I'm going to overcome it, and show Draco that I enjoy touching him as much as I enjoy talking to him or fighting beside him. Then I'll have won. We'll have won. So there.

Chapter Twenty-Six: Survival of the Kindest

Snape now remembered why he hadn't cared much about anyone for over a decade. It was because it bloody hurt, that was why.

He stood in his lab, carefully tending an experimental healing potion that was supposed to restore lost bones without the need for Skele-Gro. Behind him, Harry worked in silence, brewing the Wolfsbane required by Lupin and the other werewolves he served with effort they didn't deserve.

It wasn't that extraordinary a scene, Snape thought. It could have happened last year. But last year Harry would have spoken to him, now and then asking about the Dark Arts or saying something about his brother or Draco or how unfulfilling he found his Defense and Charms classes. Now he remained in utter silence, not even expressing an opinion when Snape asked him a question.

It was damn annoying.

And Snape knew exactly what he could say to cure the silence. He had only to tell Harry that he hadn't meant what he said, or that what he had said wasn't what it sounded like. He didn't really believe Connor was more important than Harry. Then Harry would glance at him with a cautious look in his eyes, as if to make sure that he meant that as an apology and not a justification. And he would look a little deeper, and nod, and they would be back on the path to their tentative reconciliation—perhaps even a bit further down the road than they had been the night that Harry came back from freeing the centaurs.

The only problem with that solution was that Snape would have to lie. Harry was more important to him than Connor would ever be, and Harry was more important to the war effort than Connor ever could be. And Harry knew it was the truth. It kept the silence between them poised on a knife's edge.

Snape sliced into an ashwinder's heart, and shook his head. He knew that Harry believed what he had done—saving Connor's life—to be a calculated decision, not a sacrifice. But Snape did not believe it so, could not believe it so.

Oh, he had tried. Looking into Harry's eyes a few days ago, as he lay in his bed and explained himself patiently again and again, he had used a touch of Legilimency to read the boy's emotions and tried to convince himself of it.

It hadn't worked. Harry had traded one deep-rooted stubbornness—that he needed no healing—for another—that his healing was already complete. He skirted around any mention of his parents. He went pale when he saw the articles in the Daily Prophet that talked about the abuse, but he always read them, with a morbid fascination that reminded Snape of the way that Lucius Malfoy had looked at Muggleborn students in Hogwarts, as if they were another species. He pretended not to see the sharp glances that followed him, the frightened whispers that trailed in his wake. He had made no effort to convince anyone that they had truly battled the Dark Lord after seeing how many of the other students didn't believe him.

Snape was nearly frantic with concern for him. Harry needed to—well, to heal. Snape couldn't put it any better than that. Speak with someone who wasn't that incompetent Shiverwood, or Snape, if that would make him feel better. Stand up for himself. Stop spending so much time and effort helping the people, like the werewolves, like his allies, like the other students, like his brother, like nearly everyone else but Snape and Regulus and Draco, who took from him without giving something back.

They would consume him alive. They wouldn't mean to, but they would push their own anger and fear and need at Harry. And he, who had no barriers, no sense of keeping something for himself, would burn out his own fire trying to reassure and help them. It was a noble goal, but it was one that would destroy him, because the need would never end, but Harry's ability to help would.

Snape knew he could not forbid Harry to help. It would be immoral. And he had no notion of how to restrain the most powerful wizard in the school anyway.

That's one thing the Magical Family and Child Services books never went into, he thought, and stabbed the stem of a thorny rose so hard it split apart. Snape snarled a silent curse and reached for another one. How to raise your child when he's magically Lord-level at fifteen years old and abused and refuses to submit to any of the usual punishments intended for children.

There were always the pureblood rituals, but Snape was reluctant to use them. Yes, he could establish some kind of connection with Harry if he did so, but it would be a connection that pushed Harry further and further away from acknowledging his past and healing like a normal child. He was too used to that way of dancing. He wouldn't achieve any breakthroughs, because the patterns were so familiar, and they would tend to reinforce what he already knew.

Which seemed to leave Snape with exactly nothing, with no more way of helping Harry and keeping him alive than of removing the traps Voldemort had embedded in Regulus's Dark Mark.

It was enough to drive him quite mad.

And then he did think of something he could talk to Harry about, something not mentioned in that first disastrous conversation when Harry had simply blown away his defenses like a whirlwind. Snape grunted. It was worth a try. Anything was worth a try, when he was cornered like this.

"Harry," he said.

He felt the silence snap taut, but when he looked over his shoulder, Harry had his head cocked to one side in a listening gesture.

"Have you thought about what you are going to do concerning your scar connection with the Dark Lord?" Snape concentrated on the mixture in his cauldron. If he turned up the heat just a bit, then it should slowly combine the ashwinder's heart and the thorny rose stem, and that would alter the composition of the potion just enough—if his calculations were correct—to make it restore bones instead of vanish bruises. "I know that he used it to cause you pain during the battle. I think you should shut it."

He turned around when he heard nothing. Harry had actually put his knife down and was staring at him. Snape felt hope in his mouth like dust. At least that was a different expression than the rage backed by steely determination that Harry had shown him every day in Potions class this week.

"There isn't a way to shut it," said Harry.

Snape shrugged. "I grant you that a curse scar binding you to a powerful madman and making you his magical heir is not part of most accepted theories of the mind," he said, as if he discussed this every day. "But Occlumency might work. If nothing else, it would obscure your thoughts and make your mind harder to reach. Of course, that would alert the Dark Lord, but he is already aware of your connection." That he knew for certain, having overheard Harry and Draco discussing it one day. It infuriated him that he had to rely on such measures to learn anything about his ward's life, but he would not let the fury take him. He breathed out instead, and patiently fixed his eyes on Harry's face. "I think it worth a try."

Harry's face took on that particular contemplative expression Snape had learned to fear. He was measuring himself against the needs of others, and the others had always managed to win.

He said that he is thinking now. He said that things are different. Snape grabbed his impatience with both hands and held himself still. Perhaps he will see that shutting this link is the best course for him. It would mean better sleep at night and less danger of dragging Draco into his mind, and he must see how beneficial that would be.

"I don't know all the ramifications of how the link has changed yet," said Harry quietly. "I know that it has changed since his resurrection, at least." He rubbed the stump of his left wrist. Snape wondered if he realized he was doing it. "He sent me a vision much more like a dream than the normal ones to alert me of the attack on the Weasleys, and the same kind of vision to show me the beach. I think those are under his control. And I can't affect people or things in the visions anymore. I've tried. Once, I managed to kill Nagini, but now I can't touch anything."

“Those sound like arguments in favor of shutting the link,” said Snape. “Then he cannot hurt you.”

Harry shot Snape an irritated glance. “And we would lose valuable information on the war,” he said. “It’s true that I mistook the place of his last attack, but that was my own stupid fault. At least we did know there was going to be an attack on the autumnal equinox, and it wasn’t a complete surprise. I have to have the link open.”

Snape picked up his wand and waved it at the cauldron, lowering the flame to a simmer. He was going to keep his fury out of his voice, he really was, but he had to strive hard to achieve that. This was his old fury at Lily Potter, or tried to his rage at her. All Harry said now was a direct consequence of her training. “And the ill effects on your health mean nothing to you?”

Harry’s gaze sharpened. “Here we go again,” he said, with a disgust so deep in his voice that Snape actually flinched. “You’re going to say something about my life being more important than—what this time? Being prepared for the war, maybe? The lives of my allies?” He shook his head and snorted. “I thought you would at least approve of this decision, since I’m making it out of concern for the war and not for my brother. But it would be too much to ask for your approval right now on any topic, I see.” Snape could hear the pain underlying his voice as he glanced away, another emotion Harry hadn’t shown much of in the past week.

“Harry.” Snape used his gentlest tone, both because he needed it right now, and because Harry would find it harder to block that out. “I meant what I said. I do consider you more important than your brother, yes—important to me. I did not mean that I believe Connor—the name felt strange on his tongue—should have died in your place. I meant that you should find methods that would preserve both your lives. And I mean you to concentrate on offensive strategizing in this war, not defensive. I wish you to care more about yourself. You are not only a war leader, not to me. But even if I thought of you that way, then yes, I would think your health more important than any one piece of information.”

Harry shut his eyes. Snape could see a fine tremor making its way through him. He could only wait. Harry would turn to him, or he would not.

Harry turned away instead.

Snape shut his eyes. Then he heard Harry say, "I've finished the Wolfsbane Potion. I'm taking the vials to the Owlery with me, to send to the werewolves who need it—and several to Remus, of course. Good night, sir."

When the door to the lab had shut, Snape opened his eyes, and sighed. So now he's decided to turn non-confrontational. But that won't solve our problems, any more than it will solve his lingering abuse.

Glancing by habit at Harry's work area, Snape paused when he realized the boy had left one vial behind. He swept over to pick it up, secretly glad to have the opportunity to pursue Harry and call him back.

He paused when he held the glass tube, however. The potion within didn't have the color or consistency of Wolfsbane. In fact, it looked much more like the most common healing potion for bruises, the kind that Madam Pomfrey was always running out of in the hospital wing.

Come to think of it, there had seemed to be several extra vials of the potion in Snape's cubby this week.

He was mystified for only a moment. Then he just barely resisted the temptation to break the vial against the worktable.

Harry was making him the healing potions—a tedious task Snape preferred not to have to do himself, for all its necessity—in return for Snape's letting him use the ingredients for Wolfsbane. He was doing it so that he wouldn't owe his guardian anything.

Harry, quite literally, seemed to want nothing from him.

Harry could feel his shoulders tense as he walked into the meeting of the dueling club, now held in one of the abandoned classrooms. It was pouring down rain outside, more than enough reason to stay in. But this classroom was full of people staring at him.

And that's different from the rest of Hogwarts, how? Harry put up his head and pasted a deliberately haughty expression on his face, taking time to meet the eyes of the students who sat in a semicircle of desks nearest the front—all of them closer friends than half the people here. Hermione gave him a small smile. Connor, hand-in-hand with Parvati, also smiled, though his girlfriend didn't. Neville, with dirt still under his fingernails from helping Professor Sprout in the greenhouses, waved. Millicent gave a single firm nod.

And then Draco was there, striding up to Harry's side with a glance that asked not, "Am I late?" but "How could you have started this early, without me?" Harry felt himself relax completely. He moved closer to Draco, asking without words, and received a gentle brush on his shoulder from one hand already outstretched to touch him.

You knew this was going to happen, Harry thought, a more rational, bracing thought than he'd been able to have when Draco wasn't there. You had to have known it from the day the negative newspaper stories began.

And he had known it, he could tell himself now. He still didn't know exactly who "Argus Veritaserum" was. But he had known the mysterious reporter had it in for him, and he had known that, at some point, he would claim that the accusations of child abuse against Harry's parents and Headmaster Dumbledore were completely made up, without foundation—that Harry had in fact turned on his loving guardians, the ones who had tried to stop him misusing his magic from such a young age, out of spite and inherent tendencies towards becoming a Dark Lord.

It was only a story, Harry reminded himself. It wasn't true. The people who believed it to be true must have their reasons for doing so, and he couldn't blame them for having those reasons. The mere thought of falsely accusing someone of child abuse made him flinch. For that matter, the thought of what could happen to Dumbledore and his parents with the accusations being true made him want to curl up into a ball a few times each day.

He had no reason to feel as though there were a lead weight pressing on his chest each time he met someone's eyes and saw questions about the truth there. He knew the truth. What did it matter? Why was he letting the stares and the whispers and the outraged hisses get to him?

Well, he didn't know why he was, but it would have to stop. He had a dueling lesson to begin, and today they were starting Dark Arts.

He waited a few more minutes, both to listen to Draco's quick recitation of an amusing incident at dinner after Harry had left and to make sure no one else would show up. He noticed that Margaret Parsons, who sat in the back of the room, was watching him with less animosity than usual. In fact, she grinned at him several times, and burst into giggles with her friends more than once. Harry shrugged it off. Perhaps she'd decided that the story in the Prophet today was funnier than anything.

At last, he decided that some of the regular attendees were either busy or hadn't got permission from their parents to be in a class where Dark Arts were practiced, and held up his hand. The door swung itself shut and locked. A few students began murmuring anxiously, but Harry silenced them with another gesture, though that one had no magical force behind it.

"I'm about to show you a few Dark curses," Harry said softly. "I don't want them to get into the corridor, either on purpose or deflected, and I certainly don't want anyone hurting anyone else." He glanced at Remus, standing casually in a corner. Remus smiled back, reassuring him he was doing all right with his introduction to the Dark Arts so far. Relieved he was there to heal anyone who did get injured, Harry returned his gaze to his students. "Remember what Professor Merryweather says about these types of curses. Some of the defense against them has to come from inside. If you take too much pleasure in them, surrender your will too completely, then it won't matter if you deflect them when an opponent hurls them at you. They'll still infect you with the desire to practice more and more."

"I'm sure you know that intimately, don't you, Potter?" Susan Bones asked, frowning at him.

Harry simply gazed back at her without answering, until Susan lowered her eyes and blushed. Harry let out a calming breath, and told himself it wasn't Susan's fault. She must be under a lot of stress now that the Second War had begun. She had lost her grandparents and her uncle and cousins to Death Eaters during the First War. And one of the Death Eaters arrested for complicity in the death of her uncle Edgar Bones—though of course, he had escaped prosecution by convincing the Wizengamot he was under the Imperius Curse at the time—had been Lucius Malfoy, whose son was standing unconcernedly at Harry's side this very moment.

It's all so very complicated, and I can't make it worse. If I want them to accept what I believe, and that it is possible for Dark wizards to actually work against the Dark Lord, I have to accept what they believe. They have their own minds, their own free wills. I can only try to convince and persuade people to follow me, not compel them.

"The first curse I'm going to show you is Ardesco," said Harry. A few of the students flinched, but Harry shook his head. "I won't cast it at any of you," he promised, and then concentrated. A wooden figure, vaguely human-shaped, appeared in the center of the classroom, well away from the desks, and then wards snapped into place around it, the locked chain of Shield Charms that Harry could now perform with barely a thought, to contain the curse in the area with the figure. "I'm only going to show you how to perform it."

He picked up his wand, and this time Margaret Parsons laughed aloud. Harry glanced at her. Margaret just looked back at him, eyes sparkling. "You're using a wand, Potter?" she asked. "You really like pretending that you're the same as all the rest of us, don't you? The rest of us who don't have to make up stories about being abused by our parents and fighting the Dark Lord to get attention?"

"Miss Parsons," said Remus, and Harry heard the werewolf in his voice. "Such language is unwarranted."

"You'd say that," said Margaret, "because you're his godfather, and a Dark creature. But—"

"Leave," Harry told her.

Margaret shook her head. "I don't want to. You locked the door."

"I can unlock it." Harry flicked a glance at the door, and willed it so, and the door stood open. "Go away. I don't think that anyone has the right to say such things to Remus."

Margaret sighed. "Potter, you can't take a joke," she said. "I'm sorry, all right? I'm not used to thinking of werewolves as people. I'm sorry, Professor Lupin," she added to Remus in a singsong.

Harry flicked a glance at Remus. He wasn't the one she'd tried to insult, after all. It was up to Remus to say if she could stay or not.

Remus bared his teeth, but nodded. He feared his own anger, Harry knew. He would control himself better than Margaret could be expected to control herself. But that was the way it had to be, Harry told himself firmly. Remus was an adult, and she was a child. He had the power to hurt her, to punish her, but that didn't give him the right to do it if she was only acting out of childish impulse.

Harry then put an arm out sideways, not even looking at Draco, and forced down his wand.

"Don't hex her, Draco," he said. "She's not worth it. And you know that she can't hurt us, and how volatile Slytherin's relationship with Ravenclaw is right now." An entirely unprovoked attack on Montague in the corridor that morning had proven that. "I don't want this to be the incident that sparks off a war between the Houses. Remus said it's all right, so it is."

"It's what she said about you. I want to hurt her."

Harry turned his head sharply at that. When he looked into Draco's eyes, he could see Lucius. And Harry had good cause to know just how vengeful Lucius Malfoy was. He shook his head frantically and leaned towards Draco.

“Draco, please,” he whispered. “I’m all right, too.”

“You’re not,” said Draco. “You’re not, and she’s making it worse, and I want to hurt her. She needs to suffer, Harry.” He didn’t speak loudly, and not even with much anger. There was simply a manic determination on his face.

The problem with having a possessive, protective, vengeful boyfriend, Harry thought, is that he finds it a little harder to forgive people for being children. “I don’t want her to.”

Draco snarled. Just in case, Harry added the shimmering, almost invisible line of a ward between him and Margaret, and then turned back to the figure in front of him. He locked the door again, lifted his wand, and said, “I’ll say the incantation and make the wand movement slowly. Then I’ll demonstrate the actual curse.”

He performed the slow demonstration, hearing the scratch of a quill as Hermione scribbled down notes on the movement. Then he faced the figure, snatched up a bit of his anger to funnel through the curse, and said, “Ardesco!”

The wooden figure burst into intense flames, consuming itself from the inside out. It went even faster than it usually did. Harry blinked, realizing that his rage must have done the curse good. But then, Dark Arts usually benefited from wild emotions.

He turned and faced his audience, seeing the shaken look on Hermione’s face. And Parvati’s face, for that matter, and others’. They were probably thinking about what that incantation could do to a human enemy. Well, good. I don’t want them using these spells casually. “The Intense Flame curse is a good one to begin with,” he said, “because it can’t bounce, so there’s less chance of hitting a classmate with it, unless you point your wand at them. It consumes from the inside, as you saw, instead of flying in a straight line of fire.” He glanced from face to face, and drove the point home, just in case they didn't get it. "It kills painfully, and almost instantly. Your enemy, if you hit them, often has no chance to resist."

They watched him in silence. Even Margaret's laughter had ceased, for the moment. Then Neville stood up.

"Can I try it, Harry?" he asked quietly.

Harry smiled despite himself. This is the reason he went into Gryffindor. Neville had more reason to hate the Dark Arts than most, since Bellatrix Lestrange had tortured his parents into insanity, but he was volunteering to show that the spells were nothing to be afraid of and reassure the others. Harry nodded encouragingly at him and conjured another wooden figure in the nest of wards, then moved aside so that Neville could take his place.

Neville stared at the wooden person for some moments. Harry watched his expression change, clouds taking over his usually pleasant face until it was an expression of absolute and utter determination. He wondered who Neville was imagining as his foe. He privately hoped it wasn't Snape.

Neville aimed his wand at the figure. "Ardesco!" he said, the first two syllables firmly, the last with a little tremble in his voice.

Fire bloomed, blue-white and consuming, from the figure's chest region. It charred only the chest and head before fading, but Harry was impressed. It was more than he had expected anyone in the class to manage tonight, except possibly Millicent, Draco, and a few others who had been around Dark magic from the time they were children.

More interestingly, he had felt Neville's power, usually burning at just about average level, soar up around him with dazzling intensity when he cast the spell. Then it fell back. Harry nodded. That's why he doesn't do well in Potions. He's a lightning wizard—quick burning strikes are his style, powered by emotion. Of course, he's good in Herbology, but there he has love to sustain his interest. If all he feels is nervousness, like he does in Potions, then he'll mess up instead, because his magic tries to help him but doesn't have enough intensity to work with.

"Very good, Neville!" he said, and Neville beamed at him shyly. "Excellent." Harry created another two figures, one off to the side and one slightly in front of the first one, and urged Neville off to stand before the second. "Why don't you practice on that, and I'll need another volunteer to try and cast Ardesco again?" He looked around inquiringly.

Hermione rose to her feet in interest, but Margaret spoke before she could say anything. "Oh, I was supposed to wait longer, but I just can't."

Harry looked at her warily. If she was finally participating, then he had to give her a chance—

And then he realized that she'd stooped down and picked up something from the floor. Harry blinked. It looked to be a box of the kind that non-volatile Potions ingredients were usually shipped in. He didn't understand until Margaret removed the box's lid and picked up something from within it.

It was Argutus, with his mouth bound to his tail in what looked to be an intensely uncomfortable position.

"I found him spying in my room," said Margaret. "I thought I'd bring him back to you, Potter." She smiled at him. "Don't worry. I didn't hurt him—not nearly as much as you hurt Headmaster Dumbledore, at any rate."

Harry choked, his rage rising in him so suddenly that he couldn't breathe. He clenched his hand in front of him. He saw Draco edge closer with a faint look of intoxication on his face, and realized his magic must be rising around him. A few people looked fearful, but Margaret was too far gone in the bliss of her little plan to be one of them.

"Give him here," said Harry softly.

“I want you to promise that you’re never going to send him spying in the Ravenclaw girls’ bedrooms again.” Margaret dropped the box and picked up her wand, touching it to the ropes that bound Argutus. She murmured what Harry could just make out as a Constriction Spell, and the ties grew tighter. The little Omen snake couldn’t even thrash. “What were you having him do, Potter? Look for dirty little secrets that you could file more false charges about?”

“Miss Parsons.” Remus’s voice sounded very far away through the haze of Harry’s anger. “I would advise you to give his snake to Mr. Potter. Now.”

“I just want a promise, that’s all. I think he shouldn’t even have the snake, really. It’s against school rules. But, of course, Harry Potter gets to be the exception to all the rules. He even gets to attend Hogwarts after he’s forced the best Headmaster in history out.” Margaret gave Harry a sweet smile. “Come on, Potter, a promise, what do you say? I’d hate to have to cast a pain curse on your precious little snakeling—” She raised her wand as if she were going to do just that.

“Exsculpo,” Harry snapped. “Wingardium Leviosa. Silencio. Accio Argutus.”

The jet of purple light that sprang from his hand made the ropes binding Argutus cease to exist in the next moment. Then Argutus was floating, so that Margaret couldn’t drop him to the floor, and Margaret’s voice was silenced, and Argutus was skimming towards Harry, landing safely on his shoulder.

Harry turned his head so that he could focus on the Omen snake. “Did she hurt you?” he demanded.

“Tied me up and made me miss my meals, mostly.” Argutus twisted back and forth, as though trying to get rid of the memory of the ropes. “But I am sore and hungry, and she said some of the words in the language my name is in. They hurt me.”

Harry closed his eyes. He wanted so badly to wound Margaret. What she did to him didn't matter, he could survive it all, but that she had hurt Argutus, a tiny snake who wasn't even venomous—

He wanted to hurt her, he wanted her to cease to exist, and he knew that he had the power to do it, too.

And if he used that power, what was going to make him any better than Voldemort?

He could feel the press of eyes on him, sympathetic and fascinated and frightened, and he gave a little sob. The gazes, combined with the sheer force of his temper, were going to push him over the edge in a moment, and Margaret might find herself writhing under the Cruciatus, for all Harry knew. He'd cast it against Voldemort in the graveyard.

Desire and will rushed together, and formed a new spell, the one he needed at the moment—to make him safe, to make the others safe from him.

“Extabesco plene,” he gasped, and felt the walls of the spell rise up around him, wrapping him in wind, making him vanish. He was still there, of course, but he was hidden—not just from sight, as an Invisibility Cloak or Disillusionment Charm would do, but from all the senses. No one could hear him or feel him, and Remus wouldn't be able to track him by scent. And his magic was under the spell with him, wrapped and turned inside out. Not even its pounding power would reveal him.

Harry brushed past Draco's reaching hand, ducked, and ran through the suddenly open door.

He aimed by instinct for the areas of the school where few people would be at this hour, after dinner on a weeknight, and finally found another abandoned classroom. He slipped inside it and leaned against the wall, his eyes closed, his head thrown back. His panting shook him.

He'd almost lost control.

He'd almost hurt another student.

He was sick with himself, and furious, and frightened—especially because the soft twining of Argutus around his neck made him dream all over again about injuring Margaret, making her feel exactly the pain that Argutus had felt, returning curse for curse.

He wished with all his heart in that moment that his dream were real, and he could just be assured that no one would come looking for him unless they actually needed help. He could vanish, for hours at a time. No one would worry. He'd slip in and out of the world, using his magic only for good things, and he would understand everything.

Harry opened his eyes and regarded the shimmer of his magic, visible since it was trapped in a small space with him, with what he knew was a look of loathing. "What good are you," he whispered, "if you can be used to hurt other people like that?"

"Sometimes a short, sharp shock can be most beneficial, Mr. Potter."

Harry whipped his head around, and his magic moved with it, solidifying into an arrow that Harry had to struggle to keep from flying. Acies Lestrangle was standing in the door of the classroom, staring straight at him.

"How can you see me?" Harry demanded. He was counting on his new spell to shelter him, but it was no good if it didn't work.

"You cannot fool a dragon's eyes, Mr. Potter." Acies walked across the room and sat down on a desk. She wore a fringed cowl about her face, and did not try to meet his gaze. Harry didn't even know for certain if she was looking at him now, or at a corner of the room. She spoke absently. "And you cannot fool my family's sense of power. I know what happened."

"What I almost did?"

"Yes." Acies tilted her head. "Would it have been so terrible?"

Harry choked. "Of course it would have," he said, when he could speak. "I would have hurt her, and she—she couldn't defend herself. It wouldn't have been an equal contest." He leaned his head on his knees and closed his eyes.

"You smell of so much pain," said Argutus softly. "I don't like it when you smell of so much pain."

"She fights very well on a plane where you will not even try to defend yourself, that of insults and public opinion," said Acies. "If you had shocked her or hurt her badly enough, Mr. Potter—note that I do not advocate killing her—then she would have backed off."

"And then she would have hated me even more." Harry wondered why in the world Acies, a Defense Against the Dark Arts teacher, was telling him this. "I don't want to be the one who strikes the spark that starts the wildfire, Professor Merryweather."

"Something will be, if you are not." Acies's voice were pensive. "I do not know why the reaction towards you is so deep, Mr. Potter. Sometimes I think I know, and then it slides from my mind. I will keep trying to guess." Then she shook her head. "As it is, she will not remember that you held back from using pain curses on her. She will remember only that you startled and nearly hurt her. She will feel the need to prove herself, or she will grow bold from thinking that you don't dare provoke a confrontation, and she will increase her torment."

"I can't hurt her," Harry whispered. "And I can't allow Draco or Snape or anyone else who cares about me to hurt her, either."

"Why not?" Acies's voice was polite, mildly interested, as if this were a matter of academic interest to her.

"Because of the same principles that you've given us, of course, Professor." Harry frowned at her. "Because we need to understand and respect other people's sacrifices. The loss of Headmaster Dumbledore was a sacrifice for her family and for her. She's only acting like this because of that. How can I blame her for that?"

“Defending yourself and blaming her are two different things.” Acies leaned forward. “It is not often used, because to do so would spark rivalries between powerful students that Hogwarts does not need, but there is a stricture in the books of the school that gives professors a certain—ability. I grant you formal permission to defend yourself with magic outside of class, Mr. Potter. What you do with that permission is up to you.”

Harry closed his eyes. “You shouldn’t be showing favoritism like that, Professor Merryweather.”

“I am not the Head of a House,” said Acies. “More, I am the Professor of Defense Against the Dark Arts, which already has a relaxation of rules associated with it. This is not favoritism, Potter. This is the removal of a restriction that will let you carry the battle to a field where I know you excel.”

“But I should learn to be more patient—“

“There is a certain point,” Acies interrupted him, “at which patience, forgiveness, mercy, forbearance, are all weaknesses, Potter—invitations to your enemies to do whatever they like, under the sure and certain knowledge that you won’t strike back. I believe this permission will prevent confrontations. I will have the Headmistress announce it tomorrow. It will give students a reason to think twice before attacking you, verbally or magically. And if you ignore your own emotions and instincts long enough, the explosion, when it comes, will be more violent. You saw that today.”

Harry sighed. He still didn’t like it, since it was a privilege that elevated him above others, but he didn’t think he had the energy to persuade Acies out of it right now. And maybe she was right, and it would prevent people from getting into confrontations, which would insure that he wouldn’t hurt them.

“You are like me, Potter,” Acies said, making him look up. “As much magical creature as wizard. Lords, or those with the power to become so, often are. Your magic needs to be exercised, trained, controlled, used. It is a part of you as much as your limbs and your eyes, rather than something extra, as it is for some wizards. Better to use it in constant small spells rather than dam it up and have it come out in a flood.”

Harry nodded. Snape had told him something similar during the summer between his second and third year, when his magic had first begun bursting free of the phoenix web.

He was sick of thinking and talking about himself, though, and he asked, “What do you mean, like you?”

Acies cocked her head. “Why, I have the dragon within me, Mr. Potter,” she said. “The wildness. It begins to burn and beg for release if I ignore it too long. And yet, each time I use it, the balance in my mind slips a little more, and the dragon becomes a little stronger.” She stood up and walked towards the door.

“What happens when the balance tilts from human to dragon?” Harry asked her back.

Acies glanced over her shoulder. “Then I will not come back,” she said gently, and shut the door behind her.

Harry closed his eyes. His magic hummed around him, and Argutus asked for crickets.

Like it or not, I can’t just fade. The spell is a nice compromise for when I absolutely need it, but Draco will be frantic about me, and Remus and Connor will be worried. And Snape, too, I suppose.

Harry sighed, and dismissed the cocoon of spells around him. His magic at once uttered a trilling song of freedom, gliding around him so happily that Harry shook his head.

I suppose I really haven’t used it enough lately. Draining Voldemort’s power is passive enough not to count.

Harry took several deep breaths, then rose to his feet and turned to seek out Draco. Perhaps Acies was right, and the ability to use magic to defend himself if necessary would make larger spells unnecessary.

Harry could think of something that would be even better as far as exercising his impatient magic, though.

Time to take the battle with Voldemort on the offensive.

Chapter Twenty-Seven: Becoming Conscious

Harry went up on his broom early the next morning, long before anyone else awoke, long before Draco would have a reason to expound on revenge plans against Margaret that Harry was determined not to honor.

He had to think, and the sky was the best place for it. Harry rose steadily, his hand and legs locked around the Firebolt. His magic hovered around him. If he slipped due to his lack of a left hand, it would be ready to aid him, but Harry didn't think he would slip. He wasn't chasing a Snitch, after all, and had no reason to stretch out his right hand to grasp at the air.

He soared until he was gasping, the thin, cold air cutting at his cheeks. Then he turned and glanced down at the bulk of the castle, the Forbidden Forest—an undifferentiated dark mass at this point—and the Quidditch Pitch. Several thousand feet below him, Harry thought, dizzily. The problems in Hogwarts still existed, of course, but their presence in his mind felt diminished, as though the size of the sky were eating them, even as distance ate the buildings that loomed over him when Harry walked among them.

He had to think. Here, where he was alone and the sky sang around him and the muted exhilaration that always came with flying gripped him, was the best place.

Harry closed his eyes, leaned out along his broom, and began to circle. He murmured a warming charm to protect himself from the cold air when that got to be distracting, forcing his thoughts to turn to inner and not outer discomfort.

What did he have to do?

Well, one thing was fairly obvious. Something about Margaret. Remus had taken one hundred fifty points from Ravenclaw for fighting, tormenting another student's pet, insulting a professor, and acting irresponsibly in a room where Dark Arts curses were being used. Harry thought that might restrain Margaret for a short while, but in the end, it wouldn't be enough—not if fear of Harry's magic hadn't held her back so far. And her Housemates had laughed with her yesterday, not stood up to her, so they were unlikely to be much help, either.

A short, sharp shock, Acies said.

Harry sighed. And the shock would most likely have to be magical, he knew—both because of the permission for him to use magic in his own defense that Acies would get McGonagall to announce today and because he doubted that Draco and some of the other Slytherins would be satisfied with less than a magical revenge. He'd heard Millicent and Blaise discussing it last night when he finally returned to the common room, though of course they shut up immediately when they saw him. They would defend him unless he showed that he was capable of defending himself.

What kind of spell would make her back off instead of just find some other way of getting at me? I can't shield everyone. If she can't go after Argutus or Draco, she'll just go after another of my friends, and there's no way to predict who she'll choose beforehand.

A progressive spell was the best course to take, Harry decided at last, one that would advance in stages as Margaret failed to restrain herself. If she hurt him once, only one thing would happen; if she hurt him twice, then the second thing would, and so on. And it had to be something that would embarrass her, rather than physically hurt her. The mere thought of using pain curses or Transfiguring her into a stone statue the way Voldemort might have made Harry squirm as though his stomach were on fire.

What, then?

And then it occurred to him, and Harry blinked and smiled a bit. Well, yes, that would be very hard to hide or disguise as anything other than what it is. And I'll only need to use it if she attacks me. If she's learned her lesson, or all her Housemates pile on her and keep her still, then it can stay safely in my head.

That decided, Harry moved his mind reluctantly on to the next topic he thought he had to deal with—Snape.

After several minutes of uphill struggle against his instincts, Harry had to admit that the man might have a point. Could he learn anything more from the scar connection? Harry didn't know. Since the battle, he'd had nothing but visions too brief and blurred to be useful, or ordinary dreams—most of them repeats of the Hogwarts where he was happy. Voldemort almost certainly didn't want Harry able to find and follow him while he was as severely wounded as he was. Harry could perhaps delve further into the link, but he didn't know how to do that without dragging Draco along.

A one-sided barrier would be the best solution, then, one that I can take down if I need it but which he can't get through.

Harry grimaced and opened his eyes, to watch a gull making its way through the air far below. His greatest strength in Occlumency lay in shielding his own emotions, calming himself and letting his rational thinking take over—probably a legacy of the box. He had never tried something like Voldemort's snake, a trap that would block a hostile mind with a permanent link to his from entering. He would have to have Snape's help if he was going to do this.

Do I want that help?

It didn't matter if he wanted it. He would have to get it. Harry twitched his head irritably. And that meant he had to come to some kind of understanding with Snape.

Perhaps I did mistake him. Maybe. I thought he was saying I was worth more as a human being than Connor is, which is so ridiculous it doesn't deserve a rational argument. But maybe he did mean that I was more important to him and the war effort. I can see that. It would fit with what he was saying when I brewed the Wolfsbane. And if Connor is going to be the one to defeat Voldemort—well, I hold that as a possibility, but Snape probably doesn't. He knows more about my skills and my readiness to fight the Dark Lord than he does about Connor's.

Perhaps I should ask him to give Connor lessons?

Harry snorted, but kept the thought in mind. Snape was still the professor at school who knew the most about Dark Arts—well, perhaps Acies knew more, but she so far was concentrating more on the philosophy of them, the internal defense against falling into temptation, than the outer defense against specific spells. And for all Harry knew, she'd refuse to tutor Connor, because Acies was like that.

He won't like it. I'll have to persuade him, maybe, or offer to do something for him. But I think I at least need to ask. Connor felt so useless in the battle. Harry winced at the thought of the expression on his brother's face when he'd first seen him last weekend. Connor had smiled stiffly and thanked him for jumping in front of the curse, but the deep sense of helplessness in his eyes was one that Harry could empathize with. I'll ask Snape.

Well, he meant to make many requests that weekend, including that any of his allies who had useful information about a possible Death Eater location tell him what that information was, so that they could plan an offensive attack on Voldemort. This could be part of the general deluge of requests.

And that left the crawling problem that he'd been trying not to think about, the thing that should not have been a problem but was. That was the weighty sense of outrage and anger he'd felt about the Daily Prophet article yesterday, and Margaret's insults, and the murmurs in the corridors, and all the other little things he shouldn't have let bother him, but which did bother him.

He knew what Snape would say, could hear the dry suggestion echoing in his head. Go talk to someone.

Harry shook his head impatiently. Who was there to talk to? Remus and Snape and McGonagall knew everything; it wasn't like Harry could say anything new to them, and McGonagall was doubly restricted by the fact that she was Headmistress of the school and couldn't be seen as favoring just one student. Nor did he want to make them relive what his parents had done to him, or subject Remus to more ugly reminiscences of two of his best friends.

Use Occlumency to help in that too, then. I think I'm only being affected the way I am because of that abrading I took from Voldemort's mental venom. Heal myself, get myself under control again, and the pools should swallow my emotions. I'll get through this alive. I've taken worse. And I'm sick of thinking about myself all the time. If I can concentrate on planning an offensive attack and getting Snape to train Connor, it will be better.

He closed his eyes and gently expanded his Occlumency pools, overwhelming the boiling chaos in his mind under a cool tide. He had to wrestle for perhaps twenty minutes, since emotions kept popping up and poking through the surfaces of the pools, but finally, he opened his eyes, calm and as near relaxed as he'd get.

A thought came to him. Harry indulged himself in it.

Why not? There's no one there to see.

He pointed his Firebolt at the ground and dived straight down.

The wind rushing past him built to a roar with his speed, and the warmth steadily increased as he came lower and lower, into the air stroked by the rising sun's rays. The sky tumbled past him, blue and gray and polished to a sharp sheen with the rain that had fallen yesterday. Harry heard himself laughing. The joy surged through him, a light mist floating on top of the Occlumency pools, not one of those emotions he needed to restrain.

Only when he pulled out of the dive and circled lazily a few feet above the ground did he realize that someone had been watching him after all. Hawthorn Parkinson stood near the school's front doors, her hood pulled back and her eyes fixed on him. Harry could feel himself tense, but he shoved the worry back under the surface of the Occlumency pools as well. He nodded at her as if he did death-defying dives all the time, and then pulled his Firebolt to a stop and hopped off it.

"Hello, Mrs. Parkinson," he said quietly. "Is there something I can do for you?"

Hawthorn opened her mouth, then visibly changed what she was about to say. "Yes, Harry. I have information that you'll be interested in—the probable location of one of the camps where the Dark Lord is keeping his captive Muggles. And I brought some people with me whom I think you should meet." She gave a nervous little flick of her shoulders. Harry cocked his head. I don't look that intimidating with my cheeks flushed from diving and my hair tousled, do I?

"I'd be very interested in that, yes," he contented himself with saying. "I was about to contact you and the others and tell you that I think it's time we took this war on the offensive instead of the defensive. A raid of that kind would be perfect." He looked around, but he didn't think that the others were standing at Hawthorn's side under Disillusionment Charms, or he would already have seen them. "Where are these people you want me to meet?"

Hawthorn lifted her head and gave an odd sound, half-yelp and half-howl. Shadows stirred towards the edge of the Forbidden Forest a moment later, and six people emerged.

Harry knew three of them, he realized after a quick glance: Tybalt Starrise, his joined partner John, and Laura Gloryflower. The other three, two women and a man, were strangers.

But all three of them, Harry saw as they came closer, were werewolves. Their eyes, darkened almost to the color of amber, proclaimed it, as did their half-flared nostrils. And then, of course, he knew who they must be: the three children of Light families whom Fenrir Greyback had bitten, the three werewolves he'd been brewing Wolfsbane for.

Harry bowed slightly to the male stranger. "Fergus Opalline?" he asked.

The man nodded, a faint smile curling the edges of his mouth. He had a wild shyness that reminded Harry of Remus, or at least Remus as he had been before the Sanctuary. His hair was pale, a white-blond color that reminded Harry of the Malfoys'. Harry decided to keep any remarks on that resemblance to himself, and glanced at the two women.

One looked too similar to Laura not to be related to her. Her hair was a cloud of golden curls, and she had bells braided in and among them that marked her as a trained war witch. Harry stared in open curiosity, certain there was a story there; she was only in her early twenties, and training like that normally took more than a decade. "Delilah Gloryflower?" he asked.

She bared her teeth at him as she sniffed, thoroughly, and Harry wondered for a moment who led their little impromptu pack, her or Hawthorn. Probably Hawthorn, since she'd been a werewolf longer, but Harry could see Delilah challenging her for the position someday—if werewolves were anything like normal wolves, which Harry had to admit they might not be. "I am," she said. "It is a pleasure to meet you at last, Mr. Potter." She cocked her head to the side and relaxed suddenly, as if his scent or the power of his magic had reassured her somehow.

Harry turned and nodded at the final woman. She had her head down, but she looked up at him with a jerk. Harry winced as he saw the marks of the bite that tore across her face from the right side of her head. Her right ear was missing, and Greyback's fangs had obviously stopped just a few inches short from her eye. She had a cast of features that marked her as related to Tybalt, but the ripping scar and her dark hair separated her entirely. "I am Claudia Griffinsnest," she said. "And you might as well stare. I owe you a debt I can never repay, and I've lost things I can never recover."

"I am sorry," Harry offered quietly. He hesitated, then decided he had to take the risk, and flipped his left sleeve back from the stump of his left wrist.

Claudia relaxed almost at once. "Thank you," she said. "It is good for me to remember that others have made sacrifices, as well, so that I do not sink into despair."

"I'll say," Tybalt murmured. "You ought to hear her moaning on sometimes, Harry. Utterly insufferable, really."

Claudia snapped at Tybalt. Harry couldn't tell how serious it was. The bite, or perhaps just her control over her emotions, made her face very hard to read. Delilah put a hand on Claudia's shoulder, though, and Fergus cast Tybalt a harsh glance, edging towards the two women.

"It is good to see you again, child," Laura Gloryflower said, and the whole focus of the company seemed to shift and reorient on her. Harry braced himself. He wasn't about to yield control to her the way he had when they first met in the Ministry. He kept his face cool as he inclined his head back.

"Thank you, Mrs. Gloryflower," he said. "Is there something specific that you came to see me for?"

"Partly, I came because Delilah is my niece," said Laura briskly. "But I also plan to join in the attack. I should have been there when you went after Voldemort on the equinox. Alas, a few members of my family still did not see sense about allying with you. Now they have." Her tranquil face gave no sign of how fierce the arguments must have been, though Harry couldn't help scanning for it. "I gave them a good scolding," Laura elaborated. "And I've also talked to a few members of Fergus's family. They'll be along as soon as Paton Opalline gets over this little fit of sulks he's having about allying with someone he thinks is a Dark wizard." She nodded to Harry. "I told him that you were a Dark wizard, of course, but also that you were a Light wizard. He had to think about that."

Harry smiled in spite of himself. "Do you think they'll join in the next attack that we plan on making?" he asked.

"I think not," said Laura. "Not unless they somehow manage to get themselves together in the next week, and it always did take Paton longer than that to make up his mind."

Harry blinked, but his mind had already made the connection. "The full moon is in a week," he breathed to Hawthorn.

Hawthorn bared her teeth in a joyous snarl. "Even so," she said. "That's why we came, Harry. We want to fight on your side in werewolf form. Narcissa pulled the location of Woodhouse from her sister when she tortured her.” Harry noticed that the Light werewolves frowned at the mention of torture, and Laura pursed her lips. Hawthorn ignored that. “I know where Woodhouse is, what it looks like. The Dark Lord used it as a base during the First War. And this should show the Ministry, I hope, that not all werewolves are evil.” Hawthorn snapped her teeth shut on air. “They’re pushing to make the laws against us even stricter, Harry.”

Harry frowned. He wondered if that was why he hadn’t heard anything from Scrimgeour lately. He’d assumed it was due to the Minister not wanting to seem too personally involved in the abuse case in a way that might prejudice the evidence. Well, I will have to write him a letter about that.

“We should summon the others, then,” he told Hawthorn. “It’s Saturday, so I can meet with you all day. I want to create a plan that will maximize everyone’s strengths, or at least maximize the strengths of everyone who’s available to attack that night.”

Hawthorn smiled. “I was hoping you’d say that.”

It was afternoon before everyone who could respond had managed to gather in the Room of Requirement. Somewhat to Harry’s amusement, McGonagall had not only permitted many Dark and Light wizards on Hogwarts grounds, but insisted on attending the meeting herself. Of course, she’d attended the last one, but that was perforce, since it was in her office. Harry wondered if she did actually mean to be a part of the attack.

Probably not. She knows her responsibilities, and it would be disastrous for Hogwarts if she died. She just wants to make sure that we’re not casting damaging spells on school grounds, I think.

The Room had chosen to present them with a large circle of chairs, couches, and divans, rather like the setup when Harry had met with his Dark allies here last Halloween. Harry had appreciated the encouraging message of unity that sent—

A message of unity that lasted only until his Dark allies arrived. They took one look at Laura Gloryflower, Tybalt, John, and the Light werewolves, and sat on the opposite side of the circle. Harry ground his teeth, in particular, at the way Arabella Zabini kept a hand on her wand, eyes shaded and wary, and how Adalrico stared openly at Laura, as if he could not imagine what she was doing here. Laura simply nodded at everyone, inflexibly polite, and went back to talking with her niece. Mortimer sneered when he came in. Burke made a strangled sound. They might not have existed as far as Laura was concerned.

But Harry saw the snarl that wrinkled Claudia's lips, and the way Henrietta's eyes lit up at the sight of her scar, and he could just imagine what was about to happen next.

Then Honoria came in and saved the day.

"Tybalt!" she exclaimed, as if she had been dying for the sight of him, and rushed across the room to throw her arms around him. Tybalt stood up and kissed her on the cheeks with loud smacking sounds. Harry knew that most of the people in the room were staring. He couldn't help it. He was staring himself.

Honoria looked around the room from the shelter of Tybalt's arms, her eyes wide and innocent, illusions of house elves dancing around her. "This is the perfect place to announce our affair," she said. "I'm really a man, you see, and Tybalt's really a woman, and we've been secretly in love since we were nine. Sorry to disappoint you." She nodded at John. "You especially, John, but really, you should have suspected something when Tybalt started wearing skirts."

John reached up and smacked his partner on the arm. "That's why you've refused to come to bed with me since we joined," he said. "Horrendous pimples all over your body, right."

Honoria and Tybalt burst into simultaneous giggles, and released each other. Honoria sat down in the chair next to them, whispering furiously. The silence that remained behind them was gobsmacked, but less tense than it had been. No one was going to do anything for a while, Harry suspected, on grounds of being thought absolutely ridiculous. What did you follow a performance like that with?

More entrances, it turned out. Ignifer eyed the Light contingent sourly and sat on the far side of the circle from them, but at least Harry could be sure that she wouldn't cause trouble; she seemed more intent, after that initial look, on pretending that they didn't exist. Snape and Regulus at least contented themselves with no more than a few stern looks at Harry, and suspicious gazes for absolutely everyone else in the room. Thomas came in with a book and attempted to engage Harry in a conversation about something called the Grand Unified Theory of Every Kind of Magic, but luckily his wife had come with him, and managed to steer him to a seat without seeming impolite. The Malfoys entered with a nod from Lucius and a kiss on the cheek for Harry from Narcissa. Narcissa took stock of the situation in a glance and sat down beside Laura Gloryflower, pointedly putting out her hand to be shaken.

The real surprises were the last two people to enter. Remus ambled in as though someone had invited him, and immediately sat down beside Claudia. Harry raised an eyebrow, but relaxed when he saw the other werewolves, even Hawthorn, had smiled at the sight and scent of Remus. Remus was, in fact, talking animatedly to Fergus, who began cautiously to answer back.

And then Charles showed up. His gaze snapped around the room at a laugh from Laura, and locked onto her face. A smile Harry had never seen before, deep and wistful, curved his lips.

"Madam," he said. Laura turned her head at the sound. Harry saw her face fire with a look of joy.

"Charles Rosier-Henlin," she said, and rose, and walked across the room to give him a kiss on the cheek, the head of a Light family greeting the head of a Dark family in a way that left no doubt they considered each other friends. She drew back and curtsied to him. "You can still smile like you used to. You have no idea how glad I am to see it."

“Dark Arts don’t corrupt that, Laura, no matter what else they may take away.” Charles clasped her hand and leaned nearer. Harry saw actual adoration softening his face, and knew, as if they had confessed it aloud, that Charles had probably once seriously considered marrying the witch in front of him. “And the Light hasn’t taken away your grace and beauty.”

Laura smiled. “Did you truly think it would?”

“No,” said Charles. “You were too strong for your allegiance to crush you.”

Laura brushed another kiss across his cheek, and then patted his shoulder and walked back towards her own chair. Charles followed her, sitting down in the single empty seat that had been left as a kind of boundary marker between the Light and Dark sections—binding them together in a true circle. Harry smiled at him, and received a slight smile in return.

He stepped into the center of the ring, then, feeling their eyes track and try to swallow him. Draco, sitting on the edge of the circle near Lucius, was looking at him with particular sharpness. Harry reached into himself, drew furiously on that strength that had allowed him to keep going after his mother’s visit at Christmas last year, and didn’t break down in front of their gazes. He looked from face to face, arresting some people in mid-whisper or mid-frown.

“I know what Woodhouse looks like,” he said quietly. “Mrs. Parkinson has put the image into my mind. She said that Voldemort often used it during the first War as a base. It’s entirely likely that he’s using it now as a storage camp for Muggles. If not, then he’ll have it fortified with Death Eaters. I want to take them down on the night of the October full moon.”

“You’re taking werewolves along with us?” Mortimer’s voice soared incredulously. “How do we know that they won’t turn on us and consume us alive?”

“They’ll be taking Wolfsbane, of course,” said Harry. If it wasn’t for the formal promise I’ve made him, I would dismiss him from the alliance immediately. Narcissa claimed he would bring his family in, but so far none of them have made a move to contact me. I think Mortimer may be so much dead weight. I'll have to study the unbinding rituals to get out of a formal alliance promise. "That allows them to retain their human minds, though not their human forms. We can count on—" He glanced at Remus. "Five werewolves?"

Remus nodded, his eyes glinting. Harry smiled. Remus had changed. Before the Sanctuary, Harry didn't think he would have dared to attack someone in his lupine form. Now, he trusted not only the Wolfsbane, but his own temper in a werewolf body. It was an enormous step forward.

"Five werewolves," Harry repeated firmly. "A witch trained in fire magic." He inclined his head to Ignifer, who nodded back at him. So far, she hadn't said anything about claiming a life debt from him for saving his life during the battle on the equinox. Harry wondered why, but in case she wanted it to remain a private matter, he wouldn't bring it up now. "Four former Death Eaters in human form, one of them a Potions Master. Several skilled Dark witches and wizards. An illusionist, and one still able to pass swiftly from point to point?" He cocked his head at Honoria, who bounced up and down slightly in her seat as she nodded. "Two Light wizards. And, I hope, a lioness." He glanced at Laura Gloryflower.

"I consider most of the world as my children," said Laura. "It is what a puellaris witch must do, to survive a role in public. It will be no trouble to transform once we are within range of the battle, Mr. Potter."

Harry nodded, then turned to Priscilla Burke. "And what about you, madam? Can you allow yourself to join us?"

"Not without Auror Mallory's permission, Mr. Potter," said Priscilla reluctantly. "I will not inform the Ministry of this attack, because they would insist on supervising it, and, I can see, getting in the way by insisting that you not use Dark Arts. On the other hand, I can't fight without betraying the oaths I've made as an Auror."

"This is why you should Declare, my dear," Thomas told her. "Declare for the Dark, and then Auror Mallory would sack you, and then you could fight at our side. See? It's very simple."

Priscilla smiled down at her husband. "Tempting," she said lightly. "But I think not. What I can do, Mr. Potter," she went on, moving her gaze back to Harry, "is inform the Ministry of the attack when it's over. If you have captured Death Eaters who require imprisonment in Tullianum, then we can come in and clean them up."

Harry smiled. "Excellent." He hesitated for a moment, then reminded himself that he need not be afraid to use his magic in front of his allies. This would provide good exercise for it, of the kind that Acies had recommended, and it would probably impress them, anyway. He snapped his fingers, and the sheet of parchment he had prepared rose from the corner, skimmed over Lucius's head, and settled, floating, in front of him.

Harry fixed his eyes on the sheet and narrowed them. Hawthorn had let him use Legilimency on her, and he had a very good image of Woodhouse in his head. The trick was transferring that image to parchment, to make a usable map.

"Pingo Woodhouse," he said, and concentrated intently. The parchment rippled, wavered as if it would tear in half, and then straightened itself out with a jerk. Harry nodded as the image Hawthorn had described to him appeared in outline: a great hollow valley in the mountains of Wales, bordered on three sides by high walls of stone. The fourth side swept down in a gentle curve that provided the main entrance to the valley, and was covered with thick trees. Harry could see why Voldemort valued the place. It was thick with natural magic—it must be, or Muggles would have found and used it—and eminently defensible from the ground. Anti-Apparition wards in all but a few places would restrict entrance nicely by that method. The buildings that filled the valley, all but one made of stone and covered, as Hawthorn had shown him, with thick wards, stood in a quadrangle that would allow those within them to see attack coming from virtually any direction. The central, wooden building, Woodhouse itself, was worked over with dozens of anti-fire spells. There, Voldemort conducted rituals that the presence of stone walls would have adversely affected.

"I recognize the place," said Henrietta, her voice startled. "How exactly are we going to attack it, Potter?"

Harry smiled grimly. "By a combination of distraction and air," he said. He swung around, meeting each gaze in turn. "I need to know here and now who the best flyers among you are."

"I'm pretty damn good," said John quietly.

Harry nodded to him, and continued turning around the circle. Draco, of course, was leaning forward, staring at him, and Harry rolled his eyes and nodded. Draco sat back, satisfied. Regulus grinned at him. And raising her hand, as if she could not quite believe what she was doing, was Henrietta.

Harry locked eyes with Henrietta. He did not trust her. On the other hand, it would be stupid of her to claim she was good on a broom if she wasn't. "And you really want to join me in the air?" he asked her.

Henrietta let out a sharp breath. "I want this attack to succeed," she said, and then looked surprised that she'd said it. But she went on. "I saw what the Dark Lord—no, Voldemort, was during the attack on the beach. He won't be good for my family or my ambitions if he wins. And I'd rather be a vital part of the attack than just one more Dark witch in the background, Potter."

That, Harry could believe. Besides, he was utterly confident that he was better in the sky than Henrietta was. He nodded, and turned back to the map.

"Mrs. Parkinson has shown me that there aren't spells preventing the approach of brooms," he said. "Brooms are made of wood, and spells aimed at them would disrupt the workings of Woodhouse itself. But there'll be guards watching out for us, that's for certain. We're going to need a distraction, so that we can ride above them without being noticed. That's where the werewolves come in, and our lioness." He nodded to Hawthorn, who bared her teeth in what was not a grin.

“She knows the country around Woodhouse, and can show the others where to Apparate in before the moon rises. Then they’ll transform and strike in through the forest, distracting the guards from me and the rest of us on our brooms. Since Voldemort’s won’t be there, I can concentrate on destroying the anti-Apparition wards. When they’re down, I want the rest of you to Apparate in immediately.”

“I can carry the message!” Honoria proclaimed, all but vibrating.

Harry smiled at her. “Thank you, but I need you on the ground with your illusions. We have a spell that Charles invented which will let me tell you the moment the wards fall; I’ll teach it to you before you leave today.” He glanced at the others. “What do you think so far?”

“I think that not all of us know Woodhouse,” Burke grumbled. “How are we going to find and free the prisoners?”

“This is why we have former Death Eaters with us,” said Harry. “You’ll split into three groups—one guided by Mr. Malfoy, one by Mr. Bulstrode, and one by Professor Snape.” He shot a quick glance at Snape, whose face had turned pale, but who merely nodded when Harry locked eyes with him. He’s being practical, for once, Harry thought. He knows that he’s not good enough on a broom to guard me. “They’ll be able to show you the likely places where prisoners are hidden, and what traps to expect.”

“You don’t think that You-Know-Who will have set new traps for us?” Tybalt asked, his voice worried. Harry saw him glancing at his partner, and guessed that he didn’t like the thought of being separated from John. “After all, why should he leave them the same as they were, since he knows that some of his followers have turned traitor?”

“The unique nature of Woodhouse restricts the defensive spells able to be used there,” said Lucius smoothly. “The Dark Lord will assuredly have changed some of the traps, but I was frequently at Woodhouse in the last years before he fell. There are few of the traps that I will not have seen.” His eyes flashed as he smiled, and Harry saw just how much he was looking forward to striking back at Voldemort. Of course, Voldemort had sent Evan Rosier to kill him, branded him for life, and done other things to him. "I'll brief you on those this afternoon."

Harry snapped his fingers, remembering something he'd forgotten to ask Hawthorn. "Mrs. Parkinson," he said, recalling her attention from a quiet argument with Delilah. "Can Madam Apollonis use fire at all, or do the spells at Woodhouse prevent any kind of flame from springing up there?"

"No," Hawthorn said. "She would not be able to destroy Woodhouse itself—and I would advise you not to try," she said, with a little bow to Ignifer, "but she can use her flame in other ways."

"Good." Harry turned back to Ignifer. "I'll rely on you to provide us light for the attack, once it gets going and there's no need to hide any more. The moon will be full, yes, but I don't want to take the chance of any of us hitting each other by mistake."

Ignifer looked as though someone had just handed her the best birthday present ever. "That will be no problem."

"How do you know that the Dark Lord won't be there?" Burke asked then. From the tone of his voice, he wanted to make Harry's life difficult, but Harry was grateful for the question, and that it was Burke who had asked it. That man was also irritating, for all that he'd fought when called, and it might impress him to realize exactly what had happened in the battle on the beach.

"I hurt him too badly," said Harry. "I ripped into his magical core, not just the power that he'd managed to acquire from draining other people. He'll be furious, yes, but he won't risk just charging into battle against me—and there's no particular reason for him to be at Woodhouse rather than any other stronghold." He glanced at Lucius, who nodded. Lucius had told him in private that he thought it extremely probable Voldemort had retreated to one of his lairs to lick his wounds, where no Death Eaters, no matter how trusted, were permitted to enter. "It's going to take him at least a month to recover completely. If he's there, he can cause trouble, but it won't be on the scale that it was, and I can use my magic for other things."

“A month?” Henrietta’s voice was lively with curiosity. “How do you know that?”

Harry shrugged. “I do. We both have the ability to drain magic. I felt what I took from him. It’s like estimating the amount of water in a glass. I know how to do it by sight, but I couldn’t tell you in terms of inches from just a glance.”

Henrietta frowned, and then her eyes widened, as though she had just thought of something. But she said nothing, and Harry turned to the other problems that were left—minor problems, since no one else provided a major challenge to his plans. Then it was a matter of making sure that everyone learned the communication spell, memorized the geography of Woodhouse, and did what else they could to insure the attack was a success.

Harry could not believe how much better he felt, now that he was doing something that should result in a substantial loss on Voldemort’s part. He was definitely meant to fight in an offensive war, he thought.

And that was strange, really, considering how long and hard he’d trained in defensive magic to protect Connor.

He shrugged, because thinking about it too much would mean thinking about himself again, which he was tired of doing, and returned to making exact plans for guiding the Muggles out once they’d rescued them.

Henrietta felt as though someone had torn her broom out from under her. She stared at Potter, this time giving special attention to the lightning bolt scar under his fringe. It made sense, really. And this second coincidence was too great. She felt like a fool for not seeing it before.

Both Parselmouths. Both with the ability to drain magic. And yes, that could be a curse scar from surviving Avada Kedavra. It’s not as though enough people have them for it to be a rule that one of them must be heart-shaped.

Potter is Voldemort's magical heir. And almost certainly the one who actually bounced the Killing Curse back at him.

That...put rather a different spin on things.

Henrietta tapped her fingers on her knee, only coming out of her thoughts when she needed to learn a spell, contribute a comment that no one else was thinking of, or answer a question. In the meantime, her thoughts spun and eddied around a different picture of the future than she'd had just an hour before.

There was the slightest, smallest chance that Potter might be like the Lords and Ladies she'd heard of in the ancient days, the ones who had treated their companions as actual companions, not expendable bodyguards or arrow fodder. Voldemort did not treat his Death Eaters that way, Merlin knew, and that was one of the reasons Henrietta had never wanted to join them. She was too smart, too skilled, too valuable, to be a pet.

When she'd heard that Potter refused to declare himself a Lord, and then met him, she had assumed that he was also too emotionally weak to be the kind of wizard who could stand up to his powerful followers as an equal, never mind be an actual leader.

But now, if that was not true—

Henrietta whipped her thoughts back into line. She knew what the world was like. She had lived in it and thrived, survived, flourished, because she adapted herself much more easily to disappointed hopes and dashed expectations than other people did. While her yearmates still gaped and mourned that Slytherins were treated badly by the other Houses, Henrietta had accepted it and was turning it into a weapon. And while she had listened to the tales of true Lords and Ladies with a yearning heart when she was younger, she knew before she was seven that no one in the wizarding world was really like that, not Grindelwald and not Albus Dumbledore and not Voldemort.

It was stupid to think that Potter would be the exception, particularly when he refused the title. And she was an idiot to be thinking that there was even the chance that he would be different.

But, still...

She had time to think, didn't she? No one knew she had Potter's hair. She had set the Polyjuice to brewing, but it would take another three weeks to be ready. And her plan was not the sort that required immediate confrontation.

She had time to test Potter, to ride beside him in this attack, and see if he was a true Lord.

You know he is not.

But she wanted to see.

Henrietta Bulstrode had never blinded herself to reality. And if reality had decided to take a sharp turn for the sublime, then she might as well ride beside Potter with sincerity in her heart, for once, and see what happened.

She made the decision with considerable force, if only to stop the struggle in her mind that wanted her to decide against Potter. That was annoying, she thought. Sometimes lately she felt as if her thoughts were not her own, as if someone were guiding, steering, directing them.

She settled the conflict with a sharp shake of her head—she would follow Potter with a true heart for now—and turned back to the battle plans.

Chapter Twenty-Eight: Through the Fire

Harry had a plan for Sunday.

He didn't like all aspects of the plan. In fact, he was so far from liking all aspects of the plan that he had thought about giving a few of them up. Surely it didn't really matter if he delayed some of the confrontations he knew would happen. He still had a few days to speak to his brother, and Snape could wait even longer. They were going to fight a battle together. That was the important thing, wasn't it?

Except that it wasn't the only important thing. Harry opened his eyes and stared at the ceiling of the four-poster, absently stroking Fawkes's feathers. He wouldn't have slept at all last night if not for the phoenix's help. Fawkes chirped twice, once for each caress Harry gave him, before tucking his head further under his wing and lifting one foot to curl against his breast.

Maybe I should be strong enough to force my mind past this, but I'm not. Harry gave an irritated sigh and rose; he didn't think he would get back to sleep right now unless he asked Fawkes for another song, and then he might slumber through breakfast, when he intended to put the first part of the plan into motion. He scooped up Argutus and went to use the showers. The Omen snake lifted his head and flicked his tongue out to catch one of the falling drops of water.

"I thought you only drank cold water," said Harry, though by this point he didn't know why he was surprised. It really hadn't taken Argutus long to recover from the pain curses that Margaret had cast on him, and he had promptly gone back to wandering around and trying new things. If one of those new things was catching warm water on his tongue—well, why not?

"No," Argutus said peaceably, and then wound into Harry's hair, which caused a problem when Harry was trying to use his hand and his magic to clean it. Harry settled the Omen snake on his shoulders again and went back to the shower, his mind circling uneasily around the confrontations he planned to fling himself into.

The first one was probably the least problematic. Harry knew that he would enjoy it.

And that was the problem, really. He didn't want to be someone who would take pleasure in other people's pain. It reminded him too much of both Bellatrix and Voldemort.

But it has to happen, Harry reminded himself, resigned, and then patiently pulled Argutus out of his hair again.

Harry shook his head when Draco tried to pass the Daily Prophet to him so that he could see the new article. He would lose his appetite if he read it, and then he knew what the people who loved him would have to say about that. He picked up a forkful of sausages instead, and began eating, well aware of the eyes on him—from the Ravenclaw table in particular.

She'll approach me soon. I think she would have yesterday, except that I was meeting with my allies all day and she didn't see me. One hundred fifty points from Ravenclaw aren't going to do anything to her obsession.

"I want to try some sausages," Argutus said, coiling down his arm. "They look like crickets."

"I should find someone to heal your eyes," said Harry, even as he put down his fork, broke loose a bit of sausage, and held it out to the Omen snake, who happily stretched his jaws wide and swallowed it. "These do not look like crickets."

"You do not look at things with a snake's eyes." Argutus's tongue flickered, seeming to trail the scent of where the food had been. "It is wrong of you. If you looked at things with a snake's eyes, if you were more like a snake the way you should be, then you would not hurt as much." He craned himself around Harry's neck, leaning forward obnoxiously onto the plate. "More please."

Harry rolled his eyes, and caught a glimpse of Draco watching him with a faint smile. Harry was glad of that. He'd come back to the common room so late on Friday night that they hadn't had much of a chance to speak about Margaret or what she'd done, and then yesterday, of course, had been filled with meetings and sending messages and strategizing for the attack on Woodhouse. Harry knew that Draco wanted to speak to him in private, and extensively. That was another of the confrontations planned for today, and probably the one Harry was least dreading.

"Here comes the one who hurt me."

Harry stiffened, but kept on eating. He would wait for Margaret, who was approaching him from behind, to tap him on the shoulder.

Then he realized that that wouldn't work, because Millicent and Blaise were casually rising to their feet and turning to face Margaret. They leaned against the table on either side of him and stared at the Ravenclaw. Harry knew hexes would fly in a moment if he didn't do something. He didn't want that to happen. Points would be taken from Slytherin, and Margaret would be hurt beyond what she deserved.

And should I even value my House's points as more important than her health?

Maybe he shouldn't, but he did. This was the kind of irritating truth that had driven him to plan the confrontations in the first place. He should be strong enough to ignore and put up with all the minor annoyances, but he wasn't, so he would handle them.

He turned in place, and raised an eyebrow at Margaret, who looked startled. Harry frowned. She should have known I would notice my Housemates' movements, at least.

Draco, he noticed, kept right on eating. Harry was grateful for that. Draco's rage would be more dangerous than Millicent's or Blaise's.

Margaret did him the favor of getting right to the point. "Sitting at the snakes' table and eating your breakfast like a normal person, Potter?" she asked. "Of course, everyone can hear you hissing all over the Great Hall. There isn't anything normal about that."

"I had a question to ask you," said Harry, making sure that he kept his attention fixed on Margaret's face so that he didn't look at Argutus and accidentally speak Parseltongue.

"Yes, Potter?" Margaret looked absurdly pleased. "Finally realized you can't find your way out of the Dark on your own?"

Of all things, it was that which made Draco's fork scrape across his plate. Harry decided to hurry things up before Draco could work his way into the confrontation.

"Did you hear about the special permission that Professor Merryweather's given me?" Harry looked at her in polite concern. He was aware of eyes fastened on him all over the Hall, especially from the head table. He didn't look away, didn't meet them. He had to carry this through now, or Margaret would be cursed within an inch of her life. "That I can use my magic to defend myself, I mean."

"You didn't do anything permanent to me when I hurt your snake," Margaret answered at once. "Why would you do anything now?"

Acies was right. If I'd hexed her badly enough, she might have backed off. But I can't regret not using magic on Friday. She would have died, as angry as I was.

"Because I've decided that you're an annoying little cockroach," Harry answered, "and the only way to kill a cockroach is to step on it multiple times. Acclaro incogitantiam!"

Margaret flinched back as the bright pink cloud of the spell surrounded her, then examined her arms as though she expected to find them changed suddenly into flippers. She leaned forward, peering at Harry. Harry smiled at her and turned around to go back to his breakfast.

"Don't you ignore me, Potter," Margaret whispered viciously. "Do you really think that they'll let you stay much longer in the school, you—"

And then she stopped as the laughter began around her, and she heard her own voice, speaking from the back of her head.

“Oh, Merlin, I think my breasts are about to fall out of my clothes! They aren’t, are they? I don’t dare reach up and adjust them right now. No, they aren’t, it’s just that same feeling I get every day. Phew! That’s good. Now, if Michael will just look over here and notice me threatening Potter, then I could die happy—”

Margaret’s face flushed incredibly red when Harry glanced at her over his shoulder. “What the fuck did you do to me?”

“You ought to be able to figure it out,” said Harry lightly, while Margaret’s voice went on narrating how embarrassed she felt. “That spell reveals your secret thoughts, the ones you don’t want anyone to know. It’ll keep doing that for an hour.” He tried to squash his own enjoyment, he really did, but he snickered in spite of himself when Margaret’s voice started going on about how Michael would never touch her now. “The next time you attack me or anyone else I care about, two hours, and the secrets will be worse. And then three hours, and so on. Soon you might have a voice narrating every aroused or angry or ridiculous or jealous thought you possess to an interested audience at all hours of the day. Unless you stop attacking me and my friends, of course, and keep your wand and your hands and your tongue to yourself.” He couldn’t help adding, “That shouldn’t be hard. I doubt Michael Corner will really want your tongue in his mouth now.”

Margaret fled the Great Hall, laughter following her like a pack of barking hounds. Argutus complained on his shoulder about not being able to understand English. Blaise and Millicent sat down again, putting their wands back in their sleeves.

“I underestimated you, Harry,” Millicent muttered in his ear. “That was a fitting revenge.” Then she broke out snickering again. “Oh, Merlin, her and Michael Corner? What kind of dreamworld is she living in, to consider that a possibility?”

Harry shook his head, and glanced sideways at Draco. “Are you convinced that’s enough of a punishment?” he asked.

“Yes.” Draco shuddered dramatically and picked up his glass of pumpkin juice. “For everyone. I really didn’t want to know about Parsons’s sex life, Harry.”

“And you never have to, as long as she listens to sense,” said Harry. He relaxed, his emotions melting into pleasure—half relief that Draco wouldn’t go after Margaret now, and half enjoyment under Draco’s approval.

“That’s not likely to happen.” Draco sent him a wounded look. “The first time we have to hear her meditate on taking a shit or biting her toenails is when I hex you back.”

Harry laughed in spite of himself, and then Draco leaned nearer him and lowered his voice.

“On the other hand, I might not. After all, I think some of your thoughts that that spell might show should be reserved just for me, don’t you agree?”

Harry could feel himself flush, not only because of the words but because of Millicent’s sideways interested stare. He held Draco’s eyes and nodded. Draco sat back, a half-smile playing on his lips.

If he does want to talk to me after breakfast, perhaps it won’t be so bad, Harry thought hopefully.

Sure enough, Draco matched his stride to Harry’s as they passed out of the Great Hall, and turned him gently but inexorably towards one of the moving staircases, indicating he wanted to go upstairs to talk, instead of the Slytherin common room. Harry supposed it couldn’t hurt. There would be fewer people to overhear them if they chose an abandoned classroom, and they wouldn’t have to kick Blaise out of their bedroom, which always made him sulky.

“Here, I think,” said Draco, opening a door and peering into a space Harry thought had probably been a storage room once. Odds and ends filled it—broken chairs, half-severed desks, dead plants that looked like abandoned Herbology projects, torn blankets. Harry wondered who saved things like this, even as Draco steered him inside with one hand on his back. Did Filch really think he could repair them without magic, or had it been one of his predecessors?

“I want to know why you wouldn’t let me defend you on Friday.”

Well, that’s direct.

Harry swallowed and turned around, leaning on a wobbly chair. Draco didn’t move away from him, even though a good five feet separated Harry’s chair from a convenient desk where he could have sat and likely had it not collapse beneath him. He stood in front of Harry, and used his height advantage unfairly, staring down at him.

Harry sighed and reached up to stroke Argutus. “Because I thought you would kill Parsons,” he said quietly.

“I wouldn’t have,” said Draco.

“Badly wound her, then.” Harry wanted to turn away and wander among the chairs, to avoid Draco’s eyes, but the chair was just the tail end of a mound of furniture. He had to stay where he was. “You know what the relationship between Slytherin and Ravenclaw is like right now, Draco. Cho and Luna and a few other people are trying, but they’d have to stand by their own House if you managed to hex Parsons hard enough to send her to the hospital wing—“

“Harry.” Draco reached out and gripped his left wrist, his way of insuring Harry paid attention. Argutus, who’d been slithering down Harry’s shoulder to curl around his left arm, protested sleepily. “That’s just an excuse. You know it. If I’d hexed her, you wouldn’t have had to. And I think her own House would have understood, even if it was something nasty and disabling.” He paused, then added, “And I want to know why you ran away, and then didn’t want to talk to me about it when you came back to the common room.”

“I ran because of my own anger,” Harry admitted. “I could have killed her, Draco. I might have.”

“And was there a reason that you put yourself under a spell so that no one else could find you, rather than just getting outside the room so you could calm down?" Draco sounded like Lucius again, Harry thought, not disdainful, but cool, with determination under his tone like steel under a layer of snow. "I would have followed you out, Harry, instead of trying to hex Parsons, if I had any idea where you were. I cared more about comforting you than taking revenge on her."

Harry winced. "I know."

"Then why?" Draco persisted. "Both for yourself and for her—if you really have to care about what happens to her—it would have been the better course."

Harry braced himself. Draco already knew about his dream. And he trusted Draco. He could do this. He just didn't like admitting these things aloud. They sounded stupid.

"Because I wanted to disappear," he said. "To just stop mattering, for a while. To go away." He shrugged. "You know, like the dream."

"You said you knew the dream couldn't be real," Draco pushed. He turned and leaned back against the mound of furniture, still gripping Harry's wrist. "Why did you try to grab it the moment you felt hurt?"

Harry hesitated.

"The truth, Harry. You owe me that much."

"Because I still want it," Harry said. "I want them to stop looking at me, stop seeing, stop caring. That means everyone." He swallowed back the lump in his throat and met Draco's gaze. "Even you, sometimes."

Draco snorted, his eyes dark and a muscle jumping in his cheek. "That's never going to happen, Harry," he said. "You can make me look past you with a spell, but you can't make me stop caring about you—except with compulsion, which I know you would never use."

"I wonder, sometimes," Harry said. "When I get as angry as I got at Parsons on Friday—"

"You had every right to get that angry at her."

Harry frowned. “Draco, there was a moment when I knew that I could have looked at her and made her cease to exist by willing it. That’s not a comfortable thing to know.”

“Can you teach me that trick?” Draco asked lightly. “I want to use it on Professor Vector sometime.”

“Draco—“

“I know,” Draco said, and his hands rose and skimmed over Harry’s face and hair and scar, in no particular order, touching wherever he could touch. “You worry so much about other people that that would horrify you. But, Harry, the important thing is that you’ve always had enough self-control not to kill just because you’re irritated. You can’t blame yourself for possessing the ability. That’s what Lord-level magic’s like. You might not like it, but it’s there, and you should use it for other things—like that spell today—instead of just trying to disclaim it. Or run away from the people who care about you and hide under a spell, for that matter.”

Harry nodded, reluctantly. What Draco said made a good deal of sense. Of course, he could be free of having that much magic if he sacrificed some of it, as he had planned to do last year when he contemplated freeing the northern goblins, but then he wouldn’t be able to free other magical creatures of their webs.

“Thank you,” he said, and brushed a light kiss along Draco’s cheek. He had to ask. “Do you think I would ever do that, Draco? Lose control like that and obliterate someone?”

Draco leaned back and stared hard at him. “If you do, Harry,” he said, “you’ll have an excellent reason.”

Harry nodded again. He didn’t have that kind of faith in himself, but Draco’s declaration was solid enough to lean on. And perhaps he could grow that kind of faith in himself, even think he had the right to be as angry as he’d been on Friday.

Perhaps.

He was glad that that confrontation had gone so well, because now he had to go talk to Snape.

It's just a door. Harry frowned at the door to Snape's private rooms. It's not intimidating. If you're frightened of a door, how in the world are you ever going to deal with Snape?

He shook his head. He would deal with Snape because he had to, but he couldn't help thinking it would have been easier if the door had stood open, if Snape had seen him already, and he had no choice about coming in.

Easier, but since when have you chosen the easy route?

Harry sighed, and knocked.

There was a long pause from the other side of the door, long enough to make Harry wonder if perhaps Snape was elsewhere. But he'd seen him leave the head table that morning just before he and Draco went for their little talk. Snape didn't usually spend Sundays, even bright and sunny Sundays, wandering the grounds of Hogwarts and singing a merry little song.

"Harry."

Harry jumped and turned around. Snape stood behind him, raising one eyebrow at—what? Once, Harry would have known. Now it might have been the expression on his face, or the state of his clothes, or his stare.

"Professor," said Harry. "Sir." Now he would have to stop babbling titles and actually say what he had come to say. "If you're not busy, may I speak with you?"

"I have just returned from speaking with the Headmistress about Slytherin's position in Hogwarts," said Snape. "My duties as Deputy Headmaster are done for the day, Harry. Please come in." He reached out and skimmed his hand just above the door, making several complicated wards hiss and spring back, and whispered the password, deliberately loud enough for Harry to hear that it was "Atropa belladonna." Then he passed inward, and Harry had to follow him.

He'd been less often in Snape's private rooms than in his office, and didn't like them as well. There were racks of Potions ingredients in the office, worktables, cauldrons kept specifically for students with detention to scrub, Transfigured chairs, and dozens of other little objects that Harry could put between himself and a gaze or a question that got too probing. Snape's rooms were more open, the first one having only a couch on one side, near the hearth, and a chair on the other. Snape took the chair, forcing Harry to sit on the couch.

I can't hide. Damn it.

Harry sat stiffly, not trying to force himself to relax. It was hard enough to be here at all. He was no Gryffindor, but he knew he had courage. He just had to summon that courage, and stop dithering. It didn't help that Snape remained absolutely still and quiet, apparently not uncomfortable with the silence.

"Sir," he said at last, fixing his eyes on Snape's hands, "I wanted to apologize. And tell you some things that you may not have understood. And ask for a favor." He took a deep breath and forced his gaze to rise to Snape's face.

The expression there was one it took him a long moment to understand. Harry blinked. Relief? He feels relief?

It hadn't really occurred to him that Snape would be hurting over this as much as he was. Harry uttered a small hiss of exasperation, mostly at himself. I don't understand why he loves me as much as he does, but you'd think that I would stop forgetting it.

"You may begin with any of them, Harry," Snape said. "The apology only if you wish to."

Harry nodded. "I do. I want to say I'm sorry for misunderstanding what you said about Connor. I thought you meant that he just didn't matter next to me, that he somehow deserved to die. But that's not what you meant, is it? You like me better, and you think I'm the one Voldemort will target more, so I have to be ready to fight."

More lines of strain eased on Snape's face, ones carved so deeply that Harry hadn't noticed them until they were gone. "Yes," he said. Then, apparently unable to restrain his sarcasm any longer, he added, "I am somewhat surprised that it took you so long to understand, given what I said to you while you brewed the Wolfsbane. You are not in the habit of ignoring your own intelligence, Harry."

"I was stubborn," Harry conceded. Ouch. This hurts. On the other hand, it's only admitting that you're wrong. That means that you can do it. "And I really did think you meant that at first, with what you said in the hospital wing."

Snape hesitated, then spoke as if picking his way among shards of broken glass. "Part of that does not change even with your new understanding, Harry. I still do not think you should have taken that curse. I think you should have trusted to a shield, or simply borne your brother out of the way."

"And had the curse hit someone else?" Harry demanded.

"Did you know for certain that anyone was behind your brother?" Snape shook his head tightly. "No. You made what you thought was the best decision in a limited amount of time. I respect that. But it wasn't the best decision, Harry. You speak of the curse hitting your brother or someone else on the battlefield as though it must never be allowed to happen. Then why does your life matter less than theirs? And why bring them into battle at all? Why plan something like the attack on Woodhouse, where you know their lives will be in danger?"

Harry squirmed. There were a few possible answers to that. None of them were pretty.

"It is a hypocrisy you have ignored for too long," said Snape, his words gentle and savage both at once. "It must be overcome. You seem to have accepted it, since you have asked for people to fly with you in the next battle. But now, this. And it could happen again. What happens if the next sacrifice saves someone else—Draco, perhaps—and kills you, Harry?”

“Then I’ll have fulfilled my purpose.”

Snape’s face darkened.

“My purpose in making that specific sacrifice, I mean,” Harry hastily clarified. “I didn’t mean that I thought my only purpose in life is to protect other people.”

“And what of those left behind to mourn?” Snape demanded, rising to his feet and pacing back and forth in front of his chair. His robes swirled behind him hard enough to reveal the edge of his Dark Mark. “What of those whose ability to defend themselves you disregard in making this sacrifice? You claim on one hand to trust Draco and the rest of us in battle, but then you would plunge in front of us on the off chance we might be harmed.”

Harry squeezed his eyes shut. This was one of those ugly possibilities that he had thought about. A vates had to respect the choices of others, and avoid impinging on their free will if it was at all possible. By showing that he didn’t trust other people, some of them experienced fighters, to survive on their own, he wasn’t obeying that particular stricture of the path he had to walk.

“Do you understand, now?”

Harry opened his eyes to see Snape kneeling in front of him. His face was a stern mask, but tight with emotions that Harry could not bring himself to disregard. Harry forced himself to nod.

“On one thing, though, I can’t change my mind,” he whispered. “I’m not only making sacrifices because of my training. I’m not.”

Snape stood up and retreated a few steps, until Harry could look at him without craning his neck backwards. “I can provisionally accept that, for now,” said Snape, in a tempered voice. “But so much of your healing has been internal, Harry. I wish there were a way to judge how far along the road you are. Has ripping apart your mind truly given you good results? Would not talking to someone about your past other than Shiverwood benefit you more than remaining silent?"

"The first I can let you see, at least," said Harry, relief at such a good segue making him giddy. "I wanted to ask for your help in closing my link to Voldemort with Occlumency." He saw Snape relax still further. "A one-way barrier, so that I could remove it if I ever really need to."

To his relief, Snape nodded. "I would not want you to lose control of such a vital part of yourself," he murmured.

"And I wanted to ask for your help in training Connor." Harry ignored the way Snape's eyes narrowed and the cold, sneering mask that hung on his face in Potions class snapped up. "I know you don't like him. But he'll have to go into battle eventually, and I need someone who's really, really good at Dark Arts to train him. Professor Merryweather might, but she might not. Remus would be too kind on Connor, I think, and anyway, he knows more defensive than offensive magic. I'm too much stronger than he is. Please?"

Snape snarled slightly. "Are you thinking of bringing him along in the attack on Woodhouse?"

"No," said Harry quietly. He caught and held Snape's gaze. "And as soon as we're done here, I'm going to go and tell him that."

Snape nodded. "You are not entirely devoid of sense where he is concerned," he murmured. "That is refreshing."

Harry let the sarcasm pass, and waited.

"If I train him," said Snape, "then he must actually train with me, Harry. Not make the half-hearted effort he does in Potions. I know that he is capable of competency, if not actual genius, but he will never try."

"You could try being a little kinder to him," Harry pointed out.

“Why?” Snape folded his arms. “There is no reason holding him back, nothing but dislike of me. I know Mr. Longbottom’s reason for incompetence in the class. Your brother has none of the same reasons. His magic could adapt to the art. He will not make it do so, because he has no patience. Do you really think training with me will inculcate that quality?”

“If both of you try halfway,” said Harry stubbornly. “I’ll tell him that, too. And you won’t have to have an audience in the training like you do in Potions. You can give him all the second chances you like, and still preserve your reputation as the Professor Who Sends Gryffindors Fleeing.”

“If Mr. Potter makes the promise to meet me halfway,” said Snape, “and does not whine about meeting me at eight o’clock twice a week, then I will do it. Until the inevitable moment when all hell breaks loose and he refuses to listen to reason.” He paused, then added, “Eight o’clock on Tuesday and Thursday.”

“Sir,” Harry snapped. Those were the hours the Gryffindor Quidditch team held practice.

Snape stared at him. Harry stared back. Finally, Snape nodded. “Eight o’clock on Wednesday and Friday, then.”

Harry nodded back, and stood. “I’ll tell him. Like I said, I’m going to go explain a few things to him right now.” It was the last of his confrontations for the day. The thought made him dizzy with relief. He’d got through the one with Snape, the hardest one, without breaking down in tears or yelling. That was wonderful, and it gave him some hope that his confrontation with Connor would go the same way.

“Wait a moment, Harry.” Snape put out a restraining hand. “I would still like to see you speak to someone about your past.”

Harry scowled at him. He should have known this was coming, but he’d hoped that Snape would forget it in the irritation of being asked to train Connor. “I speak to Madam Shiverwood, when she summons me,” he said.

"I can understand why you would not want to talk to me, Harry." Snape's face was perfectly still. "But there are other candidates. Regulus. The Headmistress. One of the Malfoys. Even the werewolf, if you must. There is much to be gained from talking to someone who wishes to help you, who is not in charge of many cases of abused children and will lose your face among them."

That's the point, Harry thought fretfully. That's why I like talking to Madam Shiverwood, because she has more children to care about than just me. It was also the reason why talking to Regulus was entirely out of the question. Regulus would concentrate too much on him, and yank and pull and tug out those things that Harry wanted to keep hidden like tangles of hair from his head.

He supposed that of the people Snape mentioned, the best candidate would be Remus, because he had the Gryffindors to counsel, and would be more likely not to force Harry to yield his secrets because of the lack of time.

But he'd already yielded enough in this confrontation with Snape, Harry thought. He'd admitted that he was wrong, and he'd made some steps towards reconciliation, and he'd agreed to block the scar connection even though it could be a useful weapon in the war. He fixed his eyes on Snape's. "No," he said.

"No, what?"

"No, sir."

"That's not what I meant." Snape was fighting hard to keep his voice from a snarl, but Harry heard it anyway. "Why will you not speak with someone, Harry?"

"Because too much of my life is on display already!" The flare of temper arose before Harry could stop it. He controlled it, hard, and turned towards the door. "I understand why you did what you did," he continued, in a low, tight voice. "That doesn't mean I don't hate it, and want everyone to stop peering at me. Most people know what happened, now. I can't do anything about that. But I can and will keep my feelings on the matter to myself. I have Draco to talk to about other things, like the stupid actions people take as a result of those newspaper stories. I have Connor to talk to if I want to remember something good about the past, and Remus. I have you and my allies to come to about other problems, sir. I don't see what's to be gained by discussing my feelings about—my parents and Dumbledore.” Especially because people keep refusing to believe that I could actually forgive them.

“Harry—“

“No. They're mine, almost the only secrets I have left. They're going to stay that way.” Harry glared at Snape over his shoulder. “I appreciate what you've done in the abstract, sir. But things like this make it really fucking hard to appreciate them in practice.”

He left before the last of the sweet taste of success in his mouth could sour. He managed to calm himself down as he walked. He was sure he was in the right on this one point. He would give way on others. He would try to correct hypocrisies. He would admit that Snape had been right about shutting the scar connection.

But the anger and hatred and forgiveness and love and pity and everything else he felt towards three specific people could not be of interest to anyone else. They were his. The trials would come, and go, and what would happen would happen.

Though not execution. Please, not that.

Harry would go on living through them and after them, unless he died in one of the battles first, and he would go on giving way on other points and correcting hypocrisies and admitting Snape was right. But he could see no reason for him to dig into his soul. Who cared, who had the right to care about those things, except him? It should not even be an interesting subject except to Harry himself.

“But I could—“

“No.”

“You’re not being fair—“

“No, I’m not.”

Connor turned away and punched the wall.

Harry sighed and rubbed his hand over his face. It had been a little much to hope that the confrontation with Connor would go as well as the one with Snape, he supposed. Connor was not Snape. He was impulsive, aggressive, and—well—overconfident. Harry loved his brother dearly, but he knew that Connor was too much a Gryffindor to relish being left out of battle, even though Harry had explained all the reasons as clearly as he knew how. Connor would need more training before he entered battle. He might have been able to go if he would consent to remain behind the lines, since he was brilliant on a broom, but Harry knew Connor, despite giving a promise like that with the best of intentions, would find the thought of interfering irresistible.

How can I blame him for that? I’m the same way. But I’ve had the training.

“I really, really hate this,” Connor told the wall of his bedroom, and then turned around and glared at Harry. Harry was grateful none of his yearmates were there. Of course, the only one who had really seemed tempted to linger and gawk once Harry came up to Gryffindor Tower was Seamus, and Ron and Neville had made a point of dragging him away the moment they saw Harry’s face. “I hate that you’re so much better than me. I hate the fact that you’re going to go out fighting and leave me here, but you’ll take Malfoy along.”

“All three of them, in fact,” Harry agreed lightly. “And it has nothing to do with not wanting to take you along, Connor. I would, if you could keep yourself safe. But you can’t, not yet, and you can’t add enough to the battle to spare the people it would take to guard you.”

He winced as he said that, since it did sound rather heartless. But he’d hardened himself to being heartless when he made this plan. He was not about to lie to Connor about the battle they’d be having on the full moon. He also was not about to take him along.

Connor's face paled a bit, and his eyes sparked. "My compulsion ability—"

"We don't really need anyone compelled," Harry broke in. "We won't want that for the Muggles, if they're there, and we can handle the Death Eaters. Besides, the last I knew, you had to look someone in the eyes to really compel them. It would be hard to do that in the middle of battle."

Connor closed his eyes. "Please, Harry?" he whispered. "I hate asking like this, but I want to fight."

"I know," said Harry, again wanting to squirm in discomfort. But he had made a promise to himself. He intended to carry it through. Last confrontation of the day, he chanted in his head. "But, Connor, I can't. I'm not doing this as your older brother, just making you stay behind because you're younger than I am—"

"By fifteen minutes—"

"See? That would be blatantly ridiculous. I'm doing this as a war leader, and because I know how the people I'm taking to Woodhouse fit into my plans." Connor refused to look at him. It did sound strange, Harry had to admit, and he supposed it sounded stranger to someone who had been used to thinking of himself as the Boy-Who-Lived and the future leader of the Light at one point. "This is a reason to train hard with Snape," he added, trying to sound encouraging. "The sooner you can learn to defend yourself with actual dueling spells, the sooner you can join us."

"I want to go now," Connor whispered. "Someone has to guard your back. And I want to make up for what happened on the beach, Harry."

Should have known that would be in there somewhere. "It was my choice to jump in front of that curse, Connor," Harry said quietly. "Not your fault."

"I was the one who said your name and made it necessary."

“And everything worked out fine,” Harry pointed out. “And now I want you to get the training you need so that that won’t happen again. You can best make up for it by working hard.”

Connor flopped bonelessly back on his bed and lay there for a little while. Then he said, “Eight’o’clock on Wednesday and Friday.”

“Right.”

“There goes my Friday evening,” Connor grouched.

Harry smiled. “Thank you, Connor.” He stepped up to his brother and hugged him. Connor’s arms came up and clenched around his waist with unexpected strength.

“Don’t get yourself killed, you prat,” he whispered into Harry’s ear. “I can’t do this alone.”

Of all the confrontations today, that was what made him blink back tears. Harry whispered, “Thank you,” and then turned and sought the stairs back down to the Gryffindor common room. He could feel his brother’s eyes on his back as he departed.

He felt the urge to turn back and tell Connor he could come, after all.

But he had suspected he would feel that, and his preparation was enough to keep his head high and his shoulders stiff. This was hard, but Harry no longer felt compelled to hold back from doing hard things. If he had the courage and he had the will and he had the necessity, he would go through the fire and come out the other side.

It can’t be worse than what I’ve already survived.

Intermission: Henrietta's Game

Henrietta examined the cauldron of Polyjuice potion, but could detect no differences in it from what should be apparent at this stage, with just a little more than two weeks to go until it would be ready. She shrugged and stepped away from it. Let it bubble and steam for now. She had other things to attend to, including two guests in her house.

She moved from her private potions lab to the ground floor, and opened the second door she came to. The wizard inside was already on his feet, his wand pointed at her. Henrietta lifted an eyebrow.

"I could choose to take offense to that, if I wished," she said, and shut the door behind her.

The man said nothing, though he lowered his wand. Henrietta examined him thoughtfully; this room, a study equipped with shelves but devoid of books, possessed many subtle enchantments to remove glamours and other magical forms of disguise, so she could be sure she was seeing the real man. He had a blunt face and brown eyes that probably looked secretive unless he was smiling. He must smile often, then, in his position. His hair was blond and wispy. He was a Mudblood, and had managed to get as far as he had partially on skill, partially on luck, and partially because his last name sounded like that of a famous Light wizarding family.

None of that, though, mattered to Henrietta as much as the name he had adopted for himself. He had lately started writing Daily Prophet articles under the name Argus Veritaserum. In them were many entertaining untruths about Potter. Henrietta had found them the more entertaining because everyone else thought his identity was a great mystery, but she had found him out in a few weeks by comparison of his writing style to other Prophet reporters'. This only pointed out the stupidity of the rest of the world.

"Sit down, Argus," she said. "Before I tell you what I can procure for you in a few weeks, I have to know how committed you are to lowering Harry Potter's reputation." She moved over and sat down in a chair facing him. Argus followed her slowly down, never looking away from her face. He rarely blinked. Henrietta wondered if the old stories were true, that Mudbloods sometimes bred with frogs and lizards to increase the strength of their bloodline.

“Very committed,” he said calmly. “Albus Dumbledore is my mentor, the one who taught me about the ethics of sacrifice at a young age, and the reason I survived the first war with You-Know-Who.” Henrietta barely resisted the temptation to roll her eyes. Voldemort had both a name and a title, and either was better than that ridiculous appellation the Muggle-lovers had chosen. “I know that he has made decisions and taken risks that insured the survival of the wizarding world where no one else would have made or taken them. I will not see him accused by a child who ought to be flattered by the degree of personal attention he received from a Lord of Light.”

How delightful. The Mudblood is flushing. Henrietta cocked her head and sat back in her chair. “And you think writing these articles about him will impact on him negatively enough to matter?”

“I am certain of it,” said Argus. “I’m already receiving post telling me that I’ve swayed many readers’ opinions. Now that they think of it, it doesn’t make much sense that fourteen years of child abuse could have gone unnoticed. That means that it was not abuse at all, of course, but something the boy agreed to. Now that he is a teenager and petulant—now that Slytherins have poured their venom into his ears and convinced him he’s special—he’d turn on those who sacrificed so much to make his life worthwhile.”

Careful, Mudblood, Henrietta thought, but did not say. Of course, Argus himself was ultimately a sacrifice in her plans, a role he should have no objections to playing. “Will it be enough to release the Headmaster?”

“One can hope so,” said Argus. “Albus’s trial isn’t until March, and by then, the truth about Potter will have reached everyone. And his parents’ trial isn’t for another month and a half. We may be able to clear Lily and James Potter from charges entirely.” His face shone with hope.

You will not. Potter will destroy you. So nice that he’ll owe your destruction and disposal to me. “Then I can promise that I’ll pass along the evidence I'll have," said Henrietta, with a firm nod of her head. "Potter doesn't trust me enough yet to include me in all his activities. But I'm working on him. He has some extremely...nasty things planned for two weeks hence, things so nasty they turn even my stomach. He's hinted that he'll include me in those, and I can take photographs of them and bring them back for you."

"Why would you want to hurt him?" demanded Argus, his flush altering from one of hope to suspicion. "He's a Dark wizard, just like you."

Henrietta let her lip curl and her eyes widen. "He is not a Dark wizard. He only plays at being one. And he is the son of a Mudblood. Can you ask why I would want to betray him?"

Argus frowned, then smirked. He must imagine that the similarity of his true last name to the more famous one had guarded his own dirty blood from her. No doubt he was now thinking that she would be chagrined when she found out that she'd helped someone like him.

Betraying him will be nearly as pleasant as getting Potter to submit to me in the first place.

"Then it is a pleasure indeed doing business with you, Mrs. Bulstrode," said Argus, and extended his hand. Henrietta barely let her skin brush his. His blood was less objectionable than his blind fanaticism. Henrietta despised people incapable of looking after their own interests.

She escorted him to the Floo connection by which he'd entered, blocked that particular one so it could not be used again, and then sought another room on the ground floor, three doors down from the study where she had met Argus. Her daughter Edith huddled on the bed, ducking her head and staring fearfully up at her when she came in.

Henrietta smiled and walked forward. Edith cringed, but did not move away as her mother stroked her hair. Henrietta had her well-trained. The new spell curved around her neck and branded into her flesh had something to do with that, of course, but Henrietta prided herself on the claws she had hooked into Edith's soul even more than the magical compulsions she could put her under.

Edith kept looking down. Henrietta at last murmured, "Good child. Little one. Do you know why I've called you home from Beauxbatons for today?"

A minute shake of the dark head.

"In two weeks," Henrietta said gently, "you will do me a great service. You will drink a potion for me, and then you will do what I tell you to, so that I may take photographs of you doing it. You will ask no questions. You will tell no one of this. If you do, you know what will happen." Her eyes flickered to the spell around Edith's neck. Regrettable, really. Mental control, of the kind Potter's parents used on him, is so much more elegant. At least I know that this will increase her fear of me, and in the future she may do as I say without this outside pressure.

Edith hastily nodded. Henrietta bent down and kissed her daughter's hair. Edith shook under her. Henrietta could feel her magic—the sympathetic twin of her own, which made Edith her heir, but so dimmed by crawling, creeping fear that she would never be a threat to Henrietta's position.

What pleased her even more was the fact that she still had years to work on Edith, who was only thirteen. Even when Henrietta died, her dominion would not end, because her daughter would carry her legacy forward into the future. She would not think a thought whose pattern was not set for her.

"You may leave for Beauxbatons in three hours," Henrietta whispered, and then stood and left the bedroom, her plan buzzing pleasantly in her mind.

Edith would become Potter for as long as necessary to take the photographs, and then Henrietta would send the pictures on to Argus. She would do it only once, though she would retain other photos. When Potter had undergone one round of despair and humiliation, she would offer him the knowledge of Argus's identity, and how to prevent the appearance of more photos. Probably the gratitude would not be sufficient to compel him to obey her. That was all right. The blackmail material of the other pictures would work well enough.

And if Potter refused even that incentive, Henrietta had Edith. She had seen Potter's sacrificial tendencies on full display in the beach battle. She knew Potter would never let an innocent suffer in his place. He would do what Henrietta wanted to spare her daughter, a child he barely knew.

Henrietta felt regret all the while that she pursued her plan, because fluttering through her mind like bats' wings went the hope that Potter could become like one of those ancient Lords, one she could be actually proud to follow instead of having to assume control herself because it was intolerable to bow to someone less fierce and intelligent than she was.

But what she knew of him, and what she read of him, sifting truth from lies, did not say it so. His lack of response to the Veritaserum articles was the last straw. A true Lord would have demanded an apology, at the very least, and dragged Argus into the light before Henrietta could get at him.

He is well-intentioned, but weak. But he is still a better option than Voldemort the egomaniac or Albus Dumbledore the Muggle-loving fanatic. Once he is tamed to bit and bridle and rein, I think he will do nicely.

Interlude: The Serpent's Breath

October 3rd, 1995

Dear Lord Voldemort:

I hope you do not think I do you any impertinence by contacting you. I have heard, from reading stories of the First War, that one need only speak a certain incantation over a letter in order for it to reach you—but those letters must be sent by those wishing, sincerely, in their hearts to help and not harm you. I have used the incantation, and my intentions are pure. I can only hope this message will reach your hands or the hands of one of your loyal Death Eaters.

I will retain my name in silence for right now, even as I have used charms to disguise my handwriting. I am sure that a wizard of your power is capable of discovering who I am, and even my gender. I would not mind that, but I do not wish just anyone to know. The fools who think me their ally would put up such a fuss. They already do. I am tired of listening to them. I did what I could to maintain the alliance, but they only think me a joker. No one grants me any sincere respect. Even the people I counted on as friends look at me as if they would like to smack me, as if they think that I can't know anything about the real world just because I didn't fight in the First War. None of them did, either, except the traitors who have turned their backs on the allegiance they swore to you. I wonder if they forget that?

My reason for writing is to describe an attack that Harry Potter and his allies will make on the camp of Woodhouse on Saturday, the seventh of October. They will time their attack to coincide with the rising of the full moon, and they have five werewolves with them. The main attack, Harry Potter and four bodyguards, will come in on brooms, so that Potter can drop the anti-Apparition wards while the werewolves distract the guards. They plan to rescue the captured Muggles your Lordship took from London if they can, and if not, to make sure that your Lordship is unable to use Woodhouse in the future. There will be three strike forces working under Lucius Malfoy, Adalrico Bulstrode, and Severus Snape. Aurors will wait until the attack is done to come in and take any captured Death Eaters to Tullianum. Potter has assumed your Lordship has taken wounds in the autumnal equinox battle so severe that you will not be there.

My Lord, I am willing to serve you. I've had too much contact with Muggles already, which is not surprising, considering my life. I despise them, and I agree that it would be better altogether if they and their tainted progeny were gone from our world. When you discover my true identity, I hope that you will not disdain me for my bloodline. It might seem to compromise my allegiance, but I promise you, I wish you nothing but good. Potter and his allies have insulted me too many times.

If you will it so, I will come to you in the near future and take the Dark Mark. However, I hope to persuade you against this, for now, as it would make it impossible for me to retain my place in Potter's ranks without being discovered. If you allow me to remain where I am, I will be able to pass you information on future attacks, and be well-satisfied in seeing Potter hurt and killed.

They will learn not to laugh at me. I have secrets I have never told any of them, secrets that even well-placed hints only made them sneer at me for. If you are so good as to find me worthy of your service, my Lord, I will be more than happy to reveal them to you.

With sincerity,

The Serpent.

Chapter Twenty-Nine: The Killing Moon

Minerva closed her eyes. She had been looking out across the Great Hall, and found her eyes drawn again and again to the Slytherin table, despite her attempt to look for problems in all the Houses.

This will never do. You know that you cannot favor one set of students, as Headmistress.

She took a deep breath, and sat in silence with her eyes shut for a few moments, hoping it might recall her balance. It didn't, though. Indeed, without looking at anything else, her mind had free rein to show her memories: both of the meeting last week when Harry had planned to attack Woodhouse, and of the battles that she herself had fought in the First War, when the needs of the Light had drawn her out of Hogwarts.

Her fingers twitched. She wanted a wand. She wanted to go to war.

But she had always been sensible. Even then, she had known that Albus called on her only because she was a Transfiguration specialist, and they desperately needed her, since several of the Death Eaters fighting on Voldemort's side were also skilled at transforming humans into animals. She'd even been meant to play a defensive role at first, transforming their fighters back and no more. And then the War had taken a sharp turn for the worse when Voldemort coordinated a series of attacks that left more than a hundred of the Light's best wizards dead, and the Order of the Phoenix became the most important and organized force still fighting.

She'd been on the front lines, then. It was the proper place for a Gryffindor, she thought. We weren't meant to cower behind the lines, to carry out sneak attacks, to hide our strength.

But Albus had been with them then, strong in heart and uncorrupted in principle. Minerva had been able to rely on him to defeat Voldemort when the Dark Lord took the field himself, and she'd known her place: a follower, at best a second-in-command once the War ended and she was Deputy Headmistress, not a leader.

The Headmistress of Hogwarts has to stay behind. And, of all things, the force attacking Voldemort this time is mixed Light and Dark, and has a Slytherin leading them.

At that point, Minerva couldn't help herself; she opened her eyes and looked over at the Slytherin table again. Harry was speaking with young Malfoy, his eyes wide and his movements sharp. He looked as if he would leap to his feet and prowl back and forth behind the table at any moment. Minerva smiled slightly. She knew the signs. Should Harry ever master the Animagus transformation, his form would be feline. His quick reactions, the way he moved, his surges of adrenaline, all confirmed it.

Things are different now, she thought, and the realization settled into the pit of her stomach as it never had before. I am a leader, of a sort, and I must stay here so that the wards cannot fall again. Harry has reached out to people on both sides of the fight. And just as Gryffindor soared into prominence when Albus defeated Grindelwald and during the First War, now Slytherin is rising.

She looked up the table at her Deputy Headmaster. When Severus realizes that, it should make him happy, at least. He's waited a long time to see his House overcome Voldemort's taint.

Severus did not look happy; he had barely touched his food. Minerva slid a plate of the scones she knew he favored towards him. He turned his head and fixed her with a sharp, flat stare.

"Always the mother lioness with her cubs, Minerva?" he snapped.

"If Slytherins starve themselves, who fights tonight?" Minerva murmured back.

Severus blinked, and then examined her more closely, as if he had not known that she recognized the terms on which the battle was being fought. Then he nodded, murmured, "I would be foolish to become like Harry," and began to eat.

Minerva sat back, satisfied that she had done almost all she could. Her fingers still itched, but she would content herself with strengthening the wards tonight.

And doing what she could to keep an eye on the behavior of her students, as well. The antagonism towards Harry was becoming more deliberate, and more worrying. Minerva would almost have said it was the result of a spell, save that she was sure a spell in Hogwarts would target her as well, and she had felt nothing of the effects. Perhaps Godric would know something of it.

Harry tossed back his head and took a deep breath of the night air. It made his breath steam in front of him, and he was grateful for the gloves and Quidditch gear he wore. If it was cool down here, he could only imagine how cold it would be when he was on his Firebolt.

He turned to Draco. "Ready?" he murmured.

Draco nodded. His face was pale, but it was always pale anyway. Harry knew he would certainly be composed enough to fly. He looked around one more time, then strode forward as if he were the one leading the way. Harry snorted and caught up with him inside a few steps.

His own mood was the opposite of Draco's. His nervousness had faded as the week wore on—helped by the fact that he was no longer at odds with anyone, except Snape, who continued to bother him about talking—and a mixture of excitement and wild joy had taken its place. He could feel his heart beating everywhere in his body, in his throat and his ears and his fingertips as well as his chest. He saw everything when he turned his head, minute details he would never have noticed ordinarily, so that he kept starting at the glimpses of things caught from the corner of his eye. He had an answer for every question someone asked him, so much so that he'd quite astonished both Professor Flitwick and Professor Sinistra.

This was his war, the war he'd trained so long and hard to fight. This was the first major battle of it. Harry felt his blood and his mind and his instincts turning towards it like a flower towards the sun.

He spun around and uttered a loud whoop as they walked towards the middle of the Quidditch Pitch, where they were to meet John, Regulus, and Henrietta. Draco gave him a hard look. "Do I want to know what you're so happy about?"

"Probably not." Harry dropped his arms, shifting his hold on the Firebolt so that his fingers weren't quite so cramped, and grinned at him. "You'd probably start scolding me about recklessness again."

Draco narrowed his eyes. "Merlin help you, Harry, if you take one unnecessary risk on that battlefield tonight—"

Harry just hummed and didn't listen to him. He knew the lecture by heart, anyway. He'd got it with every meal and every bedtime since Wednesday.

Draco didn't quite understand, he thought, that battles were chaos once past the initial engagement. Harry sincerely hoped their plans would result in everyone getting alive out of Woodhouse tonight, but he accepted that those plans themselves would shatter when chance and the cruel creativity of Dark wizards went to work. That was why he had at least one weapon in reserve he hadn't told anyone about, two if one counted what Regulus was bringing along. He patted his robe pocket, hearing the crimp and crackle of parchment.

"Harry? Are you listening to me?"

With a start, Harry focused back on what Draco was saying. "Um. No?"

Draco stopped, put out a hand, and snagged his arm, dragging him close. "Pay attention," he snapped. "Keep your mind on what you're supposed to be doing, not on taking curses for people. Fight like a Lord, or a vates, or a hellishly powerful wizard—whatever you want to call yourself, I suppose. Remember that we're there to protect you, and trust us."

"I do," said Harry. "At least, I trust you. I trust you more than Connor, Draco."

That caused Draco to blink and stare at him, but a shout from the Pitch, hailing them, prevented him from saying whatever he wanted to say. Harry broke into a trot, and saw Regulus come striding to meet them. He was wrapped in close dark robes that Harry hoped would keep him warm enough. He had refused to even consider the idea of Quidditch gear, which he insisted he wasn't comfortable in.

Harry scanned him for a moment, looking for the secret advantage that Regulus had said he was bringing along. Yes, there it was, a large sack tied to his belt. The sack quivered now and then. Harry grinned and accepted the half-embrace that Regulus gave him with his left arm. His right hand held his broomstick, a Nimbus.

"Ready?" he whispered into Harry's ear.

"Hell yes." Harry pulled away from him and turned to regard the other two who would be flying with them tonight. John was standing a pointed distance from Henrietta, his head slightly turned away, as though she smelled bad. Henrietta grinned at Harry. She wore Quidditch gear, and shrugged when she saw Harry looking at her.

"I was a Beater for Slytherin," she said simply.

Harry carried on looking at her a moment longer, seeing something familiar in her face. He finally managed to identify it as the same feral excitement that he felt. "You like fighting, Mrs. Bulstrode?" he asked softly.

"Yes," Henrietta hissed. "I would have gone out for a war witch if I didn't have ambitions of actually surviving past my thirties."

Harry grinned, feeling close to the Dark witch for the first time. He nodded to John, and then said, "Stay close to me. We'll be flying beyond the wards of Hogwarts, then Apparating to that glen that Mrs. Parkinson had us memorize. You remember the looks of it?" Everyone except Draco, who would be Side-Along Apparating with Harry, nodded. "From there, it's a straight flight to Woodhouse. We should be able to feel it the moment we Apparate in, thanks to its magic, and we should arrive at nightfall. Then I'll concentrate on dropping the anti-Apparition wards, and we'll get to the ground as quickly as possible.” He knew they knew this, but it never hurt to review; Harry thought this plan had more chance of surviving than some aspects of the ground strike did. “Are there any questions?”

Four heads shook. Harry felt like howling as he swung a leg over his Firebolt. He wondered how Hawthorn and the other werewolves, who would actually transform when the moon arose, handled the intense excitement.

“Let’s go,” he said softly, and they rose from the Pitch.

It had been a long time since Hawthorn had stood on this particular hillside outside Woodhouse, but she remembered it still, and the others, she saw with no little relief, had memorized the image well enough. They Apparated in not long before moonrise. Hawthorn had already taken the Wolfsbane, but she could feel her wolf stirring in her, speaking words of blood and hatred. This close to the transformation, her skin itched horribly.

Hawthorn turned to glance at the others, resisting the urge to scratch. Laura Gloryflower was the calmest of all of them, her hands linked together and her gaze fixed on the sweep of scree that would lead them downwards and to the west, towards the forest entrance of Woodhouse. Fergus whispered incessantly to Delilah. Claudia stood a short distance from them, trying to make it seem as if she weren’t listening in.

And Remus Lupin...

Hawthorn eyed him cautiously. She did not know what to make of him. He had suffered Greyback’s bite, as they all had, but he’d been a child then, and a werewolf all his life afterwards. Hawthorn had felt like an old soul when she met the three young Light werewolves, since she’d endured multiple transformations while they had yet to go through their first full moon. But Lupin moved with the wolf buzzing under his skin and in his soul, so that Hawthorn half-expected to see his face lengthen into a muzzle even before the moonlight touched him. She kept smelling him at odd times, too, as though his scent were stronger than the rest of them. Cool earth and water, leaves and raw fur—the closest to a natural wolf's scent that she'd caught since she became a werewolf.

"Stay close together once we go in," she whispered, calling the attention of others to herself. "We shouldn't face any opposition, but if we do, bunch and drive forward. The others are depending on us to distract the Death Eaters. We can't get caught up in a petty battle and slowed."

Claudia gave a little half-yelp in answer; the others nodded. And then Hawthorn stiffened and pivoted, her head turning to the east.

The full moon was rising.

Hawthorn closed her eyes and dropped to all fours as the transformation took her. The wolf stirred madly in her belly, and then rushed out and over her in a drowning tide. Hawthorn could just remember that during her first change, when she didn't have the Wolfsbane, savagery and the desire for blood had come with that first wave, burying her humanity entirely.

Now, though, the wave quieted the wolf's snarling voice, and only resulted in a deep and profound stillness shattered a moment later by the arrival of the second wave. Hawthorn's body rippled and cramped, and then became the center of a star of pain.

Her scream became a howl, mingling with the cries of the others. Hawthorn had only run with Fergus, Claudia, and Delilah once before, on the last full moon, but she had found she took comfort in hearing the voices of a pack.

The agony surged, darkening her vision. Her bones floated like sticks of wood on the sea, altering their shape and composition. But the moment passed, as it always did, and her memory relaxed; she simply couldn't remember what that much pain actually felt like, and the relief was always so blessed.

A third wave, and the color slid out of the world. Scent rushed in to take its place. Hawthorn filled her nostrils with the grass, her companions, and a certain cool something that only seemed to exist in the world during the first moments of a full moon night.

A musky reek assaulted her from the side. Hawthorn turned her head, snarling, and then shut her jaws as she met the gaze of a great cat. The lioness who had taken Laura Gloryflower's place paced forward a step or two, her tail swishing, and then turned and leaped downhill, towards the forest.

Hawthorn gave tongue to the others, briefly—it wouldn't do for the Death Eaters to be alerted ahead of time by hearing a werewolf's howl, hard as it was to control her voice—and had the satisfaction of hearing them follow her as she trailed the lioness. They bounded steadily south for a short time, then turned west. Now trees were looming ahead of them, and Hawthorn wagged her tail by instinct. She loved being among trees when she was in this form. It was right to feel branches brushing by over her head and briars almost snagging on her coat.

Something shoved up to her right shoulder. Hawthorn started and almost showed her fangs before she realized it was Lupin. He made a handsome, heavy gray werewolf, his ears pricked forward and his steps confident. He caught her eye briefly, and Hawthorn found herself looking away.

That gave her the chance to check on the others, so she didn't mind. Fergus, his coat as pale as his hair, trailed Delilah, who had become a werewolf whose fur showed as a dirty white to Hawthorn's altered eyes. She knew that, in reality, the war witch's coat was golden. That wasn't supposed to happen. Delilah's magic did not seem to care.

Claudia, a heavy black bitch, her scar even more noticeable in this form since it meant one pointed ear was gone, loped at Hawthorn's heels. Her teeth were wrinkled in a silent snarl, not aimed at any of her companions. She always looked like that, Hawthorn knew. Becoming a werewolf had altered her immensely. Once talkative and proud of her beauty, she was now silent and vengeful.

Hawthorn turned forward again as they entered the forest. The wind was against them now, carrying their scents forward, but the feel of Woodhouse's magic provided a sure guide. Hawthorn kept her ears cocked and turning, seeking out the sounds of traps, but she did not greatly fear anything they might encounter here. Werewolves were immune to so many spells that a trap would have to contain silver or a Killing Curse to be of much use.

A slight snarl was all the warning they had before twelve sleek shapes broke the darkness ahead of them, springing from ambush and hurtling to encompass them. Werewolves, Hawthorn knew at once; they were so close that she could smell them now, though she hadn't before, with the turned wind.

Snarling in rage, she met the charge of the two trying to bowl her over, dodged in a flurry of fur, and snapped her jaws down twice. That left one dragging his intestines and the other hamstrung. The hamstrung bitch tried to whirl and tear her apart anyway. They didn't have the benefit of Wolfsbane, and they were gone into the wildness that would naturally encompass a werewolf when the moon rose.

Hawthorn grabbed the bitch's throat. Slick fur, salty flesh, and then blood as she wrenched her head sideways and tore out her throat. That made the bitch sag. Her companion had tangled his forepaws in his guts and lay dying on the ground. Hawthorn turned to check on her pack.

Three of the werewolves had hit Fergus. Hawthorn saw him die, as two of the attackers held him down at the shoulders and the other sliced through half his neck with cruel fangs. Hawthorn wondered if it was clever or abominable of her that her first thought was, That will bind the Opallines to us for certain. Paton will never forgive the Dark Lord the murder of his son.

Delilah and Lupin were working in tandem to dance around three other members of the enemy pack, making them spin in several directions without landing a bite. Hawthorn felt her lips lift in a snarl of contempt as she saw the clumsy, hesitant movements of the strangers. They were almost certainly new werewolves, this only either their first or second transformation. Delilah had experience gained through six full moons now, and Lupin was a creature of grace and beauty, avoiding their awkward lunges as if he were made of mist.

Claudia had already downed her own two attackers. Their bodies were half torn apart, and she was closing in on another victim, her muzzle stretched out before her body and her paws flying. She was only really happy when she was killing something, Hawthorn knew, potion or no potion.

Laura Gloryflower had just cracked the skull of the last werewolf in her jaws like an egg. She left him slumped, a bloodied ruin, and turned to face the three who had taken Fergus. They closed in cautiously, panting. They were more experienced, Hawthorn saw, more often changed, and what they lacked in rationality they made up in instinct. They knew that this great cat would be a tougher opponent than the young werewolf they'd just slaughtered.

Hawthorn allowed herself a momentary howl of grief for Fergus, packmate, downed, dead, and then she sprang to join Laura. One thought did burn in her head in the moment before she let human experience and lupine reflexes take over to guide her in the battle.

Where is Fenrir?

Harry narrowed his eyes as he saw Woodhouse for the first time. He had known what to expect from the memory Hawthorn showed him, but she had not been able to see all the nuances of the intense natural magic that surrounded it. Harry saw it as a fallen star, a singing star, with subtle, different vibrations arising depending on whether they came from wood, stone, grass, or treetops.

"Enemies."

Harry wheeled sharply. He was flying in the center of their formation, Regulus ahead of him, John and Draco to the sides, Henrietta behind. It was Henrietta who'd spoken the warning, her eyes aimed over Harry's shoulder. He looked, and saw seven brooms rising to meet them from the eastern slope of Woodhouse, behind the quadrangle of buildings. Harry clasped his hand down on the Firebolt until he felt his knuckles pop, as paranoid suspicion, focused on what could happen, became grim certainty.

We've been betrayed.

"We have to kill them or down them," he snapped. "Henrietta, I want you to—"

"Shove it, Potter," Henrietta said. Her wand was in her hand, and she was glaring at him. "Don't be an idiot. Concentrate on dropping the anti-Apparition wards. It's what you're here for. The rest of us will take care of this."

"I have to—"

"Remember your place, you idiot. Avada Kedavra!"

The green fire of the Killing Curse cut the night, and one of the flyers tumbled from his broom. The others broke, dipping and diving, and resumed their flight more cautiously. Harry thought they probably hadn't anticipated an Unforgivable cutting one of them down from so far away. One of them did cast a curse back, but it sputtered and died in the air long before reaching them.

Harry took several deep breaths, and then nodded, and turned towards Woodhouse again, this time seeking to separate the delicate lines of the wards from the rest of the singing, glowing magic.

Draco hovered next to him, Regulus on the other side. John was racing to join the fight with the enemies, and Henrietta was right beside him. All of these things Harry was aware of distantly, but for the moment, as Henrietta had reminded him, he had to do that which he was there for.

His will bore down, his sight reaching out through his eyes, his knowledge joining with them. He knew what wards felt like through his training, and now he sought and found layered defensive spells. He smiled a bit. Voldemort had had what he probably thought was a clever idea, tying the anti-Apparition wards to the magic of Woodhouse itself. Someone would have to destroy the heavily warded wooden building before they could Apparate in.

Of course, Voldemort hadn't been planning on a Lord-level opponent. Harry destroyed the wards from the other end, where they were hooked to the grass and hills of the valley, unbraiding the spells one by one with chanted Finite after Finite. That left a lashing, uncoiling vortex of threads that would have consumed most wizards, but Harry calmly turned them back with his own powerful Protego. The ends of the torn wards retracted into Woodhouse with a snap, like the heads of snails going home. Harry nodded, and touched his left wrist with his hand, using his knees alone to grip his broom as he hovered.

"Adoro braccio de Lucius Malfoy!" he murmured, and heard Lucius's voice speaking his name a moment later. He kept his message brief. His instincts were screaming at him to get to the ground. If Voldemort was there, as now seemed likely, only Harry could face him.

"The wards are down. Pass the message to the others, and Apparate in." The ground forces were grouped together, so Lucius shouldn't need much more than a shout to pass the message.

He ended the spell and then dived, hearing the sharp cracks of Apparition already beginning. Harry kept his concentration ranging ahead of him, trying to find Voldemort. He knew they had been betrayed, but he couldn't bother to waste time on panic and hatred right now. He fed the emotions to the Occlumency pools, and they swallowed them. His focus had to be on finding the Dark Lord.

Draco and Regulus dropped back, flying near his shoulders as they came in across the quadrangle of buildings. Harry kicked his Firebolt further downward, carefully measuring his speed. He didn't want to outpace the other two, but he badly wanted to be out of the air, now that he knew the Death Eaters had forewarning of their arrival. People on brooms were too vulnerable to curses flung from the buildings around Woodhouse.

They lowered—twenty feet above the ground, fifteen. Harry saw two dark shapes fall past him, and heard a triumphant cry in Henrietta's voice. She and John had taken care of the flyers, then, Harry thought, and would soon join them.

Ten feet above the ground. They were next to the northernmost stone building now, flying over a long patch of tall grass.

Blackness surged in the grass. Harry, flown past and turning towards the sudden glimpse of movement, didn't understand what he was seeing until a strip of silver in the black oriented him. By that time, Fenrir Greyback had already leaped, clenched his jaws around the tail end of Draco's broom, and dragged him to earth, shaking and spinning him violently as they went. Draco's scream was caught off as he plowed into the ground.

Greyback tumbled a short distance away, and then rushed back in. Draco had his wand already in hand and managed to get off a spell, but it bounced from the huge black werewolf, as Harry had known it would. Greyback came in close, his jaws snapping, trying to get a firm hold on Draco's torso or limbs.

Harry felt rage turn him incandescent, transparent. His magic branded the night with fire in his immediate vicinity, and then he cried out, in a voice he hadn't known he was capable of, the voice of an angel or a demon, "Greyback. Look at me."

The werewolf shouldn't have known what he was saying, with his mind drowned in bloodlust. But perhaps he could recognize his own name, or perhaps the movement, as Harry came diving straight at him, made him lift his head and turn. Harry saw the moonlight flash on his teeth, on his eyes.

Magic and rage and will together took flight from Harry, slamming into Greyback. For a moment, he was there, Draco temporarily forgotten, his body sinking into a crouch as he prepared to spring at Harry.

Then he—wasn't there anymore.

Harry heard the snap of inrushing air as it came back together around the sudden jagged hole. Backlash made him stagger on his broom, and he wheeled the Firebolt, instinctively compensating for the lack of balance, as he would have compensated for catching a Bludger to the side. Fire ran through his head in small tendrils, making him feel the tiniest bit drunk.

But the intoxication cleared in seconds. He knew what he had done. He had looked at Greyback, and the werewolf had ceased to exist. He had killed him with almost pure magic.

And he could not regret it.

Harry leaped from the Firebolt while it was still a few feet above ground, rolling as his mother had taught him, coming up safe from the fall and collapsing into a kneel beside Draco. "Draco," he breathed, staring at him, looking for some sign of a bite or a scratch. Even such a tiny mark could be sufficient to spread the disease, the werewolf web. He couldn't see one, but perhaps that was just his hope. "Are you all right?"

Draco rolled on his back and smiled up at him. Harry smiled back, unsure if it was the relief or the release of Ignifer's fire that was making his vision burn with white spots at the corners.

Draco wanted to pant, wanted to lie still, wanted to wrap his arms around Harry and hold on, wanted to climb back on his broom and fly out of there. All his desires had narrowed to one when Greyback grounded him—the desire to live—and now that he was past that point and certain he had not died yet, they exploded in a giddy stream, spinning around and through his head.

He'd been thrown down brutally and the breath taken out of his lungs, though, so he just lay there for a moment, staring at Harry, blinking as the streamers of fire abruptly turned the night to high noon, grateful he could see.

He had to see, because the white-cheeked werewolf made no noise as she rose from the tall grass behind Harry and closed on him in a flying leap. For a moment, Draco saw her soaring, her dark fur whipping around her, her teeth bared in a skull-rictus of pain, her face seeming scorched, and entirely bared, by the white left half.

His wand was in his hand, and Draco lifted it, the lessons of a dusty classroom abruptly taking the place of his whirling wishes, and cried, "Ardesco!"

The werewolf's fur caught and smoked, just a bit. She snarled. But werewolves were mostly immune to magic, and the spell was not enough to make her alter the trajectory of her spring. She crashed onto Harry and bore him to the ground, then reared up, gaze locking on the bare back of his neck.

Draco pushed his mind frantically out from his body, and landed in hers. Unfamiliar weight nearly crushed him, the configuration of four legs instead of two drove him mad, and blood-blind savagery and grief for the loss of a mate tried to eat him alive. None of it worked. Draco had his own mate to defend, as this mind understood it, and he possessed the werewolf and pushed her off Harry before he even thought of what he was doing.

He knew his own body would have dropped and collapsed, and he whipped himself back to it, traveling in the snap which he imagined Apparition was like. He opened his own eyes, found his own wand in his own hand, and lifted it. The werewolf lay stunned on her side a few feet from Harry, beginning to lift her head. The hatred that drove her was too great to be deterred by a mere temporary loss of control.

Well, the hatred that drives me is great, too. Draco grabbed that hatred, and the memory of a voice from last year, that of the man who had called himself Moody, murmuring the list of curses that not even a werewolf was immune to.

Draco aimed. It seemed he had all the time in the world. Harry was stirring. The werewolf had stood. She hurtled towards him, paws still silent, teeth still bared in their skull-grin, eyes locked on his throat.

And through all of that, through pain and shock and onrushing death, Draco still had time to whisper, "Avada Kedavra."

His wand shook in his hand as the spell surged out of him, draining him of his hatred, a line of green fire that speared the werewolf and turned all her movement into stillness. She fell where she'd stepped, one paw still outstretched in front of her. Her malice sparked from her dead eyes like his own loathing reflected.

Draco dropped to his knees, panting. He shut his eyes. He hurt, with an emptiness deeper than the hatred had been. He could not believe he had done that, but he had to, because the evidence lay not five feet away.

“Draco.”

Draco turned and buried his face in Harry’s shoulder. Harry was up on his knees now, his arm wrapped around him, murmuring sweet and soothing nonsense into his ear. Draco clung to that. If he hadn’t cast the Killing Curse, Harry would be dead. His first casting of an Unforgivable was more than a fair trade for that.

He’d always known that he would have to do this, he thought numbly, accepted since he was six that he would someday use the green fire. The Malfoys were Dark wizards. Dark wizards used the Unforgivables. Why was it hitting him so hard now? And how could he do nothing for the moment but kneel here and fight tears and bile and vomit?

“It’s all right,” Harry whispered to him, when Draco could concentrate on his words. “It’s all right. She’s dead, Draco, and you’re alive, and you haven’t changed. I promise you.”

Draco had not known how badly he needed to hear that until Harry said it. He wrapped the words around him in place of the arm Harry had to take back, and nodded when Harry stood and looked inquiringly down at him.

Harry nodded back, then gripped his arm and pulled. Draco stumbled to his feet, shocked both by the force of the tug and the kiss with which Harry greeted him when he was standing, hard enough to make their teeth clack together. Harry drew back and grinned at him through a bloodied mouth. Draco couldn’t tell if he’d done that, or the werewolf had, when she drove him into the ground.

“We’ll fight now,” said Harry simply. “Back to back.”

Draco nodded, and the sickness and the emptiness began to thaw. He was here. He was now, and he was alive, and Harry was here and now and alive with him.

Harry turned, his hand still firm on Draco's, and looked across an expanse of grass towards Regulus. Draco saw that his cousin had spilt open the sack he'd brought along, and was pouring a steady stream of small objects onto the ground. Draco shuddered when he recognized them.

"Attention," said Regulus crisply, and the artificial spiders who'd tried to poison Harry in third year spun around and looked up at him. Regulus nodded back at them. "Go in front of us. Bite anyone who tries to cast curses at us."

The spiders gave a massive click of their legs, and then scuttled off, spreading out in a black carpet. Harry gave a howling laugh, and began to stalk after them, murmuring something under his breath. Draco strained to hear as he jogged along at Harry's right shoulder.

"They anticipated our attack, but Voldemort isn't here. He's still too badly wounded, I think. This will be fun."

Draco shuddered a little, but Harry smiled at him over his shoulder, and he forgot his fear at the unearthly beauty of his boyfriend's eyes lit by fire and feral intensity. He shifted his grip on his wand, and turned to meet the rest of the battle, bracing himself to kill again.

He'd done it once. He could do it again.
She'd forgotten.

Henrietta had once loved to fly on a broom. She'd gone out for a Beater less for love of the game than for love of flying. She'd expected the ride to be her favorite part of the evening, and when she'd taken down the Death Eaters who opposed them on brooms—pitiful flyers, one and all—she'd resigned herself to boredom. Even with the help of the traitor that it seemed lurked among their own ranks, the Death Eaters hadn't mustered a competent defense. Then again, why they should have grown in skill since the battle on the equinox, Henrietta didn't know.

But then she landed, and she saw Potter and Malfoy's son dispatching the werewolves, and she paused a moment to admire that, and so she saw the dark figure making his way towards Potter from the shelter of the northernmost building. Henrietta stared. Her heart picked up so much speed that her vision blurred. She could not believe—no. She had forgotten much, including her own excitement at the thought of having a real challenge, but she could not have forgotten the way this man moved.

Apollonis had filled the air with fire, revealing the Death Eater's face, since he wore no mask, but Henrietta didn't need the help. Blind, she would have known who he was.

She had simply never expected to see him again.

As he took aim at Potter, Henrietta, with joy in her heart and wetness forming between her legs, called out, "Cor cordium flammae!"

He staggered, but he was good at resisting curses that took place inside personal shields, and he ended the spell before it took hold. Then he spun, and then he saw her, and then he went quite still.

Henrietta stalked forward, laughing so hard it was difficult to speak. She managed it at last, though. "Hello, Rosier."

Evan Rosier stared at her. There was insanity in his eyes, but no joy. Henrietta didn't think there would have been. Potter was probably a toy to him—so powerful that Rosier entertained no serious hopes of being able to conquer him, only string him along and use him for amusement. Henrietta, on the other hand, had both battled him and fucked him, and walked away alive from both of those encounters. She didn't think there was anyone else who could say the same.

"No words for your old friend? I'm hurt," Henrietta whispered.

Rosier recovered then, and said, with the calm deadliness that he showed when he wasn't playing, "Dolor immoderatus."

Henrietta laughed. He had forgotten some things, including the pendant she carried against her skin, one of the Bulstrode heirlooms, that prevented the curses Rosier favored from getting under one's shields and inside the body. Not his Blood-Burning Curse, not Ardesco, not the Endless Pain Curse he'd just tried to use, would impact her as long as she wore it.

"I wish you were dead," Rosier said.

"Annoying, aren't I?" Henrietta asked cheerfully, and then they began to dance, and rapture flooded and consumed her.

Lucius came in hard and fast from the south, hearing the cries of werewolves in the woods, seeing Apollonis's fire slice the night into ribbons, feeling his every sense rouse to full alertness.

Behind him were Belville, Burke, Starrise, and Narcissa, all of them as alert as he was, Lucius hoped. He would hate to have something happen to them because they weren't alert. On the other hand, it would be no one's fault but their own. He was their guide, nor their minder.

He saw Death Eaters coming to meet them, clad in dark cloaks and white masks. Memories ran side by side with Lucius for a moment, reminding him of the time when he would have stood among them, and then they died and none took their places. Memories were not the friends of a seasoned fighter in his battle. He concentrated on what was around him. He saw what was there.

And Narcissa was there, on the left, and there were three Death Eaters coming for them, spread out with roughly equal distances between them. Lucius turned, and met his wife's eyes; she was already looking at him.

"Locusta's Kiss?" he asked.

"But of course," Narcissa murmured, and caught his arm. Lucius lifted his wand to point at the Death Eater on the far left. The others immediately scrambled faster, as if they thought he hadn't noticed them.

Lucius cast a moment before he heard Narcissa's voice, intoning the same curse. "Virus Locustae!"

The Death Eater on the right and the one on the left fell, convulsing, suffering as if from the bite of a Locusta snake. That left the one in the center with the opportunity to take revenge on one of them, but he hesitated about which one it should be.

They always did.

Lucius spun his wife around in front of him as if they were dancing, so that she presented her wand and then her back and then her wand, and their enemy oriented on her. Meanwhile, Lucius aimed his wand under Narcissa's lifted arm and cast the Locusta curse again. The Death Eater's eyes widened in an expression of surprise most amusing before he fell.

Narcissa finished her spin bound close to his body, and Lucius leaned in and kissed her harshly. Narcissa returned the kiss with equal force, laughing smugly into his mouth. They had the right to be smug, Lucius thought. The Locusta's Kiss maneuver was difficult to pull off, and had both elegance and deadliness. A glance to their left showed that Burke was looking at them with admiration.

"Would that more young witches and wizards today knew the true pureblood rituals," he murmured. "It's all that separates us from Mudbloods."

Lucius refrained from rolling his eyes, but only because Belville was striking a heroic pose beyond Burke and casting some complicated spell in a Celtic language that had no more apparent effect than a tripping jinx. That left it to the rest of them to finish the real work, while Belville cocked his head around at each of them, as if demanding they admire his learning. Ravenclaws, Lucius thought, with contemptuous resignation.

Narcissa charged beside him as they fought their way towards Woodhouse, and they had the chance to use the Locusta's Kiss again, as well as the Whirlwind Tango. Lucius could feel his heart beating hard in contentment, and he caught a glimpse of the same emotion in Narcissa's eyes.

This was the reason he had agreed to let his son go with Harry, in the hopes that Draco might have the opportunity to fight beside the young man he so obviously loved. Nothing bonded spouses like battle. If Draco had that kind of connection with their Potter after this evening, Lucius would be assured they were meant for each other just as they were.

If not...well.

There is still some time for Draco to learn lessons in the emotional control he needs.

Really, it was so easy to trick people.

Honorina reflected on that as she watched the sixth Death Eater in a row try to fight one of her illusions, and then she sneaked up behind the illusion and stuck the tip of her wand between his ribs. She murmured a Cutting Curse and he was down, just like that.

Or maybe the Dark Lord just couldn't get very good help, which was also a possibility, she supposed.

She glanced around, restless. She was with Snape's force, coming in from the east, and they were no doubt striking terror into the hearts of all and sundry. Snape was, at least. The man fought like one of the robots Honorina's mother had once described to her, all lethal precision and endless strength, striving to get to the center of the battle and hook up with the vates he loved like a son.

Honorina watched as Rhangnara used some highly complicated spell that appeared to tie his victim's guts up in knots, and then decided, quite clearly, that she no longer needed to stay with them.

She was bored. And she could do things that no one else could. And Harry might need her eyes.

She crouched, safe in the shade of an illusion, and then leaped. Her body tumbled and turned, melted and reformed, and she struck upwards, a sea-mew, seeing with clear eyes in the constantly renewed light of the fire that illuminated them all. If anyone caught sight of her, they no doubt thought they were seeing another illusion, or maybe a stray bird wandered into the battle. That was because no one knew she was an Animagus. No one knew her secret. Honoria loved having secrets.

She canted to the north, towards the place that Harry and his honor guard would have come in on their broomsticks. No one was flying right now, so they must have landed already. Houses ringing with magic passed underneath her, and Honoria cackled, the sharp gull-laughter that irritated most people who did not realize what clever and dead useful birds gulls were.

She would find Harry and...help. Or, at the least, amuse herself. And if someone thought she was dead because of her disappearance, then she could always have the fun of reappearing "alive" later.

She hoped it was Belville who thought she was dead. She always wanted to surprise those who most deserved it.

Harry strode confidently towards the buildings that surrounded Woodhouse. Voldemort wasn't there. He saw no need to risk himself on the battlefield, perhaps. Or perhaps the traitor's communication, whatever it had been, hadn't even reached him. If he was in one of those private lairs Lucius had talked about, it was likely.

As he walked, Harry drew out the scrap of parchment from his robe pocket. "I solemnly swear I want to attack Woodhouse," he whispered, and the lines of an enchanted map appeared, racing across the paper until they formed an image of the valley. Harry grinned. He'd worked on this throughout the last half of the week. It was good to know that he hadn't lost his touch since he'd created the map of Godric's Hollow two years ago.

"What's that?" Draco asked, of course, trying to peer over Harry's shoulder.

Harry showed him the map, studying the dots still gathered in the midst of the quadrangle. Sure enough, no dot marked the Dark Lord's presence. There was Karkaroff—Harry curled his lip—and several names that Harry was only remotely familiar with from stories of the First War, and several completely unfamiliar names that looked Russian, probably young Death Eaters from Durmstrang. No Bellatrix. Harry wasn't sure if he was relieved or disappointed on that score.

So, about twenty Death Eaters still lying in wait, then. It was probably Karkaroff who organized the defense. Harry shifted the map so that he could see it better in the light of the flames, and then frowned as he realized that a dot he'd simply assumed was a Death Eater had only one word beside it.

Siren.

Shit, Harry thought, and stared harder at the map. The siren's pool was within the quadrangle, against the southernmost building, nearly opposite from where they stood now, and past both Woodhouse itself and the waiting Death Eaters. He didn't know how to get there without a pitched battle.

Wait. Yes, I do.

Harry smiled and glanced at Regulus. "Get the spiders ready," he said. "There are Death Eaters who'll come flooding around that corner in a moment." He nodded at the corner nearest to them, which made Regulus jump and glance narrowly at him, noticing the map for the first time. He closed his eyes and shook his head.

"Sometimes, you really are Sirius's godson," he muttered.

Harry acknowledged the compliment with a small nod.

"Wait. That corner?" said John, who'd just come up behind them. Harry wondered briefly where Henrietta was, then discarded the worry. She could take care of herself if she was on their side, and if she wasn't, then his magic could take care of her. Either way, she was probably having more fun wherever she was.

"Yes, that corner," Harry replied, and then began to murmur, aloud for the benefit of those with him. "Aedifico spiritum cum odoratu et vibrare."

He smiled as Draco's eyes lit with recognition. This was the incantation that Connor had used to fool the dragons in the Triwizard Tournament. Harry watched as an illusion of himself formed next to him, so perfect that it made John start and glance at him in wonder. Harry sent the illusion forward with a wave of his hand, peeking around the corner of the building.

He heard Karkaroff's astonished shout, and then there came the sound of clattering footsteps, moving directly towards them, and of fired curses. Harry made his illusion run back around the corner, and then braced himself.

Regulus's spiders clicked their legs together.

Harry backed up a few steps, readying himself for a pull. Draco aimed his wand over his shoulder. Regulus's spiders scuttled forward, and the first Death Eaters screamed in surprise and agony as the venom entered their systems. Remembering how it felt to suffer from the spiders' poison, Harry couldn't resist a sympathetic shudder. He thought they would probably think what he did next to be more horrible, though.

He opened the serpent's jaws, and began to swallow their magic, carefully aiming above the spiders so that they could continue working. The two nearest Death Eaters, both of them small enough to be somewhere near Harry's age, fell to their knees crying out as Harry ripped their power away. Harry winced, and closed his eyes, but continued drawing. With Regulus and Draco right there, he couldn't take the chance that anything might hurt them.

When he thought he'd taken in enough magic, and Karkaroff and some of the others were hesitating to come around the corner because they feared their comrades' screams, Harry charged. Draco gave an indignant shout, which Harry ignored. Draco was perfectly capable of keeping up if he decided that he wanted to.

Around the corner, behind the building, in the shadow, and he could smell water, and see the edge of the siren's pool. Karkaroff was right there, aiming his wand with a shocked expression.

Harry spat out the magic he'd swallowed, and knocked the Death Eaters away like mice suffering from the swat of a cat's paw. He heard skulls crushed and spines snapping as they rolled. He put the knowledge of those sounds in the same place where he put the fact that he'd willed Fenrir Greyback out of existence by looking at him. He would accept, and deal with later, the fact that he had killed, painfully and numerous times.

That is what war is.

He ran through the newly clear area of earth, aiming for the pool. The bulk of Woodhouse loomed to the right, tempting him to look, so ablaze with magic that it made Harry want to wonder and sing. But he had to stop the siren first, and he was probably the only one who could.

Draco and Regulus were right behind him, John panting on their heels. Harry passed Woodhouse, and saw a shape moving between the eastern and southern buildings, near the far shore of the siren's pool. He felt his heart lift when he realized it was Snape. His force had broken through whatever guards had been waiting on the far side of the valley.

And then the siren burst out of the pool, wrapped her arms around Snape's waist, and pulled him into the water, singing as she went. Ignifer stopped fighting when she heard the song.

It twisted around her mind, so lovely that tears were streaking her cheeks before she realized it. She put a hand over her face, shuddering. Memories sprang up in her mind like blades of grass, memories of light and goodness before she'd turned her back on the Light she was raised in, Declaring for the Dark.

She could have that home back, whispered the singing voice. She could have her parents back, not her father as he'd become, stern and proud and inflexible, and not the indifferent mother who talked to her from the fireplace every day, but her parents as they'd been when she was a little girl, furiously proud of her. She found herself taking a step forward, shivering all the while, longing.

A hand caught her arm. Ignifer struck out blindly, trying to hurt whoever held her. She needed to go to the song, the singer. She needed to follow the path that had suddenly opened in front of her heart.

Then another song rose. It did not exactly combat the first. It twined around it, and turned it, exposing it to the light like a jewel. It let Ignifer see the flaws in that music, how false it was—not a jewel, but paste. Her head cleared, and she stood, blinking, with Arabella Zabini's hand on her arm and the Songstress's voice throbbing in the air around her.

"What was that?" Ignifer demanded, then realized the question was foolish; Zabini was too busy singing, and preventing the song from snaring her again, to answer her. The others in their force were waking from what looked like similar trances, shaking their heads. Adalrico Bulstrode frowned.

"The song is coming from there," he said, nodding to the buildings. "I think we should pursue it. Whatever it is can harm our vates." He began to stride, the air around him turning steadily darker. Ignifer frowned, then shrugged. There were rumors of magical gifts in the Bulstrode line, magic they usually hid.

And then Adalrico's words caught up with her.

Something that might hurt Harry.

Ignifer hurtled forward. She had just found this alliance. She was not about to lose it.

Zabini followed her, still cocooning her in the song, battling what Ignifer now realized must be the voice of a siren—

And then that voice stopped.

Harry didn't think as he heard the splash. He didn't think as he heard the song. Visions were trying to fill his head, but nothing could compare to that too-real, too-present memory of Snape going down to his probable death, the siren's arms wrapped around him and her beautiful face upturned to watch his as it went slack.

He found himself leaving the ground, or rushing through it, a trick he hadn't performed since his third year, when he ran to Hogwarts from the Forbidden Forest to save Draco from one of the Black snakes. He just barely remembered to cast a charm that would let him breathe underwater before he plunged into the pool.

Unlike the Hogwarts lake, where he'd been last year, this was perfectly clear, and the throbbing bursts of Ignifer's fire overhead irradiated it like beams of sunlight. Harry could see the siren on the far side, drifting near an obviously magically-constructed bank of stone. She sang and sang, her voice thick as the water was. She had her gaze and her grip locked on Snape, who was not breathing.

Harry flung the breathing charm. Snape coughed, and then his chest began to heave, bubbles trailing from his mouth.

The siren snapped her head around, her gaze locking on him. Harry felt her song shift the same way. Now she wasn't launching it towards Snape, or towards whatever audience might hear her; she was focusing on him and only him.

The visions came crowding back again, trying to enchant and snare Harry with images of a perfect childhood, a good relationship with his parents, an existence entirely ignored by everyone, if only he would come to the siren and touch her. Harry found it as hard to resist, for just a moment, as he had the song of the many-legged creature in Number Twelve Grimmauld Place. This siren was free of a web, her voice unrestricted, and she belonged to a kindred of magical creatures made to compel.

Then Harry's hatred of compulsion kicked in, and he bucked his mind and threw off the strands of song. The siren's eyes, large and shining green, met his. Harry tossed his thought like a spear through their connected gazes.

I am vates. Hear me! Voldemort fooled you. He set your kind free only to enchant and hurt wizards. I have freed others. Look into my heart and see the truth. Look now. I am the breaker and unbinder of webs. The one you hold is my guardian, and if you do not release him, I will kill you, though I wish magical creatures nothing but good.

The siren heard him, or perhaps she heard and understood the impulse of freedom in his mind; Harry had never believed anything more sincerely in his life. She cried out, a musical sound that luckily did not resemble her song enough to harm anyone, and her arms loosened on Snape's waist. He drifted in the water. Harry swam up to him and draped himself underneath his arm, never looking away from the siren.

Her voice crept into his mind, a timid little girl's voice, rising and falling in waves like the ocean or the restless shifting of her fish's tail. Is it true? He tricked us? We were not going after rightful prey, but only his enemies?

That is true, Harry affirmed. He would never have allowed you to enchant or compel the wizards that follow him. He did not offer sirens true freedom, but a new web.

I must tell the others of this. We are free, and we wish to sing. We must have the freedom to drown whomever we wish.

The siren hurtled away, speeding smoothly towards a low entrance in the bank of the pool that Harry hadn't noticed before. She ducked into it and was gone, with a flirt of her tail.

Harry heaved out a breath, and then swam for the surface, dragging Snape along with him. It wasn't easy with only one hand to guide his way, but other hands grabbed him when he got to the surface, and Draco and Regulus helped him back into the open air. Harry let the water-breathing charm go, and turned anxiously to Snape as Regulus laid him out on the back of the pool, murmuring, "Finite Incantatem. Ennervate."

Snape coughed, spewing out quite a lot of water, and sat up. Harry ended the water-breathing charm on him, and met his eyes.

"Imbecile," Snape spat.

Harry found himself smiling. “That settles the question of whether you’re all right, then,” he said, and had to shut his eyes. “Merlin, sir, I—“

Wings sounded close above his head suddenly, and Harry spun. He saw a gull, diving, which became a woman, falling. And he saw Karkaroff on his feet, his wand aimed, anger terrible on his face.

He saw the moment when the Slicing Curse that should have cut into his unprotected back took Honoria across the stomach instead, as she tumbled between him and the line of the spell.

In a moment, everything changed. Honoria lay on the ground, bleeding, cut open from shoulder to groin, organs steaming slightly in the cold air. Harry recognized the Curse—he’d last seen it when Rabastan Lestrange had used it on Connor in the lake last year—and he felt very cold. He raised his head, eyes raking from Honoria to Karkaroff.

Karkaroff turned pale at the feeling of Harry’s magic rising, or perhaps just the look in his eyes; he was a Legilimens, after all. He backed away one step, then two, then screamed, in a voice amplified by the Sonorus spell, “Retreat! Now!”

The night rang as those Death Eaters who could still Apparate fled. Harry heard the sounds of battle cease, falling into confusion and then shouts that were probably either of surprise or victory.

He could share neither. He knelt next to Honoria, and she bled, dying before his eyes. She had her eyes open, though, and she was smiling at him.

“Why should you—“ she asked, with an obvious effort, then had to stop, panting. “Why should you get to have all the fun of taking a curse for someone else?” she asked, as if determined to get it all out in one sentence, and then her head fell back. Her eyes closed.

“Fawkes,” Harry said, his voice distorted by emotions beyond any other expression.

Wings fluttered above his head, again. This time, they accompanied fire, and the crooning song of a phoenix who landed on Honoria's unwounded shoulder and leaned over her injury. Harry cast pressure charms to hold the blood in, his mind blasted dull and numb with shock. Fawkes's tears fell, faster than, or just as fast as, Honoria's breathing slowed; Harry could not decide their relative speeds.

The shock gave way to mourning, cutting at him like a knife slicing through one tendon at a time, and he had to wonder, the words forming in his thoughts as though out of a vortex, Is this the way other people felt when I took the curse for Connor?

He swallowed multiple times as he did what he could to assist Fawkes, which wasn't much—mostly holding the blood in and knitting a little torn skin back together. Horror and pain together echoed twice over through his soul, both for Honoria and for the thought of Draco, or Snape, or anyone, really, suffering the same emotions on his account.

I didn't know. Oh, Merlin, I didn't know. If they really consider me as important as anyone else—or at least as important as I consider Honoria—then that means they felt this. Oh, Merlin.

He heard others arriving, but their voices silenced as they neared, save for whispered conversations that Harry didn't look up long enough to notice. He did look up when someone knelt down next to him, though, and blinked when he realized it was Thomas Rhangnara, his face for once serious.

"May I help?" he asked softly. "There are healing spells I've studied that might prove useful."

Harry nodded, and Thomas began to murmur in what wasn't Latin, tracing his wand above the path the Slicing Curse had created on Honoria's abdomen. Harry watched for only a moment before turning back to his own tasks. He could not tell for certain how much effect they had. He only knew that Honoria was still breathing.

Then he realized that Draco's hand was on his shoulder, and that Fawkes had stopped crying, and Thomas was saying, "Harry? She's stable. She needs Hogwarts and your mediwitch as soon as possible, but she'll survive until we can get her there. Have one of the Malfoys Apparate her. They're good at that. I noticed when we jumped into the battle."

Harry sat back on his heels, drew in a breath that never seemed to end, and nodded. He rose, meeting Snape's eyes, and Regulus's, and Draco's. He was alive. He would survive.

Now to see who else was.

Pair after pair of eyes around the circle, and it looked as though nearly everyone was alive. Tybalt's right arm hung uselessly by his side, but he embraced John with his left, eyes tightly closed with what Harry thought was more relief than pain. Arabella Zabini limped, but her eyes were as proud as ever when Harry met them. Narcissa, though unsmiling, shifted so that Harry could see the burn on her left shoulder didn't prevent her from moving.

Then the werewolves arrived, with a lioness pacing beside them: Hawthorn, Moony, a black bitch with one ear missing who must be Claudia Griffinsnest, and one other, a golden one. One missing.

Harry closed his eyes, acknowledging the blow of a death, and counted them one more time. Henrietta was there now, too, strolling up with a faint smile on her lips, all five of their brooms floating behind her. She inclined her head when Harry met her eyes. She looked exhausted, but fully satisfied. Harry decided not to ask. She could tell him all the details, if she wanted him to know, later.

"We'll be going back to Hogwarts," he said quietly. "First, though, I want to secure Woodhouse against repossession by the Death Eaters." He glanced around distractedly for his map. Draco held it up on his second glance. Harry smiled a thanks he knew probably looked tired and took it, scanning it for more dots.

He shook his head. Save for names he recognized, and the motionless dots lying out beyond the quadrangle, there was no one in the valley. No Muggles, then. When Karkaroff got wind of the attack, he'd probably moved them, if they'd ever been here in the first place.

They had Woodhouse, though, and that was not a small prize—

Though not worth someone's life, his conscience whispered at him.

Harry told it to shut up, since this was war, and lifted his head, closing his eyes. He knew that one of the people watching him at this moment was most likely a traitor, unless Voldemort had used the scar connection to get wind of the attack. As yet, he had no idea of knowing who it was, beyond instinctive certainty that it wasn't Snape, Regulus, Draco, or any of his older allies, and a revulsion against thinking it might be Honoria. Therefore, he wasn't about to tell anyone how he intended to secure Woodhouse.

It didn't take long. The spells on the great wooden building interacted with the magic of the valley, in patterns that Harry learned to understand after a moment of gazing at them. He wove wards around Woodhouse, and then across the valley, carefully putting them just outside the patterns of magical interaction already present. The wards were to fire, and tighten into impenetrable shields, the moment anyone but him tried to enter, by walking, Apparition, Portkey, Flooing into the house, or on a broom. The last might have been a problem, but by wrapping the wards entirely around the valley, encasing it in a huge bubble, Harry avoided triggering the spells that would have disrupted the intricate communication between Woodhouse and the natural rock and trees.

This was a truly remarkable place, Harry thought, with interest that he knew would increase when he wasn't so bloody exhausted. Whoever had fashioned the original wards was a genius. He would have to study it in more detail later.

"How are we going to get out?" Henrietta asked, with a frown in her voice.

Harry opened his eyes, and saw a sheen of moonlight across the valley, binding them in. He smiled slightly. "We can Apparate out," he said. "But you shouldn't try to Apparate in after this."

Henrietta's eyebrows raised. Harry didn't give her the satisfaction of an answer. He would have to root out the traitor first, before he dared tell the wards who they could let through.

He turned to Narcissa, only to find that she was already taking Honoria into her arms. She nodded to him. Harry relaxed.

To his surprise, what came boiling up as Regulus gathered his spiders, Fawkes fluttered to his shoulder, some of his allies moved to Side-Along Apparate the werewolves, and he gripped his Firebolt, was not relief, or weariness, but rage.

Someone warned them. If not for that, whichever one of my Light allies died would still be alive, and Snape wouldn't nearly have drowned, and Honoria wouldn't have taken that curse. When I find that person, he or she will be lucky if they don't suffer Greyback's fate.

Chapter Thirty: Denouement

"She'll live for now," said Madam Pomfrey softly, pulling the sheet up around Honoria and stepping back from the bed.

Harry nodded. He had to bite his tongue to keep from asking if the mediwitch was sure. She wasn't sure, or she would have said outright that Honoria was going to live. She wouldn't torment him with uncertainty if there was no reason to do so. Besides, Harry had no doubt that Madam Pomfrey would watch throughout the night and try to keep Honoria alive.

He would have watched himself, but Tybalt, John, and Madam Pomfrey were all staying, and there was someone who needed him more. As the matron went to fetch healing potions for Honoria, Harry turned and met Draco's eyes. Draco was hovering near the entrance to the hospital wing, now and then staring at one of the beds as if he would like to collapse into it.

"Come on," Harry said softly, stepping up beside him and offering an arm.

Draco accepted with a single look of gratitude so rich that Harry winced. Merlin, the things that must be running through his mind right now.

Lucius and Narcissa had already left. Lucius had simply given a single, proud smile when Draco told them about using the Unforgivable, and why he'd used it. Narcissa had touched her son's cheek, but looked back and forth between him and Harry, and not spoken a word. Harry was not sure if that meant she didn't think Draco needed to recover, or trusted that Harry would help heal him better than she could.

And that, at least, Harry thought he could do. He'd killed for the first time much more recently than any of the elder Malfoys. They'd be recalling old memories, and probably not much sympathy. They'd try to urge Draco past the fact of this first death before he was ready. Harry would not.

Together, they slowly made their way back to the Slytherin common room. It was late Saturday night, late enough that even the students most bent on excitement had gone to bed, and none of the few slumped in chairs or on couches stirred as Draco and Harry went by. Harry divided his attention between the floor in front of him and Draco's face. It was hard to see either in the low light of the fires.

They reached their bedroom at last. Harry half-feared Blaise would be waiting up to demand an account of the battle—and his reaction to the Killing Curse probably wouldn't be a helpful one for Draco's state of mind—but steady, soft snores came through his curtains. Harry sighed and helped Draco gently into his own bed, then cast a silencing charm and climbed up beside him, kneeling on the sheets rather than getting under them. Draco had his arms wrapped around his chest now, as if he didn't want to be touched. Harry could understand that.

"How do you stand it?" Draco whispered.

Progress. At least he would speak about it, rather than Harry needing to drag it out of him.

Harry said softly, "I found it difficult at first. The one it hit me hardest with was Dragonsbane, but Mulciber was—hard in a different way. I tried all the arguments on myself. Necessity. It was the only way to kill him. He would have hurt other people if I didn't kill him. He was a Death Eater, so I was doing the world a favor."

Draco turned his head inch by inch, until he faced Harry. Harry put out his hand in spite of himself, smoothing it over Draco's forehead and into his hair. Draco sighed, and the tight clutch of his arms around his body relaxed a bit. "And did they work?" he asked.

"No," Harry said.

Draco frowned and started to move as though he would throw off the touch, then subsided under it. "Then how did you live?"

Harry hesitated. He wasn't sure his way would be the best way for Draco to handle the problem.

“Tell me, Harry. Please.”

Harry closed his eyes. “Because pain doesn’t stop, Draco,” he said. “There are always going to be things to be endured. I just—I think most people live, sometimes, like they’re going to get through the pain or the onerous tasks of daily life into some legendary time and place where they can do nothing but relax and drift in bliss. I know that’s not true. The relaxation does end. The onerous tasks are usually life itself, not something to be pushed aside so you can enjoy life. The pain needs to be got through because it just has to. Putting my head down and pushing is the way I live.”

“Or running in front and dragging the rest of us along behind you,” Draco said, with a slight chuckle.

Better than I thought, Harry realized, relaxing. He can joke. How long was it before I felt like doing that after Mulciber? The death of Rodolphus didn’t really count, to Harry’s mind, both because he’d been unconscious for so long afterwards and because he’d had many, many emotions to sort out from that night, not just his slaying of the Death Eater. But for Draco, the dominant impression of this battle would be that he had killed for the first time.

“True,” Harry murmured, and then opened his eyes in startlement as Draco pulled at his arm. “Draco, what—“

“Get under the covers with me,” Draco said. “Please, Harry?”

Moving slowly, because Draco’s earlier attitude had indicated just how little he wanted to be touched, Harry did as he asked. The moment he lay down, Draco rolled over, grabbed him, and held him close, shuddering a bit as his arms wrapped around Harry’s waist and back. Harry forced himself to relax, muscle by muscle, and placed his hand on Draco’s shoulder.

“I can’t entirely regret it,” Draco whispered. “And I think I can put my head down and push through like I need to, Harry, as long as you’re here. If she wasn’t dead, you would be. And I would do anything to prevent that.”

Harry shuddered and tried to rear back slightly. He couldn't move. The warmth pushing in from Draco's body seemed to have inundated his mind as well. He felt flayed, stripped to the bone, seen. He liked it better when Draco concentrated on himself. But he was too close, and too aware of what this meant to Draco, to do anything but meet the gray eyes staring feverishly into his.

"I love you," Draco whispered, and then closed his eyes. Perhaps the closeness was too much for him, too. Or perhaps the warmth and the reassurance and the closeness combined with the battle exhaustion dropped him off. Harry heard him lightly snoring a few moments later.

He waited some time, then tried to move gently away. Draco's arms were so tightly wrapped around him that he couldn't. Harry laid his head back down, and was immediately pulled in even tighter.

Harry swallowed and tried to ignore the prickling of his skin, the instincts screaming at him that he felt too good and needed to move out of danger now. At least he didn't think he was in any danger of going to sleep. He stared over Draco's head at his curtains and the underside of the four-poster, and made himself remember the moment when Greyback had vanished from existence.

At least he had been right. There was that meager comfort. His magic could do such things, and he had been right to run away and recover his temper rather than doing them to Margaret. If he had looked at her right after he knew that she hurt Argutus, would he have spoken her name, commanded her to meet his eyes? Would she have popped out of existence like Greyback did?

And he still didn't regret killing Greyback. But he would have regretted killing her.

He used the hours when he lay there and could do nothing but stare and think to sort through his emotions, carefully tucking them into place, analyzing them and learning what he should do from them. He was powerful. So it behooved him to keep tight, careful control of his power. His anger at the traitor notwithstanding, he wasn't about to march off and start accusing or killing people. He would maintain his secrets instead, question his allies subtly, let them know he was watching, and, next time, use a system of multiple plans, checks, and traps. Or false plans, false attacks, even. See what got reported and what didn't.

He wasn't bound magically to his newest allies—though, after the battles, the bonds of life debts connected him to Ignifer and Honoria, just waiting for them to claim them—but he had made promises it would be awkward and insulting to break off with no explanation. Insult someone badly enough on the suspicion of a breach, have it not be true, and other Dark families would either stay neutral or attack him because of their ties to the person he'd insulted, whether or not they joined the Death Eaters. A misstep in the dance now, just when he was entering the wider arena of politics, was not something he could afford.

So he would restrain himself. He had always known he had to. This simply added another, excellent reason.

Tight and tame and lashed, Harry smoothed out his emotions, and swallowed them, and made them lie still. He didn't sleep, but by the time the sun rose and Draco's arms finally loosened enough for him to crawl out of bed and go back to the hospital wing, he was convinced he'd accomplished something more valuable.

"Mr. Potter?"

Harry started and lifted his head from his cradled arms. He'd sat a few hours' watch by Honoria's bed while Madam Pomfrey got some sleep. Tybalt and John had left for home just after he arrived, still angry and worried, but content to surrender their friend to Harry's eyes and the mediwitch's care. The first thought Harry had, on hearing a voice he didn't immediately recognize, was that it might be John.

But it wasn't. A man with an oddly-accented voice, oddly familiar face, and oddly ragged white-blond hair stood in the doorway of the hospital wing. His eyes were yellow, and fastened on Harry's face with—keenness, was the only way Harry could define the emotion. Keen curiosity? Keen rage? Keen interest? Some of all of those.

“Sir?” Harry asked. “Can I help you?”

“I can help you, and that is the more important question.” Now that the man had recognized him, he seemed to relax, and he certainly had no hesitation about striding further into the hospital wing, drawing up a chair, and sitting down next to Harry. “My name is Paton Opalline. Fergus Opalline was my son.”

Harry shut his eyes and winced. He had confirmed, after they had Apparated back to Hogwarts, that the werewolf who had died in Hawthorn’s attack was Fergus, not Delilah Gloryflower or Claudia Griffinsnest. “I am sorry for your loss, sir,” he said softly. “Do you really still wish to help me?”

There was a reflective pause, and then Paton said, “I see that Fergus told you nothing about his family. Well, he may have been ashamed, though what he became was not his fault. He did—Mr. Potter, would you please open your eyes and look at me? I feel odd talking to your bowed head. I assure you, I do not blame you. Fergus made his choice to fight, and he fell in the doing so, willingly, facing enemies. I am very proud of him.”

Harry blinked and looked up. That’s why his hair is so ragged, he thought. He’s chopped it in mourning for his son. Some of the Light pureblood families did that. “I—I don’t understand, sir. I would have thought you would want to withdraw from the war, to not risk getting any more of your family killed. Besides,” he added, “though I know Fergus wanted to help me because I sent him Wolfsbane, I am unaware of any debt you owe me.”

Paton shook his head. “It’s true that we were planning to keep out of the war at first, because of what we are,” he said. “But now, one of our sons has died for you, Mr. Potter. Blood was given. Willingly.” He paused, but Harry went on staring at him blankly, not knowing what to say. For the first time, he was really regretting not studying the customs of Light pureblood families in depth. He’d spent much more time on the Dark customs, because Lily had simply assumed that the Light wizards would follow Connor automatically, while Harry would need to persuade and bind and convince the Dark ones to become allies. Harry felt very ignorant of everything right at the moment.

The exhaustion and the worry over Honoria probably aren't helping, he thought, wiping at his eyes.

"What are you?" he asked.

Paton smiled. "Old Blood, Mr. Potter. Have you heard of us?"

Harry chased a memory for a moment. But no, though he'd read the term, it had always been in the context of historical background, no more important for him to grasp what was happening in the wizarding world today than the names of Muggle kings nine hundred years ago were. Besides, his greatest historical background was in the First War with Voldemort, the one with Grindelwald, and everything else that might pertain to the struggle of Light and Dark. From what Paton was saying, Old Blood was outside that. "Not enough to know what you're talking about, sir."

Paton smiled more widely and shook back his sleeves. Then he bent his head and breathed on his wrists.

Harry watched in wonder as a glamour he hadn't even sensed melted away, revealing Paton's previously unmarked skin as writhing with tattoos. Harry couldn't see a pattern to them. They were simply endless dark lines, perhaps deep blue or purple or green, twining and intertwining and making their way up his arms until they vanished into his robes. Harry looked up and saw that similar swirls adorned Paton's face. There, though, they seemed to move in harmony with his features, forming dark green concentric circles around his eyes, blossoming into whirls of gold and red on his cheeks, dipping into yellow near his chin and blue on his throat.

"What do those mean, sir?" he asked.

Paton sat back with a shake of his head that moved his ragged hair from side to side, looking half-smug and half-eager to explain. "Old Blood, Mr. Potter. We're part of the fifth dimension of Dark and Light, one that isn't spoken about so much anymore, with all the debates on free will and compulsion. Peace and war,” he elaborated, when Harry looked at him blankly. “We rarely fight in wars. They kill our family. And we don’t like that. We would rather concentrate on growing.”

Harry eyed the tattoos on Paton’s wrists and cheeks. “And those—those represent your family, sir?”

“Yes, they do.” Paton traced one finger over the gold and red rosette on his left cheek. “One line for everyone born with the name of Opalline, or from the womb of a woman who married into another family, or a female descendant of one of those daughters. Our family is very great, Mr. Potter, because we accepted certain limitations on ourselves. At one point, most of the Light families were Old Blood, sworn to peace, not to war. If two wizards did have a conflict, they might fight duels, usually not lethal, and the punishment for killing a pregnant woman was to be Obliviated, turned into a child, and bound to the family the dead woman had come from. That was as violent as we got. Aurum exilis, cognatio abundans, has been the Opalline motto for sixteen hundred years, the length of time we have been sworn to the Light and have been Old Blood. In gold poor, in blood rich.”

Harry tried to imagine the amount of children a long-lived Light wizarding family intent on producing more children and avoiding conflict might have, and failed. “Why did the other Light families turn away from being Old Blood?”

Paton shrugged, though his face darkened with a shadow of old anger. “They wanted money, political power, vengeance—to be able to challenge the Dark pureblooded families on their own ground. Of course there are not as many riches when we give the money we accumulate towards the upkeep, rescue, saving, and protection of our own family, and when we are so many. But we are still Old Blood. We have not abandoned our vows, and in return for that, we have a deep connection such as the others will never understand. There are Opallines everywhere, Mr. Potter. And now that one of our own has willingly given his blood to your cause, we consider you an honorary family member. Blood shed over you rather than blood running through your veins, if you will.”

Harry shook his head slightly. "But if you can't fight—"

"I did think you would see it as soon as I mentioned it, Mr. Potter." Paton gave him a deep smile, eyes narrowed and smug. "We are everywhere, and of course everyone knows that relatives gossip. And most of our enemies are unaware of just how connected we stay. Our spy network is unparalleled." He tipped his head. "That is what I intend to give you access to, Mr. Potter—cousins and second cousins, siblings and half-siblings, children and parents bound together all over Great Britain, Ireland, and Europe. We originated on the Isle of Man, and that is still my seat as family leader, but we did not stay there."

That's his accent, then. He's Manx. Harry grabbed and held on to that bit of knowledge. He wanted to hold on to something in the sliding mist of fatigue his mind had become.

"Your offer is wonderfully generous, sir," he said.

Paton shook his head. "It is only what you should have, now. When you sent the Wolfsbane, you gave our son the ability to choose peace once again. For that, we would have to thank you. But then he died in a chosen battle, using the beast's form and the savagery that he could not help having to fulfill a goal of the Light. Mr. Potter, that makes you a part of our family. You enabled Fergus to make himself useful and good, instead of sinking into despair."

"I didn't know I was doing it," Harry muttered. He looked over at Honoria to disguise the expression on his face, but had the feeling Paton could still see his blush. Honoria breathed on, oblivious. Harry found himself envying her.

"But that is what makes you worthy of this gift," said Paton. "I wanted to tell you this, Mr. Potter. We would only fight to defend ourselves—and even then, we prefer to avoid Dark Arts and other magic that would break our vows—but you are one of us, and we can certainly spy for you." He stood. "Are there any other questions that you wish to ask me?"

"I—no." Harry thought about saying that he was the one responsible for Fergus's death, but he doubted that Paton would take that well. And perhaps it was the enemy werewolves who were responsible. Perhaps he could learn to think like that. "Thank you for coming, sir."

"I will mourn Fergus forever," Paton said softly. "But I have the living to think of first, all my family. And that includes you now, Mr. Potter. Our letters are open to you, and our hearths and homes, should you ever need them." He hesitated, and Harry found himself wondering what else the man had to say.

He found out when Paton began in a low, faltering voice.

"Mr. Potter, I have no idea how you truly feel on the matter, as I no longer trust the Daily Prophet to report the truth, if it ever did. But my family possesses spells that set aright the wrongs between blood kin. That includes spells that punish parents who do the hideous things that your parents did to you."

Harry jerked his head up. "Would the Wizengamot or the Ministry consider those spells sufficient punishment to forego execution or imprisonment?"

"They would not," Paton said. "These spells are means of personal redress, Mr. Potter, justice, not vengeance and not legality."

"Then, thank you, but no," said Harry, turning away and leaning down near Honoria's bed again. He told himself there was a slight change in her breathing. It had sped up a little. Was that a good thing? He would have to ask Madam Pomfrey. He would have to learn medical magic. He didn't want to just kill and wish people out of existence. "I will contact you for other things, though, Mr. Opalline."

"I understand," said Paton. "They are still your blood." Harry heard him breathe again, probably to erase the tattoos and restore the glamour, and then his hand glanced over Harry's shoulder. "Should you ever change your mind, I would be most happy to teach you the spells myself."

Harry just nodded, not trusting himself to speak, and Paton turned and left.

Harry tugged the blanket up over Honoria and then went to fetch one of Madam Pomfrey's books. He wanted the mediwitch to get some more sleep, still. He might as well use the time for something productive, and begin to study on the means of combating the wounds left by battle curses.

"Harry. Are you quite well? You look exhausted."

Harry froze for a moment as Narcissa's arms closed around him in a tight hug, but then forced himself to relax. He'd sat by Honoria's bed most of the morning, until Madam Pomfrey awakened, and then left and contacted Narcissa. On the way, and while he waited for her, he avoided Connor, Snape, Draco—assuming Draco was awake yet—and others who could have told that he hadn't slept. They would only tell him to go to bed, which wasn't useful. He hadn't realized Narcissa, who, after all, had seen him just last night, could tell.

"I've been to bed, Mrs. Malfoy," he said, which was perfectly true, and then sat down in the chair facing hers. McGonagall had granted them the use of a small anteroom usually used for private talks between professors and seventh-year students who were going into their fields on leaving Hogwarts. "I wanted to talk to you about the attack last night, and who might have betrayed us." He'd thought about it, and decided there was no ways that Narcissa was the traitor. She might abandon him, but she would never abandon or endanger Draco.

Narcissa sat down, eyes still fixed on his face in a way Harry didn't much like. "You want my opinion on our allies?"

Harry sighed. "Yes. I am tempted to suspect Henrietta Bulstrode, since her magic is so strong she could practically count on surviving the battle no matter how much danger she put herself in, and I distrust her. But perhaps I am letting personal motives blind me."

"Perhaps," Narcissa murmured. "I will tell you the reasons I brought them into the alliance, Harry. Perhaps that will help."

“Honorina Peverley is a skilled illusionist, deeper than she lets on, and more useful. I think you saw that last night,” she added dryly. “I wanted her for her fighting skill, and to show some of the people who might hesitate to join an army of purebloods that you were not at all averse to fighting beside halfbloods and Gryffindors. Igniter Apollonis, much the same. When she once fixes her loyalty, she does not change her mind easily. She’s resisted entreaties from her family for more than a decade to change her allegiance back, resisted a sterility curse, resisted all the impulses of her childhood telling her that Dark wizards were evil. And she serves as a useful symbol of the alliance’s fluid nature.”

Narcissa leaned back and closed her eyes. “Those were my easy choices. Charles Rosier-Henlin—there was the risk that he might not like you, or might decide that you were not strong enough. But he has invented several new spells that I know of, and I respect his hidden strength. And I think that he is now firmly committed to you.

“Thomas Rhanvara is intelligent, capable of research that might serve us well, a good persuader, and in contact with wizards in India who might be useful if the Dark Lord takes the fight to other countries. Also, his wife Priscilla is a good eye on affairs in the Ministry.

“Mortimer Belville is more important for his family than himself. Speaking of which,” Narcissa added abruptly, opening her eyes and reaching into her robe, “I have letters from the Belville family for you. The battle last night impressed them; it is the kind of test they have been waiting for you to pass.” Harry accepted the letters, wishing he did not feel so much as if they might bite, and nodded. “Edward Burke’s cousins are rich, and there is at least the chance that they will pass money and information along, now that they have seen how well you treat their most annoying relative. They have written you as well.” Narcissa gave him another envelope.

“And Henrietta?” Harry asked quietly.

Narcissa hesitated for a long moment. Then she said, “Harry, I feared that people would think us weak if I did not approach her. She is too obvious a candidate to omit from an alliance, especially one that already contained her second cousin Adalrico. There is a reason that the Dark Lord tried to recruit her. Powerful in magic, notorious for acting in her own interest most of the time but giving everything for those causes she adopts as her own—did you know that she saved Elfrida's life?"

Harry blinked, once or twice. Then he said, "No."

Narcissa nodded. "Adalrico had angered another Death Eater. I still don't know for certain which one. In those days, I tried to avoid Death Eater talk and business as much as possible, not wanting Lucius's Lord to think I should be Marked. At any rate, he invaded Adalrico's house and tried to kidnap or kill Elfrida while she was pregnant with Millicent. Henrietta, however, likes Elfrida, even if that does not extend to liking all the things Elfrida values. She had set up spells to warn her of such an occurrence, unlikely as it might seem to happen. She arrived in some manner that was not Apparating—Adalrico has never been able to explain that to me properly—and utterly destroyed the Death Eater. Adalrico told me that he found a layer of flesh, blood, and bone exactly one inch thick coating every surface of a particular room."

Harry winced. He didn't know what Dark magic Henrietta might have used to achieve that particular effect, but he could envision the results all too well. "I had no idea she liked Elfrida."

Narcissa shrugged. "She sees no reason to announce it. But I thought that was another reason she might agree to join us, once she heard that Elfrida was in the alliance and bound to you formally. She is extremely dangerous, Harry. I will not lie to you about that. She will find every way of fighting a bridle and rein that she can. But if she decides that she likes you, there is no one I would trust more at your back."

"Not Draco?"

Narcissa smiled slightly. "My son is a special case. Draco more, then. But no one else. She is magically stronger than Lucius, and more deadly than Severus, because she does not possess his scruples. I think it extremely probable that she might have betrayed you, though I did not believe she would go quite this far. But if she did, it was likely as part of a test. If you pass the test, she will be a step closer to deciding to join with us completely.”

Harry frowned. “There were odd gaps in the counterattack,” he said. “They only sent seven flyers up to strike at us, and I would think there would be more, since Henrietta was there, and they’d want someone to counter her as well as me. I’m surprised Karkaroff didn’t come himself.”

Narcissa nodded. “They took out the Muggles, but they did not lay an effective ambush. Curious, when they seemed to know most of the details of our attack. They were not surprised by the fact that we struck from three directions, for example. And they sent inexperienced werewolves to face Hawthorn and the others, when they should have had Greyback and his mate there.” Harry flinched at the mention of Greyback’s name, but Narcissa didn’t seem to notice. “Perhaps, Harry, the traitor left deliberate gaps in his or her communication.”

“But we can’t know that, can we?”

Narcissa bowed her head. “No. We can’t. Perhaps it was someone who meant to betray us, but was simply ineffective about doing so.”

Harry scowled. He couldn’t think who would have done that. Some of his allies were more intelligent than the others, there was no doubt about that, but they’d all been present at the meeting and known the details of the attack on Woodhouse. They could have given all sorts of damaging information away. Karkaroff, with advance notice and the time to summon more Death Eaters to the site of the battle than Harry would have fighters, should have crushed them. Harry’s magic might have been the only thing to tip the balance.

Perhaps the ineffectiveness was on Voldemort’s side, he conceded. But there is no way to know that, either.

“I’ll be constructing some double blinds,” he told Narcissa. “But you think there is no one I should remove from the alliance just yet?”

“That is your choice, Harry,” Narcissa murmured. “Now, for example, that Burke’s and Belville’s families have responded to you, you could remove them from the alliance by a few slow and careful rituals. I would not recommend doing that with Henrietta. She would take it as an insult, and she would almost certainly strike at Draco or your brother in retaliation.”

Harry gnawed his lip for a moment. Burke and Belville were both good enough fighters to go into two battles and come away unscathed. He supposed he should at least consider retaining them for that.

But if one of them betrayed us, got Honoria injured and Fergus killed...

Harry swallowed and shoved down the rage. He really did just want to let go, to let his fury-filled magic fly, or to haul the likely suspects in and use Veritaserum on them, but he recognized the lure, and the danger, of that path. Those were the kinds of decisions Dumbledore had made, when he first decided to start sacrificing principle and conscience to necessity. Harry would not walk in his footsteps.

“Double-blind for now,” he told Narcissa. “I’ll tell them I’m planning an attack I’m really not, and see if I can catch them out by what Voldemort’s forces do in response to that information.”

“That is probably for the best,” Narcissa said, and sighed. “At least I can say that I do not suspect our Light allies. Laura Gloryflower would be incapable of an act that endangered fighters of your age, and Hawthorn will vouch for her fellow werewolves.”

Harry nodded. “Thank you, Mrs. Malfoy.”

“Narcissa, Harry. I did grant you permission to call me by my first name.” Narcissa’s voice was abruptly full of compassion. “You do not yet feel comfortable enough to do so consistently. I have faith that you comforted my son after the battle. Did anyone comfort you, Harry?”

Harry stiffened and lifted his head. “Of course, madam. Draco did.”

Narcissa studied his eyes. Harry stared back. What he said was nothing but the truth, and he willed her to see that.

"You always get more formal when you want to shut someone out, Harry," Narcissa said.

Harry clamped down on his shifting emotions, the impulses to get angry or explode into denial. They were only the results of his exhaustion following a long night of battle. "I'm sorry, Mrs. Malfoy," he said. "I am tired, I'll not deny that, but I am glad that as many of us survived unscathed as did, and I'll be happier having something like the traitor's identity to dig into. How is the burn on your shoulder?" he asked, deliberately shifting the subject.

"Healed already. Poppy Pomfrey is a wonder with a wand." Narcissa stood and hugged him again before he could move away. "Please promise me that you'll slow down a bit today, Harry," she murmured into his ear. "Your health is very important to all of us."

Since Harry had nothing more strenuous planned than a little more watching by Honoria's bedside, he nodded readily. "I will, Mrs. Malfoy."

Narcissa kissed the top of his head and stood to seek out the Floo connection she'd used to enter Hogwarts. Harry stood to make his way to the hospital wing.

...must remember that mediwizardry on the Slicing Curse is delicate work. There is typically so much knit skin to be stitched together, and such significant blood loss, that several people are necessary to save a victim's life, unless he or she is brought immediately to the attention of a mediwitch or Lord-level wizard skilled in the healing arts.

Harry scowled over the top of the book at Honoria. "You were damn lucky," he told her. "And I need to learn more about healing magic."

"Harry!"

Before he could even put the book down, Connor engulfed him in a hug. Harry hugged him back, more than a little startled. It was true he hadn't seen his brother so far that day, but it was only noon as yet, and he assumed that Connor would have gone to get news of the battle from someone else if he were already awake. Otherwise, he really would have had a faceful of excited brother some time earlier.

"How did the battle go?" Connor demanded in a low voice. "Is she a casualty?" He glanced sideways at Honoria with a look of undisguised curiosity.

Harry nodded, his heart lightened by Connor's presence. His brother was still a child in important ways, hence Harry's leaving him behind, but he was also alive in an impatient, restless manner that tugged Harry out of himself entirely. "Yes. She took the Slicing Curse for me." Connor shuddered and turned slightly green, no doubt remembering his own experience with that one. "As for how it went, well, the werewolves went in first, the way I told you they would—"

He talked for several minutes, doing what he could to piece together his disjointed impressions and the fact that he had to surmise, not just tell, what some of his allies had been doing, since he didn't know for sure. Connor divided his attention between Honoria and him. His face likewise alternated expressions, awe and shock and envy.

When he got to the part about wishing Greyback out of existence, Harry hesitated, but then plunged on. If he couldn't tell his brother about it, then who, out of the people who hadn't been on the battlefield, could he tell?

"You just wished him gone, and he was?" Connor stared at him, the sunlight through the windows turning his hazel eyes to sparks of shocked fire.

Harry nodded.

"But that's—" Connor shook his head. "Could Voldemort do that?"

"I don't know." Harry stifled a yawn. "Maybe he could, but he prefers to do other things instead. After all, Greyback didn't bleed to death or leave a surprised-looking corpse, and sometimes those seem to be Voldemort's main criteria for a nasty spell."

"Tell me more!" Connor leaned on Honoria's bed and listened to him.

Harry had just about finished the attack when Honoria took a jolting breath. Harry sat up at once. "Madam Pomfrey!" he called.

The mediwitch came bustling in, took one look at Honoria, and smiled. "There she is," she said. "Her body's magic has joined in fighting the Slicing Curse. She'll live, Mr. Potter."

Harry closed his eyes as a wash of deep, rich gratitude overtook him. "Thank Merlin," he whispered. "Can I let Tybalt Starrise and John Smythe-Blyton know, madam?"

"Only if you tell them to stay at home." Madam Pomfrey shook her head chidingly at him. "She won't be able to have that many visitors for a day or two yet. In fact, now that she's rounded the corner, I'll have to ask you boys to leave."

Harry held up his book as he clambered out of the chair. "And I can borrow this?"

Madam Pomfrey looked at him quite oddly, as if she found his choice of reading material strange, but nodded. Harry stood, stretched, and headed to the Owlery, so that he could send Hedwig with the message. Connor bounced beside him, silent but obviously full of the battle.

"Harry," he said, when they were about halfway up the Owlery steps.

"Hmmm?" Harry was busy thinking about Slicing Curses and shields to counteract them. One thing that made them so dangerous was the expanse of the spell, the invisible blade that sliced a wizard or witch with wide wounds, and could completely evade a narrow Haurio shield not placed just right, or even most Protego ones. Harry thought there ought to be a way around that. Maybe a potion would work better than a shield.

“Do you think I’ll be able to follow you to the next battle?”

Harry turned and leaned against the wall. He should really eat something, he supposed. Lack of food and sleep, the heavy book, and the running around he’d done made him dizzy. But right now, he needed to fix all his concentration on Connor’s face, and give him an honest answer.

“I don’t think so,” he said. “Not yet.”

“I did learn a few new spells with Snape,” Connor protested.

“I know. But not yet.”

“When?”

Harry thought. It wouldn’t be fair to set a marker of his brother besting himself or Snape, or even someone else. Harry didn’t know how well Remus’s skill, for example, compared to the average Death Eater. He was not about to let Connor die just because he could beat Remus but couldn’t beat Karkaroff. There was someone’s word he could trust, though, as long as Harry talked to him about it.

“When Snape says you’re ready.”

Connor’s face fell. “He won’t. He hates me. The way he treated me in our Friday session—“

“How?” Harry snapped, straightening. Damn it, I asked for this thinking they’d be able to work it out. Connor comes around if you treat him fairly, and Snape cares enough for me that I assumed he’d try. “What did he say?”

“Called me a child. Said I wasn’t ready. Took points off Gryffindor for not trying, when I was trying as hard as I could.” Connor clenched his fists and scowled.

Harry adjusted the hold of his left arm around the book and sighed, his anger draining. “Connor, he says things like that all the time in Potions class, and you can ignore him there. The thing is, he really thinks you aren't trying. He told me that."

"But I am!"

"I know," Harry said soothingly. "I'll speak to him and tell him that, but for right now, you should probably ignore him. If he gets more cutting, then I'll speak to him again. I promise. All right?"

Connor muttered something, then said, "It's just that I love you, Harry, and want to be there for you." He looked up with an unhappy expression that made Harry's heart melt. He tossed the heavy book in the air, let a Levitation Charm catch it, and looped an arm around Connor's shoulders as they walked the rest of the way up to the Owlery.

"I know," he said. "I do know that, Connor." Merlin, how hard it must be to just assume you'd have a role in the war and then get spanked by the near-loss of your brother in your first battle. And I was the one who put him through that pain that I suffered when Honoria was dying. "And I promise that the chance will come soon. But I love you, too, and I want you to be safe. All right?" He put his hand on his brother's shoulder, turning Connor to face him.

Connor nodded, jaw set. Harry hoped he was resolving to work harder and not to annoy Snape.

He called Hedwig down and asked her to carry a message to Tybalt, smiling as she hooted in the affirmative. He borrowed quill and parchment from Connor, since he was so brilliant he'd forgotten to bring them, and scribbled a quick note, including the warning from Madam Pomfrey. Of course, Tybalt had been a Gryffindor, so he probably wouldn't heed it, but Harry had done what he could.

He'd just lifted his arm for Hedwig to fly away when an unfamiliar owl circled down to him. Connor glanced over curiously from the other side of the room, where he was playing with Godric, his black eagle-owl.

"Who's that from?"

Harry shook his head, frowning. The envelope was blank, and the owl took off the moment he freed the message, without waiting for a reply. Harry murmured, "Finite Incantatem," and concentrated hard on the letter, looking for any trace of magic, any charm or glamour that might hide something nasty. In the end, he hovered it in front of his face and tugged it open without using his hand.

The envelope contained a folded piece of parchment and a smaller one. Harry caught the note as it fluttered to the floor, and raised his eyebrows at the writing on it.

Should you wish to reply, simply send an owl with your answer to the Department of Magical Law Enforcement. It will reach its destination.

Unsigned, and the hand wasn't familiar. Harry frowned and turned to the letter itself.

He had only to read the first two words before he stopped, his heartbeat sounding in his ears like a slap. He knew that hand, well enough.

"Harry?" Connor was moving towards him now, one hand out. "You've gone pale."

Harry shook his head and used his magic to fold the letter tightly, into a small ball. "From Evan Rosier again," he said dully. "Another useless warning, bragging about how he would have commanded the battle. I don't want to read it right now."

Connor's face softened. "Probably wise."

Harry nodded, and tossed the ball of the letter casually behind him. Another Levitation Charm caught it and slid it into his robe pocket. He managed to carry on the pretense of a normal conversation with Connor, and even go down to lunch with him, though he was aware of the letter all the while, burning like an Ashwinder egg against his hip.

The letter was from James.

Harry had no idea what to do with it.

Chapter Thirty-One: Snape Is a Git

Snape was happily criticizing Hermione Granger's Draught of Peace—it was rare that the know-it-all Gryffindor made a mistake, and he thought it was beneficial for her to hear his opinion when she did—when Harry's cauldron exploded.

Snape whipped around, staring, though his eyes quickly narrowed. The atmosphere around Harry had grown more and more tense this week, building up to a physical and magical attack by several people Harry refused to name as he was coming back to the Slytherin dungeons on Wednesday. Harry had said only that he'd hexed them with results that wouldn't become visible unless they attacked him again. It was the kind of thing that threatened to drive Snape quite mad.

But if someone had made Harry's cauldron explode in the middle of Potions, where Snape could take House points off the perpetrator—

It seemed that no one had, though. Harry stared at the cauldron and wiped at the mixture of hellebore and powdered moonstone that covered him. Snape doubted he would have been so unobservant as not to see whatever trick or mismatched ingredient had dropped into the potion, and where it had come from.

On the other hand, the idea that he had made a mistake was even more inconceivable, considering that Harry had already mastered O.W.L.-standard potions, like this one, with ease.

"Potter!" Snape barked.

Harry looked up at him, still blinking.

"Do you know what mistake you made?" Snape said that even as he looked into Harry's eyes, instinctively using Legilimency as he did so, searching for some sign of a name. Harry looked down and broke the contact of their gaze, but not before Snape had seen intense, gnawing worry, of the kind that he'd had no idea Harry was feeling.

"I stirred in the moonstone in large clumps, sir, and didn't watch them well enough," said Harry quietly. "They stuck together, and then they reacted badly with the syrup. I'm sorry."

Snape frowned. It was the same error Finch-Fletchley had made five minutes ago, resulting in him having to leave the class. At least Harry hadn't taken the blast of the potion full in the eyes. "Clean this up and brew it again," he said, and turned away. He wasn't about to take points from Slytherin, especially when Harry hadn't made a mistake like this before.

The Ravenclaws in the back of the room muttered, but shut up when Snape glared at them. That House was still the most hostile to Harry, and Snape was of the private opinion that the people who had attacked Harry on Wednesday were Ravenclaws—though, of course, he didn't know that for certain, as Harry refused to give them away. Snape had tried to watch for subdued Ravenclaws on Thursday, but everyone was subdued in his classes, so that didn't help.

Now, though, he had a candidate for the mistake. Harry's own worry had probably caused him to focus more on internal matters than the moonstone clumps. Now Snape had only to find out what he was worried about. Harry was coming to talk to him after Connor Potter's dueling session that evening. Snape would be as patient as he could, but he was determined to get the truth out of Harry.

When he can't make Potions, something is seriously wrong. "Come," said Snape, eyeing the door in resignation. The clock said five minutes after eight, and he had entertained the hopeful vision that Potter might not show up that evening. Then he could have the double pleasure of catching up on his marking and giving Harry's brother detention later.

I will take my pleasures where I must, he thought, as the door opened and Potter stepped inside. "You are late," he said. "Five points from Gryffindor."

Potter trembled for a long moment. Snape sneered and watched him. Strange how the son who looked less like the father had come to represent the hated James Potter more for him. Snape saw the same deficiencies in Harry's brother as in James—the quick enthusiasm at the start of a project that faded when he had to put effort forward, the tendency to sway to others' opinions, the foolish bravery that meant he dreamed more of going into battle than the training necessary to prepare for it or the consequences of what followed after.

Slytherins are more sensible. We think of survival before glory. Snape stood and drew his wand. "No explanation for your lateness, Potter?" he asked.

"I lost track of time," said Potter, and then added, "Sir," as if he had needed to think of the sentence in discrete pieces. Given how slow his thoughts moved, Snape thought that entirely possible.

"I see," said Snape. "Perhaps I should give you a means of keeping track of it, then." He flicked his wand, ignoring Potter's efforts to raise a shield. He was adequate at the Protego, but he hadn't yet learned the anticipation that should let him have it up before his enemy launched the spell it was meant to deflect. "Densaugeo!"

The curse, of course, hit Potter, because when did he ever have a shield up in time? Snape was glad, for the first time, that he was not teaching Defense Against the Dark Arts, though he was sure he would have prepared the students better than Lestrage, who concentrated too intensely on philosophy. He could not have stood to see Potter fail day after day.

He watched clinically as Potter's teeth enlarged, extending almost down to his chin before they stopped growing. "A simple curse, Mr. Potter," he said. "And yet it prevents you from intoning some spells clearly. Your enemy can use it to stop you while he finds a stronger spell that you may be not prepared to counteract. And to insure that you pay attention, you will be left like that until the end of our class or until you manage the countercurse, whichever comes first."

Potter glared at him again, and Snape felt the first hatching tingles of power attacking the air around him. He raised an eyebrow. He had not thought the boy capable of wandless magic at all, and perhaps he was not. This could be the instinctive anger response of any wizard of this age cornered in an unfair situation, provided he was powerful enough to leak anything beyond his body.

The boy does have potential. But he refuses to exercise it. He wants to argue, to have a sense of fair play, to work through demonstration after demonstration instead of realizing that I am training him for war. Snape clamped his teeth together to keep from saying something about that.

Potter muttered something, carefully keeping his tongue back from his teeth, and a Tripping Jinx formed and flew at Snape. Snape created a Haurio shield without a thought and captured it.

“Stronger spells,” he said. “Unless you are content to make your enemy dance a jig while he tries to slice you open. Confundo!”

Potter promptly staggered, eyes going glassy. Snape felt free to shut his own eyes and give a long, gusty sigh, since he knew that Potter, under the influence of the Confundus Charm, was in no state to notice. Stars above, how in the world am I going to train him? Much fun as mocking and taunting the Gryffindor was, much as he sometimes wanted to hurt him for having grown up with love in the same household where Harry had known nothing but manipulation, he wanted a strategy that worked. Trying to humiliate him didn't inspire Potter to focus his wandless magic. Offering explanations did nothing; Snape had explained over and over in every session the importance of creating a shield at once, and still the boy didn't listen. Insults and belittling, the technique he used in Potions, self-evidently didn't work.

I want to succeed at this, he realized abruptly. Just as I wished to act on emotions rather than my grudge against James Bloody Potter. I want to be able to train Connor Potter for Harry's sake.

Grimacing, sickened at the thought of how sappy that sounded, Snape turned back to Potter. He would not remove the Densaugeo curse, for now; he had said he would leave it on, and he didn't want Potter to think he didn't keep his word. But he lifted the Charm, and Potter blinked in several directions, then blushed hotly.

Snape ignored that. "You see that a spell does not have to be an Unforgivable to confuse the victim," he said. "Many people, when Confounded, will do things that they otherwise will not do. There is a shield that can be worked into the hair around the skull to defeat such mental magic. It is difficult, but I believe you have the raw power to do it." And how that galled his tongue, but it was true. Snape could have been more patient if Potter was weak. He was not, though nowhere near as strong as Harry or Draco or even the Granger girl.

Instead, he was strong, and did nothing.

Snape stopped the path of that thought. Potter was already looking at him as if he had grown a second head. A moment later, he said, voice slightly blurred by his elongated teeth, "But why would you do that? You hate me."

"I am doing it for the sake of the war," said Snape, deciding that Potter did not need the comparison to his brother for right now. See, Harry, I can be careful of the brat's feelings when I try. "I will show you the spell. I know that we can work together, Potter," he added, throwing caution to the winds. "You proved that when you showed me the letter your father had written to you, and said that you wanted me to use that as evidence in charging your parents with the abuse of your brother."

Potter shook his head. "That was about Harry," he said. "This is about me, and I don't think you're really trying to get over your hatred of Gryffindors. At least Harry's in your House."

Snape had never responded well to self-pity in Gryffindor voices, and he did not do it now. "I want competent students to train, Potter," he said. "I know that I am not going to get them in Potions. Most of you are too impatient, too unintelligent to respect the finer points of the art."

Potter had the nerve to roll his eyes at him. "And I suppose that's why you criticize Hermione all the time, too," he said. "Because she only thinks she's smart, and not because she's a Gryffindor."

“She responds to the pushing,” said Snape coldly. “In this class, I know that you can do more than you are doing right now. I insist that you do it. Have a shield raised when you come through the door, you stupid boy. Accept the help of specific spells. Be aware that I will strike at you, and strike again and again, and that my strikes are still more measured than you will encounter in battle. Part of any wizard’s duel, or a meeting between two wizards in the field, is creativity. Some call it by other names, speed or imagination or intelligence. But I have seen quite dim wizards take out stronger and more intelligent ones—“ luckily, he wanted to say, or you would have no chance at all “—because they were better able to anticipate their opponent’s spells, and come up with ones that they had no counter to.”

“Like Quidditch,” said Potter. “And anticipating the dodges of the Snitch.”

Snape beat down the urge to roll his eyes in turn. Whatever analogies the brat needed... “Yes,” he said.

“But I have instincts there,” said Potter. “I don’t know what to do in a duel yet. That’s what you’re supposed to teach me.” He gestured at his long teeth. “Not just curse me and leave me like this.”

Snape laughed, and saw Potter flinch. Well, he’d meant to make him do that. His laughter was not a kind thing. “Death Eaters will leave curses on you that will make this look like a love tap, Potter,” he said. “And they will last days, not hours.”

“That’s why I’m here!” Potter shouted at him, and Snape really had to repress a snort at the way he sounded. “Because I want to know how to resist that. You’re supposed to be teaching me that, too.”

Snape drew in one breath, and then another. When he spoke, his voice was cold and soft, and Potter leaned closer to hear in spite of himself. “I know what I should teach you, Potter. I am perfectly aware of how to survive a war. I fought in the first stage of the one you seem so determined to win. And I will teach you with the methods that I deem to have the best chance of success.”

“Really?” Potter folded his arms. “None of them seem to have worked well so far.”

Snape told himself that Harry would not understand if he Transfigured the stubborn imbecile into a stick of celery and cut him up for use in a Fresh-Breath Potion, no matter how tempting it was. “Stop being afraid of failure, you stupid boy,” he said. “Stop thinking you know everything already. Stop concentrating on your hatred of me, and instead trust that I know what I’m talking about. So long as you have some other goal in mind than mastering this magic, your wandless power remains caged, and your focus is poor.”

Potter perked up. “I could do wandless magic?”

“Perhaps,” said Snape, stressing the word. In truth, he was not sure that the power hovering around Potter’s body indicated the ability to work wandlessly. Sometimes the magic never did manage to narrow down to the single point needed to do even the simplest of spells. Potter might just have raw potential instead, meaning that his curses would be unusually powerful, or a talent like Parseltongue hiding and waiting to be discovered. “But you will never know if you do not trust me and work with me.”

“Can you do wandless magic?”

Snape was not about to entrust a secret like that to a loose-tongued Gryffindor. “I have seen Dumbledore do it,” he said instead. “And Harry.”

Potter’s eyes lowered, but not before Snape had seen the conflicting emotions in them—love, and jealousy, and longing.

Envy his brother, does he? Snape fought the urge to snort. I imagine he has forgotten the details of the abuse. He sees only the end result. Something should happen to remind him shortly.

He saw no point in bringing it up right now, though. He wanted to actually accomplish something with this training session, so that irritation with it would not clog up his mind when he spoke to Harry at nine o’clock. “Shall we continue?” he asked, picking up his wand.

“How did it go?”

Snape kept his back turned to Harry for the moment, while he ordered tea through his fireplace. He could hear Harry settling into the chair on the other side of the room, and then shifting uneasily around for a moment. Harry always did that when they met in his private rooms, as though he were bewildered by the lack of places to hide.

Snape turned around and met his ward's eyes, though he saw nothing as revealing on the surface of his mind as he had seen in Potions. Harry had his Occlumency shields up now, hiding his thoughts. Snape resisted the impulse to snarl. He was the one who had taught Harry to do that, after all. “Your brother is impatient, and wants to join battle already,” he said.

“Yes, I thought of that after Sunday.” Harry leaned back in the chair with a pensive frown. “He sounded as though he wanted to go along to battle without really understanding what it was about. And I thought he would have got some idea, after he went with us to the beach.”

“And did absolutely nothing,” Snape pointed out, taking his own seat on the couch. A house elf appeared a moment later with two cups of tea, one of which Snape accepted with a grateful sigh. Harry shook his head when the elf tried to offer him the other one. Snape frowned, but let it pass. Harry was in one of his vates moods, that was obvious.

“Maybe that's it, then,” Harry said. “Maybe he wants to prove himself, not just get glory. Connor's always more stubborn about making up for a past failure than about making a new stride.” Snape listened in silence to the fondness in his voice. He had to wonder if Harry would have cared about Connor at all without the forced affection from his training. They were simply too different, and Harry spent most of a conversation about him forgiving or excusing his brother's faults. “How is he progressing?”

“Not well,” Snape said. “He wants to do more than he is currently able to. He accuses me of being unfair. He thinks he knows better about what I should teach than I do.”

“And you’re never unfair?” Harry asked that in a wry tone, but his gaze was anxious. Snape knew Harry would accept what he said, and so he answered with the truth.

“I very often heap insults on his House in my mind, but only in my mind. The worst I have ever called him is a stupid boy.”

“Professor—”

“You came to me for help in training your brother, Harry,” Snape broke in. “That does not mean I can change my nature.”

Harry sighed. “I know. Just—I think I should speak to him. I assure you he is trying, but he probably doesn’t think the same thing about you. May I mention some of the knowledge you have to him, so that he knows you’re definitely the best candidate for teaching him?”

“Do not mention that I can do wandless magic when I am angry. That is a weapon I prefer to keep to myself.”

Harry nodded. “I won’t.” His hand moved down to pat a pocket of his robe in what looked like a habitual nervous gesture. Snape’s eyes narrowed. If that is a nervous habit, it is a newly-acquired one.

Harry drew his hand back in the next moment, and said, “I suppose we should work on blocking the scar connection. I’m still getting flashes of dreams from Voldemort—nothing definite now, but for all I know, he could overpower my mind whenever he wants. And he’s getting stronger again.” His face reflected grim resignation for just a moment, and then that dropped away and he simply looked anxious. “What do you suggest I envision for a shield, Professor?”

“Something light and flexible,” Snape murmured, staring at Harry’s robe pocket as if that could make the cloth transparent. A small object; it didn’t make the pocket appear unnatural. “Perhaps the quicksilver of an Occlumency pool will be best.”

“Grass?”

Snape brought his eyes back to Harry's. "Why that?"

Harry hesitated too long, and then said, with too much force and brightness, "We flew over long grass when we brought the brooms down near Woodhouse. I keep remembering the way it swayed in the wind, but hid the werewolves crouching in it. I want a barrier that can move, but will conceal what's on the other side of the scar connection from Voldemort."

Reluctantly, Snape nodded. He wondered if the association with grass—or the memory of the werewolves springing?—was what troubled Harry, but he would not yet ask. It was absolutely imperative that Harry block the scar connection first. Then, if that relaxed him enough, Snape would try to get him to talk about whatever was bothering him.

"Legilimens," he murmured, eyes locked on Harry's, and then he slid forward and into the welcoming darkness of air around a steel skeleton covered with the thick, bushy leaves of emotions.

Harry showed him the scar connection, a twisting void between two of the metallic branches, communicating the dimensions of the tunnel and how hard it was to block without words. Snape answered in the same way, showing, rather than explaining, how to weave a thin, flexible barrier across the opening. It was similar to an Occlumency pool, but Harry could retrieve his emotions from those at a moment's notice. This had to be a little less responsive to the Occlumens's will, so as not to open and expose the thing it barricaded during normal dreaming. Now that Snape thought about it, a visualization of grass would work very well. It moved with the wind, but it took a lot of wind, or the work of digging hands, to uproot it.

Harry spun soil into being, and lowered the long blades gently into place, spanning the whole of that starless pit that bound him to the Dark Lord. Then the skeleton shifted a bit, reaching out and grasping the sides of the hole so as to provide a resting place for the grass. Snape nodded. It was a good practice, one of the reasons that wizards' minds were so often of a piece, like a single house or forest, rather than a hodgepodge of unconnected pieces; if the barrier looked too unnatural, it would be harder for Harry to imagine and maintain.

Snape floated backward, withdrawing from Harry's mind, and then caught another glimpse of that dark worry again, thrusting through the Occlumency pool that had tried to contain it like reeds through shallow water.

He hesitated, then reached out and explored the edges of it. He would not try to learn specific details, like the names of the students who had attacked Harry, he promised himself sternly. But if more than one problem troubled his ward, then he should know about it.

All the worry focused on one thing, though. The moment Snape let his own awareness brush the edge of that volatile emotion, he knew what it was.

He snapped open his eyes and held out a hand, his rage acting to fuel his wandless magic, even as Harry desperately clapped his fingers over his robe pocket. "Accio letter!" Snape snapped, and the little ball of paper rolled out of an uncompressed corner and soared across the room into Snape's palm.

"Stop it!" Harry shouted, leaping to his feet. Uncontrolled rage blazed in his eyes, and a wind whipped the fire hard enough that it went out, leaving only the torches to illuminate the room. "You have no right to read that, no right—"

Snape ignored him. Until and unless Harry actually attacked him with magic—and having seen how well Harry had restrained himself after the arrests of his parents and Dumbledore, he really had no fear of that—he did not need to defend himself. Instead, he unrolled the letter from James Bloody Potter and read it.

October 6th, 1995

Dear Harry:

I know that you won't want to hear from me. But I have something very important to tell you. I can only hope that you read this letter through to the end, because of how much it matters to me.

I've learned a little information about the trial; they tell us if we ask, and sometimes legal books on child abuse are among the ones that appear on the shelves in my cell. And I've learned that sometimes it's possible for the accused to be tried on partial charges. That means that some of the charges against me could be dropped, even though not all of them would be. I wouldn't ask you to try to get all of them removed, but there are thirteen charges of neglect against me. Even dropping six or seven could mean the difference between death or the stripping of my magic, and simple imprisonment.

Could you try, Harry, please? For me? I know that I haven't done right by you in the past. I'm very sorry for that, and I'd like to try anew. If I went to Tullianum for five or ten years, then we could talk, and as long as I still had my magic when I got out, we could try to lead a somewhat normal life. I have messed up my second chances before, but I swear, I swear to you in the name of Merlin, this time I won't. But the thought of dying or losing my magic weighs on my mind every day. I can't do much but sit here and shiver. It was an effort to write this letter. As long as I knew that I would live, and get out of prison someday, then I could make plans for that future, and be happier and healthier and more productive.

Please, Harry. Try. For the sake of the family we could be together someday.

Your loving father,

James.

Snape realized his hands were shaking as he finished the letter. There was no danger of some sappy emotion being the reason they shook, of course. He was in that dreamland beyond fury, where his anger expanded beyond his body and rattled items on the shelves. When he had entered this mood as a Death Eater, then he killed, efficiently and painfully and with a bloody, wild joy. The tension building up within him now could be released only by death.

"You had no right to read that."

Snape came back to himself long enough to notice that Harry had taken his seat again and sat with his head hanging. His voice was dull and resigned, and he flinched when Snape stood, the concern he bore somewhat counteracting the urge to cause pain and draw blood.

"You hadn't read it yourself," Snape said. "Why?"

"Because I knew I would have had to write back," said Harry, jerking his head up and snarling at him, the resignation vanished. Fury lit his eyes a complex green, and his lightning bolt scar flared on his forehead, as though they hadn't blocked its connection after all. "And I promised Mrs. Malfoy that I wouldn't communicate with my parents."

Snape felt a distant surprise that Harry had managed to keep that promise. The letter rang in his head, though, and he had to bite out the next words. "And why didn't you come to anyone and tell them about this letter? Draco? Me? Your brother, for Merlin's sake?"

"Because I knew this would happen, damn you!" Harry stood. "I knew you would get angry! And some of it would be at me, and some of it would be at James, and either way results in someone getting hurt, and I'm so angry at him for writing!"

Snape jerked himself to a stop. This was the first thing he could remember Harry voluntarily confessing about his feelings for his parents, other than his insistent desire to forgive them. Snape breathed slowly, even as he kept his voice cool. "And you could not have put the letter in a drawer? Someplace it would be safe?"

"I always wanted it with me." Harry ran his hand through his hair and paced back and forth. "I was afraid someone would find it if I left it behind. But I hated that, too. It feels like he's a chain around my neck, always with me. Why can't he leave me alone?" Those last words sounded as if he'd scraped his throat raw in saying them.

“He can, Harry,” Snape said softly, treading as carefully as he could. “He will. When Scrimgeour learns that the letter somehow got out of James’s hands when he was already in custody—“

And Harry swung towards him, and Snape knew he had pushed too far. The glimpse into Harry’s emotions vanished as he sealed the crack that had produced it. He glared, and the letter soared from Snape’s hand to his without a word spoken. Then Harry bowed his head and read it. Snape did not quite dare to interrupt him.

“Typical,” said Harry when he finished, with utterly no emotion in his words. He rolled the letter up again and put it back in his pocket.

“Harry—“ Snape began.

“No, I’m not going to try and get the charges dropped,” said Harry. His voice was wooden. “And I promise that I won’t send a letter back. I promise to you, as well as Mrs. Malfoy, that I won’t do it.” He made for the door.

“I am not as concerned about that as I am about your mental health,” Snape said to his back. Since he knows what I’m after already, I might as well bare all my motives. “When you begin making mistakes in Potions, Harry, then something is badly wrong.”

Harry swung around. “I won’t do that anymore,” he said, with the force of a vow. “I’m sorry for doing it today.” Snape nearly flinched, knowing Harry meant he was sorry for providing any hint of his emotions at all, rather than as an apology for disrupting class. “It’s fine now.”

“It is not,” said Snape forcefully. “This is why I wanted you to speak to someone, Harry. I am willing to fetch anyone you wish, except one of your parents or Dumbledore. Regulus would—“

“Fetch who you want,” said Harry, locking himself down behind the calm mask that Snape remembered from his first year at Hogwarts, and had always hated. “I’m not talking about it.”

“Why?” Snape asked.

"It's mine to keep," said Harry. "I told you that. Everyone knows what happened. That's fine." The choke in his voice immediately afterwards revealed how much he still hated it. "But they're not going to know how I feel about what happened. That's mine."

Snape could think of nothing to say. He had never been good at this part of comforting. When Harry had been more unconscious of his own reactions, he thought as he watched his ward leave the room, even insistent that he hadn't been abused, things were actually easier. That meant he exposed all sorts of telltale signs with a careless word that to him meant something else, or a flash in the eyes that he didn't know he was giving out, or his simple expectation that someone else would agree with his twisted notions of love, sacrifice, and forgiveness.

Now, though, Harry knew how other people saw him, and he had partially healed, and he knew the cost of that healing. Now, he was jealously guarding his secrets, and Snape didn't know how to get through the walls. Manipulation and lying were distasteful to him where Harry was concerned—he had gone as far as he ever wished to in that direction with his lies of omission about possessing Dumbledore's memories and what he intended to do with them—but he knew of no direct assault that would work.

He sat down and stared into the cold hearth.

Must I hurt him again, if that is the only way to get him the help he needs?

How dare he?

Harry was halfway back to the Slytherin common room before that thought, or a variation of it, stopped running through his head. He halted, leaning his brow on the cool stone, and breathed carefully. Wet scents came and curled through his nostrils. Harry forced himself to think about them, about what would happen if water came flooding through the dungeons—would anyone even notice the difference in scent in time to escape the torrent?—and finally, gradually, relaxed.

Then he went about the more difficult process of reconciling himself with what had happened.

He saw it. It was probably inevitable that he would the moment I invited him into my head to firm up the Occlumency barrier. And I was slipping more than I thought, if I let my worry affect my behavior in Potions. Harry sighed. He'd fobbed Draco off with the idea that he'd slipped in Potions because of a flash of a vision from Voldemort, and told him that he was going to Snape tonight to block the scar connection—which did happen to be true. He felt bad about lying.

But the fiery panic that he felt at the mere thought of sharing any of his true and churning emotions overruled even his scruples there. He would tell Draco anything else, including his worries about how well Snape and Connor were getting along in their extra dueling lessons. This was the one thing no one else could have, though, the one thing no one else would ever have.

Snape keeps urging me to be a little more selfish. You'd think he'd be pleased.

Harry gave a rusty chuckle at that, and smoothed the ground where he'd buried his feelings one more time. So. Someone knew about the letter from James now, and he didn't have to worry about keeping that secret. He'd be all right. He would. He would still ignore the temptation to write back. Anchoring the promise to Snape, who was here with him in Hogwarts, would help with that.

But he would not ignore the temptation to hope. James had learned, it seemed. He no longer spoke of being set free entirely. He just didn't want to pay an unfair price for his crimes. He wanted to make sure that he still had a future when he got out of Tullianum, so that he could dedicate his life to his sons.

Harry let his stiff shoulders fall back into position, and sighed. He had changed his mind about going to the Slytherin common room, though. He wanted to fly. Granted, it was after nine at night and he wasn't supposed to be outside the walls after dark, but he wouldn't go beyond the wards. This would help clear his head and make him an easier person for Draco and the others to be around tonight.

He slipped easily through the halls, wrapped in a Disillusionment Charm, and Accio'd his Firebolt once he had reached the Quidditch Pitch. When it came to him, he climbed onto it and kicked off, rising swiftly into the night. He shivered as the high cold burned through him. He hadn't brought Quidditch gear or a glove, of course.

But that was all right. He wouldn't stay out long. He lay down along the broom, stabilizing himself to compensate for the loss of his hand, and turned his face up to watch the waning moon. The Firebolt flew in lazy circles.

He kept his mind on physical sensations, on the cold and the sounds, both odd and natural, that drifted up from the Forbidden Forest. His breath plumed in front of his face, and Harry watched the clouds of steam as long as he could, until the darkness insisted on breaking them up. The moon hunched like a crabbed old man, and Harry counted the craters he could see on his face. He almost remembered a fey tale he'd learned as a child, about Merlin and the battle he'd fought with the man in the moon, but he refused to remember it. That would drag up memories of Lily and James and—the other things.

He was yawning and thinking he should go down when he saw a small shape circle through a beam of moonlight. Harry blinked and sat up. Had someone come after him? Draco was the only one likely to, and he would have called out before he reached that height.

The other flyer sped past him again, and this time Harry could see that it was far too small to be a wizard on a broom. In fact, it had visible wings, and was about the size of a phoenix. He hovered, watching in interest as it drew nearer and nearer. Was this a species of magical creature, perhaps, come to ask him a question as vates?

The creature finally came close enough, and seemed determined enough, that Harry thought he could risk calling a ball of light into his palm without frightening it. The moment the golden glow winked into being above his hand, the creature altered its path and came straight for him.

Harry recoiled. This close, he could see that the creature was unnatural. It did look like a bird, but its beak had teeth, and each feathered wing, twisting with iridescent colors like the shades spilled on a patch of oil, bore a crown of three claws. Its feet folded close to its breast, powerful, clawed things bigger than most raptors' talons Harry had seen. Its long tail was a lizard's.

But it was the aura around it that really made it ugly. Harry could feel its magic spreading out beyond its body, invisible but very present. That magic was a vicious, violent thing, seeking to rend and kill.

He swerved. The bird swerved with him, impossibly fast, and lashed out as it soared just above his head, setting Harry coughing with the foul musk from its feathers. The claws scored five ragged lines down his left cheek.

I like/hate you, snarled a voice that resembled a Dementor's as much as it resembled anything, drilling like a spike of cold into Harry's head. I love/loathe you.

"What are you?" Harry insisted, no longer doubting it was intelligent. He shivered as the blood stopped flowing from the cuts almost at once; they were freezing shut. He whirled back upright, and saw the bird turn in the night to face him, using its tail for balance. Its eyes were red. It laughed at him.

Guess, it said, and then it flew straight up into the sky and vanished in the darkness and moonlight. Harry scanned for it, flying into the space where it had been, but found nothing. It might have been a purely magical creation.

Harry shivered, and gingerly touched his face, wincing when his fingers encountered icy scabs. He supposed he should go see Madam Pomfrey, and then would come the multiple explanations.

He sighed, and circled back down towards the school. At least it's reminded me that there's a world beyond myself again. I can be grateful for that.

Chapter Thirty-Two: Spells That Leave No Mark

Lucius gave a long, luxurious stretch—rather, he thought, like a cat prepared to go hunting. Well, he did not resent the comparison. Cats were noisy and foul-scented enough that he would never tolerate one in the Manor for long—Draco’s Kneazle kitten when he was a child had been enough of a burden—but in the abstract, he could accept the idea of grace, and speed, and beauty.

And deadliness to mice.

He checked his preparations carefully one more time. He had the cage of insects. He had the knowledge of curses burning in his head and on his tongue. He had the blank wand. He had the requisite amount of trust in Auror Wilmot to make sure that things went as planned.

He finished the check, and blinked lazily.

Time to go a-hunting.
“Welcome, Mr. Malfoy.”

Lucius smiled into Wilmot’s eyes as he held out his hand for a shake. The pale, hazel-eyed man clasped it with no sign of hesitation, and ignored the small flinch Lucius wanted him to feel at his touching a halfblood. He simply shook, and then moved back to his desk and shuffled through some papers.

“As you know, Mr. Malfoy, the new laws that may make an impact on the activities of Dark families are really quite simple to follow—“

Lucius listened, and smiled and nodded in all the right places to convince someone passing by that this really was all he had come for. The cage of insects sat at his side, glamoured to look like a bag of papers. The blank wand lay in his pocket. He thought more about them than information he had already received from his own contacts in the Ministry long before the laws reached this stage.

Wilmot continued talking, producing more sheaves of paper and shuffling through them with droning enthusiasm. Most of the people who walked past looked at Lucius with pity for being caught up in the Auror's talk. Lucius managed to ignore those glances easily. In fact, he wanted to laugh. Wilmot was a near-perfect actor, and if anyone suspected what Lucius was really here for, he would eat his own hand.

Abruptly, he realized that Wilmot's voice continued, even though the man had stood and reached for his wand. Lucius arched an eyebrow, and raised it higher when he realized that a complicated illusion was in place that maintained images of both himself and Wilmot in their chairs, nodding and chattering respectively. He stood, carefully scanning his own copy. It looked no different than the one he saw in the mirror every day, save for a certain blankness behind the eyes.

"Triggered spell," Wilmot explained, when he saw Lucius looking at him. "It needed a certain amount of time to pass before it could take our likenesses." He waved his wand and murmured a simple glamour spell under his breath, one, Lucius knew, that would not trigger the Ministry's wards into thinking a prisoner was escaping as a Disillusionment Charm would. In moments, Wilmot's features melted and changed into those of a drab Ministry flunky Lucius wouldn't have looked twice at, and from the tingle in his own cheeks, he suspected the same thing had happened to him.

"This way," Wilmot said softly, and walked towards the lifts.

Lucius followed, inwardly exulting in the effectiveness of Aurelius Flint's spy network. Whatever debt Wilmot owed to Nott, it must have been enormous, to make him take so many risks in smuggling Lucius in to torture the Potters.

There was, of course, the chance that Wilmot would betray him later, but Lucius doubted that. Others in the Ministry owed debts that could, with a bit of pressure, be transferred to Lucius. Those others would keep an eye on Wilmot for him.

As they rode the lifts down, Wilmot murmured, "You trusted me to make arrangements to insure you would not be caught. They are done, Mr. Malfoy. And I think you will be pleased with the one who takes your fall.”

Lucius gazed into his face, finding it hard to estimate, as always, what the real emotions were like under the glamour. “Who is it?”

Wilmot told him.

Lucius gave a little chuckle. Sometimes, he enjoyed being surprised. This surprise was a pleasant one, given what inconvenience the person was currently causing him. And Wilmot was right in the explanations he gave for his choice. Everyone would believe that this person would torture the Potters.

I could become fond of Wilmot. An intelligent friend in the Ministry, one who managed to survive Scrimgeour’s first purge of the Aurors, is a useful thing to have.

“Here we are.”

Lucius raised his eyebrows when he realized there were no guards on the cells. He had assumed that Wilmot would arrange to have the usual guards bribed or drugged or otherwise out of the way, but no one appeared to have been here for at least five minutes. Wilmot smiled at him, a mysterious smile that said he valued his own secrets, and cast the spells that unlocked James Potter’s door and took the glamour from Lucius’s face.

Lucius lifted the cage with the insects and stepped within. Behind him, the door shut and locked again. Lucius was unconcerned. He knew spells that would make Wilmot regret leaving him in here if he tried it, and Wilmot knew he knew them. It was always so pleasant to understand one’s associates. In fact, Lucius was more than usually pleased with the world today. He did hope that wouldn’t affect the way that he planned to torture James Potter. He would hate to think he was being kind.

The cell was too large for someone who had committed Potter’s crimes, and too soft. James lay curled on the bed in one corner, his shoulder hunched. He tensed a bit when he heard the door open, but didn't turn to see who it was. Lucius had no impression so strong as that of a sulky child, trying to convey the impression of stern strength in ignoring intruders. In reality, of course, the impression James conveyed was of a pouting lip.

Lucius set the cage on the floor and removed the glamour. Then he said, "Hello, Potter."

James sat up and whirled around. The ghost-like pallor to his face told Lucius that he'd recognized his visitor. He had to swallow several times before he could say anything, though. Lucius watched the performance all the way through, finding it immensely entertaining. He wondered if James often demanded water from the guards, whether he had to work up to all his speeches the way he was working up to this one, and whether he would say anything worthwhile when he did finally speak.

It was not so much a surprise as a disappointment when he didn't. "I'm not afraid of you, Malfoy," he tried.

"Of course you're not." Lucius pulled the blank wand from his pocket. It came to life in his hands with a soft thrum. This was part of the task it had been made for, and it would perform the spells required of it for that task, then go dead. Thus Lucius avoided any suspicion of using his own wand, which he'd been required to register when he entered the Ministry. "That's why you're shaking, Potter. It happens to be cold, with a high wind, in here. Why not fool yourself, since you have been doing so for so long?"

James all but vibrated, leaning forward and just catching himself as he was about to tumble off the bed. "You can't do anything to me, Malfoy. Do you realize what would happen if Harry found out? If Scrimgeour found out?"

"Yes," said Lucius. "Probably better than you do, since I know both your son and the Minister, while you have hidden behind your own ignorance for more than a decade." He touched the cage with the blank wand. The bars went transparent, though they didn't open as yet. The insects inside began flinging themselves madly against the front. Lucius wondered how long it would take for James to notice them. “That is why they are not going to find out.”

James gave a long, liquid snort. “You can’t possibly disguise whatever you intend to do, Malfoy.”

“Yes, I can,” said Lucius softly.

James went on, undaunted. Or perhaps he thought that if he ignored what Lucius said, the problem would go away. That was his modus operandi, from what Lucius understood of him. “I’ve just written a letter to Harry. He knows me better than you do. He understands the good in people. He’ll come save me. You shouldn’t be here when he comes, if you know what’s good for you, and he could show up at any moment.”

Lucius’s amusement froze, and then cracked and fell away. He didn’t change his expression, of course. He did not wish to do so. The news that James Potter had written their Potter filled him with rage like dry ice, and then pleasure as cold as the amusement had turned.

“James Potter,” he said, “abuser of children, coward, imbecile, disgrace to the name of pureblood wizard, this will be a positive pleasure.” He tapped the front of the cage with the blank wand, and murmured the incantation that released the insects, stepping out of the way as he did so.

A deep buzz filled the room as the insects soared free, a whirling swarm like that of mosquitoes, though much bigger. They swirled twice, wavered as if they would head for Lucius—though he wore a repelling charm already—and then oriented on James.

“No,” said James, though he couldn’t possibly know what they were.

Lucius didn’t bother to respond. He savored the shocked and horrified look on James’s face just before the starving insects dove at him.

Hundreds of small crooked legs bearing barbed pincers on the end hooked into James’s flesh. He screamed as the long beaks lowered and hooked in after them, but Lucius knew no one would hear him; the cells bore Silencing Charms to prevent the prisoners from annoying each other. Lucius stepped slightly to the side, to get a better view, as James half-vanished under the black cloud, all the while screaming in horror and pain.

Then the insects began to shrink. Lucius closed his eyes to savor the way James's cries lifted, soaring. The pain did not vanish when the insects dug in, of course. It became keener, from hundreds of pinpricks to hundreds of red-hot irons, all focused on an inch of skin or less.

When he looked again, Lucius had the treat of seeing the insects pass into James's body. They slipped through pores, they turned into smoke and wafted in through his eyes and nostrils, they kicked into his armpits and burrowed in. The holes they created vanished as they went inside. The pain would stay there, but there was no sign of bites or stings. Strictly speaking, what the insects had fastened on was James's magical self, and not his physical one.

James stopped screaming and stared at his unmarked arms in bewilderment. Lucius leaned on the wall, smiling. He wasn't surprised when James raised his eyes to him and snapped, "What the fuck did you do to me? What was the point of that?"

"You have no idea," Lucius said pleasantly. "And it will stay that way."

In truth, the insects were coursing through James's bloodstream now, blending with his tissues, becoming part of his body in the way that his bones were. They would search out some sign of Dark magic. That was how the healers of the past had used them, to eat curses that no ordinary mediwizardry could take care of. Most victims suffered no pain when the insects dug in, since the curses offered them food, and the healers would remove the bugs the moment their task was completed.

James had no Dark curses on him. The insects had to burrow into his magic instead. They would search every corner of him, but when they found none of the food they preferred, they would make their own. James had just become home to a thriving colony of insects whose presence would go entirely unnoticed and unremarked for a year, perhaps two.

Then the disturbance in his body would manifest as cancer. Lucius rather suspected that it would appear full-blown in every part of his body cancer could appear in, that he would experience horrible pain, that he would know he was going to die for several months on end—intolerable to a coward like him. The Healers would shake their heads, but they would not be able to tell the difference between a natural and magical cancer. By then, there would be no trace of the insects to be found. And why should anyone suspect or look for them, when it was entirely uncommon for the insects to be used in medical practice anymore?

James Potter would die now. Lucius rather hoped the Wizengamot would leave him alive, and condemn him to Tullianum. A few short, miserable years, and then death inevitable and undeniable. If the Ministry cut that short with one of their painless executions, Lucius would be annoyed.

At least he had the anticipation to savor, and the belief that the Wizengamot would not hand down a death sentence. James had only been charged with neglect. They were less likely to think that that crime deserved one.

James said, “Of course I’m going to tell Harry about this. I don’t know what you did, but he will. How in the world do you think you’re going to get away with this, Lucius?”

“I didn’t give you permission to call me by my first name, Mr. Potter,” said Lucius. “And I prefer getting away with it to having you know what I have done. Don’t worry, you’ll have plenty of unpleasant anticipation of pain in the future.” As James opened his mouth, frowning, Lucius aimed the blank wand at him and added, in a casual voice, “Obliviate.”

James’s face went slack, and he blinked. Lucius said softly, “You’ve been asleep. You had a painful dream, but that’s nothing unusual for a man accused as unfairly as you’ve been, is it? I think you should go to sleep, James, and not quite remember what the dream is about. It would be best.”

James dropped to the bed, limp as a doll, and rolled over. Lucius stepped backwards and tapped on the door in the prearranged pattern that let Wilmot know it was time to let him out. The cage floated behind him as he stepped into the hall, and Wilmot reset the locking spells, all the while darting curious glances at Lucius.

“He’ll suffer,” was all that Lucius thought it necessary to say in response to that glance.

Wilmot nodded, and then let him towards Lily Potter’s cell. Lucius felt pleasure stretch in him like a cat in the sun, and smiled as the first curse twitched behind his lips.

She did more. She will suffer more. And no one will suspect me. This has all the ingredients of a wonderful afternoon.

Lily sighed. She knew this was a dream, because of the softness of the ground beneath her feet and the incredible, surreal richness of the sky over her head, but that didn’t stop her from wishing it were true.

In the dream, she stood on the lawn outside their old home, the house at Godric’s Hollow, and watched Connor play. He was skipping a stone across the pond, cheering as it went further and further with each try, and laughing as the chips of mica in the stone bounced the sun back. It was such an innocent game. No one was hurt. Lily could not help thinking that Connor was inherently better than other children, but surely it helped that he had been reared in such peaceful surroundings, not taught violence. It was love that would defeat Voldemort, and Connor knew love.

Harry stood beside her, watching his brother in silence. Lily turned and gazed down at him. He was taller than this now, she knew, but then, Connor was a child, so Harry could be a child—in body. He had never been a child in mind, not since she started training him and he started understanding the importance of his task. He turned his head up and looked at her, and contentment shone in his eyes. He knew the real importance of the prophecy. Yes, he had been the one who deflected the Killing Curse and destroyed Voldemort, but the heart, the core, the thing that would win the war, was love. So even though he knew the truth now, he was still content to yield place and precedence to his brother. He could remain in the background because he was ultimately less loving than Connor.

Lily ruffled Harry's hair, and listened to Connor's laughter, and fought against the remembrance that things had ever been different. She would have to wake up sometime, but why, oh why, did it have to be now? All the world was wonderful again. She had been right. Her sacrifices were acknowledged and agreed with. There was no son turning against her, no strange and savage knowledge that she might have been wrong staring her in the face, no one telling her that she had abused her children when she had simply done what she could to prepare them for war. She liked this dream.

"Mum?"

Lily smiled down at Connor. He hadn't spoken in that particular needy tone in years, since he had decided that he was a big boy and could take care of himself. "Yes, Connor?"

"I have something to show you." He held out the flat stone he'd been skipping, so that Lily could admire the way those same flecks of mica that had flashed the sun back were shifting and changing. "See! Do you think it's accidental magic, or something else?"

"Let me see." Lily bent down to look, adoring the warmth of the light on her face and the sweet scent of her son and Harry's silent presence at her back. This was life, the life they all should have had. This was reality.

Connor smashed the stone into the side of her head.

The shattering of her dream was almost worse than the intense pain that flooded her. Lily felt herself drop, and then she lay on the warm grass, staring up at Connor. Behind her, she heard Harry laugh, as he never did. The laugh was mocking, and Connor smiled the same way as he stood over her, bouncing the bloodied stone in his palm.

“Why?” Lily managed to whisper, and then she coughed on blood that shouldn’t be there, not when all she’d taken was a blow to the side of the head.

“Because I hate you,” said Connor, his smile gone and his eyes suddenly narrow with dislike. Lily felt her heart break. Connor’s eyes were hazel, just like James’s, and looking into them now was like having James hate her, the way he might if he knew about Harry’s training. “You didn’t prepare me for war. You kept me innocent all along. And now I’m so far behind, and struggling to catch up, and Merlin, I just hate you!” He gave a loud sob, and then knelt beside her and smashed the stone down again.

Lily couldn’t move. Dimly she felt more and more smacks, the shattering of her skull and the spattering of her brains, but the keener sensation was Harry’s laugh, which she heard for all but the very few moments before death claimed her.

Lily awoke and sat up with a gasp. She was in her bed in the cell at the Ministry, and for the first time ever, she was grateful to be there. She shivered, gripping her arms and bowing her head.

“Potter?”

Lily looked up swiftly, then relaxed. An Auror had entered, but this was one of the guards who had always been kind to her, slipping her extra food on the sly and never making fun of her for not being able to use magic, the way some of the others did. Her name was Elizabeth, and now she regarded Lily with wonder and unease in her brown eyes, slowly lowering her wand.

“What’s the matter?” she asked.

“A horrible dream,” Lily whispered. She said it with such emotion in her voice, emotion she hadn’t even known herself capable of, that Elizabeth tucked her wand away altogether and came to sit down beside Lily, smoothing her sweat-soaked hair off her forehead.

“It’s all right,” Elizabeth whispered. “That takes people, sometimes, near the trials. And of course you’ve been having more than your fair share of nightmares.” Lily took comfort in her anger. It wasn’t right that nightmares from a curse had tortured her, was it? And after all she had given up for the war. It was no more right than the fact that neither of her sons ever visited her, than the twisted idea Harry had that she’d abused him because she wanted to. She hadn’t wanted to. It was a choice between sacrificing him and letting the world fall into darkness. It was only due to the training he’d had that he could face Voldemort at all. And she would have done everything differently, anyway, if she’d known at the time that Harry was the one who had deflected the Killing Curse. He would have had training because of his powerful magic, but she would never have thought of him as a potential Dark Lord.

A dull axe cut into the back of her neck.

Lily gasped and tried to stand, but Elizabeth’s arm curved around her, keeping her right where she was. Lily stared into the Auror’s pleasant face and smiling eyes, and then suddenly realized it was a mask, a glamour. Someone else was under the glamour—Auror Mallory, who had arrested her and made her life a living hell when she first arrived here. Lily screamed.

Mallory laughed, and held her still as the axe rose and then cut down again. It took a long time. A human neck was thick, and when an executioner wasn’t committed to doing his task properly, it might take as many as fifteen cuts to slice through all that flesh and bone and muscle...

Lily counted twenty-two cuts before death came for her, as a mercy. Lucius fought to still his twitching lips as he stood in a corner of Lily Potter’s cell and watched her experience her visions. The Neco Identidem curse linked his mind to hers, and let him see, if he chose to, exactly what she was feeling and thinking as the spell went into operation. Currently, she had died five times, and she was starting to notice and suspect and dread the death the moment she awoke in another dream. Lucius had to admit he was a bit impressed at her creativity, though by far the most rewarding part of this whole curse was her fear as she perished. That really was what dying was like.

Lucius admired his own creativity, too. Even if the Wizengamot sentenced Lily Potter to execution, as Lucius thought would most likely happen, she could only die once. That was not enough to pay for her crimes.

And then an idea occurred to him. A delicious idea. An idea he knew he could put into motion, though it would mean giving up the repetitions of the Neco Identidem curse and the other mental assaults he'd planned. Lucius straightened and stared at Lily Potter.

There was also the chance, the smallest and most infinitesimal chance, that an Auror experienced in Dark Arts would sense the spell, and Auror Wilmot's fall wizard was not someone who would use this particular curse. It could lead to Lucius getting caught.

He was a Slytherin. He weighed the risk of being caught in his head against the smallness of it, and the pleasure it would give him to enact this revenge, and the binding that his family had to Harry Potter. Then he nodded.

He would roll the dice.

He raised the Neco Identidem curse, and Lily Potter whimpered and slid into true sleep. Lucius smiled, distantly, even as he began to move in precise, controlled gestures. She might as well remain asleep for this portion of the invocation. Lucius was not about to tell her its purpose, anyway.

He extended the blank wand above his head, and whispered, "Lamnae cruore adoleo."

The air trembled in front of him, and the knife-blade formed, gleaming, near his left arm. That meant Lucius was ready for the sacrifice he had just promised to make. If he had not been sincere, the knife would never have formed at all.

He turned his arm sideways, and the skin split. Lucius felt fire trace its way up his veins. He didn't flinch. Cold followed it. He might have been a statue. The knife filled the cut with spiky, jagged pain, and still Lucius did not move, staring at the blade, the knowledge of what he would accomplish with this spell, this ritual, this sacrifice, obviating any response to the agony.

At last, he bled. The knife turned, catching the blood on its blade. Then it hovered, still, in place. Lucius would have to enact the second part of the spell himself. Everything about this ritual was a choice, with multiple chances to turn back. The wizards who had created this particular branch of Dark Arts had wanted to insure that only the strongest reached the end and achieved the desired results.

“Concedo adflictationem me,” he murmured.

Then he had to close his eyes and stand still as his entire body tingled and went numb. All sensation ended. He could no longer feel the pain from the cut, the blood trickling on his skin, the knife pressed against the wound, his heartbeat against his chest. If he moved, if he panicked, the spell would break. He had to wait as the knife drew his own pain into it. When he opened his eyes, at last, and a tendril of sensation began to return, the knife glowed a brilliant yellow, pregnant with pain.

“Adflictationem indigeo annalis,” he said.

The knife trembled. Lucius felt brief, whip-like spikes of magic brush past his head. The summoned power might decide to obey him, and it might not. In that moment, his dedication to the Dark was measured, and his commitment to his revenge, and his motive for seeking that revenge. No one but a Dark wizard desiring vengeance could cast this spell. Lucius stood in silence and endured the inspection. He was confident that he would pass muster.

The knife turned and flew to Lily Potter, scoring a shallow cut on the back of her neck. The yellow light flowed from the blade into the wound. Again she whimpered, and again she failed to wake.

Lucius closed his eyes, and relaxed. A simple healing spell took care of the cut on his arm, and he slid his long robe sleeve—specially fitted to hide the Dark Mark from casual view—back across it. No one should look for it. This spell was not exactly common, precisely because it was so hard to cast.

As he watched the agony pour into the woman who had abused a child with Lord-level magical power, he was satisfied. He had asked for as much pain as the spell would grant him. He would have been within his rights to ask for more, he thought, considering what had happened to Harry, but he would then have had to use a ritual that required objects he didn't have with him and which had a much higher chance of both failing and getting him caught. Few people would look for this. The cut was hidden by Potter's hair. The wand that had cast the spell was not his own.

And another had agreed to take the fall.

The last of the yellow light vanished from the blade, and then the knife, too, dissipated. Created by the spell, it could not last past the effects of the curse. Lucius stretched his arms above his head and nodded to Harry's mother.

"For bearing the boy my son loves, I thank you," he said. "For abusing him, I hate you, and always shall." The words were almost meaningless after all he had done to her, but he felt better for saying them. They disclaimed any hint of a debt that he might owe the woman. When dealing with Dark Arts spells of this caliber, it was always best to be sure that the caster suffered from no ties to the victim.

Lily Potter would almost surely be executed. When she was, the execution would be painless and take only a few minutes in the eyes of anyone watching. Lucius planned to attend it himself.

Now, though, he would have the satisfaction of knowing that, however little time it took in reality, in Lily Potter's perception it would seem to last for much longer. She would suffer a year of unending pain in the space of those few moments, the stored agony in her body exploding through her veins. Lucius had given her as much pain as he could imagine her suffering, and that was quite a lot.

He still regretted that he could not have given her a decade of anguish. But that was too risky. He would be satisfied with what he could get.

He woke Potter long enough to cast Obliviate on her and tell her that she would remember only bad dreams, then tossed the blank wand in the air and concentrated on the nonverbal spell that he had told Ollivander to implant into it. The wand burst into flames, and burned away to light ashes that drifted down over Lucius's face and hands. He brushed them off absently and went to the door. No Aurors looking for traces of the wand that had cast these spells would be able to find them now.

Again, he knocked in the prearranged signal. Again, Auror Wilmot opened the door and let him out, but this time he was not alone. With him was the person he had chosen to take the fall and the blame for Lucius's actions.

Lucius arched an eyebrow when he saw that she wasn't restrained or drugged or under Imperius, but looking at him with bright, clear eyes. "Auror Mallory," he said, and bowed. "I am somewhat surprised to see you here."

Mallory shook her head. Now that Lucius thought of it, her eyes did have a gloss to them, but it was the look of fever. Whatever fire consumed her came from the inside and the inside alone. "I would not have lasted much longer," she said. "I longed to hurt them. Now, they are hurt, and I will cast curses to make Rufus believe that I did it. Vengeance is taken, and justice is done." She paused, as if she had to think about the next words. "I am happy."

"You know that you'll be sacked and prosecuted?" Lucius had not really believed Wilmot when he indicated that Mallory was going along with this of her own free will.

"I know." Mallory looked half-restless, twirling her wand between her fingers. "It will be worth it. I have not been able to stand it, seeing the reporters at the Daily Prophet and even some of the people in the Ministry turning against Harry. I wanted to hurt the Potters so badly, but Rufus forbade it. Well, now I'll be able to get my wish, and my spells will conceal the greater pain that you dealt them." Her eyes narrowed at Lucius. "I don't want to know the details just in case something slips out, but you dealt them pain?"

Lucius nodded. "I did."

"Good," said Mallory. The glaze in her eyes had turned to a joyous one as she opened the door to Lily Potter's cell and slipped inside.

Wilmot locked the door again, and shook his head. "She's been quite mad for weeks now," he confirmed, when Lucius looked at him. "She would eventually have gone after them herself, I believe—damn her position and her morals and everything else. They'll know that she could have; she was the one who sent away the guards on the doors. And as long as she confesses to her crimes freely, they have no reason to try her under Veritaserum and look for further things she might be hiding. Scrimgeour's too honorable for that, anyway." Wilmot curled his lip. "Almost the whole Ministry is mad, either for Potter or against him. A few hints, and she took the bait."

"Why aren't you mad?" Lucius asked.

Wilmot laughed softly, a barking sound. "I don't quite feel like giving away all my secrets, Mr. Malfoy."

"The ones I possess are safe with me," said Lucius. He had no reason to question Wilmot in such a way as might make the Auror decide he was a threat. He wanted his useful friend to stay safe in the Ministry. "And who do you believe will become Head of the Auror Office, now that Mallory is disgraced?"

Wilmot shrugged as he recast the glamour over their faces and they walked back towards the lifts. "There are several people the choice might fall on. Scrimgeour won't be able to just make the appointment this time, not when his last choice tortured prisoners. Personally, I think the most likely candidate is Priscilla Burke."

Lucius laughed.

Wilmot shot him a curious glance. "What?"

"She is a person I approve, though never one I would have thought likely to ascend to the post," said Lucius. And now we have more and more friends within the Ministry, and someone who will glance the other way as long as we keep our games within reason. Better and better.

They returned easily to Wilmot's desk, resumed their seats and their apparent boring conversation, and dismissed the glamours. Lucius rose to his feet a few minutes later and extended a hand to Wilmot.

"A pleasure, Auror Wilmot," he said ceremoniously. "We shall have to do this again sometime."

"Yes, we should." Wilmot clasped his hand and met his eyes with no trace of hiding or flinching. "I have my own reasons to hope that the laws impacting Dark wizards are reconsidered, Mr. Malfoy, and to approve what happened today. I hope that you won't hesitate to seek me out if you need help again."

Lucius inclined his head, and then left, the cage that had held the insects bobbing beside him in its glamoured disguise. He had punished the Potters, got rid of a Head of the Auror Office who could have been a thorn in his side as he reestablished his influence in the Ministry, and secured a useful friend for the future.

All in all, it had been a very good day.

Chapter Thirty-Three: Walk a Thin Line

"I just don't understand how you can do it, Potter, that's all."

Harry had a moment to be glad that Draco wasn't at this meeting of the dueling club, but doing research into his own family background for a spell that he wanted to create. He would have hexed Susan Bones by now. Of course, it was probably only because Draco wasn't here that Susan had dared to begin the subject at all.

Harry glanced around the room from the corners of his eyes. Everyone had stopped pretending to duel now, and was openly staring at the two of them. Harry stifled the urge to hiss. They needed concentration to get the expanded Shield Charm spells right. No, it wasn't Dark Arts, since Remus hadn't been able to be here this evening and supervise them, but it was still a delicate and difficult spell, and they might lose their lives to a Slicing Curse or a similar hex if they couldn't master it.

And now everybody was staring, even Connor, as though they couldn't imagine how Harry could find words to answer this accusation.

Harry sighed and turned back to Susan. "Because the son isn't the father," he said. "Families are important, Bones. I know that." He thought of his parents for a whip-quick moment, and then turned and met his twin's eyes. Connor took a step forward, one brow raised, but Harry shook his head. He appreciated Connor's offer, but he didn't need his brother to defend him. "But you won't get anywhere punishing Draco for what his father did to your uncle. Draco hasn't done anything to you. And he's firmly against Voldemort. He'd have to be, to dare be seen with me," he added, a bit sourly. Surely Draco's constant presence at Harry's side, his actions, should have proven which values he held, even if Susan and the others did distrust every word that came from both Harry's and Draco's mouths.

"But his father killed my uncle," Susan whispered. "And I know that you haven't spoken up against Lucius Malfoy either, Harry. In fact, some of the rumors say that you're working with him."

I should have known it would come to Lucius sooner or later. Harry met her eyes. "I'm sorry about your uncle and your cousins," he said. "And your grandparents, for that matter. I wish those deaths hadn't happened. I wish the First War hadn't happened. But it did, and there's nothing I can do to take it back. The very most I can do is try to help you survive this one, and defeat Voldemort. I won't abandon Draco because of his father, and I wouldn't abandon Lucius unless he tortured someone again. He has changed, Bones. Just as other people can change, you know," he added, thinking he should bring the example a bit closer to home. "Like my godfather did at the end of third year. If someone can go from Light to Dark, why can't someone go from Dark to Light?"

"This is all the same war," Susan whispered. Her eyes were bright with tears, and she could hardly hold her wand steady. Harry thought that was something she would need to get over if she was ever to make any progress in the war. Too easy for an enemy to spring and snatch the wand out of her hand while she aimed it so ineffectively. "That's what my aunt said. And she's the Head of the Department of Magical Law Enforcement, she should know. So someone can't change sides in the middle of a war without getting called a traitor. And I still have to avenge the deaths of my uncle and my cousins and my grandparents. And I can't fight on the same side as the son of the man who tortured them to death."

"It's not like he tortured them to death yesterday, Susan," said an unexpected voice behind Harry. "It's not like you even knew them. Give Harry a break, would you?"

Harry blinked and turned his head. Ron was standing there, scratching the back of his neck and wearing an expression that said, "What in the world am I doing defending a Slytherin?" But he didn't move away, even when Susan turned her teary eyes and shaking wand on him.

"You don't understand," she whispered. "My aunt made sure I knew all about Uncle Edgar, how—"

"Yeah, and my mum lost some brothers in the war, too," said Ron. "To Lucius Malfoy, or at least he was one of the Death Eaters who killed them. Took five wizards to take them down,” he added, with a touch of justifiable pride. Harry nodded. Gideon and Fabian Prewett had been extremely powerful wizards, and some of the first targets of Voldemort’s concerted attempts to remove Light wizards for a very good reason.

“So I’ve lost some uncles,” said Ron. “And yet I’m right here learning beside Harry, and not trying to hex Malfoy. Much,” he said, when Harry glared at him. He had done a fire hex last time that got around Draco’s shields entirely, thanks to Draco’s too-obsessive focus on Harry and a Light pureblood wizard’s innate ability with fire and light, and then been a little too delighted with it. “We need all the allies we can get to win the war, because You-Know-Who is so powerful. I would never ask my mum to fight beside Lucius Malfoy, because she knew her brothers. I never did. They died while I was too young to remember them, or even before I was born. I don’t know the exact year, because Mum doesn’t like to talk about it.”

“Well, my aunt does!” Susan caught her breath on a sob. “I feel like I did know my uncle Edgar, and I don’t want anything to do with Death Eaters, or the children of Death Eaters, or the boyfriends of Death Eaters—” She threw Harry an accusing glance.

Harry grabbed the cold fury that wanted to roll out of him. He was glad, now, that Draco wasn’t here. This was the kind of incident that he would exaggerate for more trouble than it was worth, lengthening the whole thing into insults and hexes. Harry had handled the six Ravenclaws who’d attacked him last Wednesday, and he would handle Susan Bones now.

Come to think of it, it’s a good thing that Snape isn’t here, either.

“Do you think Draco is Marked, Bones?” he asked quietly. “Just come out and say so, if you do.”

Susan frowned. “Of course not. He couldn’t hide it. I’m not saying he’s Marked, just that he’s a Death Eater.”

“But a Death Eater would have the Dark Mark,” said Harry, and took a step forward. He could feel every eye locked on him. Last chance to settle this without half of Hogwarts exploding at me. He was well-aware that any action, any word, could be the one that would set the dry grass of hearts and tempers in the school afire. "So he's not a Death Eater."

"He thinks like one," Susan muttered.

"How so?"

"I've heard him say Mudblood before."

"He hasn't for a month now," said Hermione firmly, standing up. Zacharias put an arm around her, but Hermione shrugged it off. Harry seized a sliver of amusement, like a thin beam of sunlight, from seeing how much that annoyed Hermione's boyfriend. "I know. I heard him say it in the hallway between classes, and I gave him a lecture about how it was stupid for him to have those prejudices when he was Harry's boyfriend and Harry's mother's a Muggleborn, and anyway Harry would hex him if he heard him say it. He hasn't said it since. He always substitutes Muggleborn."

Harry could feel his eyebrows climbing higher as Hermione recited that. Of course there were things that he didn't know about Draco's life, just as there were things that Draco didn't know about his, but he hadn't even imagined that something like this had occurred. So far as he knew, Draco's prejudices remained unreformed, and he just didn't think about them when he was with Harry, or put Harry in the context of them.

Come to think of it, maybe he didn't change his mind. But he's keeping his mouth shut, and that's a good first step.

"Thank you, Hermione," he said, and turned and faced Susan. "Well? Do you have any other proof he's a Death Eater?"

Susan's face had closed, and she looked away with a mulish expression. Harry relaxed. They were past the most dangerous moment, when Susan might have hexed him and other people would follow her lead or try to defend Harry, and it would all turn very dangerous. Now the atmosphere in the room was more akin to that of a sulky first-year trying to come up with an insult against snarky seventh-years than dangerous adversaries at each other's throats.

"I didn't think so," said Harry, and glanced around the room, then snapped his fingers. "The club is dismissed for today."

Groans answered him from a few throats, but most people didn't seem that upset. People who were with Susan wanted to sneak away and lick their wounds, obviously, or maybe console each other that, pretty words aside, Harry couldn't possibly be in the right. The neutral Hufflepuffs and Gryffindors just wanted to get out of there; the Ravensclaws had left about the time that Susan started speaking to Harry the way she had. The two Slytherins in the room, Blaise and a fourth-year whom Harry didn't know well, called Aidan Belby, waited with wands held loosely in their hands while Harry got ready to go.

The real surprise was when he started back to the Slytherin common room, and realized that the Weasleys were walking with him—Ron at his side and Ginny near Blaise. Harry gave them a puzzled glance.

Ron returned him a sheepish shrug and smile. "Just wanted to show you that I meant what I said," he said. "You're a Slytherin, and I still think Malfoy's a git, but you're right. And not all the Light pureblood families are mad, I promise."

Harry smiled in spite of himself, and listened to Ginny arguing amiably with Blaise about whether one's allegiance to Light or Dark really gave one better ability with a certain kind of spell, or whether it was purity of blood or individual talent or just sheer dumb luck. Blaise spoke quickly, with determination, but he didn't manage to shut Ginny up. Remembering the hex she'd fired last year, when Ron tried to object to her dating Blaise, Harry doubted there was much her boyfriend could do to manage it—other than a kiss, with lots of tongue, which was in fact what he glanced back and saw them engaged in at one point. Harry rolled his eyes and faced forward again.

That was how he saw someone coming out of one of the dungeon corridors just ahead of them, clad in a Disillusionment Charm that made it look as though part of the walls was moving, wand low and a curse coming out of its mouth. “Flagellum cruoris!”

Harry whirled, grabbed Ron, and shoved him towards the wall of the tunnel. Ron staggered, off-balance, his breath coming out in a hiss of pain as his shoulders collided with the stone. Blaise and Ginny were safe on the far side behind Harry, and Aidan was just running up behind them, shouting.

Harry continued the whirling motion, and hissed as he felt the curse take him across the shoulders, cutting a pair of crisscrossing lines. The lines were thin, but they sliced through his shirt and his skin and his muscle, and the pain was equally sharp and thin, as though ants were marching on and biting them. The Blood Whip was one of the few curses that, like Avada Kedavra, had virtually no block or shield. It was too wide for Protego, too powerful for Haurio, and reacted badly, as in causing explosions, with most of the other possible wards and barriers. Harry had trained himself with that curse in childhood, and so, though he hurt now, he was not incapacitated as he turned to face their attacker once more.

The figure had paused in shock, as though it had no idea what to do now that its most powerful weapon had failed. Harry used its distraction to snap, “Finite Incantatem!” and watched the Disillusionment Charm melt away to reveal a vaguely familiar Ravenclaw girl.

“Here, I know you,” said Ron, who’d hastened back to Harry’s side, wand drawn. “You’re Marietta Edgecombe.”

Harry remembered her now; he’d seen her dancing at the Yule Ball last year. Marietta raised her head, her face stubborn.

“You can’t say anything,” she warned Harry. “Anything you say could set everyone off, you know it could.”

Harry nodded tightly at her. Slytherin was having enough strained relations with Ravenclaw right now. And anyway, to accuse someone of using the Blood Whip curse was not a matter for a detention and a loss of House points; it meant that McGonagall would seriously have to consider expelling Marietta. And then, too, Marietta was part of a minor Light pureblood family, and a friend of Cho Chang's. If Harry turned her in for this, he might as well declare open war in Hogwarts's halls.

"Harry!" Ron protested. "You can't not report it. Look at your back, for Merlin's sake!" Ron's temper was gaining speed and ground, and a few sparks dropped from his wand. Harry winced. When Ron was angry, then his magic became half again as powerful, or at least it did since last year when Harry had helped him break through the block that his rage had put on his spells. "I don't know what that curse was, but she hurt you—"

"She did," said Harry. "And she's not going to do it again." He cast the same spell on Marietta's wand that he had on Margaret's, binding her from using magic against him again. After a moment's thought, he added in Draco's name, Argutus's, and the names of everyone standing with him in the corridor. Marietta's eyes flashed, but she nodded.

"Probably the best choice, Potter," she said. "No hard feelings, hmmm?" She gave him a harsh-edged smile. "We both know what's going to happen, sooner or later."

Harry did. There would be a maelstrom of fire. Something would set it off, and he would be at the center of it. He let out a long, harsh breath, his eyes locked on Marietta's. "Was that curse actually aimed at me, or at Ron?"

"I think I'll let you brood on that." Marietta put her wand away with almost offensive slowness, looking far too pleased with herself. "It's going to happen," she whispered, just loud enough to reach Harry's ears. "But we both know that you won't want to push it to happen. Sometimes, Potter, you're ridiculously good-natured. You could have a lot more if you would just exert your power and your temper."

Harry said nothing. He watched Marietta go, and slowly, slowly released his tight grip on his magic. He had wanted to respond with an incantation that would turn the Blood Whip back on its caster, doubled in strength. It would have flown right at Marietta, and hit her on the front of her body. She might have had her throat sliced open.

My magic and my anger are both too dangerous. But when I don't do something permanent to them, then they get bolder. Harry let a harsh breath travel through his nose. But they can't make me do what they want me to do. They can't make me yield to temptation and use my magic without thinking of the consequences.

"That was stupid," Ron was telling him angrily, when Harry turned around from watching Marietta go. "She used a curse that ought to get her expelled. And you ought to go to Madam Pomfrey." His hand pressed gently, consideringly, against Harry's wounds for a moment, and Harry flinched, his mind suddenly recalled to the pain.

"I know a healing spell for this in one of our Defense Against the Dark Arts books," he said. "I'll be fine."

"Harry!" That came from not only Ron's throat, but Ginny's and Aidan's. Blaise was the only one who seemed to understand, slowly shaking his head.

"Everything'll come out if Potter goes to the hospital wing now," he said. "Edgecombe will be expelled."

"Good!" said Ron hotly. "She deserves to be!"

"And then what will that do to Ravenclaw? Do you want one quarter of the school turned against Potter, Weasley?" Blaise exhaled, his eyes locked with Ron's. "That's what we're looking at right now. If anything's going to happen to punish the people who are hurting Potter, it has to happen in front of other people—Professors, preferably—and the attackers have to seem like ordinary crazed people, not members of a particular House." Blaise shook his head. "That's why they've been so careful to keep their attacks small and isolated so far. Except for Parsons, but she was a special case." He ignored Ginny's mutter about what kind of "special" Margaret was. "It's Harry's word, or Harry's word and ours, against a Ravenclaw's. They're counting on House divisions to help shield them."

Ron looked murderous, but jerked his head down once. "You just better be all right," he said to Harry. "And something should happen to Edgecombe."

Harry frowned, not liking the expression on Ron's face. "If you attack her, it'll seem like a Gryffindor attacking a Ravenclaw."

"I know that," said Ron. "Don't you think I know that, now that the High and Mighty Zabini has explained it all?" He ignored Blaise's scowl. "I didn't say I was going to attack her. Just that something should happen to her."

Harry looked long and hard into Ron's eyes. Ron looked back at him with an absolutely oblique expression that Harry didn't consider fair. Ron was a Gryffindor, and a Weasley besides, famous for their tempers and their transparency. He shouldn't look as cunning as any Slytherin right now.

"Make sure you heal those cuts," he said, and then refused to say anything else until they reached the Slytherin common room, where he nodded good night while Ginny kissed Blaise again. Harry cast a glamour over his back to hide the wounds from the other Slytherins, and stared hard at both Blaise and Aidan as the Weasleys rounded the corner.

"I can count on both of you not to say anything?"

"Of course, Potter, for the reasons I explained," said Blaise. Aidan just nodded, looking a little sick.

Harry nodded back, then entered the common room. A few people glanced at him, but only with the interest that any passage of Harry's excited. They went back to their books and their games soon enough. Harry relaxed. With luck, he could find the healing spell and cast it on his back, and no one would be any wiser but the people who had been in the corridor.

His run of bad luck wasn't over yet, though. When he and Blaise entered their bedroom, Draco was there, looking up with a bright smile from his Transfiguration homework.

“Hi, Harry! What—” His voice cut off as he took in their expressions—or perhaps his empathy was allowing him to feel some of their emotions. He sat up, his own expression racing steadily towards anger. “What happened?”

Harry shot a glance at Blaise. Blaise shrugged. If Harry could cast the healing spell without dropping the glamour, the gesture seemed to say, then he wouldn’t repeat anything.

But Harry knew he’d have to at least see the cuts in the mirror to do this. He only remembered that there was a healing spell, not the incantation, and the Blood Whip Curse was nothing to fool around with. Besides, Draco would probably find out that he’d lied later and be angry as hell. Harry sighed and dropped the glamour, wincing a bit as the pain seemed to increase with the revelation of the cuts.

Draco leaped off the bed and circled around behind him, obviously working out that the damage had to be there since Harry looked fine from the front. Blaise walked over to his own bed and shut the curtains, giving them what privacy he could. Harry appreciated it. He could hardly look at Draco’s face as he let his hand ghost just above Harry’s wounds. He didn’t want to share this.

“Harry,” Draco whispered into his ear. “What curse did this?”

Well, at least it isn’t a promise of fiery vengeance. Harry could live with that. “The Blood Whip,” he murmured. “One of those nasty curses that makes most shields explode when it touches them. I don’t know for sure if it was aimed at me—it might have been aimed at someone I was walking with—but—”

“Whoever cast it probably knew that you would get in the way.” Draco turned Harry towards his trunk, the direction he’d been walking when he dropped the glamour. “You remember a healing spell for it?”

“In the fourth year Defense Against the Dark Arts book,” said Harry quietly, still distrusting Draco’s gentleness. “That’s what I was going to get.”

“You can get it, then.” Draco’s hand trailed through his hair, snagging here and there. The gesture was almost absent, and yet so possessive that Harry gave an uncomfortable wriggle. Draco didn’t appear to notice. “I want you healed as soon as possible.”

Harry fetched the book, removed his shirt, and then went into the loo. With the help of the mirror, he focused on the image of the two whip-cuts, crossed like an X along his back from the top of his shoulders to his waist. Staring intently at the image, he whispered, “Integro et commoveo inresectus.”

The lines of blood narrowed, then unpeeled, as though an invisible whip were taking them away in turn, moving from his waist up to his shoulders and leaving unmarked skin behind. Harry relaxed only long enough for Draco to step up in front of him. Harry watched his expression in the mirror, head still twisted to look over his shoulder, as Draco ran a hand down Harry’s chest.

“Harry,” Draco said, voice slow and soft, crooning and insistent. “Tell me who did this to you, Harry.”

Harry swallowed. He wasn’t frightened of Draco, of course he wasn’t, but there was that stare again—constructed by the lines of his cheeks and his jaw as much as his eyes—that promised intolerable pain for whoever had hurt Harry. It was the same way he had looked when Margaret cursed Argutus. Harry winced at the thought of what he might do to Marietta. “I’m not going to tell you that, Draco,” he said carefully.

“Harry.” Draco pressed a kiss to his temple, then trailed a hand down his cheek. “You know you will.” His voice had turned lulling, hypnotic.

Harry closed his eyes. He couldn’t understand why his head felt stuffed with cotton and cloud, why he felt this wish to surrender. “No,” he whispered, his voice so soft that it lacked conviction.

Draco kissed his other temple. The only sound in the room was their breathing, Harry’s faster and louder than Draco’s. He waited.

It's probably harder to resist because he's touching me, Harry thought, the sudden realization cutting through his mental haze like a sunbeam through fog. I didn't know I was that susceptible, or that I wanted so much to share everything with him.

Maybe he still could. It seemed like a good idea to his clouded brain, at least. "I'll tell you," Harry whispered. "I'll tell you, if..."

"If?" Draco's hand was moving again, skating and hovering above his cheek. It pressed itself to Harry's back next, rubbing in circles, and let Harry remember he was half-naked.

"You promise not to hurt the person who did this." He'd come awfully close to saying "her," Harry reflected, and he didn't want to eliminate half the school from Draco's guessing game. He blamed the hand on his back. It felt good, but not good enough to trigger his panic.

"I can't do that, Harry." Draco's voice was still sweet, without a trace of anger, and that just made him frighten Harry more. "You know I can't. Tell me the name." A sharp kiss to his cheek, with a hint of teeth behind it.

Slowly, successfully, Harry fought himself out of that embrace, and moved towards the door. The mist in his head was finally dissipating. He turned to face Draco, and shook his head.

"Not unless you promise."

Draco cocked his head to the side, and a faint, amused smile curved his mouth. "Harry," he said gently. "You've misunderstood something fundamental about me. You still have the impression that, at bottom, I care as much for the rest of the school as you do. I don't. Your life is more important to me than that of some random Ravenclaw. You're mine. I am going to find out that name. I won't push you now, but I will find it out, and I will punish her."

Harry had the feeling his eyes flickered, but he did his best to maintain the neutral mask. "Who said it's a female Ravenclaw?"

“Because it usually is, lately.” Draco moved past him, still smiling. “Rest now. You’ve been wounded. You need to sleep, and I need to make sure she’ll regret ever being born.”

Harry folded his arms and shut his eyes. The odd atmosphere still lingered around him, made him want nothing so much as to go to Draco and tell.

And is your emotional comfort worth Marietta’s life?

Harry swallowed and shook his head. He was tired after the argument at the dueling club and the pain from the curse and trying to prevent Ron from attacking Marietta and the healing spell. He could rest. He could do that.

Harry heard the first murmurs of excited conversation the next morning before he ever arrived at the Great Hall. Two of the Slytherin prefects were walking in front of him and Draco as they went to breakfast, and Harry tensed in spite of himself when he heard “Ravenclaw.”

“—a foot-long tongue, and her skin turned purple with pink spots! Madam Pomfrey couldn’t figure out how to remove them!”

“Is it true her arm was Transfigured into a chicken wing?” The female prefect’s eyes were bright with enjoyment as she listened, and the male prefect, the one who, it seemed, had actually been in the hospital wing and seen the victim, was happy to oblige her with more details.

“Oh, yeah. And her left foot was a chicken’s talon, original size and everything, so she can’t walk. She’s delusional and blind, and her hair’s grown down the sides of her head and into her skin. I think there might even be more things wrong that I didn’t get to see.” The male prefect’s voice rang wistfully. “But the best thing is that all the spells are interwoven together. To take one off, Madam Pomfrey will have to take them all off, and she can’t figure some of them out!”

The female prefect snickered appreciatively. “What’s her name?”

“Marietta Edgecombe.” The boy shook his head. “I don’t know what she did to annoy the Weasley twins, but I sure hope I never do it.”

Harry felt his shoulders stiffen. Ron. Ron told the twins to get vengeance on Marietta, and they did. It sounded as though they’d launched several hexes or tricks or jokes in her direction all at once, but the interwoven nature of the spells suggested it was more complex and malicious than that.

The worst thing was that Harry couldn’t confront Ron about it. He would be the one to expose the House feud if he did. The prefects weren’t speaking as if these were the actions of a pair of Gryffindors against a Ravenclaw; these were the actions of the Weasley twins against someone who irritated them. Fred and George pranked everyone who would sit still long enough. No one was going to think that Marietta was a special case, that this was revenge for a spell she’d cast at someone else.

Very good, Ron, Harry thought grudgingly. You’re hot-tempered as all hell, but you’re a good strategist. Of course, Ron was a master chess player. Harry shouldn’t have let himself forget that in the face of Ron’s shouting.

Draco caught his arm. Harry looked sideways, and saw his eyes shining like blades in the sun.

“Marietta Edgecombe?” Draco murmured.

Harry knew the expression that flashed across his face said he was caught. Draco gave him the same slow, sweet predator’s smile.

“She’s the one who will regret being born, then,” said Draco, with a nod. “I see.”

“Don’t, Draco,” Harry hissed under his breath as they entered the Great Hall. “The twins got her. Hasn’t she been punished enough?”

“Not nearly enough,” Draco breathed. “Oh, Harry, the things I am going to curse her with.”

“I don’t want you to,” said Harry, deciding that direct appeal was probably the most likely tactic to work right now. If Draco cared about what he wanted, then he should—

Draco just shook his head, and escorted Harry in to breakfast with a hand on his back. Harry made a few more attempts to dissuade him from whatever vengeance was floating around his brain, including arguments about the damage from the Blood Whip being easily reversed and war in the school happening if he took revenge. Draco hummed to himself and ignored him.

Harry hissed in frustration as he sat down at the far edge of the Slytherin table and started to eat. Why does he act all compliant when I do want him to assert himself, and then turn stubborn over things like this?

The post owls came skimming in through the windows, bearing the Daily Prophet. Harry already knew there would be a story about the abuse charges, or about the trial, or about “ordinary citizens” voicing “concern over the loss of Albus Dumbledore” and “false charges,” if the writer was Argus Veritaserum. He made up his mind to concentrate on his food and ignore them.

Draco’s humming stopped. Harry felt the tension inside him crank up another notch, but he kept on eating.

“Harry,” said Draco, and his voice lacked that terrible gentleness. This was actual sympathy. He held the newspaper towards Harry. “I’m sorry, but you have to see this. It’s better now than it will be later.”

Harry swallowed and took the paper, staring blankly. At first, his eyes were drawn to the photograph, and he didn’t quite understand what he was seeing. It looked like Auror Mallory, a triumphant smile on her face, walking between two considerably sterner Aurors down a corridor lined with cells. Harry almost didn’t recognize her. What in the world could have happened to make her smile like that?

Then he saw the headline.

HEAD AUROR ARRESTED FOR CURSING POTTER PARENTS

'They deserved it' Mallory said

By: Rita Skeeter

Harry couldn't bring himself to read the story. He handed the paper back to Draco instead and shoved his chair away from the table.

"Wait a second, Harry," said Millicent, scrambling up and grabbing his right arm. Draco's hand closed around the stump of his left wrist a moment later, in that delicate gesture he used to command Harry's attention. "We're not done yet, and I think someone should go with you."

"I'm fine," Harry whispered. He tried and failed not to think of his parents writhing under the kind of battle curses a trained Auror would know. He tried and failed not to think of the rage Mallory had shown when she came to the school that summer to arrest Lily and Dumbledore. She could do wandless magic. She was nearly as strong as Snape. She would have made them suffer.

He felt his breakfast rushing back up his throat, and tore his arm and his wrist free from Draco's and Millicent's hands. As he ran towards the door of the Great Hall, he caught a glimpse of Connor's face, frozen in horror, and his heart pounded, hard, in guilt. If he had contacted Scrimgeour and asked him to make sure that Mallory wasn't let anywhere near their parents, then perhaps this wouldn't have happened.

"Intestinus erumpo!"

Harry knew he should have been able to block it. He knew he should have had a shield up. Perhaps if the person who cast the spell had been farther away from him at the time, and if pity and guilt and terror hadn't eaten his concentration, he still could have managed it.

As it was, the Entrail-Expelling Curse hit him in the back a second after it was cast. Harry cried out as he felt his belly slit open and his intestines fly out of them, tangling around his feet. The pain was unearthly, unable to stand comparisons to anything else he'd felt because he'd never felt anything like this before. He dropped to his knees, gasping, knowing even through the haze of agony that he shouldn't move. That was how many wizards reacted to the Entrail-Expelling Curse, and they wound up tangling themselves in their own guts and doing more damage.

Draco was by his side a second later, hands shaking and eyes wide. Harry leaned against him, gasping, closing his eyes as the spell pushed one more tangle of pink and white out of him. He could smell blood and shit and fouler things. He concentrated, pulling on his magic, forcing himself to think of this as a battlefield. The sheer horror of what had happened to him kept trying to push his mind away from the healing spell that might help.

"Finite Incantatem," he said first, just to make sure that he removed the last of the curse. Otherwise, it might be struggling to push his guts out of him even as he repaired his stomach. Shock was quickly descending on him, but Harry fell back into his training, in which such things as shock didn't exist, and there was only what had to be done. "Conglacio." That stilled the movement of his intestines. "Abdo intestinus."

The guts coiled back up inside him, a process that made Harry jerk in Draco's arms and draw several gasping breaths. Merlin, this hurt. But that was no reason to faint. Harry repeated the spell several times, focusing his mind on a picture of what his body would look like, healthy and normal. He knew the damage many curses caused. He just had to reverse his mental picture of the Entrail-Expelling one, and it should be perfectly reversed, everything back in its proper place.

Larger hands steadied him as the last of the pink and white coils settled into place, and then a low voice snarled an incantation that would at least staunch his blood flow and hold the wound in his stomach motionless. Harry blinked up at Snape, his eyes fluttering in time with his breaths now.

"Sleep, Harry," said Snape. His eyes were incandescent with rage, the brightest Harry had ever seen them. "Consopio."

In spite of his curiosity, in spite of his longing to tell them to go easy on the person who had done this, Harry closed his eyes and went to sleep.

Minerva was familiar with Severus Snape's bad moods. She had seen plenty of them—the temper he was usually in when he came out of one of his little chats with Dumbledore, the cold sarcastic anger in which he sometimes dragged one of her particularly mischief-making Gryffindors in front of her (it was usually a Weasley twin), the sneering contempt he used when he thought he knew something she didn't or that had flown above her head.

Until now, though, when his rage burned hot and he actually screamed at her in her office, she realized she had never seen him truly infuriated.

"Someone attacked him in the middle of the Great Hall, Minerva! The Entrail-Expelling Curse! And just because none of Flitwick's little bastards will give up their comrade does not mean that I intend to see this go unpunished!" Severus leaned forward across her desk and glared at her. "I will use Veritaserum and Legilimency with or without your permission. I will find the person who did this."

Minerva maintained the calm mask while she rapidly considered her options. On the one hand, she could hardly do as Severus asked without protests from parents that their little darlings had been forced to take a truth serum or have their minds ransacked. What Severus wanted was between dubious and outright illegal, unless the students actually volunteered.

On the other hand, she knew as well as Severus that if they let this go unpunished, then Harry would never be safe. Madam Pomfrey couldn't be on guard in the hospital wing twenty-four hours a day, and neither could young Mr. Malfoy—though from what Minerva now knew of the boy, she had no doubt that he would try. Someone would enter sooner or later and try to cast another illegal curse, or even a lethal one. Harry might be sleeping. He might not know the counter. Several people might attack at once, overcoming him because of his ethics and reluctance to hurt others.

Something had to be done.

A knock on the door interrupted her before she could tell Severus what she thought their best option was. Minerva sighed and sat up. The only people who knew the password for the gargoyle were other professors and prefects. Almost certainly, one of them would bring more bad news. "Come in," she said steadily.

The student who entered was not a prefect, but a fourth-year Ravenclaw. Minerva stared at her in wonder. It was a moment before she could recall her name, but one didn't forget those large glasses and protruding silver eyes easily.

"Miss Lovegood," she said at last, trying to control her tone. "What are you doing here?"

Luna Lovegood nodded seriously at her. "Headmistress," she said. "I asked the chairs at the Ravenclaw table about who Harry's attacker was. And I have a name now. It was Gilbert Rovenan."

Minerva could see still and terrible anger gathering in Severus's face. He would shout, at any second, that they didn't have time for Luna's nonsense right now, that she was wasting valuable moments when they could have gone hunting for the real suspect, that she must indeed be quite mad to come to the Headmistress's office.

But Minerva was thinking. She knew that Luna should not have been able to enter the moving staircase at all. And she was remembering a girl she had known when she was a Hogwarts student, one who seemed distracted half the time because of objects chattering constantly at her.

"Miss Lovegood," she said. "How did you get up here?"

Luna gave her a patient look. "The gargoyle told me, Headmistress," she said. "It's quite lonely, you know. I think you should talk to it more. I'm just me, but anyone could get up here if they just charmed it for a few moments and got it to give them the password," she added in a tone of censure.

“Ridiculous,” Severus hissed.

“And yet, Severus, here she stands,” Minerva told him, and saw rationality take hold in his mind for the first time since Harry was hurt. His eyes narrowed, and he gave Luna a long look.

“You are a friend of my ward, Miss Lovegood?” he asked.

“Oh, yes.” Luna’s face brightened. “We went to the Yule Ball together last year.” Snape was nodding now, the right chord in his brain obviously pressed. “He was so kind,” Luna continued, “not stepping too heavily on the floor or crushing the benches when he sat down. The furniture all likes him. So the chairs were happy to tell me that it was Gilbert who cast the Entrail-Expelling Curse.”

“Why are you willing to tell us who did it, Miss Lovegood?” Minerva had to ask. The rest of the Ravenclaws, though some of them looked torn, had maintained that they didn’t know who cast the curse.

Luna’s face was solemn. “Because I know for certain, and I’m not Gilbert’s friend,” she said. “I’m Harry’s. He’s been very strange—Harry, I mean. The walls have tried to talk to him, but he can’t hear them. So they’ve been talking to me instead. I know people have been casting curses at him, but Harry always wills other people to leave them alone so strongly that he blocks the walls’ memories. This time, he wasn’t anywhere near the chairs, and they told me about Gilbert.”

Severus had started for the door at a glide, his eyes gleaming. “Severus,” Minerva said sharply. He paused and glanced at her over his shoulder. “Bring him here. Alive, and unharmed,” she added.

Severus studied her intently for a moment, then inclined his head in a sharp nod and left. Minerva hoped her caution would actually work, and that Severus would not pause along the way to “let drop” to his Slytherins who had done this.

“Miss Lovegood, do you know why Mr. Rovenan cast that curse?” she asked her.

Luna sat down carefully, patting the back of the chair she sat in as if stroking a cat. "Because Marietta Edgecombe is his girlfriend," she said simply. "She wound up in the hospital wing this morning, and Gilbert blames Harry for it." She shrugged. "I tried to ask the walls if that was fair, but Harry blocked their memory again."

Minerva decided that she might as well give in to her curiosity, as Severus was most likely bringing their culprit. "This is a remarkable gift you have, Miss Lovegood."

Luna looked at her in mild puzzlement. "Thank you, Headmistress, but really, everything talks. Everything is alive. But most people refuse to listen," she concluded, with a little sigh.

Minerva continued talking to her for the few minutes it took Severus to arrive again. Luna continued to gently deflect her queries. So far as she was concerned, she lived in the actual, normal world, and everyone else was blind, deaf, and dumb. At least, Minerva thought, it would explain the quiet, dreamy girl's inattention in class, if all the objects in sight were simultaneously trying to tell her stories.

Gilbert Rovenan was a burly sixth-year Ravenclaw whom Minerva remembered as an above-average Transfiguration student, though for some reason he hadn't received enough OWL levels to continue into the NEWT class. He tugged away from Snape the moment they were through the office door, and straightened his sleeve. He had blue eyes and dark hair, and wasn't bad-looking, though not much above ordinary in that department, either. He appealed to her without looking once at the silent, and tightly coiled, Head of Slytherin beside him.

"Headmistress, Professor Snape seized my arm and hauled me off," he complained. "Is that fair? He wouldn't even tell me what it was about."

"We know that you cast the Entrail-Expelling Curse at Mr. Potter," said Minerva, choosing to act as if they had certain knowledge from long years of handling Gryffindors who, while they would not lie, would keep silent unless they thought she already had evidence of their wrongdoing.

Gilbert flushed to the roots of his hair, and his face twisted with hatred that Minerva could only stare at. “He hurt my girlfriend,” he said, his voice low and murderous. “I knew the curse. I thought it was only fair that he pay for hurting her.”

Minerva closed her eyes. She knew Severus would wear a triumphant expression, and Luna a sorrowful one. Her decision was already made.

“Mr. Rovenan,” she said, “you will be expelled. Your wand will be broken. You—”

“But you can’t—I have to speak to Professor Flitwick! I want to talk to my parents!” Gilbert’s voice was becoming shrill.

And so, Minerva thought, it begins. She opened her eyes and entered the first skirmish in the war that was about to break out in Hogwarts. This was her battleground now, and while it was infinitely less satisfying to intimidate a sixteen-year-old boy than it was to battle a Dark wizard and Transfigure him into a lump of shapeless flesh, she was not one to shirk her duties.

Harry came slowly back to himself. It felt as if he didn’t awaken, but rather washed in to shore on a wave. First he felt the water, and then the dry sand under his palms, and then the whole scene inverted and he was lying in a hospital bed with someone holding a cup of water to his lips.

Harry drank. The arm that had gently supported his shoulders tightened fast enough to make him grunt in pain, and Draco’s voice called, “Madam Pomfrey! He’s awake!”

Harry opened his eyes, and then blinked as Draco slipped his glasses onto his face. He turned his head to look into at him.

“You could have died.” Draco’s face was pale, and his eyes had that blade-gleam, this time mingled with fear.

"But I didn't." Harry thought it was important to point that out. He wriggled and tried to sit up in the bed, but Madam Pomfrey came bustling out then and scolded him into lying still.

"Not so fast, Mr. Potter," she said. "You've suffered a great deal of shock, you know, and then you disordered things further when you attempted to put your entrails back into your gut all by yourself." She gave him a chiding look as she held her wand over his belly. "So that had to be straightened out. You've been asleep for a day. You'll be staying here at least three more days for observation. That's the minimum length of time it takes to recover from an Entrail-Expelling Curse."

Harry subsided. When he looked around, he could see that Connor, Ron, Hermione, Ginny, Blaise, Millicent, Zacharias, Luna, and Neville were there, and he flushed in embarrassment to find himself the focus of so many gazes. Madam Pomfrey went into action a moment later, herding all of them but Draco and Connor out, so that one obstacle was taken care of.

"Merlin, Harry," Draco said then, and hugged him around the neck. "I thought you were dead."

I came closer than I'd like to think, Harry thought. He swallowed a healing potion that Madam Pomfrey gave him, then asked, "What's been happening?"

"They caught the one who cast the curse at you," said Connor. His eyes were furiously alight, and he was twirling his wand between his fingers, ignoring Madam Pomfrey's frowns and pointed looks at it. "His name's Gilbert Rovenan. He's going to be expelled. They've talked it over, Professor Flitwick and the Headmistress, and Professor Flitwick finally gave up pleading for him. He's going." He paused and stared over Harry's bed at Draco. "But not until tomorrow."

Harry glanced at Draco in alarm. He was just in time to see an expression that looked far too much like his brother's on his boyfriend's face.

“And what are you going to do?” Harry demanded. He tried to sit up again, but he was weak enough that Draco held him easily down with one arm.

“Who says that we’re going to do anything?” Connor said innocently. “We can’t get into Ravenclaw Tower, anyway.” He gave a winning smile at Madam Pomfrey, who simply moved away from the bed as if she had no interest in what they were saying. The moment she was gone, Connor leaned nearer and lowered his voice. “We’re going in tonight, Ron and Draco and I, with Fred and George and Ginny and Hermione. Luna’ll let us in, and Cho will join us once we get there.”

“But—“

“Connor, would you leave me alone with Harry, please?” Draco asked then, with unnatural politeness. Connor nodded the same way.

“Of course. I have to get to my dueling lesson with Professor Snape anyway.” He tipped a wink at Draco. Harry wished they would stop that. It was unnerving. “Nine o’clock, then?”

“As we agreed,” Draco said, and Connor left.

Harry started in the moment his brother walked through the doors of the hospital wing. “You can’t hurt him. If he’s going to be expelled, then—“

“You’re wrong, Harry,” Draco said. “Things didn’t fall out the way you thought they would, not when Rovenan attacked you in front of the entire school. None of the professors could ignore what happened. There’s no war between Houses. Most of Ravenclaw is ashamed as hell about it, or, if they’re angry, they have the good sense to shut up. Even the Hufflepuffs are shunning them. Gryffindors and Slytherins are getting along better than we ever have planning revenge for you. Don’t you see, Harry?” he added. “It’s practically incumbent on you not to object to this, in the name of inter-House unity.”

“I don’t want him hurt—“

“You don’t get a choice.” Draco abruptly leaned in towards him, and Harry shrank back. Draco’s words were soft and fierce. “Not this time. Your safety and your well-being matters to more people than just you, Harry, and even to more people than just other Slytherins. You’re not a saint, that we should just forgive whatever happens to you. We’ve been pushed too far, and this is the end.”

Harry shut his eyes. “Nothing I can say is going to stop it?”

“Nothing,” Draco confirmed. “Even if you tell one of the professors, we can get past them, since we have Ravenclaws on the inside we didn’t tell you about. And you’re too weak to get out of bed and go stand guard at the Tower, so unless you’re actually going to compel us to stop, there’s nothing you can do to prevent us. Are you going to compel us, Harry?” His chin inched up.

Harry stared at him, and saw not just the Slytherin determined to take vengeance, nor the Malfoy protecting what belonged to him, but also the boy who had nearly seen his boyfriend die in front of him. Harry remembered the surge of protective rage he’d felt when Greyback went after Draco.

He swallowed and closed his eyes, shaking his head.

“Good,” said Draco softly, and kissed Harry, and then left.

Harry stared at the ceiling, absently rubbing his stomach, and wondered why the hell these things seemed to happen to him so often.

Chapter Thirty-Four: Ravenclaw Tower

Snape stepped back and lowered his wand, blinking slowly. His ears rang from the explosions of smoke and light, and though none of the spells that Potter had hurled had touched him, the effort behind them was much improved.

“I am tempted to award points to Gryffindor,” he murmured.

Potter inclined his head as he put his wand away. He didn't look tired, the way that most young wizards would have after casting that many spells in quick succession. He looked as though flames had taken root in him, hollowed him out, and spread to shine through his eyes. Snape studied him narrowly, and then nodded. He would not have thought it, but then, he had been letting the shadow of James—and of Harry, who was at home in both Dark and Light—blind him. This Potter was more closely akin in his magic to what a Weasley might be able to do. He could hurl much stronger Light spells than he would ever manage Dark Arts. His use of spells based on fire and light was nearly instinctive.

And rage, in this case rage fueled by protectiveness for his brother, enhanced his magic. But it had to be true and righteous anger, not the irritation that he had shown so far in his dueling lessons with Snape.

“But you won't award points, Professor?”

Potter's sly voice brought him back from his contemplation. Snape shook his head. “No, I won't,” he said. “I will the day that you manage to knock me out with a spell.” He grimaced immediately after having made the promise—he never awarded points to the Lion House if he could help it—but what was said was said. And Potter's smile was not as smug as he would have expected, merely confident.

“That's to be expected, Professor,” he murmured. “Now, if you excuse me, I need to meet someone at nine.” And he opened the door and hastened out of the office before Snape could even dismiss him.

Snape thought about taking points for impertinence. Then he thought about the flames behind Potter's hazel eyes—the same flames that he had once seen in the eyes of James Potter across the one battlefield where Snape had ever respected him—and refrained.

He moved slowly over to the simmering cauldron, and resumed brewing his potion. It would look like the Draught of Peace to anyone who came in and looked at it. He could account for all the ingredients to Minerva, and even for his reasons for brewing it. Of course he would want to show the students what a perfect example looked like, since it was an OWL-standard Potion and none of them had yet managed to brew it correctly.

No one but another Potions Master—and few of them, Snape was certain—would have noticed that there was the slightest green tinge to the Draught, a deep and living green like that on the Slytherin crests.

Snape worked swiftly, his fingers shredding and cutting and crushing and stirring without much thought. He would much rather remember the way Harry had looked after the Entrail-Expelling Curse had hit him than concentrate on a potion he had been able to brew since he was seven, or even the variation that he had perfected when he was sixteen.

He wanted to etch the memory of Harry's white and gasping face into his brain. He wanted to savor the realization that had hit him, a former Death Eater who had seen that curse performed numerous times, that this time was different from all the others, and that something in him would have died if he had lost Harry.

That mattered more than all the vengeance he might take, even more than the vengeance he suspected Connor Potter and some other students were on their way to take. It mattered that Harry was alive and healing and had the chance to change. His parents in prison, people paying for what had been done to him, Dumbledore executed or stripped of his magic—what were they but details?

For the first time in his life, Severus Snape could acknowledge that vengeance might not be the best course. He could look back on the potions he had brewed for James Potter and Minister Fudge last year not with regret that he had got caught, but with regret that he had ever brewed them all, because in brewing them he had hurt Harry.

The words were simple in his mind. He could not figure out why they were such an enormous revelation.

Then he looked down at the green-shimmering potion in the cauldron, and he knew.

Though he would certainly finish this potion, he might not use it. In fact, he might Vanish it the moment it was correctly brewed.

The thought of hurting Rovenan paled beside the thought of hurting Harry.

Draco nodded as Connor came up, completing their group. The other Gryffindors had met him at the base of the final staircase up to Ravenclaw Tower considerably earlier, since they had no dueling lesson with Snape to hinder them.

Granger had a dark frown on her face, and she was tapping her wand against her leg. That was considerably scarier than the two youngest Weasleys, who were either eyeing Draco suspiciously or eyeing the steps in anticipation, but not as scary as the Weasley twins. For the first time Draco had been around them since he'd arrived at Hogwarts, they weren't laughing, nor even smiling. Oh, sometimes they smirked, as when their hands went down and patted their robe pockets. But they weren't laughing, and Draco suspected he was about to see what Fred and George Weasley could be like when they were actually going into battle, not just pranking someone for the fun of it.

"Let's go," Draco whispered. They followed him up the stairs, though he heard Weasley—Ron—muttering about how come Malfoy got to take the lead. His sister shut him up with a few choice words that made Draco hide a chuckle. He wouldn't have thought any Weasley knew those words, never mind the youngest.

No one met them on the stairs. Draco did stop them halfway up to cast Disillusionment Charms on them all. If Ravenclaw Tower was set up at all like Slytherin or Gryffindor, then the sixth-year boys' room might be a considerable distance from the door. All they really knew was that Rovenan had received permission to spend one last night among his cronies, in his own room, before his ceremonious expulsion and the snapping of his wand tomorrow morning. Chang was going to be their guide once they entered the Tower.

Draco curled his lip, then shook his head. He shouldn't feel so irritated at the thought of Chang, really. She was joining them because of the life-debt she owed Harry; this couldn't make up for it, but taking revenge on someone who had hurt her ally would be a duty for a Light pureblood witch. And Harry had proven conclusively two days ago, as far as Draco was concerned, that he belonged to Draco now.

Smirking at the thought of that, he nearly missed Loony Lovegood's slight movement. She stepped out from behind the tapestry that overhung the front door of the Tower and startled them all. Draco controlled himself and narrowed his eyes, though they narrowed even further when she looked straight at them as if their Disillusionment Charms weren't there.

"Oh, hello," she said. "You might have wanted to choose stronger spells, though. I can see you."

"Yes, but no one else can, Luna," said Granger. Her voice rasped. Draco wondered if she was just impatient, or if Loony grated on her as much as she did on him. Of course, Granger was all about logic and clear ends, so maybe she would dislike anyone as mad as Loony.

And why the hell am I wondering about what the Mudblood, of all people, thinks? Draco shook his head. I'll be as bad as Harry next, insisting on "understanding" people all over the place. I should be thinking about revenge on Rovenan.

As it happened, though, he had the perfect curse, so he didn't need to think about it that much. Loony had already whispered the password to the Tower door, and it swung wide. They followed after her, while Loony hovered to the side and looked around vaguely. That was another reason having her let them in was a stroke of genius, and Draco had to admit he commended the Weasel—Ron—for having thought of it. No one would think it strange that Loony Lovegood was keeping the door open for a long time, or just standing there and staring into space.

The Ravenclaw common room was considerably warmer than the dungeons, of course, partially because of its location but also because of the many fires flaring along the walls; Draco didn't think he'd ever been in a room with so many hearths in his life. Blue and bronze was everywhere, and smooth, dark furniture dominated the view, if one didn't count the enormous mural of a soaring eagle on the far wall. Staircases sprouted at the other end of the long, narrow room, and even as Chang popped out of a chair near the largest fire and strolled casually towards them, Draco's gaze locked on them.

"This way," Chang murmured, pausing just in front of them. Draco stared at her suspiciously, but then realized there was a faint, rhinestone-colored glow around her eyes. She had on a spell that let her see through glamours and charms, then. It was comforting to realize that, and also to see that almost all the other Ravenclaws remained bent over their books or engaged in agitated, whispered conversations as they passed towards the staircases.

Draco studied the expressions on their faces, and sneered. Most of them seemed embarrassed or ashamed or fearful. Well, they should be. Ravenclaw was currently lowest in the number of House points, extremely unlikely to win the Cup, and Slytherin was preparing to declare a silent war on them. Even the seventh-years whom Draco knew had listened most sympathetically to talk of pureblood purity, and therefore might join the Death Eaters, were outraged that a half-blood had dared to attack someone powerful enough to be a Lord, and that he would only be expelled and have his wand broken in retaliation for that. The argument that the Headmistress couldn't do more than that because Rovenan wasn't of age had been ignored, as it should be, Draco thought. Any proper Slytherin knew there were ways of doing things outside the boundaries of the law.

He had already written to his father, asking him to pursue a few of those ways. If Lucius took Draco's suggestions, the Rovenan family was about to find itself a good deal poorer. They owed debts, it seemed, or at least his pureblood father did. Lucius only had to buy up a few of those debts, or procure them by favors granted, and then call them in all at once.

Draco rather thought his father would do it. Harry was theirs—the boy Draco loved, the leader they had sworn to follow, his father's truce-dance ally, his mother's all but adopted son. Lucius would probably come up with even more creative punishments, which Draco was all for.

They reached the foot of a certain staircase, and Chang tipped her head at them. "Be quiet," she murmured. "They're having a farewell party for him right now, but there're only a few people up there. They'll hear us coming unless we're careful."

Draco nodded, and made shushing gestures at the others, though he wondered how effective they would be, considering the Disillusionment Charms. He followed Chang as quietly as he could, and the Weasley twins did a creditable impression of sneakiness, too. It was not Draco's fault that Granger and Connor and the two younger Weasleys sounded like elephants.

They reached a door marked Ravenclaw Sixth-Year Boys. Draco rolled his eyes. He supposed Ravenclaws liked everything precise, but there was no need for that kind of nonsense in Slytherin. Everyone knew where the rooms were, and who they belonged to, and who should be in them at any given time of the day.

The room was indeed silent. Chang gave them one more warning glance, and then laid her hand on the door.

She froze. Draco wondered if she'd heard something suspicious. He gripped his wand tightly, waiting for her signal to move ahead.

Then Chang withdrew her hand from the wood, and Draco saw that she was shaking. A moment later, she slumped motionless to the floor. Draco stared down at her in shock. The door had some kind of ward on it. But who would do that, when they're living in common and—

The door to the room burst open, and many, many more Ravenclaws than Draco had expected to be facing rushed out. He could make out Parsons in the back of them, and Turtledove, Parsons's particular friend, and Corner, and Terry Boot, and a few others he knew.

At the head of them all was Rovenan, and his eyes shone with a mixture of desperation and fury.

"Finite Incantatem!" he bellowed, gesturing straight at them with his wand.

Draco felt the warmth of the Disillusionment Charms vanishing, and then Rovenan was on him, and he didn't have much time or chance to think about anything else.

He cast up a Protego, using the instincts that Harry had drilled into him in the dueling club, and so Rovenan's first hex bounced and went straight back at him. He rolled out of the way with what Draco thought were disturbingly battle-trained reflexes, and the hex took down one of the girls behind him. That still left too many for Draco's taste, especially since he was on a narrow landing with his allies ranged behind him and below him on the stairs, but at least he had a moment to breathe and think, and settle on the curse that he would like to use next.

It has to be a battle curse, not a vengeance curse. And no Dark Arts unless absolutely necessary.

Rovenan was already spitting out the first syllables of what sounded like a Dismemberment Curse—and where the hell had he learned so much about Dark Arts?—but Draco was faster than that. The Dismemberment Curse had at least eight syllables. He only had to speak four.

"Rictusempra!"

Rovenan began to laugh, and his wand trembled in his hand. Draco watched for a moment, and decided that he was not going to drop it. He didn't allow himself more than a moment to make that decision, remembering the lesson that Harry had tried to drill into him, and Professor Snape, and their battle on the night of the full moon: The wizard left alive on the battlefield is often the quickest.

“Expelliarmus!”

The wand soared from Rovenan’s hand to Draco’s. Rovenan’s eyes flashed, but he didn’t look a bit fearful, even as Draco stuck the wand in a pocket and clapped his left hand over it. Instead, he turned halfway around, crouching, and began yanking at his robe.

A pair of bright yellow pebbles soared over Draco’s head and smacked down in the middle of the landing. One of the twins yelled, “Cover your nose!”

Draco had time to heed the warning. The several Ravenclaws on the landing, who were packed together and probably hadn’t seen exactly who they were facing yet, didn’t.

Plumes of yellow smoke burst into being from the pebbles. They didn’t drift and dissipate like smoke, though, but maintained a solid fountain shape, like water, heading straight for the Ravenclaws. A few of them took it right in the nose, and began to moan. Draco watched as red blotches broke out over their faces and their eyes swelled shut, and chuckled in spite of himself. It looked as though the twins had given them a nasty allergic reaction to something.

He felt a shove at his side, and then the Weasley sister was on the landing with him, just as Parsons aimed her wand. Parsons said something that sounded nasty and twisting, not a spell Draco was familiar with, and a dark line sprang from her wand and head towards Ginny.

Ginny blocked it with Haurio, another shield spell Harry had been drilling into the dueling club, and then cast the Bat-Bogey Hex. Parsons clapped her hand over her nose, yelping indignantly.

Draco tried to press forward, to get to Rovenan and stop whatever he was doing, but the landing was too small and too filled with too many people. The Ravenclaws who’d succumbed to the twins’ pebbles had fallen, and the others in the room were pushing their way out now.

With a grimace, Draco knew they'd have to retreat down the stairs and hope they didn't caught on the carpet or tripped up—or worse, met by Ravenclaws from below. Draco had the impression that most of those in the common room had been caught by surprise, but surely that couldn't last.

He tapped Ginny on the shoulder and began to move backward, keeping up his Protego to get rid of the hexes and jinxes and curses coming his way. He strove to keep his head clear and his breathing even. Now was not the time for the kind of amateur heroics that Gryffindors favored. Just be steady, and they would all reach the bottom and be able to fight their way out of here.

Abruptly, all the magic around them turned foul. Draco gasped and began to cough. He felt weak in the knees. He bent over, closing his eyes, despite the fact that he wanted to stay upright and keep his hold on his wand. He'd never felt evil before, he thought, but he was feeling it now.

He remembered what it had been like on the battlefield when the bitch werewolf had tried to kill Harry. It had hurt to possess her and cast the Killing Curse on her, but he'd managed to do it, because he knew he had to. Harry was right. Push through this, and do what needs to be done.

He stood, and was glad to see that the female Weasley had retreated down to the step behind him, and that the rest of the Ravenclaws were coughing and gagging just like he was. A few of them had fainted. One or two were staring at Rovenan with looks of horror on their faces. Rovenan was coming forward, his face flushed, but he was seemingly otherwise unaffected by the magic. Maybe he's the source of it, Draco thought, though he didn't understand how that could be, unless he was capable of wandless magic.

He understood everything when he saw the bared and gleaming Dark Mark on Rovenan's forearm.

Harry said something like this happened once, that one of the Death Eaters he fought on the beach last summer turned all the magic foul. It's a last-ditch trick, apparently, but one that can be effective.

It was no longer working on Draco, though. He was stone-cold sober, and he knew what Rovenan was trying to do. He really had been trying to kill Harry, and playing on his House's general pigheadedness to hide his intent. And it had been awfully strange, hadn't it, Draco thought, his mind clattering along like the Hogwarts Express, that so many Ravenclaws were casting high-level Dark Arts spells like the Blood Whip and the Entrail-Expelling Curse?

Rovenan locked eyes with him, and his smile suddenly faltered, as though he realized Draco was neither choking nor flinching from him in panic. He thrust his Marked arm forward. Draco choked once, but he gripped his wand and prepared to use a Dark Arts spell. He could, now. A Death Eater was fair game.

"Draco! Do not."

Draco didn't move—he wasn't that foolish, to take his eyes off his enemy—but he felt every hair on his neck rise and tingle. Professor Snape was here.

Snape felt it the moment the Dark Mark went into action, befouling all magic in the immediate area.

He felt it even though he was in the dungeons and he knew the befouling was happening several floors above. Hogwarts was pure of such evil influences, since Snape would never have used his own Mark in such a way. That made the sudden presence of this particular vicious trick as noticeable as a fire in the midst of a closed room. He rose, and he turned his head, and he let the sucking presence lead him.

Once he was out of the dungeons, he knew it was coming from Ravenclaw Tower. He altered his direction, then. As a teacher, he knew several little-used passages that ran towards the Tower, and they would cut down on the length of time that he had to spend running, since this bloody school wouldn't let him Apparate.

He reached the tapestry, and realized he had no idea what the password was. He didn't care. He lifted his wand, and his magic coiled in him and whirled around, and his Reducto smashed the door, and the tapestry with it, to bits.

That particular spell was safe. It was used by wizards of the Light as well as the Dark, and for all that his own Mark was burning on his arm now, it wouldn't poison him—yet. Any use of Dark Arts in the befouled area would. Light spells were safe for at least the next half hour.

He tore through the common room, murmuring spells that repelled the bodies trying to run at him, the screaming students who didn't have an idea what was going on and probably never would. Snape felt a surge of contempt even through the worry he was feeling right now. How could students reach their seventh year in Hogwarts and yet still be so innocent? They should train them better. Were it not for the curse on the position, he would ask Minerva to let him teach Defense.

And then he saw the knot of struggling bodies on the staircase, and knew his destination. He also saw the moment that Draco Malfoy straightened, fighting back against the overwhelming influence of the twisted magic, and knew that he was about to use Dark Arts, because that was what he would naturally turn to, with the training that Lucius had given him during his childhood and the way he knew war.

“Draco! Do not.”

Snape assumed Draco had heard him, since he didn't collapse and shrivel into a withered husk in the next moment. Snape cast Wingardium Leviosa on himself, so that he could rise to his Slytherin's level in a very short time. He wasn't about to bother with the stairs, given that it was crowded with Weasleys.

He knew only three ways to stop the poison the Dark Mark was spreading. One was for the Death Eater who had invoked it to end it willingly. Snape doubted this one would do so, since he'd kept it burning for so long already. Another was for the Death Eater involved to Apparate or Portkey out—impossible, because of the wards on Hogwarts and this room in particular, though Snape supposed the fool might make it to one of the common room's many fireplaces and Floo.

The third was for the Death Eater involved to die by a Light spell. Snape feared that course was the one he would have to take. He would see who the Death Eater was first.

He lifted his head, and was surprised and not surprised to see Gilbert Rovenan standing with his left forearm bared in front of Draco. The boy hadn't seemed any more likely to be a Death Eater than anyone else, but Snape had barely known him, and he would have had an excellent hiding place, in the pit of chaos that Ravenclaw House had become of late.

Rovenan smirked at Snape, as if asking what the professor intended to do to him. Snape leveled his wand, holding the boy's eyes all the while. He saw excitement in them, and vindictive glee, and no awareness of what he had done. Snape could understand that. He'd once felt much the same way, the first time he attacked a Muggleborn home as a Death Eater and saw the inhabitants cowering in front of him, someone paying him respect at last.

There were all sorts of routes by which Voldemort might have snared this boy. Perhaps he had been promised power and glory. Perhaps a family member had recruited him. Perhaps Karkaroff or Mulciber, during the time they'd taught Defense Against the Dark Arts last year, the most laughably named class in the whole of Hogwarts, had talked him into it.

Snape would never know, unless both of them managed to survive this confrontation, and he did not think they would. As he knew the emotions in the boy's eyes, he knew what the likely outcomes would be. And when it had been him in Rovenan's place, the earth could have shaken and he would not have yielded his loyalty to Voldemort, so convinced was he of his own rightness.

Snape felt something in him shift and click forward, a mixture of sorrow and utter determination that settled easily into place even though he had never felt it before. He had once been a loyal, joyous Death Eater, and then, after Regulus, he had gone cold to survive. There had never been this feeling, the regret mingled with the knowledge that he was ready to kill.

“Gilbert,” he said, using the boy’s first name in an effort to connect with him, his empathy for him in that moment outrunning even the remembrance that he was Harry’s attacker. “Will you stop it from burning before it turns every spell in the school deadly?”

Rovenan curled his lip and laughed. Does he know, Snape wondered, can he know, that the spell is killing him even as it works? There was a reason that Death Eaters used this magic so little and only at great need, and usually ended it as soon as possible. “No.”

And Snape would not let him leave here, not alive, not when he would join the ranks of their enemies and create more trouble.

The determination pushed forward and into all the corners of his mind, crushing out any other thoughts. Snape lifted his wand.

“Reducto.”

He spoke it softly, but with all his magic behind it, concentrating on Rovenan’s body as a barrier, an obstacle.

Rovenan soared. He soared across the landing and hit the wall of the tiny space—not far, but with considerable force. He hit the wall with an impact nothing could have survived, a crack that Snape knew would have ground some of his bones to powder. More to the point, it snapped his neck.

And the befouling stopped.

Snape knew how loud silence could be, but he hadn’t heard this particular silence in a while, the shocked and hurting silence of children who had just witnessed death for the first time. He turned, his mind spinning along the course that it would need to take now, and wondered if this was the way that Harry felt all the time. If so, he was no longer sure if he feared for his charge so much as felt sympathy for him.

“I will take you back to your Houses,” he told Draco and the Gryffindors he’d brought with him. He paused, and swept his eyes over the gaping Ravenclaws beneath him. "I will also summon Professor Flitwick to attend to you," he told them. "If you have questions about why I have done this, check Rovenan's left arm. But first," and he swept his wand around and down, "abscindo manulaes laevaes!"

The left sleeve of every student in the room fell away, exposing their forearms. Snape raked them with cold eyes, searching for some sign of the Dark Mark. He didn't know whether or not he should relax when he saw none. There could be Ravenclaws in their rooms who were Marked. He would certainly tell Filius to look for it.

Right before he himself checked his Slytherins, and then turned himself into Minerva and let her decide if she could continue to employ a teacher who had just killed a student.

Draco returned to the dungeons in stunned silence, pacing alone beside Professor Snape after they'd spoken to Professor Flitwick, and delivered the Weasleys and Granger and Connor to Gryffindor Tower. He still didn't know what to make of the utter collapse of their vengeance plan. In an abstract way, he supposed it was for the best. They weren't going to get into trouble for their actions, not when so much else had happened, and Rovenan definitely wouldn't be bothering Harry again.

On the other hand, the thought that there had been at least one Death Eater in the school filled him with deep shock, and the impulse to return to the hospital wing again and make sure that Harry was still safe.

And then there was the fact that Rovenan had managed to learn of their vengeance plan at all. Draco had already figured out the only way he could have learned of it. He longed to look at Professor Snape and know that he had been wrong, but he hadn't developed the courage to raise his eyes yet.

Snape stopped him with one hand on his shoulder as they reached the door to the Slytherin common room. Draco looked up at him at last, and saw the knowledge of war in his House Head's face, more clearly than he had ever seen it before.

“How many in Slytherin House knew of this vengeance plan, Draco?”
Snape asked softly.

“Lots of people,” Draco whispered.

Snape nodded. “And one of them betrayed it to Rovenan.” He closed his eyes in a long, slow blink. “You know as well as I do that, given the circumstances, only one kind of loyalty could trump the loyalty of Slytherin to Slytherin.”

“I know,” said Draco weakly. So, I wasn’t wrong. Someone in our House is a Death Eater.

Snape took a deep breath, then spoke the password and stepped into the common room.

It was quiet. The whole of the House, it seemed to Draco, sat on the couches and divans and chairs by the hearths, waiting for them. They would have heard what had happened by now, of course. News never stayed still for long in Hogwarts, and the prefects, patrolling the corridors, would have brought back rumors, and then confirmation, of the battle in Ravenclaw Tower.

Blaise snapped out, “Everyone, stand up now.”

Everyone stood up, and turned their bared left forearms towards Snape and Draco. Draco felt his heart seize up as he realized what they were proving. He relaxed a bit with every expanse of unmarked skin he looked at.

Snape said, in a voice like the Draught of Living Death, “Where is Montague?”

Draco closed his eyes.

“Gone to the Dark Lord.” Blaise’s voice was calm, and surprisingly steady, though Draco knew that, if he looked, Blaise’s dark face would be nearly gray. “We found enough evidence in his room to convict him, sir. Nothing very useful, but some of it incriminating.”

Snape made a low noise. Draco wondered, with that same odd interest that had made him wonder what Granger was thinking on their way to Ravenclaw Tower, whether he was blaming himself for not keeping one of his students from treading the same mistaken path he had followed.

It's not his fault, Draco thought, and reached up to ghost his hand across Snape's elbow, wondering if he could convey that message with just a touch.

Snape shook his head, and seemed to snap out of his trance. "I am going to speak with the Headmistress," he said. "None of you will wear left sleeves for the next week." He didn't ask whether they understood, whether they would obey. They would, or he would know the reason why.

Blaise and Millicent, who stood the closest to Snape, actually bowed their heads as he left. Draco took a deep, shaky breath, and sat down on the couch with his yearmates. For the first time all term, Pansy reached out and took his hand, though she didn't speak.

"Harry's going to be all right," Blaise whispered. Draco looked up, and saw the force of new conviction in his eyes. Blaise had never been as close to Harry as the rest of them, perhaps because his mother wasn't allied as deeply as Hawthorn Parkinson, or the Bulstrodes, or Draco's own parents. Now, though, he obviously understood how close the war could scrape to them, and what the opposite side looked like. It might be a commitment born less of loyalty than of fear, but he would stay true, Draco thought, and other reasons might grow later. "I promise, Draco. He really will be. You have no idea how he's going to be guarded, from now on. And the rest of the school is going to see just how free of the Dark Lord Slytherin House can be."

Draco thought it was weak of him, that it was happening mostly because he was too tired to feel anything else, but he found hope in Blaise's words. He nodded, once, and then let the rest of them hustle him off to bed. A few other Slytherins left as they went up the stairs. Draco blinked at them, then nodded again. They would use their cunning to evade the professors and prefects of other Houses, and get to the hospital wing unnoticed.

Harry would not be alone or unguarded tonight, perhaps not ever again, until the war was over.

Draco felt a little bubble of fierce pride pop up through the numbness that had largely overtaken him. The other Houses have always looked down on Slytherin. Well, now they're going to see that we're more like them than they thought, and not just when we ally with them to avenge a Housemate. We can be as proud, as independent, as determined to fight, as they can.

Snape stood in silence before Minerva. He had told her the whole tale, and he had no idea what would happen next.

He could not help remembering another night, when he had come to Albus, and Albus had looked him in the eye, and in the soul, and tested him under Veritaserum, and then accepted his repentance as true. Snape had known the man Albus was, then. He did not know the woman Minerva had become, not that well. He knew she might sack him, might turn him over to Ministry Aurors, who would not be gentle with a former Death Eater who had acted like a Death Eater again, or might do nothing. He had no way to be sure.

"Severus."

Snape glanced up. Minerva was leaning forward, her gaze brilliant, catching the light from the torches on the walls like gleaming cat's eyes.

"You say that the evil from the Dark Mark would have poisoned the school?" she questioned.

Snape nodded. "Dark Arts first, then Light spells. Any magic performed in Hogwarts after that first half hour would have killed the person who cast it. Rovenan would have died eventually, but not until the poison had slaughtered anyone who had gone unwarned."

Minerva breathed in, breathed out, and waited as if for a sign, though Snape didn't know what it could be. Then she raised her eyes and said, "You defended the Ravenclaws, the school, a student in your own House, and your ward, against a Death Eater. So far as I am concerned, you deserve commendation for that, not condemnation."

Snape closed his eyes. He could feel relief crashing down over him, a torrent so great that he could not really respond to it as yet. He waited.

"I will contact Mr. Rovenan's parents," Minerva went on. "I will also see about securing his body, so that no—ah—surgery can be performed after the fact to disguise what he was. And I will speak for you, Severus. I will fight for you. You warned him, you asked him to reconsider what he was doing, and he did it anyway. And this was after he had used a lethal curse on another student." Minerva's hands tightened on the edges of her desk. Snape half-expected to see them grow claws.

"Death Eaters," she said.

Snape blinked at her, not quite understanding the chain of her thoughts.

"There were Death Eaters in my school," said Minerva, and she rose and paced back and forth. "Threatening my students."

She swung around, and Snape fought the urge to take a step backward. Voldemort had just vexed Minerva McGonagall, Headmistress of Hogwarts, very, very thoroughly indeed.

"Go to sleep, Severus," Minerva said quietly. "I will reassign some of the wards to watch and guard Harry, and I will speak with Filius about his Ravenclaws, and whether he has discovered any more of—them—in his House. Know that you have my gratitude, and that I will fight for you." Her eyes were still brilliant with fury. "Anyone who tries to hurt you, or suggest sacking you for defending the school, will have to go through me."

Snape nodded several times. He didn't seem able to do anything else. He had thought before that Minerva McGonagall would be a very different sort of leader from Albus Dumbledore, but he had not realized just how different. She was not going to use manipulation. She very obviously did not need it.

He walked slowly back towards his offices, though he surrounded his body with shields and wards so that no one could sneak up and attack him on the way there. No one tried.

When he reached the office, he looked down at the ruined modification of the Draught of Peace, and Vanished it.

Then he called his Pensieve to him from across the room. He knew that he should follow Minerva's sound advice, and sleep soon. The past three days had cost him more than he realized he had to give.

But, first, he wanted to place certain memories he had in the Pensieve, and attempt to discover what they meant. When he had been up in Ravenclaw Tower, trying frantically to figure out whether anyone was about to cast Dark Arts in the midst of Rovenan's befouling, he had felt something else—a kind of drifting fog, a mist, a vicious presence that nevertheless did not feel like Dark Arts. The memory had tried to depart his mind the moment he noticed it, but he had trapped the impressions and slid them into an Occlumency pool, so fast that they didn't have a chance to escape.

He drew out the battle, placed it into the Pensieve, and then lowered his head to go under the surface of the silvery liquid. He would watch, and try not to get distracted by the sight of a dying boy too like the one he had been, and figure out what the hell that mist was.

It might be something that could hurt Harry. If it was, then Snape would find it out, and destroy it. It was part of what he, a man with chosen loyalties, did.

Intermission: Power Play

Albus kept his eyes closed even as Hestia Jones walked around him, now and then murmuring soothing phrases or casting spells that eased his cramped muscles. It had been dangerous for Argus Veritaserum to arrange to sneak Hestia in again, and she could not stay long. Truly, Albus was not sure that it was worth it. He could have ruminated on his own failure just as effectively under the Still-Beetle imprisonment, and had many times over the last few weeks, as he realized how and why his spell had gone wrong.

That didn't keep his mind from returning to it now, and raking his own failure over the coals obsessively.

He had cast the spell intending to change anyone's perception of Harry from a favorable one to one that would hinder Harry, and keep him emotionally unprepared for opposing his parents and Albus. His friends should have become overprotective. His allies should have made mistakes in their rage that would get them killed. His enemies should have tried everything in their power to hurt him. Students with slightly negative feelings towards Harry would have them exaggerated, and should have made Hogwarts a battleground for him every day. Albus had known that his spell would leave those caught between two states of mind unaffected—notably, the Lestranger woman Minerva had hired, and werewolves—but they were only a very small portion of the wizarding population. There was no danger that anyone would figure out what was going on, at least, since the spell would steer the thoughts of anyone who did begin to figure it out away from that dangerous information, and then eat the memories.

His thoughts could spread along with the effects of the spell, and he would observe everything that went on, though he was powerless to alter it. Albus had believed that would content him. He would see how Harry slowly collapsed, and realized that the wizarding world on his own was too much for him. He would be a less than effective witness when the time came for Lily's and James's trial, and some members of the Wizengamot would be hostile to him, so they were likely to go free. The same thing would happen with Albus, he was sure. More of the public was willing to think him innocent, someone they loved and revered and knew worked for the good of the wizarding world, than two people who had lived in retirement so intense that their once-sterling reputations had faded. With Argus's tireless work in the press, and the spell, and Lily and James gone free, and even Harry likely to plead for him at the last, Albus was sure that he would see the outside of the Ministry again in March.

It hadn't happened. The spell had taken hold in Ravenclaw at Hogwarts, the House it had identified as the one with the highest level of hostile feeling for Harry, and influenced its students just as Albus had hoped. Some members of the Wizengamot, and those in the Ministry, muttered about how they had never trusted Harry; one could not trust a child with Lord-level power who refused to Declare for Light. A few of those who favored Harry, like Auror Mallory, had indeed become overprotective.

But Harry's allies and those closest to him—his brother, Severus, young Malfoy—had continued unchanged in mind. Albus had been startled, but concluded that, of course, powerful Dark wizards like Charles Rosier-Henlin were cautious and not used to moving immediately, no matter what their emotions might urge them to do. And Severus was limited by his position at Hogwarts from leaving for long periods of time, and young Malfoy was limited by his age and his need to be near Harry constantly. Eventually, the balance would tip, and they would make Harry's life as miserable as his enemies were doing.

And still it had not happened, and only on the night of the Woodhouse battle, when Albus had had the opportunity to compare the thoughts of the transformed werewolves to the thoughts of the fighting Dark wizards, had he realized the reason.

The mind of Charles Rosier-Henlin was as unchanged as the mind of Hawthorn Parkinson or Remus Lupin. Henrietta Bulstrode was a bit more influenced, but then, she was currently more of an enemy than an ally to Harry. Lucius Malfoy's desire for vengeance had heightened (and while Albus was sorry for Lily and James, he could not have Hestia reveal Lucius without revealing his own spell), but he had conceived the plan on his own, before Albus began to spread his change. The others seemed in the same boat as Charles and the werewolves.

When he pulled back and looked at them more carefully, then Albus had seen what appeared to his eyes as numerous tiny silver hands at work in each of their minds, doing nothing but unbind his webs as fast as they formed. They could not give Harry's allies the memories of his spell, because Harry himself didn't know the spell existed. But they could and did prevent those webs of compulsion from tightening much, unless the person in question already had a bit of evil in mind.

Harry was so much a vates that he had spread an unconscious influence of his own in response to Albus's spell, to tear it apart. He wanted freedom, and endless possibilities, for those he cared the most about, and for those who had chosen to follow him. If they volunteered to be overprotective, or to turn against him, that was one thing. If he did not know them well, or if he blamed them for something, as he blamed Auror Mallory for the arrest of his parents and Albus, his protection did not extend over them. But Harry and his magic and his will would shield the people whom he felt he did owe something to from an outsider attempting to transform them against their choices.

Albus had never thought that he would face a true vates. Even after the boy began to show signs, there was still a large chance that he might turn aside from the path. How he could maintain it? Falco Parkinson had assured Albus that it was impossible, that one would have to sacrifice his magic in order to free the magical creatures and allow other wizards and witches to grow to their greatest extent. And no Lord-level wizard would ever do that. Their magic was too much a part of them. It sang within them, and they either lived with it and used it for the good of the wizarding world, or they had a need to increase it and corrupt others with it, as had happened to Tom.

But it seemed that that had not happened with Harry. He was vates, unbinder, destroyer of peace and safety. He was so much a vates that he sensed webs as they were forming and fought them away. Albus suspected that Harry's magic would have revealed the memory-destroying portion of the spell, too, save that it actually destroyed the memories and didn't simply bind them. Harry appeared incapable of tolerating a web anywhere near him.

It frightened Albus immensely to think that his beautiful, delicate wizarding world, that fragile soap bubble he had fought so hard to protect, might be shattered at last. The wizarding world was webs all the way down, webs that insured most wizards and witches never needed to think about things like where their next meal was coming from or a centaur attacking them. Albus loved the world as it was. How could he stand aside and see it torn apart by well-intentioned but ill-guided revolution, by a will to freedom that would not even take note of all the wills to tameness standing to oppose it?

"My lord."

Albus blinked and came out of his daze. Hestia gently held a cup of water to his lips, and he drank and then nodded to her.

"I only need cast one spell today, my dear," he said, and then closed his eyes.

He would not end his compulsion—not yet. Severus was on the brink of figuring it out, but he would still not know what it meant, having no acquaintance with spells of that kind. It would depend on him speaking to just the right person, such as the Lestrangle woman, and Albus was willing to risk that that might happen. He had been willing to take gambles so far, such as vengeance falling on Lily and James, in order to defend the larger wizarding world. This was only another of them.

But he did murmur, "Transformo Kingsley Shacklebolt."

His compulsion coiling lazily around Kingsley's mind tightened into a web. Albus suffered a brief burst of gladness that he could at least control Kingsley, whom Harry did not like much and had not shielded.

He felt sorrow as he concentrated, pouring what remained of his magical strength after the wide-spreading compulsion into this spell. He was sacrificing another of those who followed him, as he had sacrificed Lily and James to Lucius Malfoy's vengeance, as he had once sacrificed Harry and Connor to Voldemort's attack. But he was well-used to these decisions now, and he knew he was saving something larger than any one person: the wizarding world he fiercely loved and would not see crumble. He was willing to be damned, as long as the wizarding world could survive.

He knew matters had gone too far. Whether it was on purpose or not, Harry was a fully-fledged vates, intent on performing his dangerous miracles of change and transformation. It was not to be borne, not when he did not think enough of other wizards and witches and their welfare.

"Kingsley Shacklebolt, damnari inter sicarios," Albus murmured.

The compulsion funneled in a very specific direction, gnawed a small home for itself in the midst of Kingsley's mind, and settled there. It would spring to life only on the day of Lily and James's trial, the sixteenth of November, which was not very far away now.

Albus's heart was aching when he opened his eyes, and tears filled them, but he met Hestia's eyes and said, "You will tell no one of what you heard here?"

The young witch stood proud and strong, all but radiating loyalty. She shook her head. "No, my lord. Never. You are only doing what you have to do to protect our world."

Albus nodded back at her, and then let her use the Still-Beetle to confine him again. At once his mind roamed out on the wings of his spell, seeking to watch Harry, this time. His thoughts were filled with mourning.

I am sorry, Harry. But when it comes down to a danger that may threaten everyone else, there can be no faltering. If I do this one thing with a firm hand, then our world is saved—twice over, because the prophecy will have to choose your brother. I am sorry. But I think that, if you were in my position, if you were in the position you occupied even three years ago when you thought about other things than your own goals and life, you would agree with me.

Chapter Thirty-Five: Stronger Than You Think

By the time he was finally able to leave the hospital wing, Harry had become used to the idea that the world had changed, but he still hadn't adapted well to one feature of it that looked to become permanent.

"There's really no reason for you to keep attending me now," he told Adrian Belby, who was the only one of the three Slytherins escorting him from the hospital wing back to the common room whom he knew at all well. "Madam Pomfrey says I'm past the danger from Rovenan's curse, and I can see people coming more easily than I could lying in a bed. I should be fine."

Adrian just looked at him. He was vibrating slightly with a pride that never seemed to leave him. Harry had seen the first signs of it when he showed up for his first round of guard duty with the bare left arm that he still sported. "You need to be guarded, Harry," he said simply. "So we'll stay and guard you."

"That's what I'm trying to tell you," said Harry, keeping his temper with an effort. At least when Blaise or Millicent or Draco were with him, it was like talking with friends; he could forget they were there to protect him. Adrian and the others took it all so seriously. "I don't need guards now."

"Yes, you do."

Harry jumped. Adrian and the others reached for their wands. The Weasley twins ignored them all, falling into step with Harry as if they'd just met for a bit of a friendly chat. Harry smiled in spite of himself when he saw their bare left arms. Each bore a constantly moving lime-green tattoo that said VOLDEMORT IS AN IDIOT. Now and then, the insult changed.

"We're happy to share the duty," said the one Harry thought was Fred. He spoke to Adrian. "We have NEWT Transfiguration first thing on Monday, but that's the only class it would actually hurt us to miss. We can skive off the others and send illusions to them. What times do you most need an extra pair of hands?"

Adrian thought about it. Harry opened and closed his mouth several times. No one, of course, paid the slightest attention to him.

“Wait,” he said. “Don’t I get a say in this?”

“No,” said Adrian, “because sometimes you’re an idiot, Harry.” It sounded as if he’d learned that by rote. He turned to Fred. “Tuesday mornings are thin right now. So are Wednesday afternoons. And you never know when someone might try to take advantage of a Quidditch practice.”

A devilish grin replicated itself on both twins’ faces. “Why, Belby,” said the one Harry thought was George, “you’re actually inviting the Gryffindor Beaters to watch your team’s movements?”

Adrian paused, obviously abashed.

“No, he isn’t,” said Harry, and used a tone of voice that made them look at him and actually pay attention. “I am taking my safety seriously, I promise you. But Rovenan is dead, and we need to pull the school together, not yank it apart.” He nodded to their bare left arms, including his own. “That kind of thing is a fine symbolic gesture. I have no problem with it. By guarding me all the time, though, you make it seem as if you fear for my life.”

“We do,” said Adrian.

“And would you trust a Slytherin near me faster than a Ravenclaw?” Harry demanded. “You must. All my guards so far have been Slytherin.”

“That’s about to change,” said George.

“Gryffindors are a good start,” Harry agreed. “But we have to have some Ravenclaw guards, too, or this all looks useless—like we’re suspecting a House instead of the one member who turned out to have other problems.” He ignored the twins’ laughter and imitations of what they thought Voldemort tempting Rovenan must have looked like. “I want Cho. And Luna. And Draco said there were a few Ravenclaws on the inside of the Tower whom they trusted, who would have gone after Rovenan if they were shut out. I want to know who they are.”

“That’s actually a good idea, Harry,” said another of his guards. She was Catrina Flint-Digsby, the female prefect he’d heard laughing about Marietta Edgecombe’s transformation. She wound a curl of her hair around her finger as she considered him now. “We should have guards from all the Houses. That Smith bloke is an ally of yours, isn’t he?” She grimaced as if she’d bitten into something foul when she mentioned Zacharias. Harry wasn’t surprised. Zacharias seemed to strike most people that way.

“Yes, he is,” said Harry, relaxing a bit. “I think we should mix shifts. If you really must, have someone from another House working with the Ravenclaw guards, but also have Hufflepuffs working with Gryffindors, and Gryffindors working with Slytherins. If you really want to do this at all,” he added hopefully. He had the feeling that this would become a charade very soon. People had their marks and their OWLS and their NEWTS and the safety of their families—since there was a War on, after all—to worry about instead of him. Harry didn’t want them to neglect their lives for his.

“We know the Ravenclaws Malfoy meant,” said George. “We can get—“

“Their names for you,” Fred finished. “Pair of pretty—“

“Girls, Harry.” George winked. “Give Malfoy something to be jealous about. Keep him on his toes.”

Harry felt a bit of queasiness in his stomach at the thought of Draco being jealous. He’d had enough of that last Tuesday, Merlin knew. “Don’t tease him,” he said, facing the dungeons again. He was resigned, not surprised, when the twins adopted marching attitudes and kept pace with him and his Slytherins. “Please.”

“No more than he deserves, at least,” said George innocently.

And a Weasley twin's idea of deserving doesn't match anyone else's. Harry shook his head. He could only hope they wouldn't hurt Draco too badly, or that the Ravenclaw girls weren't really pretty.

They were, of course. Fred and George often joked, but not when telling the truth would serve their purposes better. They even made a point of escorting the Ravenclaws over to the Slytherin table that morning, when Harry was trying to enjoy the first normal breakfast he'd had in four days and pretend that he wasn't the focus of all eyes.

"Harry Potter," said George ceremoniously, using a Sonorus charm to project his voice to all parts of the Great Hall, "your first volunteer guard has asked me to introduce her. This is Padma Patil, twin sister of Parvati Patil."

Harry nodded to Padma. He knew her, vaguely. She, of course, looked almost exactly like Parvati, but there was a steady gleam to her eyes that reassured Harry she wouldn't be as giggly as her sister. She was pretty, though, with large dark eyes, dark skin, and a long sweep of flowing black hair that she kept braided with blue ribbons.

"And this," said Fred, planting himself in front of the other girl like a knight protecting his lady fair, "is the beauteous, the gracious, the munificent, the beneficent—"

He staggered as though the person standing behind him had hit him. He grinned, and stepped out of the way.

"Isabell Neelda," he finished.

Harry blinked when he saw Isabell. He had assumed she had to be at least casually connected with someone in another House to want to protect him, the way Padma was to Parvati, but he didn't know her. She was a sixth-year, so that wasn't surprising. She had light brown hair, blue eyes, and was beautiful more for her smile than anyone else.

She caught his startled gaze, and winked at him, turning her head to the side and putting a finger to her cheek. To anyone else, it probably looked like she was making a flirtatious gesture. Only Harry saw the green-and-gold swirl of the tattoo that shone as the glamour she wore was brushed aside, and then vanished again as she swept her finger back the other way. He relaxed. She was Opalline, connected by blood to Paton.

"I've heard a lot about you, Harry," Isabell said, putting her hand out. Harry clasped it and shook. Draco made a sound from the side that was part grunt and part hiss. Harry withdrew his hand quickly, but Isabell didn't seem to take offense. "I'd like to be the first to apologize for the shameful behavior of my House. The moment Marietta gets out of the hospital wing, I am going to give her such a smack upside the head."

Harry turned his own head, and saw Draco's eyes take on an almost manic gleam. Harry had no idea whether his boyfriend had already taken revenge on Marietta, or whether Isabell had simply reminded him to, and had no intention of letting him think about it right now.

"Thank you, Isabell," he said, and nodded at Padma. "You, too."

Both Ravenclaws seemed to consider that enough invitation to sit down at the Slytherin table and start eating breakfast. The Weasley twins hovered around for a moment, grinning, but when Draco didn't oblige them by exploding into an immediate jealous fit, they pulled long faces and went back to eat with their fellow Gryffindors.

"Harry," Draco murmured into his ear as he leaned across the table to fetch the pancakes.

"What?" Harry asked.

"I don't think you'd do anything to make me jealous on purpose," said Draco. "I trust you. But you came near dying the other day. Pardon me if I'm a little protective, and going to watch every Ravenclaw who comes near you like a hawk for the next little while. It's just the way I am."

Harry relaxed. It could have been far worse.

Minerva sat calmly waiting for Aland and Julianne Rovenan. She had a Gryffindor scarf wound around her neck. She didn't need it; her office was perfectly warm with the fire in the hearth, and it wasn't yet so cold outside that a Scottish witch required protection from the elements. But she had wanted to wear it, to have that rich tumble of gold and red around her when she faced the parents of the boy Severus had killed, so she did.

The Death Eater boy Severus had killed.

Minerva adjusted the scarf, and nodded. Yes. That made the difference. She was sorry for the parents who had lost their son; even an accidental death at Hogwarts was always anguish to report. And during the First War, when Light wizard after Light wizard had perished and she had had to bring the official letters carried by ravens to their children, Minerva had learned to know almost every variation of anguish and grief a face might wear. She had never got used to any of them.

But she had gone on bringing the letters and reporting the accidental deaths. Albus had relied on her to do that even then. So this was not a new task. Yes, this time the student had died at the hands of a teacher, and Minerva had had that teacher go right on teaching Potions. She didn't care. She would not run. She would not take even the diplomatic measures that Albus would have taken, canceling Potions classes or having someone else cover them until such time as "the matter was cleared up," to use a phrase he had favored.

She knew what the Rovenan parents intended to do to her. She would still not back down.

A knock sounded on the door, though the wards in the staircase had already let Minerva know they were coming. She called, "Please do come in, Mr. and Mrs. Rovenan."

No pause; they were probably too occupied by their grief to wonder how she had known for sure it was them. The door opened, and they entered. Minerva took the time to study them in the few moments before they sat down in their chairs and leaned forward to stare at her.

Aland Rovenan had gone to a private tutor instead of coming to Hogwarts, and Minerva knew little of him. A proud man, said some of her sources, but others claimed that he was only shy. Right now, though, looking into the pale, pinched face in which his son's blue eyes shone, Minerva had the feeling that he would have no trouble finding words. He had come to demand what he saw as justice for his dead child, and he would have it.

Julianne was a different matter. She'd been a Hogwarts student thirty years ago, and Minerva remembered her with some fondness. She'd been skilled in Transfiguration, and earned the most NEWTS ever in the subject at the time, though the record was broken a few years later. She had blond hair, and the yellow eyes common to some of the pureblooded Light families. She'd been in Gryffindor. The worst thing that Minerva remembered being true of her was her merciless nature when roused. She had a hawk's gaze, and a hawk's soul.

Julianne started, as Minerva had thought she would. "Headmistress," she said, respect like frost in her voice. "We have sent a letter to the board of governors. A representative of theirs will meet us here in a few minutes. I trust that you have owled them and given them the password to your office?"

"Of course," said Minerva politely. She could be polite. These were grieving parents. And since they had been kind enough to tell her what they intended to do beforehand, she'd had plenty of time to ponder and react. As she'd said in her letter, the governors were welcome in Hogwarts at any time. Two of them had walked through the school the day after Gilbert's death, seeing for themselves that there were no more Death Eaters in any of the other Houses.

"Enough, Julianne." That was Aland, leaning forward, his hands clutching the sides of his chair. "I want an explanation from this woman before we demand that they sack her. I want to know why the hell she didn't go to Ravenclaw Tower herself and preserve Gilbert's life." He closed his eyes, and a sob rose up in his throat. "From the reports I heard, she let several students try to take vengeance for what Gilbert did to the Potter boy, and then Severus Snape went after him and killed him. And it was all with your tacit permission, Headmistress!" His eyes snapped open, and he stared at her. "I want to know where the hell you were."

"In my office," said Minerva quietly. "I had no idea that vengeance was planned, I assure you. I would say that the students were amply punished by what they encountered. As for Severus Snape—"

"We are asking that the board of governors sack him, too," said Julianne, and gave her a sharp, sweet smile. Minerva was reminded that she'd had a special hatred for Slytherins. "Just so that we're clear."

"Of course." Minerva showed her own teeth in return. Julianne was bird-like enough to rouse her own feline hunting instincts. "Severus Snape performed his duty to this school. You will know the story of his past. As such, he was aware of what the Dark Mark could do. Gilbert would have poisoned Hogwarts with the Mark if it kept burning. Professor Snape asked him to make it stop burning. Gilbert refused. So Professor Snape did what sometimes must be done in a time of war, and killed him."

She stopped abruptly, blinking at the image of the one her wards had told her was on the way up her stairs. Neither of the Rovenan parents appeared to have noticed her distraction, however. In fact, Aland took it as an excuse to jump back into the conversational fray.

"I don't believe my son was really a Death Eater," he said. "We haven't seen any proof."

Minerva raised her eyebrows. "Gilbert's body is in the hospital wing, under a preservation spell. I assumed you would wish to bury him in as perfect a condition as could be achieved. I will take you to see the corpse myself when our meeting is done, and you may see the Mark on his arm."

Aland hesitated. Julianne narrowed his eyes. "He cannot have been serious, then," she said. "Perhaps he used a spell to cast the Mark on himself in play. We know the reason that he used the spell against the Potter boy. He was upset because of what had happened to the girl he loves."

Minerva narrowed her eyes in turn. "Forgive me, Madam Rovenan," she said, deliberately using too high a title of respect, "but I was unaware that you considered young love a reason to try and kill another student."

"That was another exaggerated portion of the report that reached us, of course." Julianne clenched her fingers together like a hawk binding to a mouse. "We have heard people say that Gilbert used the Entrail-Expelling Curse. That cannot be true. We raised our son right. He would never turn to Dark Arts."

"And yet he did, in front of the Great Hall," said Minerva. "I can fetch all the witnesses that you like on that, Madam. But I see that our representative from the board of governors is here now, so perhaps we should suspend our conversation for a moment until he enters?"

Julianne inclined her head just as a sharp knock sounded on the door. Shaking her head over the ironies of fate, Minerva called, "Come in, sir."

Lucius Malfoy had a very predatory walk when he wanted to, and he had made his way to the center of the office before either of the Rovenan parents had turned to see him. He took Minerva's hand and bowed low over it, his eyes bright with a mixture of pleasure and dangerous amusement. "Headmistress, dear Lady," he murmured. "Always a breath of morning, to be in your presence."

Minerva held his gaze. She had faced Lucius Malfoy across several battlefields in the First War, had nearly died by his Killing Curse three times, and had nearly Transfigured him twice. And now they were allies. At least she thought she could live better in this violently changing world than Albus ever could have.

"Mr. Malfoy," she said. "If you would take your place?" She drew her wand and Transfigured one of the bookshelves into a chair for him. Lucius inclined his head in thanks, and sat down.

That was when Julianne Rovenan recovered enough of her breath to protest.

“Headmistress!” she all but squawked. “You cannot mean to have him here!”

“And why not?” Lucius cocked his head to the side and regarded the woman quizzically. “Much as I am sorry for your loss, Mrs. Rovenan, I hardly think that you can object to me on the grounds of my not having lost a child.”

“Not that! Do you deny that your son is Harry Potter’s boyfriend, and that your presence here is therefore a conflict of interest?” Julianne had stood. She had a gleam in her eyes that said she was soaring in for the kill. Minerva stifled a groan. Julianne did get like this.

“I don’t really think it’s a conflict of interest, Mrs. Rovenan.” Lucius continued with the thoughtful frown. “After all, we are not here to try and punish my son, or Harry Potter. We are here to determine whether Headmistress McGonagall and Professor Severus Snape should be retained in their present positions, or sacked. The governors agreed to send me because I once knew Severus Snape, and should be able to tell if he is lying or not.” He lightly touched his left arm. “Also, it was understood that you had some questions about whether the Dark Mark on your son’s body is, in fact, the true one. I can see why you would not want to trust Professor Snape’s word on the matter. After all, he was not Gilbert’s Head of House, nor his friend. I assure you, I can identify it. I, myself, am Marked.”

“A servant of You-Know-Who, then.” Aland was staring at Lucius, his face white with an emotion Minerva thought was loathing, this time.

“Never willingly,” said Lucius at once, enough pride in his voice for five Rovenan parents. “I was under the Imperius Curse at the time, and reeling from the death of my father. I was captured, held, and used against my will. I escaped Azkaban by testifying against my former comrades, that is true, but most of them had served willingly. I never did.”

Liar, Minerva thought, staring at Lucius. He has too strong a will to ever surrender to being a servant.

“We still cannot trust your word,” Julianne insisted.

“And why not?” Lucius turned a wounded look on her.

“You are a Dark wizard!” Julianne flung those words at him as if daring him to deny them.

Lucius’s eyes lost their innocence for the first time. “I am also a pureblood back to the time of the Norman Conquest,” he said. “I challenge you to find one shred of dishonor according to the pureblood rituals in my family history. You will find none.” He rose to his feet. “If you really wish me gone, I will go. Of course, the board will have to send someone other than the governor you requested. It seems that he is married to your sister. Now, that would be a conflict of interest.”

Julianne turned her head away. Aland said, abruptly, “We want justice for Gilbert. That’s all. If he really did use the Entrail-Expelling Curse, if he really was a Death Eater, then—then I want to know.” His voice shook, but steadied when Minerva looked at him. “I want to see his body.”

Minerva nodded. “But we must wait until the board sends someone other than Mr. Malfoy to conduct the investigation.”

“If he can identify the Dark Mark, then I want him,” said Aland.

“Aland!” Julianne turned towards her husband.

“No, Julianne.” Aland was shivering like a stake in a high wind, but he stood and put one arm around her shoulders. “I—we have to know, don’t we? I want to know. Either they’re all terribly mistaken about Gilbert, and then we can sack a Professor who would kill a student for no good reason at all and make Hogwarts safer for the rest of the children here. Or they’re telling the truth, and there are horrible things about him we never knew. I want to know what those are. I want to know my son.”

Julianne leaned into her husband, and said nothing. Minerva wondered how much of her feral intensity had been a mask to hide the tear-blasted woman within.

Aland looked at Lucius and Minerva over his wife's head, and nodded. "I think we're ready to see Gilbert's body now."

Afterwards, after the parents had seen their son's body and suffered the painful shock of knowing that almost everything they'd believed about him was wrong, after the tears and the recriminations and the calm responses and the apologies for the recriminations, after the Rovenans had gone away shocked into silence but promising to talk to the newspapers about what had really happened, Lucius walked back to the dungeons with Severus.

He didn't know why. Severus had simply looked at him, and Lucius had recognized the look in his eyes that he usually got before a Death Eater raid. So he'd made his excuses to the Headmistress about taking tea in her office, and walked back into dungeons that still felt like home to him, even though he'd gone to Hogwarts half a lifetime ago.

Severus led him straight to his offices, a motion that made Lucius raise his eyebrows. At least the man had sense enough not to let him hear his password. Lucius really would have had to punish him if he'd been enough of an idiot for that.

Not that the man was an idiot, of course, not with the way he'd handled Gilbert Rovenan—publicly, asking him to stop, just the way calculated to raise the least amount of fuss. Lucius was sure that Severus had done it for just the reasons the Headmistress indicated, to stop the school from being poisoned. He was also sure that Severus hadn't been without pleasure in the deed, given what the boy had done to Harry.

Lucius still wanted to snarl when he thought about it. If the professors hadn't already checked their Houses for more Marked students, he would have done it himself. To have something like that happen to their young vates in the middle of all Hogwarts's wards and protections was unthinkable. And then to have his parents doubt that he'd been a Death Eater, and used a Dark curse!

Sometimes, the sheer thickness of Light wizards made Lucius repine that he'd turned from Voldemort. Of course, with Harry around, the Light wizards shut up and did as they were told. It was the only thing that made Lucius tolerate having them as part of the alliance.

"What did you want me to see?" he asked, once they were fully inside the office. He didn't doubt that Severus had brought him here to see something. Otherwise, he could have cast spells that wouldn't allow them to be overhead and told him the truth elsewhere in Hogwarts. Severus had always been good at that kind of thing.

"This." Severus was already turning around, a Pensieve in his hands. Lucius took a wary step closer, his hand on his wand. He didn't really think that Severus would turn on him, but one survived as a Dark wizard and a Slytherin by trusting one's paranoia, and he knew all sorts of spells that could be cast with a Pensieve. The Dark Lord had once kept a prisoner alive for seventeen days with one.

"It won't hurt you, Lucius," said Severus, catching on to his caution then and giving him an exasperated look. "Draco would never forgive me if anything happened to you, and what Draco doesn't forgive, neither does Harry."

Slightly reassured, Lucius still waited for Severus to put the Pensieve down and dip his head below the surface before he followed.

He found himself in Ravenclaw Tower while Severus asked Gilbert Rovenan to lower his wand. He stood on the floor, though, a distance from the battle, and he'd already heard Severus describe it, so there must be some other reason he was there. He looked around.

And then he felt it. He stiffened. There was a drifting mist in the air, coiling within the minds of everyone around them, carrying powerful Light magic and a whispering compulsion. Lucius focused on the whispers, willing them into clarity, and thought he heard Harry Potter before Severus, standing beside him, distracted him.

“I’ve been able to bring them that close,” he said. He had his back turned to the battle, as if he couldn’t bear to watch himself kill the boy again. Lucius doubted that, of course. Probably, there was nothing very interesting in a battle he’d had to relive several times. “Close enough to know that it’s a spell trained on Harry. But I don’t know much else about it.”

Lucius tried, as best he could, to examine the state of his own mind. He couldn’t discover much, but he appeared to be free of the spell. That didn’t reassure him. “Why haven’t you told anyone else?”

Snape snarled. “I have tried. The information slides from their minds the moment I speak of it. The spell can defend itself, Lucius. I think I only noticed it on Wednesday because I was specifically searching for signs that someone was about to try Dark Arts with the Mark burning, and then I trapped the memory in an Occlumency pool. We can discuss the thing, here. Outside the Pensieve, I retain the memory, but I am a trained Occlumens. No one else seems to.”

Lucius held up a hand, his eyes closing sharply. “Wait. Wait.”

Severus, to his credit, waited. Lucius was not sure that he could have done the same thing, if someone else had told him that much and no more. He dived into the depths of his memory, seeking out what he’d heard one day in a sleepy, dozy History of Magic classroom, when he’d forced himself to stay awake throughout the lecture to win a bet with one of his yearmates.

There are Light spells that affect the mind and influence the perceptions, that are capable, for example, of converting one’s perceptions of a particular person into unfavorable ones—that is, ones that will hinder his actions and prevent him from doing whatever it is that you wish him to do. They are rarely used. For one thing, they require an enormous amount of power, and they would drain even most Lords and Ladies of Light. For a second, they are considered as immoral, skirting the edges of Dark Arts, a weapon to be raised only in war, if then. And for a third, they are subtle, and take a long time to work, time which may drain the wizard or witch fueling them, and they have odd limitations. They cannot cross water, for example.

Lucius remembered no more, because he had fallen asleep, but those words had entered his mind and burned there with peculiar intensity. His mind had been on the edge of dreaming, and everything seemed more real then, as his brain strove to distinguish between dream and waking. At any rate, he was sure that his information was correct, and that this was what the spell was.

And he was sure that only one Light wizard in Britain at the moment would have the strength and the motivation to use such a spell.

“Dumbledore,” he spat, opening his eyes.

Severus nodded tightly. “So I assumed. And I assume that it is responsible for the recent spate of attacks on Harry, both in the Prophet and in the school. But how to spread the word of it, when you will lose the memory the moment you step out of the Pensieve and I cannot talk of it to anyone?”

“Can you write it down?”

Snape shrugged. “I tried that, too, but though I have seen my reader’s eyes widen, they forget about it the moment they look away from the parchment.”

Lucius cursed. “Then I think we must have our vates break the compulsion,” he said. “Bring him into the Pensieve, show him what is happening, and ask him to snap the web.” He narrowed his eyes at Severus, struck with a sudden thought. “In fact, why haven’t you done that already?”

Severus’s hesitation revealed the reason. Lucius rolled his eyes. “I know you care for the boy,” he said. “So do we all. But I assure you, he would not thank you for trying to relieve him of this ‘stress.’ He would wish to be rid of it, because it influences others.”

“I suppose I needed someone else to say it.” Severus shrugged. “Do you think you will recover the memory of this once the spell is broken?”

"I hope so, but I cannot be certain," said Lucius. "At the least, you should be able to speak and write of the spell then, and you will convince others if you ask them to compare their feelings about Harry then to the feelings they had about him for the last few months." His mind was racking and clicking along like the Hogwarts Express. "Doesn't Harry have a contact in Rita Skeeter?"

Severus's face drew down in a sneer. "That woman—"

"Is still a better reporter than any other on the Prophet, these days," Lucius cut in. "Ask him to contact her. Ask her to release an exclusive story on the effects of Dumbledore's spell, with proof on how he broke it. Not that Prophet readers need the truth. The very suggestion of this will muddy the waters."

"His parents' trial is in only a few weeks," Snape warned with a light snarl. "I would not want to put—"

"More stress on him." Lucius tossed his head impatiently. "It is likely that he will never have to live through a period of stress this intense in the next year. I would rather eliminate any chance of a Light Lord gaining control over the minds of his allies, and Harry himself, than see his parents or that Light Lord go free because of an undetected spell and your tender sensibilities, Severus."

"You do not understand what he is putting himself through—"

"I understand that he is stronger than you think," said Lucius. He locked eyes with his old comrade, and didn't back down. "Ask others if I cannot convince you. Narcissa, Hawthorn, Regulus. And he is vates. This is within his rights, his responsibilities, his duties as one who bears that name. He will do it, and he will do it eagerly."

Severus bowed his head. Lucius smirked at him, and then stepped back and out of the Pensieve.

He gripped his thoughts as he did so, trying to retain the memory of Dumbledore's spell. Of course, the man had been responsible for the wards of Hogwarts, but it seemed he had never bothered to set one that would detect Death Eaters in the school. Or perhaps the Headmistress had never bothered to set one. Lucius would speak to her about that before he left. He would offer his own Dark Mark as a test subject, if she needed something to anchor the ward to.

Wasn't I thinking about something else?

He shook his head, and left Severus's office without a backward glance. He did know that they'd been talking about Harry, and he'd said the boy was stronger than Severus thought.

And he is. Stronger than anyone else I have ever known. He survives everything, and that is what must be done before one can do anything else.

Harry saw doom fall with the Daily Prophet on Monday morning.

The owls had to circle the room before they got to the Slytherin table. That meant the other tables got their newspapers first. One by one, Harry saw smiles wither and die on their faces, and then they turned their heads and locked their eyes on him. Shock and horror and condemnation made their expressions change.

Harry closed his eyes when Draco received his newspaper. He waited until the sharp noise that said Draco had shaken it out, and then he gazed bleakly at the front page.

There was a photograph of himself, close and exceptionally clear. As Harry watched, he held up an Augurey chick, a greenish-black bird that was struggling awkwardly in his hand. He gave the camera a twisted sneer, and then smashed the chick's head open with a stone, and shocking violence.

Harry looked at the headline. The byline, of course, was Argus Veritaserum's; that was not surprising. It was the headline that did the damage.

HARRY POTTER: VATES OR MURDERER OF MAGICAL CREATURES?

Anonymous witnesses speak out about the horror of 'Potter Revels'

Harry swallowed his sickness, and clenched his hand on the edge of the table. He knew this wasn't true, of course not, but he knew what the article would say before reading it. It would claim that this supposed killing had happened during the time he was in hospital, only pretending to be recovering from the Entrail-Expelling Curse. It would hint darkly that he killed innocent and useful magical creatures, that his ambitions as vates were just a cover, and that there was a reason no one saw Dementors or unicorns any more. It would include many tantalizing details about how the murders had happened.

It would not be believed, not by everyone. But in the tense and heated atmosphere that had led to some members of Ravenclaw House who were not Death Eaters attacking him, which had led to the Veritaserum articles in the first place, Harry feared that the picture and the articles would do their work. Some people really would swallow it whole, and others would believe because they wanted to or it was convenient to do so.

He could find nothing else to think of for long moments as he watched "himself" smash Augurey after Augurey, until he felt a hand on his shoulder and Snape murmured in his ear, "Harry, come with me immediately."

Numbly, Harry climbed to his feet and followed, wondering what the magical creatures would believe, wondering how many wizards would turn against him, and praying that he could somehow wake up from this dream and have it not be real.

And underneath all that, burning and climbing like a dragon tunneling to the surface, was fury.

How dare they. How dare they hurt those I am supposed to protect.

Chapter Thirty-Six: The Will of Water

Harry only became aware of the guards following him when Snape tried to shut his office door in their faces. That caused a loud, and immediate, protest from Draco, Isabell, and Hannah Abbott. They hushed when Harry turned around and met their gazes, too. Harry suspected that his rage was shining through his eyes.

"I won't be long," he said softly. Whatever Snape wanted him for, it couldn't be long. Breakfast would be over in half an hour, and then classes began, including Potions. "Stay there."

None of them objected, though Draco stared a bit too long. Harry didn't know why, and didn't try to figure it out. He shut the door behind himself, and turned to see Snape placing a Pensieve on a low table Transfigured from one of the chairs that usually occupied the office. Old wariness made Harry hesitate before he walked up to it, but then he shook his head and moved forward.

"What memories does this hold?" he asked.

"The battle at Ravenclaw Tower, and what I did to stop Rovenan," said Snape. "But, more than that, it holds the memory of a spell I sensed that night." He paused, as if waiting for something, then made a small noise of frustration. "It is not easy to explain outside the Pensieve. It will be easier once you have put your head into it." He lowered his own before Harry could protest that he didn't like Pensieves and had never seen anything attractive in them. Grumbling, Harry stepped around to the other side of the dish and followed.

He still wanted to do something about Argus Veritaserum and the person who had caused the Augurey chicks to be murdered. But perhaps this was important, too. The way Snape had sailed up to him argued that it was.

Time and space flipped around him, and then he stood in the Ravenclaw common room, a place he had visited a few times when he was helping Luna to make progress in her classes in her second year, after she'd been paralyzed for most of her first. He heard and felt magic blazing from above, foul heaviness rather like Voldemort's wandless power in the graveyard. He forced himself to ignore it, and concentrate on the air around them, between the many staring faces and open mouths of the Ravenclaws.

“You feel it?” Snape, the present-time one standing behind him and not the one on the landing pleading with Rovenan, asked.

Harry frowned. There was a spell there, wasn’t there? Its form was odd. It was a boiling mist, foaming as if it objected to the attention of their minds. Whispers filled it. Harry cocked his ears, stripping away all the other distractions to focus on just one part of his hearing the way his mother had taught him, and heard his own name, repeated over and over and over again.

He shook his head. “Why would someone want to cast a spell that fills the room with my name repeated over and over?” he asked Snape.

Snape snarled. “That is not its purpose, Harry. I could not tell you outside the Pensieve, because I have attempted to tell several people over the past week—Minerva, you, even Lucius when he came to settle the matter of Rovenan’s parents—and the spell has eaten your memories. You understand me well enough when we’re conversing, but your attention wanders in a few moments, and then you’ve forgotten about it again. The spell is subtle, and contains its own defense mechanism.”

Harry shut his eyes, to close off the distraction of sight as well, and listened again. There was something before his name in each repetition of the spell. It was the incantation that had created it, Harry realized abruptly. After several moments of listening, he thought he had all the words.

Converto intellegentiam de Harry Potter. Converto animadversionem ab intellegentia.

Several possible translations of the spell flashed through his head, but Harry rejected most of them; the spell wasn’t focused on him, for one thing, which would argue against an interpretation like the incantation lowering his intelligence. He found one that fit after a few moments.

I change the perception of Harry Potter. I change the good perception to an unfavorable one.

Harry's eyes blazed open. He felt the rage in him alter direction. He was still angry about Argus Veritaserum and the Augurey chicks, but those were targets truly beyond his wrath for the moment; he still didn't know who Veritaserum was. But he knew who must have cast a spell like this, so closely allied to compulsion, so mental, so subtle rather than directly confrontational in the way that Voldemort would have gone for.

Dumbledore.

Harry snarled under his breath and turned to look up at Snape. "How far do you think this spell extends?" he asked, voice so furious that he barely recognized it himself. "Just through Hogwarts?"

Snape shook his head. "Lucius was able to tell me something of its nature yesterday, while he was in the Pensieve and the spell did not steal his memories of itself. I did research last night. The only thing that stops this spell, other than the power and perception of the witch or wizard who uses it, is salt water. I think we're looking at a spell that occupies the whole of England, Scotland, and Wales." He paused. "You have made a small net of safety in the middle of that, Harry."

"Oh?" Harry's thoughts roared back across the past months, taking in the attacks of the Ravenclaws and the weeping of Madam Shiverwood and the sudden madness of Auror Mallory, and casting them into a new light. "Why do you say that?"

"I do not seem to have been affected, other than losing my memories of the spell whenever I started to catch on," said Snape. "Neither does Draco. I can imagine ways in which this spell could have twisted several of his perceptions. He would never consent to remain on the other side of that door if he was overprotective about you to the point of hindering your progress, for example. He could easily have hurt and killed the people who hurt you. But the only one he truly struck at was Whitecheek, and that happened in the midst of battle.”

Harry frowned. “But that doesn’t make sense. Why would Dumbledore want to leave the people who supported me alone? He might have a hard time changing their behavior without my thinking there was something going on, but if the spell really does protect itself, except in the Pensieve—“

“That is not what I mean,” said Snape. “You have made a career of unbinding compulsions wherever you find them, Harry. I think that your mind saw this net, or sensed it, and unbound it from those you love. Or perhaps you had already laid the protection in place.” He stepped forward and put a hand on Harry’s shoulder. “You told me once that you want everyone free to make their own decisions as much as possible, uninfluenced by Lords or fear or powerful magic.”

Harry could feel himself scowling. “But that means everyone. Not just people I love, or trust, or feel protective of, or however this defense truly works.”

Snape sighed. “Then I think Lucius was right, and you must be prevailed on to break the spell.”

Harry wondered how, if he would lose the memories the moment he left the Pensieve, but then dismissed the question. He would just do it from within the Pensieve, then. He would do whatever he must to snap this compulsion and give everyone their minds back.

“Did your research tell you how the spell was meant to be broken?” he asked, but wasn’t surprised when Snape shook his head.

“No. It suggested that, most of the time, it breaks when the wizard or witch powering it collapses. Most people cannot take the stretch in perceptions that it brings on, multiplying one’s eyes and emotions endlessly, until one can see through all the minds under siege if one chooses.”

“Then that means Dumbledore knows what we’ve been doing.” Harry suffered a faint tremor of unease, and then pushed it away again.

Caution had its place, and it was in the planning how to break the spell, not in worry over what would happen afterwards. Now was the time for courage. “Very well, then. We’ll keep that in mind when we deal with him. Do you think he’s behind the reason that the wizarding public has been so hostile to me?”

“Very likely,” Snape agreed. “And the reason why the articles were received at all. I know the Prophet would normally get tired of accepting anonymous articles so frequently. The spell seems to have increased their antipathy towards you. Skeeter’s articles rarely appear anymore.”

Harry had noticed, but had assumed it was because Skeeter was getting tired of defending him. He gave an absent nod. “So part of this is false, too. I can’t depend on anchoring my unweaving of the spell on the difference between many people’s notions of true and false. They’ll consider their memories of the past few months as being as accurate and true as their memories before the spell began, and we have no way of knowing when Dumbledore began the spell, anyway.”

“Anchoring your unweaving of the spell—“

“Dumbledore’s like a spider,” Harry explained, frowning at the wide-eyed Ravenclaws in the Pensieve memory and wondering how many of them would have opposed him or thought of him at all without the spell. “He’s weaving from point to point. He can’t anchor the web on nothing, don’t you see? He chose to alter perceptions of me, not create them. He had to have some emotion in the person’s mind to work with, no matter how small it was. And now I have to have something to anchor my unweaving of the spell with. I don’t think I can just follow the pattern of his spell, because I don’t know those other minds like I know yours, or Draco’s. I might alter something that was original to them.”

“I must admit that I know very little of magic like this, Harry.” Snape’s voice was subdued. “I am an Occlumens and a Legilimens, but I work, at most, with one other mind, or with presences in someone else’s mind. I am not sure what to advise you to do with this.”

"I'll figure it out," said Harry darkly. He could feel the burning in him change its focus. Now it was urgency, and not merely anger. He wanted that web unbound. It was going. Its very existence was intolerable to him, since it had acted against other people's wills and choices. "I'll have to think it through a bit, and probably stay in the Pensieve until I do, but I'll figure it out."

"Can I help?"

Harry started, and turned. Argutus was crawling towards him through the memory, twisting his head in interest to look up at the scared Ravenclaws. "I have been here before, but not with so many people," he announced, twining around Harry's left leg, his left hip, and then his left arm. "And this feels like something out of the past. This is not a natural place, is it?" He didn't sound offended, but fascinated.

Harry narrowed his eyes. "You can tell the difference between the present and the past?"

Argutus cocked his head to look back at his own milk-smooth scales. "And the future. I am an Omen snake, after all."

Harry stared hard at him, and saw colors swarming on the scales, dancing and trying to form a vision. He doubted that Argutus was old enough yet to tell him what they meant, so he waited, gazing at them and stroking Argutus's head. Snape waited with him, probably thinking he was conversing with Argutus on matters of deepest importance and needed to be left alone.

The colors altered fitfully, fretfully, and finally slammed into a maze of scarlet and gold, as if they'd found a form that suited them. Harry squinted, but still could not tell what shape the scarlet and gold might take. The Gryffindor lion, a Gryffindor banner? Was Argutus telling him that he needed the help of the Headmistress, or perhaps his twin? Or was he just trying to say that Harry would be involved in breaking a Gryffindor's spell?

That's the problem with Divination, Harry reflected in frustration, thinking of Trelawney's prophecy in his third year. Never enough details when you need them to really help with anything.

But if he could force no interpretation upon the hues, then he was at least free to let his mind roam and pick an association with them. Harry tried to slow his breathing, thinking of things that were red and gold. Gryffindor colors, leaves when they turned, fire—

Fawkes!

Harry clenched his hand, causing Argutus to hiss in displeasure as Harry quit petting him. “Argutus?” he asked, bending towards the Omen snake to give him the task before he could sulk. As long as he thought he was doing something important, Argutus would bustle. “Can you get out of the Pensieve and then bring the phoenix here, without alerting anyone to what you’re doing?”

Argutus turned his head slyly sideways. “Of course I can,” he said. “No one knows as many tunnels in the stone as I do. And he is asleep in your den at this time of the morning. But I don’t know why I should. After all, you haven’t spent much time lately with me, and I don’t like the phoenix. He has the bad habit of shrinking and growing when he should stay the same size all the time.”

Harry managed a smile, in spite of everything. Argutus wanted to be coaxed. In the midst of so much strangeness, a spell that had influenced most everyone Harry knew without their even being aware of it, it was good to find at least one being who acted normally.

“I’m sorry,” he said. “You’re the cleverest, dearest snake that ever was, Argutus. Your name means ‘clear,’ but it’s more than that. You’re a good omen all by yourself, never mind that you’re an Omen snake. Your eyes see more clearly than anyone else’s in the school. You discover all the really interesting things. But you’ve got courage, too, to survive those pain spells without a murmur of complaint, and nobody is as loyal as you are.” He felt an inspiration strike him and sink its teeth into his brain. Argutus had been fascinated by the differences between the Houses—it was the reason he spent so much time wandering in the Ravenclaw, Hufflepuff, and Gryffindor common rooms—and had insisted on hearing as much of the history of Hogwarts as Harry thought he could understand. “In fact, you’re the perfect blend of all four Houses.”

Argutus gave a quick little hiss Harry hadn't known he could utter; he supposed it was the closest a snake could come to a purr. "I go," he said, and slid down from Harry's arm in the direction of the "back" of the memory. Harry supposed he had got in in the first place by sliding over the Pensieve rim. "I cannot let you down, not when I am that cunning and clever and brave and loyal."

He slithered off, and Snape demanded at once, "Do you really think the Omen snake can help you, Harry?"

Harry let out a little breath. "His scales showed a vision of fire. I think Fawkes can help me, yes."

"Why?" Snape looked as if he were reconsidering ever showing Harry this. Harry knew why. Snape's eyes had spoken it all through the conversation in which he told Harry about Rovenan, and his part in killing him. There was a new kind of protectiveness to his gaze, a new hesitancy about involving Harry in efforts to cure evil or fight spells like this one. "Are you sure you aren't grasping at straws?"

"I might be," Harry admitted. "Not even the prophecies of an Omen snake are clear, after all, at least until he learns to interpret them. But Fawkes is those colors he was showing, and he was Dumbledore's phoenix. I think he knows his mind as well as anyone else alive. You said that the spell contains a large part of Dumbledore's own perception. I hope to be able to detangle what's him and what's the thoughts of the people I'm fighting for that way."

Snape's frown was deep. "That does not sound easy."

"It probably won't be." Harry kept his voice light.

"Why must you be the one to do this?" Snape whispered. "Lucius said that you would be, and he was right, damn him. But can you not rest, and hand the reins over to someone else? I might be able to solve the problem eventually, through dedicated study of Occlumency and Legilimency."

Harry gave him an incredulous look. "What with your duties as Potions Master and Head of Slytherin and Deputy Headmaster? No, sir. And the problem would grow worse in the meantime. I know your methods. With all due respect, sir, you would spend months on this, because you wouldn't want to do something wrong. Sometimes you simply have to say fuck caution."

"Spoken like a Gryffindor," said Snape, though his words lacked malice.

"Spoken like an angry vates," said Harry. "And there's the other part of your answer, sir. I have to do this because no one else can. Dumbledore might have the power, but he sure as fuck doesn't have the motivation."

"Does your language always get fouler when you are angry?" Snape asked.

"You mean you haven't noticed that by now, sir?" Harry prowled in circles, absently avoiding the Ravenclaws, who were clutching defensively at their left arms as Snape cut their sleeves off. "Yes, it does. And I am very angry. He had no right to do this. It isn't—it isn't even limited to the people I'm protecting." Harry shook his head, wondering how he could explain it. The explanation would both reassure Snape and enable Harry to put his thoughts into some kind of order, so he wanted to make the effort. "Everyone deserves that capacity to make their own choices, without being pushed in one direction or another. I know I can't stop some of the pushing, like parents telling their children to go to bed at a certain time or else, but no one should ever have to suffer from magical coercion. And some of them will make bad choices, like following Voldemort, but that's still what they decided on. But I can't just force freedom on people, because what if they don't want it? That's why I'm almost grateful to Dumbledore for handing me this. It's not like freeing house elves, where I'll have to talk wizards into agreeing." Harry grimaced slightly at the thought of what a nightmare that would be. "It's a clear-cut situation. I'm not changing their minds, just handing them back their capacity to make their own decisions."

“Why?” Snape whispered. Harry knew he wasn’t asking why that was a good thing—how could he, when he bore the Dark Mark on his arm and had fought so long and hard to get free of what it meant?—but why Harry was so deeply committed to this, in particular.

Harry stretched out his hand, and let a shimmer of flame run up his arm. “I’ve got all this magic. What else would I use it for?”

Snape shook his head, eyes amused, and started to reply, but just then the air around them shone with subtle fire, and Fawkes arrived on Harry’s shoulder with a croon. Argutus slithered through the common room a moment later.

“He flew ahead of me,” said Argutus. “Tell him to stop doing that.”

Harry stroked Fawkes’s wing feathers, and ignored Snape’s mutters about how the phoenix had come to be here. Harry thought Fawkes could go anywhere he wanted, and probably ignored what wizards thought of as “rules” in doing so. “I need your help,” he said softly. “Dumbledore’s extended a spell over England, Scotland, and Wales. I want to break it. It compels people to change their minds about me. The problem is that it’s hard to tell where his mind begins and their thoughts end, and we can’t do it outside the Pensieve, or we’ll lose our memories. Can you help me?”

Fawkes uttered a deep sound Harry hadn’t heard before, like the crash of falling waters. Then he rose from Harry’s shoulder, hovering just above it, so that his tail feathers and no more brushed against the side of Harry’s neck. He shut his eyes, and his song burst forth.

Harry had thought he’d heard all his friend’s songs—the mourning one, the coaxing one that told other magical creatures of the coming of a new vates, the joyous one with which he sometimes greeted sunrise, the wild one that he’d sung as he flew above the Forbidden Forest. But this was a new one. It was barely a melody, since it combined so many different sounds. Harry could hear a mutter of voices, only some of them singing. They babbled and rushed past him, and then he found himself swept up in them.

The Pensieve memory tore and whirled away. Harry had only a moment to worry about whether that would mean he would lose his memories of the spell and what he was doing with it, because he found himself dancing through flames.

Pattern after pattern took fire, nets and rounds and wheels of it, spreading in every direction. Harry stared, and began to see the threads that were there before they burned, ash-black strands of thought and emotion and memory. Fawkes's voice ascended, and more and more of the webs exploded into white and gold and orange and blue.

No, there was only some blue, Harry realized abruptly. That was the color that expanded and throbbed on the most tangled web, the one that raced through and under everything else. Harry's eyes narrowed, and his heart began to beat to the same harsh rhythm as those flames did.

That's Dumbledore's web. Fawkes is marking it out for me, in the best way he knows how.

He felt a sharp tug on his left arm, and looked down to see Argutus coiling there, his weight deliberate. He lifted his head and extended his tongue to taste the scent of the fire, not looking at all put out. "I don't want to be left behind," he explained.

Harry was not at all sure that the snake would be able to keep up in this strange neverland of fire and Pensieve memory and phoenix song, but he wouldn't discourage him from coming, either. There had lately been enough discouragement of ambitions and choices and freedom. He rested his hand on the Omen snake and reached out towards the blue flames that marked Dumbledore's web.

At first, he didn't know what to do. If he put out the flames, then he might kill Dumbledore's influence over anyone else, but he might also permanently damage Dumbledore's mind. There was part of him that whispered that would be no bad thing. Who cared if the Light Lord was found drooling in his Still-Beetle confinement when they came to escort him to the trial?

But Harry did. He cared. He had not received Dumbledore's permission to damage his mind. He didn't need his permission to unbraided his influence, since that was something he had done that had hurt others. But Harry had no reason to bat him back into his own mind and wreck all that he was.

The key, as always, proved to be imagination. What Harry thought of the webs as, how he conceived them, was often as important as what he actually did to be rid of them. He closed his eyes, and located himself in Fawkes's song, the song of falling waters.

Water opposes fire, said a voice so old that it seemed to be a natural truth of the world, not one that Harry had located inside himself.

He thought of water. The sea at the Northumberland beach came to him, as perhaps it always would, first of all, the endless hush of waves and the expanses of stone-gray ocean. Then he imagined the siren's pool at Woodhouse, the lush, clear liquid, made, he was sure, to mimic the siren's natural environment. Then it was the lake at Hogwarts, shifting and cloudy, the weeds blossoming to hide the truths of the water and the dangers within it.

Water standing became water falling, rain singing down, the smell of dampness in the dungeons that always increased when a storm was in the offing. Rain was probably falling right now; Harry had seen a tinge of gray in the enchanted ceiling of the Great Hall this morning. Rain was a part of autumn, of spring, of Britain and of Ireland, drizzle and wetness and sudden heaviness in clothing and limbs.

Water falling became water flowing, braids of rivers threading all over the islands, ending in the sea, or beginning in it, if one looked at it another way, breathing out union, breathing out connection, ripple and spread and link and drown.

Harry wound the imaginings together inside him, and then braided them up with the remnant of his anger. The Augurey's cry signaled rain, and there were several Augurey chicks who would never cry to herald a storm, thanks to their murder by the person posing as him. Harry imagined rain falling, lonely for the black-green bird's cry, and he imagined people daring to murder the chicks and publish the articles and believe them at all because of Dumbledore's spell, and he pushed the water out of himself.

He opened his eyes and saw the cascades twining down the web's burning strands, falling with imagined gravity and not against it—it was important that the image be as natural as possible—drowning the fire as it went. Fawkes's song wound between the waters all the while, thunderous as a cascade. This was a song of justice, of stern and regretted but necessary action. Fawkes did not like getting rid of his own flames, but in this case, the flames he was getting rid of were not natural, should not have been here, should have stayed safely ensconced in Dumbledore's head. Fire had to yield to the will of water.

Harry poured it all out of himself, and saw the strands cool and stop burning, turning to ash. He wondered what the thoughts of those under Dumbledore's spell would feel like at the moment. Would they experience a certain lightness, wondering where the weight on their emotions had gone? Or would they think of him and not know why? Or would they feel nothing at all until the web was snapped completely?

Harry leaned forward and breathed on the fragile, ashy strands of the web, expecting them to blow apart.

Nothing happened.

Harry frowned, and glanced up at Fawkes, wondering what he should do. The phoenix uttered a confused note, then went back to singing the song of stern justice so that the ash-web couldn't creep away and mingle with the others. But that warble was enough to confirm to Harry that the phoenix didn't know what he should do any more than he did.

He gnawed his lip for a moment, and tried to recall what he knew of Dumbledore. He must have pushed an enormous amount of his magic into this. He would have given all he had, heart and soul and mind. That had been why Fawkes could locate his influence at all, because so much of the Headmaster himself was present.

What was the heart of Dumbledore?

And then Harry knew. His smile wasn't happy as he stepped forward, gently shifting the weight of Argutus back to his shoulder. He didn't really like understanding the former Headmaster any more than he had liked understanding Voldemort. But he wasn't foolish enough to ignore his understanding, either.

The heart of Dumbledore was sacrifice.

Harry touched the stump of his left wrist to the ash-web.

He could feel the spell scream, rather than hear it, a low vibration that traveled through his body. Argutus gave a surprised hiss. "Did a tree fall?" he asked, but then became absorbed, as Harry was, in watching the web unravel.

It began from the inside and traced outward, following the general spiral shape. Numerous small strands, binding the spell's influence to the thoughts and emotions of many different people, puffed apart and were gone, dissipating into floating clouds of black dust. Harry watched as the larger structures slumped and melted into meaninglessness, and he felt joy throbbing in his chest like a second heartbeat.

And satisfied rage, too. Strange that the ending of the web doesn't seem to have ended my anger, Harry thought. Even stranger that I don't want it to. I want to find out who killed those magical creatures and make them pay.

The web whirled around once and blew away. Harry laughed, and looked down as he felt Argutus lift his head and test the air with a tongue.

"Do you do that all the time?" he asked.

"Quite a bit of the time," said Harry.

"I'm so glad that I chose you as a friend," said Argutus happily. "That was fascinating. I can't wait until the next time we get to do that."

Fawkes gave an indignant warble as he settled on Harry's shoulder, and in Harry's mind appeared a vision of the phoenix and Harry shining with light, while Argutus lounged behind them, a dim shadow. He had helped with dismissing Dumbledore's web, the vision said; Argutus had done absolutely nothing.

Harry stroked the phoenix and the Omen snake in turn, and then opened his eyes. The first thing he saw was the Pensieve memory around them, replaying, this time somewhere near the middle of Snape's battle with Rovenan. The second thing he saw was Snape staring at him.

There was an awe in his eyes that Harry didn't think he'd ever seen before. Of course, he thought, Snape had never been this close to the breaking of a web, while Draco had shared the freeing of the centaurs and the unicorns and the Many with him. And if he'd seen a tenth part of what Harry and Fawkes had done, Harry couldn't blame him for feeling awed. He was feeling rather smug and pleased himself.

"So that's gone," he said confidently.

Snape nodded, slowly. Then he straightened, as if thinking it remiss of a guardian to listen to what his charge said, and announced, "I rather think the Headmistress will cancel classes for today, to give people time to deal with the sudden change."

"Good," said Harry, with a shrug. "I think people need the recovery time. And I need to contact the Ministry, and the Daily Prophet." If Skeeter doesn't know who Argus Veritaserum is yet, I don't think she would be adverse to doing a little digging to find out.

Snape smirked for no reason Harry could discern, and nodded, and then they pulled their heads out of the Pensieve memory.

Harry gasped and blinked, before realizing that he had Fawkes on one shoulder and Argutus on the other, and the memories of the spell in his mind. He gave one hard smile and strode towards the door.

"Do not try to do too much," Snape called after him.

Harry glanced back over his shoulder. "I'm not. I'm just going to do what I need to do, and explain to certain people how very, very angry they've made me." He opened Snape's door and nodded crisply to his three guards. They all blinked at him, Draco not excepted. It seemed that they'd been expecting him to come out of Snape's office bleeding and vomiting.

Not now. Maybe not ever again. Obviously, this is like what happened when I didn't warn the Ravenclaws enough. People think they can push me. They're going to find out that binding people under webs and hurting magical creatures is just not on.

"Come on," he said. "I've got to go talk to the Headmistress." He strode snappily up the corridor towards the Great Hall.

Fawkes was crooning a sunrise song on his shoulder, and Argutus was telling him what web he thought they should break next. Harry felt his heart lift higher and higher. His anger grew talons and breathed more fire on the way.

This is going to be really damn fun.

Albus could not move. The Still-Beetle confinement would not allow him to. But he could shudder in his head as Harry snapped the spell and cast him back into the solitude of his own thoughts.

Harry had broken the web with the help of a phoenix and his own loss at Voldemort's hands—not the help of a single, human wizard, and without a reference to either Light or Dark magic, for all that a creature of the Light had aided him.

There was a vates abroad in the world, and Albus had only one more chance to stop him.

Albus could feel the first coming of regret towering above him like a storm in the North Sea.

He knew that wave after wave, of pain and horror and loss, would follow it.

Chapter Thirty-Seven: Make Some Noise

Draco told himself it was not childish to go a little weak in the knees at the sight of Harry as he came out of Snape's office. His eyes were ablaze, as they tended to be in moments of high emotion, and Argutus glowed with shifting colors on his arm, and Fawkes shone on his shoulder. He was aglow with light, but not the weak kind of Light that Light wizards served and Draco's father had often told him to beware of, lest it should trick him into servitude through false promises. This was light like lightning, like sea-fire blooming and leaping on the masts of a doomed ship.

This was light that made Harry look really damn good.

Draco followed obediently as they made their way to the Headmistress's office, though he did wonder if Harry knew the current password. As it turned out, he didn't need to. Fawkes lifted his voice and threw a note like an arrow at the gargoyle. The heavy creature gathered itself and shifted aside, its limbs grinding and shuffling on the stone.

Harry stepped onto the staircase, and Draco made sure he was the one who stood at Harry's right shoulder. The Hufflepuff girl and Neelda meant well, he was sure, but neither of them was as good at spotting small threats to Harry as he was. Besides, Harry glanced back once, as if he expected to see him standing there, and Draco didn't think he could disappoint him.

Harry's hand found his, and squeezed.

More sure than ever that he had made the right decision, Draco hardly heard the Headmistress's voice saying, "Come in."

When the door opened, they found McGonagall on her feet, one hand on her head and her expression pained. That look melted the moment she saw Harry. She stood straight then, and Draco thought he saw her draw in a breath as of cleansing sea-air. She nodded at Harry.

“Well, Mr. Potter?” she asked quietly. It only occurred to Draco a moment later that she wasn’t treating Harry at all like a student.

“You’ve canceled classes for today?” Harry asked her.

McGonagall nodded. “With the chaos exploding in the Great Hall, with memories suddenly rushing back to students and professors alike and emotions shifting so suddenly, it seemed the most prudent course,” she added dryly.

“Dumbledore was spreading a web,” said Harry, without bothering to introduce the subject. Draco hissed a bit at the thought that Harry had broken another web and he hadn’t been there to see it, but Harry’s hand found and squeezed his again, which somewhat helped to make up for the disappointment. “It was a powerful, old Light spell, which subtly influenced people against me and ate the memories of those who discovered it. Of course there’s no way to tell immediately which actions people took against me were influenced by that, and to what degree. But I think canceling classes for today is a good first step. It gives people some time to recover and think about what they feel.”

McGonagall closed her eyes and thinned her lips. “And another shame falls to the House of Gryffindor,” she said softly. “I am sorry, Harry. Godric’s children have not done very well by you.”

Draco looked down to conceal a smile. He could see advantages in this shame of Gryffindor’s, though he doubted Harry would see the same thing. Draco had not been blind to the fact that Slytherin House was gaining in prominence, that people—save those students against Harry—tended not to make as many jokes about them or assume they were evil automatically, as they had last year. Their rival House being willing to hide its head about now was another point in their favor.

“You didn’t have anything to do with it, Headmistress McGonagall,” said Harry dismissively, which rather wasn’t paying attention to politics, in Draco’s mind. “It does mean that I need to contact the Minister, and inform him of the spell, and get him to reason out which of his actions towards me in the last little while were prompted by the spell, and which were genuine. It'll affect publicity, the trial procedures, the members of the Wizengamot they might choose to judge the trial—all that." Harry shrugged as if none of it mattered more than any other part. Draco thought he was the only one in the room who knew him well enough to see how his shoulders trembled at the mention of the trial. "I'll have to talk to other people too, of course, but the Minister first. I need to ask your permission to be absent from the school today, at least, and perhaps for several days, and I need to know how far you're willing to back me on opposing the Minister, if that's what I need to do."

"I believe you entirely, Harry," said McGonagall at once, which earned her a few points in Draco's eyes. "Creating a lie like this isn't in your character. If you need my help with Minister Scrimgeour, you shall have it."

Harry's eyes closed for a moment. Draco wasn't facing him, but he knew they did it anyway, by the crinkles in the side of his face. He felt a moment's smugness in being that familiar with Harry, and then an even greater smugness at the thought that Harry was his, all his.

"Thank you, Headmistress," Harry breathed. "And I'm afraid I need to borrow two of your professors for my journey to the Ministry. I'd like both Professor Snape and Professor Lupin to escort me."

"Is Professor Lupin a wise choice, Harry?" McGonagall asked gently. "It is true that I nearly dared the Minister to oppose me by giving him a job here, but Hogwarts is distant from the Ministry, and Scrimgeour is less concerned with me than Fudge was with—Dumbledore. Bringing a werewolf into Scrimgeour's own territory may strain your relationship."

"If it can be strained that easily, then I don't want to preserve it intact," said Harry. "Besides, bringing along a former Death Eater is risky, too. I want to show the Minister that I don't intend to back down and be as calm and tame as I have been so far."

Draco frowned. When has Harry ever been tame or calm? But he had refrained from much political prodding into the Ministry in the last few months. Perhaps that was what he meant.

"I think Professor Lupin is still in the Great Hall, calming students," said McGonagall quietly. "Would you like me to go get him, Harry, or would you prefer to go yourself?"

Harry took a deep breath. "I want to go myself."

McGonagall gave him a fierce, appreciative smile. "Then I wish you good luck, Harry," she said, and sat back down behind her desk.

Draco again managed to be right at Harry's shoulder as they entered the moving staircase, and he murmured in his ear, "I hope that you don't think you can leave me behind. We're going to the Ministry together."

Harry tilted his head back; they stood so close that he could let it rest on Draco's shoulder. Draco lost his breath at the feeling of Harry's hair on his cheek.

"I wouldn't want it any other way," Harry said.

I am angry, and I have a right to be angry.

That was the sentiment Harry kept repeating to himself, and it stood him in good stead as he strode back into the Great Hall. Professor Lupin and Professor Flitwick were near the front of the room, speaking softly with several overexcited students. They didn't see him as soon as the students themselves did.

Harry saw their faces tighten in shock. Several of them looked away from him. Those would be people who had figured out some difference in their thoughts about him, Harry thought. Others simply stared, as if they knew that something was different but didn't know what or why. A wake of whispers ran behind him as he marched towards the Professors.

It wasn't their fault, said part of Harry's mind, the older and more familiar part. It was the spell.

But with most of his fury escaped, it was impossible to put the rest of it away so easily. It snarled in his ears, and reminded him of what Margaret had done to Argutus, what Marietta had done to him with the encouragement of her Death Eater boyfriend—though probably not with the knowledge that he was a Death Eater—and what Rovenan had done. Harry knew Dumbledore's spell had seized and worked on what small feelings their minds might have harbored towards him, blowing up tiny clouds into great storms.

But those feelings were still there in the first place. Margaret hated me for something that happened in second year. Marietta hated me—because, apparently. Rovenan still became a Death Eater, and I don't think I was the only reason why.

Harry felt himself tense when he was a few feet away from Lupin and someone stepped up behind him. He heard Draco drawing his wand, but he didn't get a chance to say anything before the person said, "Dolor immoderatus."

Harry didn't recognize the voice, but he recognized the pain curse she was casting—probably at Isabell or Hannah—and he swung around and lifted his hand. His fury and his magic, both roused, rose together with a spat note from Fawkes, and turned her curse in mid-flight, changing it into a red spell that bounced back at her like a dagger. The caster, Lucy Turtledove, Margaret's friend, shrieked, and put one hand to her face. Harry saw her skin cracking and flushing, as if she had a bad sunburn. It spread from her cheeks to her chin, and Lucy yelped and dropped a hand when she touched her cheek, flinching, as if the intense heat were too much for her to bear.

Satisfaction as hot as the burn licked along Harry's spine like flames. He knew his lips had twisted into a smile, but he didn't know what it looked like, save that Lucy stared at him and as quickly glanced away.

"I broke a web that was spread over you," he said, raising his voice so that everyone could hear him. "Albus Dumbledore cast a spell that worked on your emotions and tried to compel you to hinder me. I thought that your hatred would cease with the web's removal." He fastened his eyes on Lucy. "It seems that I was wrong, and that some of you are not that intelligent."

Lucy was staring at him again, one hand clenched so tightly around her wand that Harry thought she would break it. That would be something to see. Her eyes glowed with hatred. "You're lying," she whispered. "Headmaster Dumbledore would never do that. You're lying."

"I am not," said Harry. "And even if I was, you have no excuse for trying to attack other students. Didn't Rovenan teach you anything?" His gaze went to her covered left arm. "Do you have something to hide, Turtledove?" he added, and made sure that his voice dripped false solicitude.

She seemed to choke. "How dare you—how dare you imply—"

"If you don't have anything to hide, then you should have no trouble showing your arm." Harry moved a step forward, knowing that he had turned the mood of the room against her, and that she would be stinging with embarrassment, and that he was enjoying this, much as he told himself he shouldn't. "Bare it for me."

"Why should I?" Lucy's chin went up. "You're a liar, I know you are, a Dark wizard, one who doesn't have any reason to tell the truth and just likes to show up those who are performing a useful service to the school!" She nodded to Margaret Parsons, who was lurking behind her, but avoided Harry's eyes when he tried to catch hers. "You cursed Margaret with a humiliating spell, and you've—"

"Received permission to defend himself with magic, as you should know full well, Miss Turtledove," said Remus, appearing beside them like a wraith, as graceful and as silent. Flitwick was behind him, his face reflecting deep disapproval as he gazed at the students of his House confronting Harry.

"Fifty points from Ravenclaw," Remus continued, his amber eyes dangerous. "You owe Mr. Potter at least the courtesy of listening to the truth." He ignored Lucy's spluttering entirely and turned to Harry. "Was there something you needed, Harry?"

Since he could hear Flitwick scolding Lucy, Harry felt secure enough in himself to nod. "Yes. I want you to come with me to the Ministry. I've got to tell Minister Scrimgeour about the spell." He held Remus's eyes. "You'll be going with Professor Snape, because I thought you were the best choice."

Reflections of several possibilities shone in Remus's gaze, but he simply inclined his head. "I'll go, Harry. You have the Headmistress's permission, I trust?"

Harry nodded. "I'll meet you by the front doors in a half-hour, then," said Remus, and turned to look at Lucy again. "It could be sooner, I know," he added, anticipating Harry's words long before he gave them, "but I have something to deal with here, first."

Harry worried that Remus would hurt her, with the rational part of him. The angry part of him chuckled and let him turn, to march out between two lines of students trying very hard not to stare at him, and go fetch Snape.

Rufus Scrimgeour was not having a very good day.

There had been the sourness in the back of his throat when he read the Daily Prophet article this morning, and saw Potter smashing Augurey chicks over the head. He could not believe it, but more than the literal truth of the article, what it portended made him close his eyes and swallow.

There was fear abroad in the wizarding world, and hatred, of a child with Lord-level power.

Rufus had been three years behind Tom Riddle in Hogwarts. He had seen what happened to a boy like that who was revered by some, but hated by just as many. Riddle had split Slytherin down the middle, some of them clinging to him and some turning away, and some of those who turned away had received—strange wounds. No one could prove Riddle had done it, but on the other hand, no one else came forward to claim credit for the dangerous pranks, either. Rufus had kept his head down, his vow to the Light at the age of twelve largely protecting him. Riddle had ignored him in contempt, and most of the others thought he was too odd to bother with.

And now there was another child who had power as strong as Riddle's—or stronger, really, than they had been at comparable ages, though Rufus was not at all sure who would be more powerful once Potter had grown to manhood—and people hating him. Harry could so easily do as Riddle did, turning in on himself in the face of that loathing. It would be worse for him, Rufus knew, because Harry would not understand it the way Riddle had. That first Lord had handled it with a raised brow and a sneer. Harry tried to make things better for those who hated him.

Sooner or later, though, forgiveness and good will had to run out. Sooner or later, they could wind up with another Slytherin Lord who chose to embrace Dark Arts, so that respect would at least mingle with the hatred.

And there was the suspicion, niggling and whispering in the back of Rufus's head, that Harry might one day decide to turn his sights on the Ministry, that his silence so far was ominous, that he should have been in contact and badgering Rufus to do something about the werewolf laws by now. What if he was gathering power in an attempt to take the Ministry over? What if he did manage to destroy the refuge of ordinary wizards after all?

Rufus wearily rubbed his forehead. He couldn't remember how long he'd had those suspicions. Since July, he thought.

And then, as he sipped his tea and contemplated the Argus Veritaserum articles he'd saved and wished his respect for the right of the Daily Prophet's reporters to say whatever the hell they wanted would yield just enough to allow him to arrest Veritaserum—sometimes, it was a problem having morals—everything changed.

Rufus spilled his tea, which was never calculated to put him in a good mood. He stood up, wand whipping into his hand, and glanced around the office. He frowned. There had been a sparkling mist over everything a moment ago, and now it was gone.

Wasn't it?

But why was there a sparkling mist in my office in the first place?

Rufus strode rapidly to the door and threw it open. Young Tonks was the guard on the office this morning. Of course, she started and tripped over her robes, sprawling full-length on the floor.

Waiting for her to recover, Rufus stared in several directions and even sniffed. Come to think of it, a faint smell he had got used to was gone, too. It had been the smell of rotten eggs. But why should he have got used to that? Surely not even the most incompetent of Auror trainees would have to wear the hex that made them smell like that for more than a week. Smelling like rotten eggs was an excellent incentive to master the correct spells.

"What is it, sir?" Tonks squeaked, popping back up again.

"I want to speak to—" Damn. Not Mallory. Rufus still had to pause and remember that his most trusted second-in-command had disgraced herself, sometimes. "Auror Burke. Right now."

Tonks simply ran off, not even pausing for a "Yes, sir!" Hopefully that would help make up for the several times she tripped on the way. Rufus shut his door and returned to his desk.

His glance fell on the Veritaserum article about the Augureys, and he read a few lines. He frowned. Who would believe this drivel? It was still a cause for concern since it spoke of the attitude some people held towards Potter, of course, but suddenly it seemed much less compelling than it had been.

Someone cast a spell on me.

Rufus tapped his wand against his palm, speeding up as he began to pace back and forth, only slightly favoring his bad leg. He could think of only a few wizards who would have the skill to get such a spell past his complicated, layered wards on the office, and most of them were either in Tullianum or running around with Voldemort. Of course, Rufus couldn't discount that the Dark Lord might want to hex him, but such a subtle spell wasn't really his style. Voldemort liked to announce his presence. Besides, wouldn't he have had the spell do something else? Command Rufus to become a Death Eater and take the Dark Mark, for example?

What was the spell meant to make me do?

It was an unanswerable question for right now, and Rufus tucked it away. He went back to numbering down candidates who could have done this kind of thing.

There was Dumbledore. He certainly had the raw power, but he was in Still-Beetle confinement. One couldn't use magic through Still-Beetle confinement. Of course, one couldn't cast magic on Dumbledore, either, but that was all right. The beetles would make sure that he was still alive, his body preserved as it had been at the moment the shell was thrown. He could remain locked up neat and tight until they were ready to try him.

And there was Potter.

Rufus scowled. His suspicions about Potter wanting to take over the Ministry no longer seemed quite as potent as they had been, either. On the other hand, if Potter didn't answer an owl, then Rufus thought he would be justified in suspecting him. He went to his desk and sat down, intending to write a polite letter.

He was halfway through the first paragraph when the door opened, and Auror Burke came in. Rufus sat back, linking his hands behind his head and studying her. Burke was a Dark family, almost all of them, though some of the bastards had the decency to stay neutral. Auror Priscilla Burke was one of those. She hadn't Declared, though her husband had. She was fiercely, yet quietly, independent. She got things done. Rufus had chosen her because he trusted her to look out for her own interests, and to have the cool-headedness that Fiona Mallory lacked. If she ever became involved in a case that targeted one of her family, for instance, she would hand the reins over to someone else. Fiona hadn't been able to keep away from the Potters, and look where it got her.

“Sir,” said Burke, sitting down in the chair opposite his desk and inclining her head cordially. She was tall for a woman, and could look him directly in the eye. “You wanted to see me?”

“Yes,” said Rufus. “Did you feel a change in your thoughts about ten minutes ago?”

Burke’s eyes widened, then narrowed. “I noticed something,” she said. “The air around me felt lighter, and I remembered a few things I’d forgotten from the past months, about times I suspected I was under a spell. But I couldn’t see any visible effects. Besides, none of the wards on my office rang. Do you think that there really was a spell, sir?”

“I’m positive,” said Rufus. “And the wizards who could cast a spell able to get in under our wards are rare, as I’m sure you know.”

Burke nodded. Her face had gone pale. Rufus cocked his head. Her husband is Potter’s ally, but I had thought she’d kept distant enough from the war to keep her job here. Perhaps not.

“Were you exempt from the spell because you are Potter’s ally?” he asked quietly.

“Sir, I—I really don’t know.” Burke shook her head and gave him what he thought was an honest, if anguished, look. “I don’t think he would do something like that. He’s vates, about freeing the magical creatures. I don’t think he’d enslave wizards to do it. From what I understand, he can’t, or he loses everything he’s become.”

Rufus jerked his head in a short movement neither nod nor shake. Yes, he’d heard that too, but Merlin knew that Potter had enough power to be a Lord, and Merlin knew no wizard was immune to temptation. Rufus could see Potter Declaring himself a Lord out of genuine desire to do good, forgetting that wizards and witches who did not have his extraordinary magic were people, too.

“I would like you to go through the Department,” he said. “Quietly. Find out who seems to have recovered from this spell, who remembers nothing, and who still might be under it.”

Burke was just nodding when his door flew open. Rufus lifted his head and narrowed his eyes when he saw Tonks standing there. “Nymphadora,” he said, to show how displeased he was. “What is it?”

“It’s Mallory, sir,” said Tonks, gulping several times. “She’s broken free of her confinement. She insists now that she wasn’t that angry at the Potter parents, and she doesn’t know why she let herself be arrested. She says that she was manipulated, her emotions exaggerated.”

Rufus cursed softly. If that is the effect of the damn spell, we have more of a problem on our hands than we imagined.

But Fiona’s escape was a bigger one. Rufus knew she was the strongest wizard in the Ministry right now, excepting the confined Albus Dumbledore. And if she’d decided to forego rationality enough to break the wards on her cell, then she might well use her wandless magic to kill.

“Tell me where she is,” he ordered Tonks, drawing his wand.

“Sir, you can’t—“

“I’m the only one who has a chance of getting through to her,” said Rufus. “Tell me now, damnit.”

Tonks bowed her head. “Second floor, sir. Just past the lifts.”

Rufus nodded, and lifted the thread hanging around his neck, which held several small ordinary objects, made into Portkeys, one for each floor of the Ministry. They were the only ones that worked in the confines of the building all the time, without special dispensation. He grasped the one for the second floor, and felt the familiar dizzying whirl grab him and then deposit him in the middle of the Auror office.

Most of his Aurors were missing from their desks. Rufus could hear a silence from up the corridor, which was worse than the sounds of battle. More to the point, he could feel Fiona’s magic in the air. The walls and floor shimmered with heat. Rufus winced. He’d been one of the first Aurors on the scene after Fiona had killed her abusive father when she was sixteen. The man had been covered with burns so deep he hadn't been recognizable as human.

"Steady does it," he muttered, in encouragement to himself, and started forward.

He made it through half the desks before he caught a glimpse of movement under one. He dropped at once to a battle-crouch, wincing as his bad leg pained him. He caught a glimpse of a startled face, and then red hair.

"Weasley," he said, nodding to Percy. "Do you know where Mallory is?"

Weasley shuddered, but he had a hold of his wand, and Rufus knew he'd been hiding as part of a strategy, not out of fear. "Still in the second-floor corridor, sir," he said. "She tried the lifts, but Madam Bones had already cast a spell to make them refuse to carry her. She was screaming about finding Albus Dumbledore and making him pay for this."

Rufus sighed. So there's no doubt about who she blames it on, at least. "Come with me, Weasley," he ordered, and had the satisfaction of hearing Percy fall in behind him as he threaded his way through the desks. He'd known he had potential Auror material in that one from the first time he looked into his eyes. Potter had done him a favor there, identifying Weasley as one of the spies Dumbledore was trying to plant in the Ministry and warning Rufus about it. Rufus had taken the opportunity to snare the younger man's loyalty for himself. No sense in wasting someone who could do the Ministry so much good.

They rounded the corner that led out of the office, and the heat immediately grew stronger. Rufus gripped his wand, and stepped out into the middle of the hallway.

He nearly stepped on Auror Feverfew, lying motionless on the ground. Rufus estimated his state of health with one glance, and relaxed when he saw that the young man still breathed. His burns were bad, though, at least second-degree. Rufus shook his head, and felt his mouth harden into a thin, determined line. This was why he didn't like powerful wizards and witches. They were apt to let their magic rule them, and think they had the right to do anything they wanted just because of what they could do.

Well, Fiona was about to learn better.

A few more steps, and he saw her, standing in front of the lifts and attacking them with blast after blast of wandless magic. She hadn't noticed them coming, but then Weasley stepped heavily, and she whipped towards them. She went quite still when she caught sight of Rufus.

Rufus made a quick decision. Fiona's eyes were crazed, her own skin blistering and crackling with the force of the raw magic that bled from her. He had been about to try reason, to persuade her that she was a principled Auror and didn't need to do this, but he knew now she wouldn't listen.

"Calx de Achilles," he murmured, a spell that he didn't use often, a spell as near the Dark Arts as he would let himself get. When it was a choice between Fiona hitting him and Weasley and this spell, though, the Achilles' Heel Curse would win out every time.

The spell lashed, seeking and finding Fiona's weak point. It would have been easily defeated if she had shields, but she didn't; she was too far gone in rage to have them.

Her eyes widened, and she made a little moaning noise as one of her worst memories welled up and overwhelmed her. Then she slumped to the floor, unconscious. Rufus quickly shot binding ropes from his wand, tying her wrists and ankles together and forcing her to lie still.

He left Weasley to fetch a Healer for Feverfew and cart Fiona back to the cells, advising him to work with several other Aurors to set up stronger wards this time, and then went back to his office. Potter was indeed going to have some explaining to do.

He was gratified when Tonks informed him that Potter had already arrived. He smiled grimly and stepped into the office, seeing the boy waiting with Severus Snape, the young Malfoy boy, and a man who was obviously a werewolf.

Does he want to issue a challenge? Then I'll meet it.

Harry turned his head as Scrimgeour stalked into the office. He had often thought the Minister was like an old lion, but that was never truer than now. His yellow eyes all but glowed, and he had a deep purr to his voice as he spoke—though not the kind of purr a cat would give on being stroked.

“Potter. My Ministry has gone quite mad this morning, and I think I am relieved of a spell I don't remembering being under. I trust that you can shed some light on this?”

Harry smiled slightly. He knew it wasn't a pleasant smile. He didn't mean it to be. He had seen the look on Scrimgeour's face when he saw Remus, and the flicker of discomfort and disdain that passed over his features when he identified him as a werewolf. That is going to be our next battle, isn't it, Minister? That is, if you don't convince yourself that I did Dumbledore's dirty work.

“I know about the spell,” he said. “It's Dumbledore's. He cast a web of compulsion across Britain that made people think as unfavorably of me as possible. I would wager that you probably thought I was set to muck about in the Ministry. I'm not. I broke the compulsion, and I'm here to let you know about it. I have no idea how long it will take your people to recover, or what lasting damage they might have from this spell. I do think that you should move Dumbledore to an isolated cell in Tullianum until his trial, so that no one else has a chance to get to him.”

Scrimgeour's eyes became slits, and he walked behind his desk before he spoke again. Harry felt Draco's hand on his shoulder. He moved back into the support, but didn't lean back, though the grip invited him to. He couldn't afford to look weak in the Minister's eyes right now.

“No one can cast magic through Still-Beetle confinement,” said Scrimgeour. “Not even a Light Lord.”

“Someone raised it, then,” said Harry.

Scrimgeour jerked like a fish on a line. “Impossible. I looked over the Aurors myself, and purged them of anyone who might even have been tempted to free Dumbledore. Besides, why wouldn’t he have cast more powerful magic if he did have the chance to?”

“Because he prefers subtle spells.” Harry moved a step forward. Draco and Snape and Remus all moved with him. He was amused at that, but he kept his amusement off his face. It would only do to let Scrimgeour see hardness in his eyes right now. “He wanted the chance to make it seem as if the wizarding world itself had decided he was innocent. That was the only way to retain his old reputation and his old power. And as for purging your Aurors—well, Minister, Auror Mallory tortured my parents. I think you should look over the ranks again.”

Scrimgeour’s nostrils flared just slightly. Then he said, “You’ve informed me of the spell, Potter. I believe you, provisionally. It doesn’t sound as though you would cast the kind of spell that made hatred of you possible. But if that’s all you want, why march up to me with this phalanx?” He moved his head to indicate Snape, Remus, and even Draco. Harry supposed that Draco’s narrow-eyed protective look might have something to do with it.

“Because I have a guard everywhere I go, these days,” said Harry, fighting the temptation to roll his eyes. “Because there were Death Eaters in Hogwarts.” He drew in a deep breath. He hadn’t recited his final purpose to any of the three coming with him. So far as they were concerned, this was mostly a journey to let the Minister know what was what, and just where he stood in relation to the structure of political power in wizarding Britain. But Harry did have something else in mind, and he would say it now. “And because I want you to see that I’m serious about my goals. All of them. I will use my power, though I won’t compel people. That means that you’re going to have a challenge on the werewolf laws, Minister.”

Scrimgeour just nodded. Remus, though, shook at Harry's side as though he'd heard a wolf howl.

"And it means that you're going to have to move my parents' trial date," said Harry, getting out the sentence all at once.

Draco's hand tightened on his shoulder, and Snape snarled. Remus growled, a more frightening sound. Scrimgeour raised an eyebrow. "Why?" he asked.

"Because the atmosphere's been poisoned, now," said Harry. "Do you have to ask? Some people hate me, some people love me, and that'll include members of the Wizengamot. There is no way that my parents will get a fair trial. Shift the date to a time when more people know about the spell and have a chance to recover from its effects. December should work, I think."

Scrimgeour studied him in silence. That gave Draco the chance to lean forward and whisper into Harry's ear, "Are you insane? You're already stressed about this, and you want to move the trial back further, and put yourself under more stress?"

"It's not about me," Harry snapped back at him. "It's about applying the principles of justice fairly and evenly."

"I agree with Mr. Malfoy."

Harry's heart stopped. He had never thought he would hear Scrimgeour say something like that—either agreeing with a Malfoy, or going against his own principles. He turned his head back slowly, inch by inch, and stared hard at the Minister, who didn't stir.

"But, sir," said Harry, fighting the urge to cry out, "you don't know yourself when your own feelings towards me changed. You'll have to wait until the spell breaks completely. You—"

"Did you, or did you not, break the web of the spell, Mr. Potter?" Scrimgeour asked. "Are you, or are you not, vates?"

"It's gone," Harry whispered.

Scrimgeour nodded sharply. "Then I will advise the Wizengamot to clear their minds as much as possible in the three weeks we have remaining. Speak with mediwizards if they need to, or a skilled Occlumens. They will be ready by the time the trial comes, Potter." His face darkened for a moment. "Dumbledore's trial will be the problem. I am glad that will not be until March."

"I would prefer this not happen, sir," Harry said steadily.

"The evidence came in before Dumbledore could possibly have cast the spell, since he wasn't in confinement then," Scrimgeour countered. "The Pensieve memories are still fact. They will still serve as evidence during the trial."

Harry ducked his head and said nothing. He could feel the anger burning, the temptation to just lash out and change things, but he would not. There were some things even his magic and his temper would not allow him to do.

Draco's hand stroked softly at his shoulder, and pulled him back to himself, reminding him what things he still had to be angry about. "Minister, do you know who Argus Veritaserum is?"

Scrimgeour shook his head. "I was trying to find that out myself."

"Thank you," said Harry. "Then I think I have nothing further to say to you, unless you want to say something to me?"

Scrimgeour shook his head again. Harry nodded back once, and then turned and ducked out of the office.

Snape hissed at once, "Harry, what were you thinking? To get your parents' trial pushed back—"

"I want them to have every chance," said Harry, staring straight ahead. His hand was clutching the quill-shaped amulet he would use to call Skeeter. He would set her digging to find out who Argus Veritaserum was, and who had murdered the Augurey chicks. That was a good thing, a thing he could be angry about without more complicated emotions in the background.

Remus said softly, "Harry, what Lily and James did to you was wrong."

Not this again. Harry turned on them, and the look in his eyes was evidently enough to silence them. Draco was the only one who didn't draw back, but stared at him with a slightly open mouth. Harry ignored that. Perhaps he was too stunned by the sudden movement to know how to react otherwise.

"I know that," he said. "I accept that the trial date won't be moved. Everything is fine. Now, come on. I want to set Skeeter on Veritaserum's trail before the day is much older."

He marched off, ignoring the rest of what Remus and Snape said. No point in getting angry about things he couldn't change.

He could find out who was impersonating him, though, and get to the bottom of that. And when he did...

The anger burned like fine wine in the bottom of his belly, like a promise on the lips of an enemy. Yes. I think I will enjoy that even more.

Intermission: Breathing In the Moments Between

Harry stood in front of the grass that Occluded his scar link to Voldemort, and felt the pain streaming from beyond it.

Voldemort was doing—something. Harry could feel him exulting sometimes, or growing angry, or weaving magic in dense spells that seemed to center on the sort of elaborate preparations a ritual might require. But he felt all those sensations only in the first moments they occurred. They all wound up ebbing into pain.

He could see what was happening, if he removed the grass.

Harry closed his eyes and clenched down on the temptation to do so. He could feel Fawkes's warm bond pulsing in the back of his mind, but the phoenix was asleep, and not sharing this—this odd thing, whatever it was, this mixture of dream and vision. Fawkes couldn't stop him if he did choose to go down the scar link and look at the thoughts currently occupying Voldemort's mind.

But if he did that, he stood a good chance of pulling Draco along with him.

And if he didn't, there was the chance that Voldemort might go right on draining Muggleborn children of their magic, or torturing his victims, or preparing a Dark spell to make himself immortal. Harry didn't think any of those things beyond Voldemort. He rubbed his hand over his left wrist.

He had to stop Voldemort. It was his duty to stop Voldemort.

But in doing so, he would endanger Draco. And he was sure that Draco and Snape and the others would say that he was endangering himself, and the war effort.

He shifted back and forth in front of the grass, restlessly. All his rage couldn't help him now. It just urged him to charge forward, damn and forget the consequences. He stood there, irresolute, and the irresolution tore and tugged at him, shredding his guts and going straight for his heart. It wasn't quite as painful as the Entrail-Expelling Curse, but now that he'd felt that, Harry had something to compare this to.

He felt a hand on his shoulder, shaking him. Surprised, Harry blinked and woke. His vision hadn't been intense enough to disturb Draco's sleep, had it? Now, that he really wouldn't forgive himself for.

He called his glasses to him with a wandless, wordless spell, and slid them on his face, peering up. Yes, it was Draco who woke him, but his face was anxious, worried, not angry. Harry frowned. Did something happen while I was asleep?

"Draco?" he asked. "Your parents? Are they all right?"

Draco's face flickered into confusion, and he shook his head. "Yes, of course, they're fine," he said. Then his eyes widened, and he said, "Ah. Yes. You thought I woke you up because I had bad news?" He pushed at Harry's shoulder until he moved over, and then sat down on the bed.

"Well, yes," said Harry. "If you were angry, I thought you would have started scolding me, but the worry—"

"Is for you, you prat," said Draco softly, and kissed him on the temple. "I woke up to get a glass of water and heard you whimpering. Are you all right?"

Harry considered not discussing it. But this had nothing to do with his feelings for his parents, which he did still prefer to keep to himself, and he didn't want to lie to Draco about it. He couldn't pretend that he'd been sleeping peacefully, so he told the truth.

"I can feel Voldemort moving. Doing—something. I knew I could get more details if I just removed the barrier Snape helped me put over the connection we have. But I knew I might also hurt you if I did that." Harry gave a helpless little hiss, his rage coming to mean more now that he was out of the dream. "I hate being indecisive."

"I'm glad you didn't remove the barrier," said Draco. His arm snaked around Harry's shoulders, and he tugged him close against his side.

“Yes, I knew you’d say that,” said Harry, his words muffled by the cloth of Draco’s shirt. “My life is more important to you than seeing Voldemort defeated.”

“Yes. It is.” Draco’s voice made that not a banal fact, but a whole new truth. “You are more important to me than this war, Harry, and your life is more important than any knowledge. Without you, we fall.” He gently touched Harry’s hair. Harry couldn’t even tell with what, his lips or his fingers, so light was the gesture. “You need to stay alive for the rest of us, if you won’t stay alive for your own sake.”

Harry gave another uncomfortable wriggle. Normally, he could have tolerated more contact than this, but Draco’s intent focus on him made it unnerving. Draco let him pull away, but gripped his face and held it still as he looked into his eyes.

“Do you believe me?”

“I believe you,” said Harry. It was impossible to doubt Draco believing it, and that was really what was at stake here. How Harry valued his own life wasn’t that important.

“Good. Now lie down and go to sleep, and don’t worry about this any more. You have so many people who love you, Harry, who are willing to stand behind you.” Draco curled up on the bed in a clear sign that he didn’t intend to leave and go back to his own.

Harry lay down a short distance from him to soothe his own jangled nerves, just barely able to tolerate Draco’s arm as it draped over his shoulder. Now, though, he had something else to worry about, his mind singing Draco’s words.

Do my allies really follow me, and not my ideals? If I died, would the alliance dissolve and no one try to follow Connor or anyone else who might carry on the fight against Voldemort?

I don’t want that to be true. It was true for Dumbledore. I don’t want it to be true for me. One person shouldn’t be more important than the whole of this battle. If I die, they have to keep fighting.

How do I make them see that?

The way to make them see that was not, manifestly, to be the goal of a hive of the Many the next morning, as they rolled into the Great Hall in their usual writhing mass and made straight for the Slytherin table.

Some of the Slytherins, who should know better, were looking nervous. Harry rolled his eyes and stooped, holding out his right arm. Luckily, Fawkes had decided to stay in the bedroom this morning, and Argutus was out exploring the school, so there was no one to object as the Many traveled smoothly up the offered limb and over his body. Harry felt a sense of relaxation pervade him that he hadn't experienced in a month, since the battle on the beach and the last time he'd had the Many swarming and draped on him. With so many small snakes around him, snakes who were formally allied to him and whose poison could kill or permanently blind someone else, he felt safe. None of the Ravenclaws, or anyone else, would dare attack him now.

"We want to give you one of our children," said the hive.

Harry frowned. By the tone of their voices and the fact that they hadn't cared about the staring eyes and screams they got as they roamed through the Great Hall, this was the younger hive, the one he'd actually seen hatched in the Forbidden Forest and freed from their web. He hadn't thought they were old enough to lay eggs and have children of their own yet. Granted, the life cycle of South African hive cobras was one of the expanse of things he was no expert in. "You have young already?"

"No. Children is what we call a member of the hive who is eyes and fangs and nothing else," said the ebbing voices. One of the cobras draped around Harry's arm moved, and then slithered up his body to his face, the others rolling smoothly back to make room for it. No, her, Harry supposed, noting the subtle waver in the golden ripples that supposedly indicated that this snake could lay eggs. "She cannot hold the collective mind. She will serve as eyes for us when we must see you, though. And she will attack at any moment you command her."

“Bite someone to death,” said Harry flatly, “or blind them.” The small snake was locked around his neck. She didn’t sway like the others. She simply remained tucked down, under his chin, and held him in a tight clutch that didn’t feel tight. Harry reached up, and could barely tell where her scales left off and his skin began.

“Yes. You are in danger. We do not want to lose our benefactor. And our child does not need to eat or sleep. She will guard you day and night.”

Harry ran a finger over her tail. “And I can’t refuse the gift?”

“You would die,” said the Many simply. “There are enemies everywhere. We have met with our little brother, the snake you gave the name in the tongue of wizards. He told you about the attacks on you, on him, on everything and everyone dear to you. The vates may die of age or in breaking a web or in fighting the mighty wizards, but he will not die because of a shot spell from an enemy he should not care about. She is here to defend you from those you trust too much, those who creep up on you.”

Harry nodded in resignation. With the constant attacks from the Ravensclaws, he could hardly say that he had no need for such a gift, though he was still somewhat disturbed by it. He had assumed that all members of a hive of the Many were equal, that there weren’t empty vessels. It seemed that he’d been wrong, and would just have to accept that.

In a way, it’s good. There is more wonder in them than I ever guessed. They’re not bound by human ideals, and why should they be?

“Thank you,” he said.

The Many writhed, doing a graceful dance to accept the gratitude, for all Harry knew, and then slid down and away, tumbling across the Great Hall and towards the door.

Harry just shook his head when Draco arched an eyebrow, and sat down between him and George Weasley, his guards for the moment.

"The magical creatures have decided I should be guarded, too," he muttered. "I'm going to have no privacy."

"Why, Harry." George leaned towards him and leered. "Why would you want to have some privacy? Got some things to do that you don't want to show anyone, do you?" His eyes flicked towards Draco.

Harry rolled his eyes and ignored Draco's glare and his own threatening blush. "Shut it," he said, and stood, testing the slight weight of the snake around his throat. It was very light, to tell the truth. She either wasn't wrapped tightly enough to constrict his breathing, or knew how to shift when she might have done so. "Let's get to class."
"Miss Turtledove."

Remus wondered what he had to thank for the way Lucy Turtledove froze and squeaked when she heard his voice—his being a werewolf, or the fact that he'd assigned the Ravenclaw girl two weeks of detention with Filch the last time she threatened Harry. Probably the first, from the way she turned and stared at his teeth. Besides, if the punishment had made that much of an impact on her, she wouldn't have been creeping along behind Harry and his guards on their way to Defense Against the Dark Arts, trying to take an opportunity for a good hexing.

"I wasn't doing anything." Turtledove folded her arms and frowned at him, tossing her long dark hair over one shoulder. "You can't assign me detention or take points. I wasn't doing anything."

Remus held her eyes for a moment, only to see her blanch and glance away. Old anger made his nostrils flare. He smoothed it down without much effort, though. At the Sanctuary, he had at last come to terms with his extreme rage, a result of enduring the bite so young, and learned not to be afraid of it. There were many socially acceptable ways to vent it.

Like taking points, for instance.

"Fifteen points from Ravenclaw for insolence to a professor," he said mildly, and saw Turtledove's eyes widen. Ravenclaw was already almost in negative points, though Trelawney still awarded points, unaffected by what was happening in the school, and Sinistra took pity where she could. “Now, I want to know what you were doing following Harry. Didn’t that teach you anything?” He nodded at her reddened face. None of the professors had been able to remove the curse, though everyone but Remus, Acies, and Severus had tried. They’d concluded that the end of the sunburn would have to wait for the end of Harry’s anger at her.

“He can’t—” said Turtledove, and ducked her head. Her voice came out muffled. Remus sniffed delicately, and then raised an eyebrow. She was on the verge of tears. “He can’t get away with everything he’s done,” she said. “Having a s-snake in the school. Two snakes, even. Accusing the Headmaster of child abuse. Casting spells on us.” She lifted her head and stared helplessly at Remus. “He’s becoming a Dark Lord, and we’re the only ones smart enough to see and stop him. Why doesn’t anyone believe us?”

Remus studied her in silence. He didn’t think he could correct all her misconceptions about Harry, and he didn’t want to try; the prejudice against Parselmouths, for instance, was at least as old as the prejudice against snakes themselves. But he could, and he would, try to correct the most dangerous mistake she was engaged in.

“Miss Turtledove,” he said, “I can assure you that the accusations against Albus Dumbledore are true.”

“That’s impossible.”

Remus shrugged. “I discovered the truth about Harry’s home life in his second year. His parents would do nothing. I went to the Headmaster, thinking he could help, that surely he couldn’t know about what Lily and James—two of my dearest friends—were doing to their own son. He Obliviated me. I didn’t fully know what had happened until Harry restored my memories. Now, does that sound like the kind of wizard who would protect children?”

Turtledove had shrunk away from him as if he were threatening her, and she shook her head now, spasmodically. “That’s not true,” she said. "Albus Dumbledore is a great and noble wizard. My parents told me so."

"I believe he once was a great and noble wizard," said Remus, thinking of the way he and his friends had fought in the First War, about what kind of leader Dumbledore had been then. Never faltering, perfectly suited to facing and battling a Dark Lord. Perhaps it was the decisions he'd had to make afterwards, in a time of nominal peace, that had started him down the long path to his fall.

"But he's just—he's the Light Lord," Turtledove tried. "Can't you see? If we don't follow him, we'll have no chance at all. The Light will lose to the Dark. We'll all become slaves of You-Know-Who. He's our only savior, and they've imprisoned him on the word of another Dark Lord!"

Her eyes were wide, white with the fear that had eaten her reason. Remus supposed that Dumbledore's spell might have increased it, and perhaps lingering traces of the web were hurting her even now. But it had been there when she came into the school. Her parents had pumped poison into her ears, and he had no idea how to purge it.

But he could, perhaps, frighten her off from attacking Harry.

"Miss Turtledove," he said, "in addition to the permission he's received to use his magic, Harry has magical creatures defending him. The phoenix would rather weep for you than burn you, I believe, and the Omen snake could at best break your wrist. But the Many cobra would kill you."

"And you let him walk around with that thing around his neck?" Turtledove exclaimed.

Remus inclined his head, and let his lips lift from his teeth, just slightly. Turtledove immediately pulled back.

"We must," said Remus, "because we can guarantee him no safety otherwise, and because we would prefer not to irritate the Many hive cobras. They have accepted him as their vates, Miss Turtledove. Do you know what that word means?"

"A singer," she whispered. "A seer."

Remus nodded encouragingly. "Harry is trying to see paths clear to freedom for the magical creatures which won't endanger them, or wizards, or other kinds of magical creatures. He's freed a few species, but there are many, many species still to go, and other groups of the same species. That means that he's committed to a duty and task that might take longer than his life. And the magical creatures know that, and will protect him. Even if we tried, we don't have the right to dictate their wills any longer, since Harry won't let us have that. So we can't restrain the Many snake if you attack Harry and it bites you. Stay away from him."

Turtledove frowned at him. "Is that the reason you like him so much? Protect him? Because you're a werewolf, and he's vates to you, too?"

Remus smiled. He wasn't about to tell her that his wolf was itself a web, a disease, that spent its time hating and longing for blood, and especially hated Harry. He did have hope that Harry might be vates for them someday, breaking the webs, and so her statement was, in a sense, true.

"Yes," he said, and let his teeth flash at her again.

"I could tell," she whispered. "I could tell that you threatened me."

"And the Headmistress would ask why, and then I would tell her why, and you would, perhaps, be expelled," said Remus pleasantly. He had been witness to an amusing little scene on Saturday of Minerva swearing that she would expel half of Ravenclaw, if that was what it took to get the truth through the little brats' heads. "And I think, for that threat, that you've earned yourself another week of detention, Miss Turtledove."

She turned away from him with a sulky mutter of, "Yes, Professor."

Remus let her go. He was not entirely sure that she would obey him. She might attack Harry again, there was always the chance, and this time she would end up blind or dead.

Remus found it hard to worry too much about that possible outcome. Another thing he'd learned in the Sanctuary was to fully embrace and use the few good things that being a werewolf gave him. His keener senses were one of those things, and another was a greater sense of what it meant to be free, instead of wild. Sooner or later, one had to give up on warnings. If another person was determined to run headlong off a cliff, and you'd tried yelling and threatening and persuasion and everything short of force...

Well, she had to be free to make the choice that would shatter her head.

Remus knew better than any fully human witch or wizard exactly what Harry was, what he represented. His muttering and snarling wolf wouldn't let him forget. That meant he valued Harry's life more highly than that of a random Ravenclaw who seemed determined to jump. Remus would lie in the sun and watch her take a run at it, at this point.

He turned and went back to his office, where he had letters waiting for him from Claudia Griffinsnest, Delilah Gloryflower, and Hawthorn Parkinson. They were interested in trying to build a pack, though they didn't know how as yet. They also didn't know why they missed Fergus Opalline so much, and had turned to him for help on that.

Remus wasn't a wandering werewolf, but he had contacts among those who were. He knew some of the refugees, and he knew some of the odd accommodations they'd made to live with their wolf natures and their utterly unexpected demands. The wolves were dark and sang of blood and hatred and sweet flesh on every day that didn't contain a full moon, but they also approved of other werewolves, and had a kinship with them. It was best that their human hosts obey those impulses, where they weren't destructive, and build the packs, and allow themselves to mourn when one of them died—not for a brother, not for a friend, but for a packmate.

He would share those secrets with other werewolves, because they needed them. No human but Harry was welcome to them. And that meant that no human but Harry—and only Harry if he asked—would know that there was a fourth letter currently on Remus's desk, too, from a werewolf who had managed to secure a job in the Ministry and keep it, undetected.

“—Bell scores! Ten points to Gryffindor!”

Harry wheeled on his Firebolt and peered over his shoulder, just in time to see Katie Bell rise triumphantly, dodging around an attack by one of the Slytherin Beaters as if she didn't even notice him. A moment later, the Weasley twins united in an attack on the Slytherin Chasers, forcing the Beaters to pay attention to them instead. Harry shook his head. The Gryffindor team was playing brilliantly, while the Slytherin team seemed completely disorganized today. Probably all the lost sleep from guarding me, he thought sardonically.

He lifted his head, scanning restlessly for the Snitch, forcing himself to ignore Zacharias's announcement of another ten points to Gryffindor. If he could catch the Snitch now, he could still win Slytherin the game. Gryffindor wasn't yet that far ahead.

He saw Connor looping lazy patterns a short distance from him, head turning from side to side. Then he abruptly jerked in the direction of one of his glances, stared a short time more, and began to fall.

Harry knew his brother's tactics, though. This was a feint. Connor just wanted to trick Harry into diving after him, in the hopes that he would be caught near the ground and a further distance from the Snitch when it did show up.

The little golden ball was still nowhere in sight, and it could still be anyone's game.

Harry heard a Slytherin goal being announced from below with more panache than it probably deserved. He heard the slight whistle that he knew was Connor returning from the ground, disgruntled that he hadn't managed to fool Harry. And then he saw the Snitch blazing above his head.

Harry leaned forward, legs and hand locking around the broom handle. His mind was very clear, less urgent than it had ever been while he was playing Quidditch. He had figured out the probable end of this game before he entered the air.

The speed of his Firebolt would get him to the Snitch faster than Connor could reach it. But Harry had an enormous disadvantage now: the loss of one hand, which meant that he would have to hold onto the broom with his knees alone in order to capture the damn thing. It was a dangerous maneuver. A gust of wind could send him to the ground. A sudden dodge from the Snitch could lose it for him altogether.

Connor gave a small gasp behind him, and then Harry heard him flying upward, urging his broom on with short whoops. Harry locked his gaze on the Snitch and refused to look at his brother.

Dart and shimmer and shimmy; the Snitch shot across the sky, trying to lose both determined Seekers. Harry climbed rapidly, getting above it. He banished the growing specter of fear from his mind. The other three times he'd played Quidditch against Gryffindor, it had seemed as though someone were trying to kill him—or Connor—but that wouldn't happen this time.

The Snitch slowed to a joggle, as though it were taunting them, or didn't think it was in much danger.

Harry came down in a slanting dive, traveling out of the sun like a hawk attacking a rabbit. Connor would be hard put to it to see him unless he shaded his eyes with one hand, and he was unlikely to remove either from the broom until he was within catching distance.

The Snitch sped up again, but Harry was ahead of Connor on a level plane now, and he knew the Firebolt was faster.

He took a deep breath and gave his broom its head.

The wind stung tears from his eyes as he flew, and joy, wild and unrestrained as the joy he'd felt when flying outside the Malfoys' house, sang in his ears. He flew, and he flew, and he flew, and then he was even with the Snitch, and the time had come to extend his hand, do or die.

He clenched his legs down and tore his hand free, reaching out.

The Snitch smacked into his palm, and Harry closed his fingers around it. He heard Zacharias roaring from below, and the stands going mad, and Connor's disappointed yelp from behind him.

Then a gust of wind caught him.

Harry slammed his hand back onto the Firebolt, clinging tightly as the world began to spin. Sky and earth rushed together and emptied themselves, then rushed together once more. Harry closed his eyes and held on so fiercely he thought he would crush the Snitch. The flutter of small wings against his palm reassured him, but only slightly.

He had to break his spin, and he only knew one way how.

He leaned backward, straining every muscle in his arm and shoulders, and stuck his left arm out for added momentum. The Firebolt shuddered, then tipped over backwards.

Harry landed with an ommph. He hadn't realized the ground was that close. He blinked at the sky, and tenderly reached up, still clutching the Snitch, to feel the back of his head. It felt as though he had a bleeding lump there. At least he'd inflicted that on himself, he thought, rather than the Lestranges or Sirius or a Dobby-controlled Bludger.

"Slytherin wins!" Zacharias announced, just in case no one had heard him the first time.

The mad cheers began again, and Harry let his teammates lift him. He grimaced in pain when they did, of course, and Felborn, the new team captain since Montague had fled, shook his head.

"Can't even have fun without putting yourself in the hospital wing, can you, Potter?" he muttered.

Harry smiled, closed his eyes, and let them say what they would. It had been wonderful, for a few hours, to forget all about anger, and all about pain.

The anger came back a few hours later, when Harry was lying in his bed in the hospital wing, with Fred Weasley on guard and joking about whether Harry shouldn't just catch Snitches with his skull from now on, and an owl soared through the window, open to the bright November air. Fred insisted on checking the letter it bore for hexes before Harry read it. When he turned the parchment lime-green, though, Harry rolled his eyes and snatched it from him.

He stared at the first few lines, and felt his blood turn cold, and then burning hot, and then like acid, which was an interesting array of sensations. He looked sideways, and saw Fred sitting up, his eyes fixed on Harry's face.

"Something up?" Fred asked softly.

"I think so." Harry scanned the letter one more time, to be sure, and then nodded. "Yes. This is from the person who impersonated me and sent the pictures to the Daily Prophet." Only she hadn't exactly impersonated him, he found as he read further, but that was beside the point, and anyway, the truth only fueled his anger. "She wrote me intending to blackmail me, and she promises that she'll reveal Argus Veritaserum's identity, too, if I just do what she wants."

He turned and looked at Fred. "Could you fetch me two pieces of parchment and a quill, please?" he asked. "And go to the Owlery and tell Hedwig I want her. Oh, and a school owl."

Fred stood up, grinning, that smile that was a mixture of amusement and a predator's bared teeth. "You're writing two letters back to her?"

"No," said Harry, feeling his own mouth stretch in a wider line as his anger roared up to new heights. "One to her. The other goes to the Isle of Man."

Interlude: A Kindled Soul

November 4th, 1995

Dear Mr. Potter:

I did hope that I could speak to you less openly than this. I dreamed of a chase, a hunt, of luring you through numerous deceptive passages.

As it is, I think I should come right out and speak more frankly. I am the one who sent the pictures to the Daily Prophet. I am the one who gave my daughter Polyjuice and had her impersonate you. I admit it. It is a good thing to have a clean conscience at last, though nowhere near as comfortable as someone like you would proclaim it.

And why admit this? Why give my enemy such information so freely?

Three reasons, Mr. Potter. The first is that I know who Argus Veritaserum is and where he resides. I gave him the pictures, never dreaming he would do as he has done with them. They were intended to be blackmail, a subtle threat to hold over your head—not splashed on the front page of that wretched rag of a newspaper. I am perfectly willing to give him up to you. He has trespassed on my patience, and on yours, for long enough.

The second reason is the motive behind my betrayal. A test, a trip of the wire to see how you would respond. I cannot follow any but the strongest Lords, Mr. Potter. I thought you were strong after the night of the attack on Woodhouse, but then you wept over the body of a fallen comrade, giving a prime opportunity for someone to strike at you—and you had to be saved in the first place, because you were not paying attention to your surroundings. I was not convinced that your sacrificial instincts were given up. I continued to wait and watch.

Your response to the articles and to the Death Eater activity within Hogwarts has at last satisfied me. I am willing to give you Argus Veritaserum, and the photographs still in my possession, and my promise that such a test shall never happen again.

The third reason is my daughter, Edith. I have found, to my dismay, that she has become uncontrollable, and I fear that she may have encountered those at Beauxbatons who encouraged her to become intimate with French contacts of the Dark Lord. She has a spell on her that I cannot identify, and cannot break. I can only confine her to her room. If you are unconvinced of my loyalty—and why would you be convinced of it?—I am willing to trade you everything I have already mentioned for your help in curing Edith. She is my magical heir, and I love her dearly.

Can you come to me no later than next Friday, the 10th, and help me with these problems?

I await your owl.

Sincerely,

Henrietta Bulstrode.

November 4th, 1995

Dear Mrs. Bulstrode:

For reasons of my own, I am accepting your offer. I will meet you on the 10th, at noon, if you will owl me with Apparition coordinates for your estate. In the meantime, please make sure that Edith gets plenty of rest, good food, and gentle care, and give her my warmest regards. One cannot be too careful with unknown spells.

Harry Potter.

November 4th, 1995

Dear Paton Opalline:

Once, sir, a month ago, you came to me and offered me your family's help, the alliance of the Old Blood. I have particular need of one thing you offered me then. Will you firecall me when you receive this owl? You need only speak of the fireplace at Hogwarts Hospital Wing when you toss the Floo powder into the flames. I will be waiting by the hearth at any hour in the afternoon on Sunday, which I calculate is the earliest time my owl can be expected to reach the Isle.

Your ally,

Harry Potter.

Chapter Thirty-Eight: Ascent and Assent

Harry reflected that it was very tolerant of McGonagall to allow them to keep meeting in the Room of Requirement. He didn't know any other area on Hogwarts grounds that would be large enough to contain so many of his allies comfortably, and without requiring the ones who didn't like each other to sit next to each other. Of course, the Headmistress probably didn't trust them completely, since she was sitting in with them as usual, but it was still generous of her.

You're putting off what you know you need to do.

Harry sighed, and tugged his scattered thoughts together, in a direction that would lead them away from generosity. He straightened from his slump against the wall, and Draco, who'd been standing with him, scurried over and took a seat. Harry met the eyes of the people he'd invited here, one by one.

In truth, it was most of his allies. Elfrida Bulstrode and Laura Gloryflower he'd had to leave out, because their puellaris vows would compel them to do unfortunate things when they got near Henrietta, if what Harry suspected about Edith was true. Adalrico had chosen to stay home with his wife. Claudia Griffinsnest hadn't been able to come; someone suspected that she was a werewolf, and she had to remain in sight and not do anything suspicious for a few weeks. Delilah Gloryflower would have told her aunt about the meeting, since Laura was the head of the Gloryflower family, so Harry had also had, reluctantly, to leave her at home. The decision to leave Mortimer Belville and Edward Burke uninformed had been Harry's own. He hadn't been able to contact Arabella Zabini, and he'd tried to contact Regulus, but also proven unsuccessful. Snape had answered shortly that he was having some trouble with the Ministry, and Harry had known better than to inquire further. (He'd also unwound the Many snake from his throat this morning and left her napping on his pillow).

Tybalt and John were there, though, grinning. Honoria sat beside them, her hands clasped and her eyes bright, although no smile graced her face. She seemed content to wait and see what Harry would do. Ignifer sat beside Honoria, now and then regarding her suspiciously, though she watched Harry with a look of absolute trust.

There was an empty chair, and then the rest of Harry's allies. Charles clasped his hands behind his head, his gaze never wavering from Harry's face. Thomas had his nose buried in a book. Hawthorn and Remus were talking in low, rapid voices, though they exchanged a few last words and faced back to the front when they saw Harry waiting. The Malfoys sat at their ease, like a pair of trained gyrfalcons getting ready to swoop down on their prey, and Draco at their side. Snape was not far from them, his face for once neutral. He'd seemed more cautious, less prone to judge Harry at once, ever since he had shared the breaking of Dumbledore's web with Harry.

McGonagall sat at the far end of the line, as if she were heading the meeting, though she kept looking curiously at the empty chair behind her. Harry had deliberately asked her to keep it empty for him. She'd done so, and asked no questions. But now it was almost time to end the waiting, anyway.

Harry closed his eyes and summoned the rage that waited just under the surface of his mind, if he cared to look for it. Then it hit him like a blow, and abruptly his magic unfolded around him, snarling. He looked up to meet the considerably startled gazes of his allies. Even Thomas had been distracted from his book, something ponderous having to do with South African magic.

"How did you do that?" he demanded.

"Unfold my magic?" Harry shrugged. "It happens when I'm angry."

"What do you have to be angry about?" Charles sounded less as if he were making an intellectual inquiry than Thomas did, but his eyes were still shadowed. Harry could guess why. Harry had said only that the purpose of this meeting had something to do with Henrietta. Charles must be wondering if Harry was moving too quickly, letting rage determine his best course rather than rational thinking.

I've had a week to do the rational thinking. Harry had hammered out a plan that pleased him, in a hard-edged way. And the only one whose help he needed to perform it was Paton Opalline's. The rest of his allies were here to learn why he was doing this to Henrietta, to observe...

And take away a lesson. Harry didn't know if the traitor was here today, but if he was, then Harry wanted him sweating.

"Henrietta Bulstrode," he said simply. That snared the complete attention of anyone whose mind might have been wandering before, judging by the way that a few of them leaned forward. "She sent me a letter on Saturday claiming responsibility for the pictures of me smashing Augurey chicks that reached the front page of the Daily Prophet. She said it was part of a blackmail attempt that should never have reached the public. She promised to give me Argus Veritaserum, the rest of the pictures, and her complete loyalty if I would simply come to her and free her daughter, Edith, whom she claims is under a spell of some kind."

"If she's under a spell, it would only be one that Henrietta put there," said Ignifer, eyes lighting. "I hate that woman."

"I know that," said Harry calmly. "And I have help in dealing with that aspect of things." He turned to face the door of the Room of Requirement. "You can come in now, sir."

Paton Opalline entered. He'd dropped the glamour since he arrived at the school yesterday to talk to Harry and finalize the details of their plan. His tattoos swirled and danced across his body, pulsing with threads of gold and red light quite separate from the inked lines themselves. Harry wondered what that meant, but didn't ask. He was too busy watching the expressions on the faces of his allies as they stared at Paton.

Almost all of them looked contemptuous. Honoria and Thomas were the only exceptions, Honoria for looking as if she would burst out laughing and Thomas for his wide-eyed fascination; Harry half-expected him to murmur something along the lines of, "Oooh, pretty."

As I thought, then. Most of them must despise the Old Blood because they won't kill. That means that they cannot have a part in the plan I put together today, even if they want it. Harry was more grateful than ever that Henrietta's letter had arrived when he was alone except for Fred Weasley, and that Fred had thought it a grand joke to arrange everything in secret, even getting Madam Pomfrey out of the hospital wing on Sunday so that Harry could talk to Paton in private. Draco and Snape would no doubt have insisted on killing Henrietta right away.

And that is stupid. She needs to be dealt with. Killing is not dealing with her. It sends no message to the traitor. And I have only some rights over her. There is one who has more.

"If you would sit down, sir," said Harry, nodding Paton to the empty seat next to McGonagall. Paton ambled over and did as he was told, eyes bright as he took in the gazes of everyone watching him. Harry supposed he must be used to the scorn. He had told Harry that most Light families despised his own for refusing to take part in Ministry politics and accumulate wealth; Merlin knew what the Dark families would think.

"Ah," said Lucius, his voice low and hard. "It's the breeder who makes the Weasleys look sane."

"It is true that I have nine children, Malfoy, and had ten until recently, until Fergus died," said Paton, without hesitation, touch his mourning-cropped hair.

Lucius's lip curled, and it seemed as if he would say something else, but Harry said, "Mr. Malfoy, I will not hear any further insults from you."

Lucius blinked and stared at Harry for a split second before he wiped his face clean. Such staring was a weakness in the pureblood dances, a sign that the dancer had been taken by surprise. Lucius wouldn't want to show that off. He turned his head away instead, the slightest bit.

"As you wish, Mr. Potter," he murmured.

“I do wish.” Harry unfolded a bit more of his own magic. It wasn’t hard, not with the rage that reminded him of the dragons’ songs, wild and oblivious to anything outside itself. “Mr. Opalline will help me convince Henrietta Bulstrode that she has gone too far against me. He will help me punish her. The rest of you are coming along as witnesses. Do not interfere.”

“You mention that this—this woman did those things to you, and you don’t want us to interfere?” Draco was almost vibrating in place on his chair. “You can’t mean that, Harry.”

Harry turned and faced him. This was actually likely to be one of the hardest tests. If he could stand intimidating Draco at need, then he could face intimidating any of the others, to most of whom he had less emotional commitment.

Draco started back, and then dropped his eyes. That left a pure silence for Harry’s words to break into.

“Yes, I do wish it.” Harry surprised himself by how calm he sounded, and then realized his voice wasn’t calm. It was quiet, but harsh, like the pause before the thunder sounded. “None of you will do anything to harm Henrietta. None of you will do anything to assist me. You will watch. I wished you to know what I do to allies who turn against me like this, and who hurt innocents.”

“Her daughter’s been hurt, certainly,” said Charles, sounding a bit bewildered. “But who else?”

Harry stared at him. Did the man miss that article altogether? “The Augurey chicks.”

Charles nodded, but Harry could see that he didn’t really understand. His own wild contempt grew in him, and he had to stamp down on it. Most wizards still didn’t understand the way Harry saw magical creatures, whether or not they were ever likely to be useful allies to him in war. They existed. That gave them the right to any freedom and possibility they could have that didn’t trample on others’ freedom and possibilities. And it meant that Harry despised wizards and witches who hurt them just because.

“You’ve made me your leader,” he said. “Supposedly.” His gaze cracked from face to face, searching for the slightest sign of disobedience or boredom. “And most of the time, I’ll welcome your questioning, your strategies, your eagerness to challenge me and have some things your own way. Not this time. If you cannot consent to come with me and stay in the background, I’ll leave you in the Room of Requirement until I’m done.” With the Headmistress of Hogwarts on one’s side, one could do things like that.

One by one, everyone involved bowed their heads, or their necks, or gave another sign that they wouldn’t challenge him. Harry held a staring contest with Snape for several minutes until he seemed to realize that he was making Harry look bad, and consented with a sneer.

Harry turned and caught Paton’s eye. “Let’s go,” he said.

Paton smiled, and the red and gold lines racing over his tattoos animated further, covering his shoulders and white-blond hair in a dancing haze. “Let’s.”

Henrietta paused in her pacing and her humming to caress Edith’s hair. Her daughter huddled away from her as much as the large chair she sat in would allow.

“Ah-ah-ah,” said Henrietta chidingly.

Edith froze, and sat still. Henrietta stroked her hair and scratched under her chin, smiling at the spell around her daughter’s throat all the while. It looked like a hooked collar of white and green light. Potter would be concerned the moment he saw it, of course, and he would not recognize it, because it wasn’t a spell that existed outside Henrietta’s branch of the Bulstrode family. He’d try to break it, though. Even if he didn’t completely believe her letter—and he would have been a fool to do so, not worthy of being Henrietta’s tool—then concern for Edith would bring him along. And once he saw that Edith wore this kind of spell, then it wouldn’t matter if he thought the caster was Henrietta or Voldemort himself. He would still want to free her.

And his interference, any break he put into the spell, would damage Edith's mind. It was damage that would heal in a year or two, of course, but Henrietta didn't intend to tell him that. What mattered was that in his guilt, he would consent to do anything she asked. Henrietta knew his psychology. She had only to get her teeth into him and watch him twist in her jaws.

He'd said that he was coming alone when she sent him the letter with the Apparition coordinates. Henrietta was not worried if he did come with someone else. She was the strongest of his allies with the exception of Severus Snape, and she was on her own territory. She had several rune circles prepared, and nastier spells and traps, just in case Potter decided to be...uncooperative.

She and Edith were waiting in the main library, a large room on the ground floor with windows that appeared on whatever wall the most light was currently coming from, tracking the sun throughout the day until it sank. Then they vanished, and candles appeared. Right now, they were evenly distributed throughout the room, and admitted more than enough illumination to let Henrietta make out the tears on her daughter's cheeks. She only voiced a tiny whimper when her mother stroked her hair this time, but that was all right. Henrietta could take pleasure in delicate sensations as well as the kind of complete surrender that she expected to have from Potter in a few minutes.

She lost track of how long she stood there. The dreams of the future were brighter and more vivid than the reality surrounding her.

Then her wards were destroyed.

Henrietta reeled, every alarm that her home possessed ringing in her ears, shrieking in her skull from the mental ties, and making her bones shake as they were spelled to do in case she was in such a deep sleep she didn't hear them. She stared up, gasping, tears flooding her eyes, and trying to determine what had happened.

Her wards were—gone. When she reached out to them, nothing was there. They'd been smashed as effectively as if a manticores had taken its tail to planes of ivory. Henrietta shook her head, dazed. There must be something still there. Each ward had a homing spell at the very bottom of its multiple layers; if someone did manage to destroy all the other spells that made them up, then the shards would sink into the ground and flow back to her. She should be tingling with magical power right about now from the remnants of all the wards on her house, and she was not.

Then her nose began abruptly to burn. It smelled as though the mother of all thunderstorms were rolling in.

Either a storm like that was coming, one that would make the Augureys shriek themselves hoarse in foretelling it—

Or she had an enraged Lord on her doorstep.

Henrietta scrambled up. She hadn't thought it would come to this, ever. Potter had the power of a Lord, but his will was chained from using it. He was too soft, too delicate, and thought too much about stepping on toes. Henrietta had been certain she could control him because he had left the halter of kindness on his neck with the reins dangling for anyone who wanted to do so.

It seems I was wrong.

But she could still adapt, and survive. She was a Slytherin, and a Slytherin always had a backup plan. She turned and walked swiftly across the room, though she still shook from the impact of the wards' razing, and stepped into the circle composed of rune blocks on the floor near the furthest bookshelves. The circle shuddered slightly, and then closed around her. The markings shone silver and gold, a subtle shimmer of power. Henrietta took a deep breath, and felt her panic calming and some extra magic flowing into her. She'd split off a piece of her power long ago, but instead of binding it into one object, like a sword or a staff, the way the majority of wizards and witches did, she'd bound it into these rune blocks. Broken apart and scattered, they each carried only a trapped grain of magic, one that couldn't be released without the presence of its fellows. Together, they gave her back nearly everything.

Henrietta snarled softly and pushed her fingers through her thick brown hair, shoving it back from her face. If he wants a battle, then he'll have a battle. I shouldn't have to fight him, he should yield the moment he sees the spell around Edith's neck, but he might strike at me before he sees it.

Reassured, she drew her wand and gestured at the door into the library. "Findo extos," she murmured. A shimmering line of silver power raced across the doorway, coiling close to the floor. Henrietta smiled slightly. This was a nastier version of the Entrail-Expelling Curse, one that struck from the inside only. Potter wouldn't see that, and it would trip him up a bit when his viscera began abruptly to divide into smaller and smaller pieces. He'd manage to overcome it, of course, but Henrietta would use the extra moments to make him observe the spell around Edith's neck. And she should have even longer than the spell would ordinarily win her, because, since Potter's experience with the Entrail-Expelling Curse itself, he should have a panic reaction to anything that felt even a little like that. She'd have those few extra seconds.

She congratulated herself, and was just striding across the library to stand beside Edith's chair again when she felt another presence enter the room with her.

Henrietta turned at once, wand in hand. So perhaps Potter's Apparated into the library. He shouldn't have been able to, not when he didn't know what it looked like, but Lords could do things other wizards could not. That was all right. She had spells that could take care of that, too.

The silver spell she'd placed against the doorway snapped, unraveled, and trailed out like entrails itself, yanked down an invisible maw. Then the faint shine of some of the books on the shelves stopped, and then a few of the trap spells that Henrietta had placed on the walls, and then another rune circle, gleaming unobtrusively in the corner.

Fuck. Henrietta's heart pounded erratically. Potter had sent that damn magic-eating ability of his ahead of him, and it was even more unnerving to watch her own power vanishing into thin air than it was to see Potter gnawing and ripping it away from Voldemort.

She wouldn't allow that ability to touch her. She wouldn't. She was not about to lose her magic. Her magic, along with the strength of her will, was what exalted her and made her different than the other people who surrounded her. She would rather die than lose her magic.

She aimed her wand at where the front edge of that loss of magic must be, given the vanishing lights, and murmured, "Permuto," throwing all her will behind the incantation.

The magic-eating ability should have changed completely, become magic, and then allowed her to recapture and command any power she'd lost again. Instead, her own spell whistled down the invisible thing's gullet, and Henrietta felt fear stirring in her like some forest creature she'd crushed.

Then the walls around her buckled. Henrietta whipped about, hearing Edith shriek from her chair, and saw the magical windows enlarging until they made the entire room transparent. She could easily see her own lawn now, mantled with sunshine and desiccated leaves.

And covered with wizards and witches, with Potter in front of them. At his side stood a single wizard with messy white-blond hair and a stern, direct gaze. His skin bristled with tattoos.

The look in Potter's eyes made Henrietta know terror for the first time in thirteen years, when she'd thought she might die in childbirth. She knew he would be well-protected, and that she shouldn't try to hex him. But the man beside him was fair game, and he didn't even have a shield.

She aimed her wand at him and didn't speak the spell aloud, simply letting it fly and crash through her window. The idiot shouldn't be able to resist it, especially since he looked like a Light wizard, the kind that didn't fight. Potter, intent on swallowing her magic, glugged with it, shouldn't notice in time to stop it.

Potter, indeed, did not react, but the Light wizard did. Smiling, he lifted one arm, and the red and gold shimmer around his skin grew suddenly thick, into a shield that repelled the curse without a sound. It soared high and shattered harmlessly into the air, scattering scarlet sparks down on Henrietta's erstwhile allies.

Henrietta snarled as she remembered what those tattoos meant. Old Blood. Holding money in common, blood in common—and magic in common. He can draw on the magic of all his family members at once if he needs to. Some kind of damn reservoir, they are. Shit.

“Henrietta.”

She shuddered, and told herself that it wasn't power that compelled her to look. Potter wouldn't do that, whatever else she thought of him. Her head snapped around anyway, though, and she locked eyes with the fifteen-year-old boy she would never have thought could frighten her as he did now.

He has the ability to eat magic. Where does it end? He could swallow the entire wizarding population of Britain if he wanted, and then the rest of Europe, and then the world. If he wanted. What keeps that in check? A set of morals? What if he gets tired of them?

She understood, now, with exquisite clarity, why Albus Dumbledore had tried to enslave Harry Potter when he was still a child, not young enough to have a will of his own.

Potter took two steps forward. His eyes were as brilliant a green as life. “Where is your daughter?”

And Henrietta felt hope bloom in her heart like a fever, though she fought hard to keep it from infecting her expression. She was good at that, though. All Slytherins were. “In the library,” she said, tonelessly, and stepped out of the way, bowing her head. She knew that she couldn't strike back at Potter right now. He would only eat her magic.

She had to watch, and wait, for a time. If she was right, the best time ought to be in a few moments, when Potter tried to break the spell, damaged Edith's mind, and was torn apart by his guilt and sorrow.

She watched from beneath lowered eyelids as Potter Vanished the glass in the window, and he and the Light wizard walked across the library to Edith. The shield around her went away when Potter looked at it, of course, and then he leaned forward and stared at the hooked spell on her neck.

Henrietta tensed, waiting for the moment when he would try to break it.

Instead, Potter stepped aside and said, "Paton."

The Light wizard closed his eyes and clasped his hands together. "We have kept the vows of the Old Blood," he said. It sounded like a prayer. "We have not killed save in defense of our own, we have not sought power, we have not sought vengeance. We have not cast any of our blood out to die, though they were born powerless. We have shared the good things in life, and sought to diminish evil by sharing as well. Here, in the name of a child whose mother has hurt her, by the will of a family who finds that abhorrent and has since the dawn of their days, I ask the Light's help, in the name of the Light. Fiat lux, lux aeterna!"

Light blossomed from between his hands, a white spark so bright that Henrietta's eyes watered and she wanted to look away. But some compulsion kept her in place, staring, the same one that had made her look at Potter. She had to watch as the Light wizard's hands fell open like the petals of an unfolding flower and the spark breathed out over them, so brilliant, so mighty, so different from the Dark Henrietta had served all her life that she trembled in hatred and unwilling awe.

The Light moved to trail a rope of fire like burning magnesium from the wizard's hands to the spell around Edith's neck. It traced the barbed hook of it, and then there came a noise like a sigh, and Henrietta thought she heard a song, sung in high, piercing, ecstatic voices, compounded of joy that would break her mind if she understood it, of leaping flames, of leaping light, light, and light, and light once again—

And then the moment was gone, and the trail of fire fell away from Edith's neck, and the spell fell away with it, the spell that no one outside the Bulstrode family should have known or been able to break.

Trust Potter to find the one ally who could, Henrietta thought, her bitterness drowning her alive.

“So ever the Light doth shine against the Dark,” the wizard said softly, and closed his eyes, some of the joy Henrietta had heard in his face.

Potter knelt down in front of Edith and said, in a voice that should not have come from a Lord’s mouth because it was too gentle, “Edith? You get to make your own decisions now.”

Henrietta heard a rustle of robes behind her, and knew that Potter’s allies had arrived. She didn’t turn to look at them. She was too busy watching Potter talk to her daughter, and knowing that her daughter would condemn her to death. It was what Henrietta would have done in her place.

Edith made a small, frightened sound. Potter must have heard a question, because he said, “Because I know what it’s like, Edith. My parents hurt me, though doubtless not in the same ways. Neither of them was as clever as your mother.” He said “clever” like it was an insult, and he turned his head.

Henrietta changed her mind when she met his eyes again. Death, even one made to repay her daughter for the humiliation Henrietta had put her through, must be better than living and suffering at Potter’s hands.

Edith uncurled a bit, and whispered something to Potter. Potter’s head snapped back around at once, and his hand rose and hovered gently over her shoulder.

“Because no one gave me a choice,” he said. “No one cared what I wanted, how I wanted my parents to be punished, or not punished, for what they did to me.” Henrietta wished she could turn her head and see how those words slammed home like a spear in Snape, who had betrayed Potter’s parents to the Ministry, but she had lost the power of movement. “Yes, your mother’s done evil to me, but she’s done more to you. Yours is the right of justice, if you wish to take it. Paton can teach you spells that right the wrongs done to you, but only you can use them.”

Henrietta felt a deep coil of loathing pinch her guts. Why didn't my ancestors take the precaution of eliminating the Old Blood? They should have.

Edith took a deep breath, and then sat up and shook her head. For the first time, her voice was audible enough to be heard by the rest of the room. "No. I don't want her killed. I don't want anything to do with her, not ever again. I don't want to see her again. I don't want people to know in the newspapers, the way they did with your parents. I just—can you take me back with you, to Hogwarts? Then I'll know she can't touch me, if I'm near you."

Grudgingly, Henrietta had to admire her daughter's ploy. It was the only way that would insure Edith was absolutely safe from her mother's anger, to live in the same place a Lord lived.

"Of course, Edith," said Harry softly. He looked at Paton. "Can you lead her out of here, Paton? I don't think she should see the rest of this."

The Light wizard knelt and extended his own hand. Edith trustingly reached out to him, and the Light wizard pulled her into his arms. Edith didn't protest, though Henrietta had never known her daughter to like being held since she was two years old. She closed her eyes and clung tight as they passed Henrietta, so that she didn't have to look at her mother.

Henrietta couldn't watch her for long. Potter had taken a step forward, and was staring at her, and it was impossible to look at anything else when his eyes blazed like that.

"Henrietta Bulstrode," said Potter softly. "I don't intend to kill you, since your daughter doesn't want you dead. But I intend to bind you, so that you can never hurt me again, and will make up for the hurt you have done me."

Henrietta felt a bit of her confidence return. Potter was too soft-hearted to do the things that would really assure her compliance, and if he took her magic, then she couldn't help him in any way. It was beginning to seem as if he wouldn't punish her enough, and then, in a year or two, she could at least try to get some of her own back.

Potter looked sideways, at his allies. "Professor Snape," he said. "Will you be our Bonder?"

The confidence froze again. Henrietta narrowed her eyes. No. He cannot mean—no.

"Gladly," said Snape, and strode forward. Henrietta could feel his magic flexing its claws, and knew how badly he wanted to kill her. But he kept it under control, following this child-Lord with as much obedience as if he were Voldemort himself.

And still Henrietta thought he could not mean it, because Potter hated all forms of compulsion. "What do you mean to have him do with that thing, Potter?" she asked, nodding at Snape's wand.

"Bond us," said Potter. "You are going to make me two Unbreakable Vows today, Henrietta." He knelt and extended his hand.

Henrietta knew there was no way out of an Unbreakable Vow—intimately, since several books in her library concerned her ancestors' attempts to find a way around it. If she broke one of its clauses, then she would die. It was a simple matter, and it was a chain that she had never thought Potter would use.

"No," she said.

Potter looked up at her. "You will agree to it," he said calmly, "or I will drain all of your magic, including all of your magical artifacts, and your rune circles, and I'll break your wand. I can still get the help I intend to demand from you with your money. Kneel, Henrietta."

This was impossible. Impossible that she could have lost, impossible that she could have been caught against the wall with no backup plan.

But if the choices were between taking the Vows and loss of her magic, Henrietta knew which one she would embrace. Besides, there was the fact that Potter still was what he was, someone raised to be rotted with compassion from the inside out, like a blight. His demands might be easier to live with than he imagined they would be at the moment.

Henrietta took a deep breath and knelt, reaching out to clasp Potter's hand. It would have been gratifying to find that it was hot, or sweaty, like her own, but it was cool. Potter turned and looked up at Snape, who held his wand at the ready and was murmuring the incantation for the Vow.

"Do you, Henrietta Bulstrode," Potter asked, "swear never to hurt your daughter, Edith Bulstrode, again, by magic, by word, by deed, by conspiracy, or by indirect action through another person?"

Henrietta felt herself relax. She ought not to have worried. She was accustomed to Potter's ways. Of course he would seek safety and protection for someone other than himself. And Henrietta could always have other children, though she would miss Edith's perfect obedience.

"I do swear it," she answered.

A line of fire shot out from Snape's wand and encircled her and Potter's joined hands. Henrietta shivered. It felt as heavy as a chain. She hated it. But she could live with it.

"Do you, Henrietta Bulstrode," asked Potter, his eyes on her again and steady as steel, "swear never to hurt your husband, Tertian Bulstrode, again, by magic, by word, by deed, by conspiracy, or by indirect action through another person?"

Henrietta blinked. He cares about Tertian? But then, this is Potter. He cares about everybody.

"I do so swear."

A second line of fire, a second chain, and Henrietta barely kept herself from wriggling. It was disgusting, that she, a free pureblood witch with the magic and position to enforce her will, should be bound like this. But needs must. And the third clause would probably be one of safety and protection, too. Henrietta wondered if he would forbid her from going after his allies.

“Do you, Henrietta Bulstrode, swear never to hurt me, Harry Potter, again, by magic, by word, by deed, by conspiracy, or by indirect action through another person?”

Henrietta was quite tired of freezing, but it seemed that she could not have no other reaction when Potter said something so extraordinary. She stared at him, at his serious face, and listened to the words that would destroy any chance of her ever taking vengeance on him in the future.

Wouldn't it be better to die than accept this loss of freedom?

But, no, no, it wouldn't. A miserable life was better than a proud death, however she might have felt in the heat of the moment. Every Slytherin knew that.

It was hard, but Henrietta subdued her pride, and said, “I do so swear.”

The third line of fire joined the other two, and then all three vanished. Henrietta shook her free hand. It felt as though the chains were still encircling her body, constricting her when she tried to stretch muscles she hadn't known she had, hemming her into a smaller circle of life.

I hate this.

And there was a second one to get through. Henrietta supposed the first thing Potter would ask for was the safety of his allies.

He did not. Instead, Potter said, “Do you, Henrietta Bulstrode, swear to use half your wealth to build a sanctuary for nesting Augurey birds, to take an active interest in this sanctuary and to promote the welfare of the species, and to offer an apology for the chicks you caused to be murdered in the presence of my phoenix, Fawkes, that he might translate it for them?”

This is ridiculous. Henrietta shook her head, not in refusal, but in bewilderment. "Why do you care so much, Potter?" she asked. "It isn't even as though Augureys can speak, like centaurs or merfolk."

"Do you so swear?"

Henrietta closed her eyes. Half her wealth gone. Potter had netted her neatly there, not even specifying "money," and thus obliging her to give up valuable magical artifacts and gems as well as coins.

"I do so swear," she whispered.

"Do you, Henrietta Bulstrode, swear to leave the rest of your wealth to your daughter and magical heir, Edith Bulstrode, for her use and support and enjoyment, until and unless she clearly expresses that she does not desire it?"

Caught there, too. Henrietta opened her eyes and stared bleakly at Potter. He's determined to take away every freedom that I might have had.

"I do so swear," she said, because what else was there to do? She found she couldn't look at the second line of fire as it joined the first.

Potter leaned nearer. His eyes seemed to fill the whole of the world.

"Do you, Henrietta Bulstrode," said the horrible voice, "swear never to use your magic again, except at my express command, and then only in the form of those spells I tell you are yours to use?"

It was the final assault. It was the final indignity. It was the strike that ripped through Henrietta's tangled ambitions and finally showed her the truth of matters, how they stood, that she was never going to be able to fight against Potter and had to give up her dreams of a future vengeance.

She bowed her head. The world was very harsh around her, sunlit, and not because of the Vanished windows.

And yet, somehow, it was fitting. She had fought, and lost. She had made backup plans, and they had not been strong enough. She had made stupid mistakes, and thus she deserved to lose.

She had been outwitted, outsmarted, thought around. And it was the only kind of defeat that she could have brought herself even marginally to accept. Being “persuaded” by half-baked philosophy, as Dumbledore would have tried, or pressed against her will to become a mindless servant, as Voldemort would have done, had done during the First War, was intolerable.

To have tried her very best and lost was something else again. And now, she did have a future, if she tried her very best in another direction, because Potter was not like those other Lords; she could see it now. The way he cared about Augureys as much as humans argued against it. He was vates, the way he had always said he was, and that meant she could trust his word.

If I must have someone in charge of my life, Henrietta thought, as she lifted her head and stared at Potter, I would rather have a vates than any Lord. He is more like the ancient Lords, the way I thought he might once be. The old legends have come to life again, and I am dwelling in the middle of one. And I can admit when I am beaten. I can give in and bow my neck.

I yield. I yield everything I am, with eyes open, to a chosen loyalty.

“I do so swear,” she said, and saw Potter’s eyes widen as the third line of fire bound them and she smiled. She knew he would be searching for clues to treachery in her gaze, some way of seeing that she was less than sincere.

He would not find them. Henrietta was sincere, this time, and she knew the peace of giving over. She’d never known it before. Any opponent she’d faced was weaker than she was, could be deceived or manipulated or tricked around. No one had ever cornered her.

Now, Potter had, and there was a sudden death of uncertainty in her life. Henrietta knew she would hate it at points in the future, but for now, it filled her with a deep calm.

I can do nothing else, so let me at least apply my mind and what other resources I might muster to the task of doing well by him, of making up for my stupidity in opposing him. And the first part of that shall be telling him Argus Veritaserum's true name.

Harry leaned forward, clutching the edge of his chair and trying not to let on how nervous he was. He was fairly sure he knew where the Sorting Hat would place Edith, but if it put her into Ravenclaw, a House hostile to him...

The Hat gave a little chuckle. "GRYFFINDOR!" it announced cheerily.

Harry leaned back and sighed in relief. Then he glanced across the Headmistress's office at Connor, who'd been irritated to be left behind at first, but placated once he understood the importance of their mission and invited to attend Edith's Sorting, along with Snape and Draco. The rest of Harry's allies had already departed, their expressions ranging from shocked to thoughtful to pleased. Paton, alone, had left with a smile, and a quiet word to Edith about her being part of the Opalline family now. If she wanted, they had relatives in the Ministry who would assist her in changing her last name.

Connor nodded at him, eyes bright and face determined. Edith would find a perfect welcome in her new House—the House Harry had thought she would go into, from the moment she picked up the courage to speak to him as she had in front of her mother and a room full of strangers. Harry knew Gryffindors weren't protective of their own in the same way as Slytherins were, but honest gentleness, and equally open snapping and snarling at anyone who tried to hurt her, were better for Edith than the unobtrusiveness with which Slytherins expressed their affection. She needed to know she was loved.

"Come on, Edith," said Connor, gently, standing and holding out his hand. Edith took the Hat off her head and stared at him uncertainly, but some of her fear melted when Connor added, "I'm Connor Potter, Harry's brother, and I'm part of Gryffindor. I don't think anyone can wait to meet you. Harry told me he thought you'd be part of our House."

That relaxed Edith, and she gave Harry a little smile, and then went out the door with Connor, who hovered protectively over her. That left Harry to face McGonagall, and Snape, and Draco.

The Headmistress, luckily, took one look at his face, and said, "Go rest, Harry. I think my questions can wait until tomorrow."

Harry nodded in relief and then turned and left the office. He heard Snape and Draco following him, but they didn't begin the interrogation until they were out of the moving staircase, knowing as well as he did that McGonagall had wards to watch and listen to people there.

The first thing Draco said was, "I don't understand why you didn't tell us," and his voice was small and hurt. Harry sighed and ran his hand through his hair. He felt hollow without the rage supporting him any more.

"Because I thought you would interfere, and insist that Henrietta should receive a harsher punishment than she got," he said honestly. "I knew you wouldn't want me to leave the punishment up to Edith."

"But she hurt you!" Draco caught his left wrist and pulled hard enough to spin him towards the wall of the corridor. Harry braced his shoulder on the stones and arched an eyebrow at his boyfriend. Draco just went on scowling. "She did deserve death, or the complete loss of her magic."

"No, she didn't," said Harry. "I wanted Edith to have first crack at her, and since she didn't want it, I bound her by the Unbreakable Vows I thought were right. And that is the end of the matter, Draco. She's bound, captured, stopped. You didn't see the look in her eyes after she took the Second Vow. I did. She handed her heart over to me on a platter, Merlin knows why. Slytherin worship of power, I suppose."

Draco stared into his eyes for a moment longer, then shook his head. "I still think you're too forgiving, Harry."

Harry narrowed his eyes. "Why? Because I don't kill everyone who turns on me?"

Draco's look just got fiercer. "I have something to show you later," was all he said, and he released Harry's wrist and turned towards the dungeons. "I still have to do some research on it first."

Harry didn't bother following him. He knew Snape had a question to ask him, and he let Draco leave, and he let Snape ask.

"You still believe that my method of handling your parents and Dumbledore was wrong," said Snape, and it wasn't really a question.

Harry bared his teeth. "Yes, I do," he said. "You know why."

"I wish you could talk to me about it." And Snape really did look wistful, an expression Harry had never seen on his face before. "In lieu of that, would be willing to speak with Regulus? He expects to be free of the Ministry soon. He is clearing up the last doubts as to who he is and whether he has really abandoned his old allegiances. But in a few days—"

Harry shook his head. It was answer enough. Snape fell silent, and for a few moments they walked towards the dungeons without speaking to each other. Snape at last broke the tension with a hesitant question.

"Harry." Harry looked up at him, but didn't quit walking. "What would you have done, were you in the same situation as Miss Bulstrode?"

I know the answer, but he's not going to like it. Snape had asked for honesty, though, so he was going to get honesty.

"Able to control my fate, you mean? Able to decide for myself how many of my secrets I wanted other people to know?" Snape's eyes darkened with distress, but he didn't interrupt. "I would have done what she did," said Harry, "keeping it quiet, except that I would have used my own power to make sure my parents and Dumbledore couldn't hurt me again. And then, when I could stand to be in the same room without wanting to kill them, I would arrange visits with them, to try and help them change. If Henrietta can do it, they can."

“Henrietta Bulstrode is a Slytherin, and your parents and Dumbledore are not,” said Snape. “It makes the difference, as you have so accurately divined.” He didn’t sound angry, though, and the sarcasm was more reflex than anything else. “Harry...if you will tell me, what do you intend to do at the trial?”

Six days. My parents go to trial in six days.

“The victim is not allowed to testify for either defense or prosecution,” said Harry calmly. “And of course it would be wrong of me to use my magic on the Wizengamot, or the witnesses, compelling them to change what they will say or believe.”

“Otherwise?” Snape asked.

Harry halted and looked up at him. This was too important to make a mistake about. Snape stopped, too, and met his gaze.

“I will fight as hard as I can with the weapons permitted me,” said Harry, precisely, “words, and experience, and explanation of my memories. I will fight not to see them executed. I will fight to give them a fair trial, one not prejudiced by personal emotions. And I will fight to see them free, if it does not involve trampling on other people’s wills.”

Snape hissed as though someone had kicked him in the solar plexus. He said nothing. Harry turned and continued on to the Slytherin common room alone, though he felt Snape’s gaze on his back like a hand.

Argus Veritaserum’s real name is Homer Diggle. He’s a Muggleborn Auror. I can find him easily enough.

The distraction, for he was using it that way, only lasted for so long, and then his emotions blurred and slewed and went back to the subject of his conversation with Snape. Harry bared his teeth.

I owe everyone around me so much—for trust, for belief in me, for loyalty, for love, for their very existence that demands they be allowed to live and grow as much as possible. I am incredibly in debt to them.

But this belongs to me. This is mine. They don't understand why I'm fighting for my parents. They can't comprehend why I want to forgive them. That's all right. Let them not understand. Let them not comprehend. They're not the ones engaged in this. I want to do this, and it's mine, and it's my choice not to "talk" to someone the way Snape wants me to, and I wish it could have been handled quietly but it wasn't, and now I'm going to fight with every muscle in my body, every ounce of my will, to see them alive, and, if I can, free.

Chapter Thirty-Nine: Home Truths

Rufus opened the letter cautiously. He didn't really think Harry would have sent him a letter that would explode, of course, but he was not sure that he wanted to know what was in it. None of the post he'd received in the past few days was good, though some of it was simply confusing, like the message he'd received detailing Henrietta Bulstrode's sudden burning desire to work with the Department for the Regulation and Control of Magical Creatures to establish an Augurey sanctuary. Rufus had simply passed it along to the appropriate people and decided not to ask.

This note was simple, but it contained words that made Rufus burn.

November 11th, 1995

Dear Minister Scrimgeour:

It seems that your Aurors are not yet fully purged. I have discovered that a Muggleborn Auror, Homer Diggle, has been writing to the Daily Prophet as Argus Veritaserum. He is closely connected to Dumbledore, though almost no one knows this. I believe him to be a deep-cover member of the Order of the Phoenix, and perhaps one of a number of Muggleborn students who went to Hogwarts during my mother's years there and became interested in sacrificial ethics due to Dumbledore's teaching. He would be the one who arranged matters so that Dumbledore could cast his spell, I think. You may want to purge him now, since he is, rather unaccountably, still there.

Harry James Potter.

Rufus put the letter down and stared into space. He knew Homer Diggle, though he would not have been able to say the man was Muggleborn. He had explained to clerk after clerk that, yes, he was connected to the pureblood Light wizarding family Diggle, but his ancestors had chosen to spell their name differently due to a disagreement with the head of the family several centuries ago.

And that explains why I never thought to look for a connection between him and the Headmaster, Rufus thought grimly. I know all of Dumbledore's allies among the Light wizards, or I thought I did. Perhaps that was another matter that would have to be investigated, though, given the pressure that the Light wizards had put on him over the past few weeks to free their leader, Rufus was fairly sure that he did recognize all of them by now.

He stepped to his door and looked out. This morning, he had two Aurors on his door. He'd noticed the change a few days ago, and hadn't commented on it. If his old comrades wanted to make sure the Minister was well-guarded, he would hardly wish to interfere with that. It might be what saved his life one day.

"Auror Wilmot," he said, since Auror Feverfew was still recovering from the burns he'd taken at Fiona's hands a few weeks ago.

Edmund Wilmot snapped to attention and glanced at him. Rufus frowned. He didn't always like the man, though it was true Wilmot did impeccable work. There was something a bit too wild in his movements, and he smiled as if he were about to bite.

"Yes, sir," said Wilmot, though, perfectly polite, so Rufus went ahead and gave him his mission.

"I need you to find where Auror Dagle is working, and bring him to me at once," said Rufus. "I have some disturbing news for him."

Wilmot's eyes lit. Rufus wondered for a moment if he could possibly know the truth, then shook his head. No, I'll be questioning Dagle myself, and probably extracting memories from him for a Pensieve. Wilmot wouldn't be so eager if Dagle knew something that could condemn him, too.

Unless Wilmot knew but Dagle didn't know...

Rufus willed the thoughts away. Caution was one thing, but he couldn't become paranoid. Cleaning up the Ministry was a bigger job than he'd thought, that was all. He watched as Wilmot bowed and hurried off.

He spent a few moments speaking with Auror Feverfew, ascertaining that his burns were healing nicely, and then went back into his office, and confronted yet another disturbing message, this time from Madam Amelia Bones. She still held her position as Head of the Department of Magical Law Enforcement, and though matters had flipped, rather, so that Rufus was her supervisor rather than the other way around, she still wrote as steadily and unflappably as ever, giving suggestions for new laws and new squadrons that she thought were a good idea.

Right now, she was making two suggestions she must think had their roots in sterling good sense.

Rufus didn't like 'em.

He warily studied her first proposal. True, on the surface it sounded interesting. With Death Eater numbers building again, and the Aurors still in demand for all their regular work, it made sense to designate a squad just for the capture and tracking of Voldemort's forces. They'd had great good luck a month ago, capturing a number of Death Eaters after a battle at a valley in Wales, but they wouldn't have that again. You-Know-Who had who-knew-how-many followers by now. There were trained war wizards in other departments who were wasted behind desks. They could become the Death Eater Removal Squadron.

Rufus was remembering what it had been like when the Aurors, briefly, had been authorized to use the Unforgivables in their campaigns against the Death Eaters in the First War.

He would not see that happen to them again.

He settled for scratching, "Needs reworking," at the top, and then turning to her second suggestion. This was the one that made him uneasy about Dumbledore's spell, and how deeply it might have taken hold.

Madam Bones wanted to lay the creation of a new department before the Wizengamot. The department would have the innocuous name of Investigation of Magical Disturbances. That could mean almost anything, from Unspeakable-like work to training for Obliviators.

What it was, as Madam Bones described it, was a means of registering and tracking Lord-level wizards. It would include monitoring children who showed signs of growing into such power eventually, so that, in the words of the proposal, “no child might ever be abused by his or her fearful guardians again.”

Rufus could translate that. So that we will never have a Harry Potter on our hands again. The main reason Harry had terrified everyone was the suddenness of his appearance. Lords built their magic steadily over a long period of time, and rumors ran before them; no one had been really surprised when Dumbledore defeated Grindelwald, and there were rumors of You-Know-Who long before he launched his first raid. The wizarding world had a chance to adapt to them, to adjust their thinking and political processes to fit around them. But no one knew what to do about Harry.

Rufus didn't like it.

He was still frowning at it when the door opened, and Wilmot escorted Homer Digne in. Digne was frowning in his turn, as though he didn't really understand what this was about. He met Rufus's eyes with what looked like honest puzzlement.

“Is something wrong with my family, sir?” he asked.

“I know that you have betrayed us,” said Rufus, seeing no need to hush things up at this point in time. “You must have let someone into Albus Dumbledore's cell, and you sent articles to the Prophet to fan the flames when you must have known you could encourage illegal conduct. What is your excuse?”

Digne's hand went for his wand. He'd always been fast, Rufus remembered, but that was part of the reason he had his own wand already out. He started to lift it.

Wilmot snaked a hand down and grabbed Digne's wrist, squeezing. The other man let out a scream as the bone shattered. He fainted with the pain, and then sagged against the other Auror, who held him up easily.

Rufus frowned, but let it go. Yes, Wilmot was violent—it was the reason he'd never advanced—but they'd hired him in spite of that, and sometimes his unusual strength came in handy. "Take him to the cells, Edmund. You're in charge of guarding him for now."

"It will be my pleasure," said Wilmot, baring his teeth.

Rufus looked hard at him.

"Imagine," Wilmot continued, without missing a beat. "Drawing a wand on the Minister."

That didn't seem to be the reason he'd broken Diggle's arm, but Rufus let that go, too. I can't sack someone just for being odd. "Quite," he said, and then turned back to the business of deciding what to do about the more difficult business of his office, while Wilmot dragged Diggle off to the cells, whistling a merry tune.

Rufus wished his life were that uncomplicated.

Harry rolled his eyes. His correspondence with the Burkes and the Belvilles wasn't going well.

He sat in a room near the stairs up to the Owlery, biting the end of his quill until the feather went damp and matted between his teeth. The letter on the desk in front of him had gone no further than the salutation. Harry wasn't yet sure how to answer the delicate mixture of praise and threats he'd got from Compton Belville. When Harry had told him rather sharply that, yes, he did plan on allying with Muggleborns, Compton had apologized, but then asked for several magical artifacts in return for his family's alliance with Harry. All of the artifacts were Dark Arts ones mostly used in torture, though Compton had provided "alternative" uses for them.

The Burkes were, in their way, worse. Their one infallible point remained that they wanted some artifacts from the Black estates, and other families that the Burkes had married into or descended from, but didn't carry the name of. Adelina Burke had told Harry earnestly that they could bring Ministry records to show that they did have the rights to Number Twelve Grimmauld Place, to at least half the land on which Malfoy Manor currently sat, and to the Garden, the Parkinsons' estate.

"You look deep in thought, Harry. Care to share?"

Harry jumped, sending his letters flying in the wind of his motion, but luckily the semi-permanent Levitation Charm he had around him at all times scooped up the flying papers before they could hit the floor and smudge the ink that already covered them. He turned around and saw Regulus standing in the doorway—well, leaning in the doorway, because Merlin forbid he stand up straight—and smirking at him.

"Regulus." Harry relaxed. "Snape said that the Ministry was questioning you. Did they finally stop?"

"Finally," said Regulus, with a roll of his eyes. "I stunned them the first time I appeared, and they were willing to accept, temporarily, that I was who I said I was. Then I guess 'formerly dead Death Eater' on the paperwork turned a few heads, and I got hauled in for further questioning. They were most disappointed when I told them that I'd turned my back on Voldemort years ago, and couldn't tell them anything about his current activities."

"Did they treat you badly? Did they—"

"No, no," Regulus soothed him. "Just asked every question they could think of, and got me tangled up in all the paperwork they could think of. But I'm free and clear now. They know I'm a Black, that I'm loyal to you, and that I'm the legal heir to all the Black estates and properties." Abruptly, he grinned, and strode across the room to catch Harry in a hug. "Severus told me that you did something fairly spectacular yesterday. I'm sorry to have missed it."

"I didn't like having to do it," Harry said softly, leaning against Regulus and floating the quill across the room so that he could hug back without getting spit on Regulus's robes. "But if she shows loyalty, then I can give her back her magic little by little.” He’d granted Henrietta permission to use many small spells and charms—Lumos, for example, and medical magic—but the Dark Arts only in self-defense. He’d made her Old Blood, in a way, an idea he’d had after talking with Paton. He didn’t want his allies able to kill her, but, on the other hand, he could hardly leave her free to simply curse them, either.

“I think you did the right thing.” Regulus’s hand ran soothingly through his hair, still holding him close. Then the sound of a second voice, behind him and also coming from the doorway, startled Harry again.

“When were you going to tell him I was here, Regulus? Honestly, are all Blacks born to be selfish?”

Harry’s breath caught in his throat, and he pulled away from Regulus to peer around him. “Peter?”

Peter Pettigrew smiled at him. He looked far different from the way that Harry remembered him looking, even a year ago when Harry had freed him of the last shreds of the phoenix web. His blue eyes might have shadows in them, but they could shine with light on the surface. His robes were perfectly neat and clean, and he’d lost the starveling thinness that remained from Azkaban, and there was no beard on his chin.

“Hello, Harry,” he said, and held out his arms, and Harry went to him and held him in stunned silence.

“Don’t tell me,” he said, when he had his voice back. “The Ministry was finally satisfied that you were what you said you were, too.”

“Yes,” said Peter calmly. “It took longer for me than for Regulus, of course, because they wanted evidence from me to use in Dumbledore’s trial, and they had to accept that I wasn’t guilty of the crime I’d been convicted of in the first place. At least Regulus never had the bad fortune to actually be arrested,” he said, to Regulus, who grinned at him.

"It's a matter of skill, Wormtail, not luck." Regulus sniffed. "If you'd just had the sense to change into your namesake and run when the Aurors first came after you, then you could have come and hidden in Wayhouse with me. Wouldn't you have liked spending fourteen years as a wooden rat?"

"Spare me," said Peter.

Harry closed his eyes and grinned, fighting back his own happiness to keep it from overwhelming him. It was really true, then. He could ignore what Peter had said about giving evidence for Dumbledore's trial in the flood of joy. There was one thing that bothered him, though, and built until he had to break through Regulus's and Peter's banter.

"Where are you going to live?" he asked, drawing back and looking up at Peter. "Do you need money? A house? I can—"

"Harry Potter, taking care of the wizarding world one stray rat at a time," Regulus intoned, and then laughed at him. "Honestly, Harry, did you think I'd bring him here and make you do that? He's going to stay with me. We were just going to get settled—in Cobley-by-the-Sea, I think, since it's the most comfortable. That's part of the reason we're here. I wanted you to see the place that you're going to inherit someday, and Peter wanted to talk to you."

Harry scowled. "Regulus, I told you, I'm not going to be the Black heir."

"That's all right," said Regulus. "Quite all right, really." He reached into his robe pocket and pulled out a great sheaf of paperwork, waving it at Harry. "These are the forms that I need to sign to make someone not of the Black blood, or sympathetic with my magic, a legal heir. It'll take months to get through them all and make sure I haven't forgotten a signature or a binding seal. By that time, maybe you'll be more used to the idea, hmmm?"

Harry just rolled his eyes. Let him waste his time, then. It's not going to do him any good in the end.

"I don't think I can go to Copley-by-the-Sea," he said instead, and nodded to the letters floating in obedience behind the desk. "I have important letters to write to my allies."

"Do they expect them back by a particular time today?" Peter asked.

"Well, no—"

"Then come with us," said Regulus insistently. "Both of us haven't seen you to talk to in far too long."

Well, that was true, at least. Harry looked from one face to the other and gave in. He did want to speak with them, if only to make sure they were all right, and he could use a bit of relaxation away from the letters. Maybe some hours of not thinking about them would knock something loose.

"Let me just speak with Snape," he said.

"Beautiful, aren't they?"

Harry had to blink back tears as he nodded. He wasn't sure what he'd expected of Copley-by-the-Sea—a larger Grimmauld Place, perhaps, with fewer crooning portraits and no magical singing beasts and more dust.

It wasn't like that at all. The house was built into the side of a cliff in Cornwall, and the very first thing that Harry had heard when they Apparated in was the sound of the Atlantic Ocean, falling and singing and surging hard enough to make the stone around them shake. It wasn't the North Sea that lay off the coast of the beach where he'd celebrated Midsummer, but it was water, and the sound had had the power to relax him since at least the time he'd gone swimming with the unicorns.

Everything was made of stone, and covered with sea-patterns. It had taken Harry wandering through three libraries in a row to realize that the pictures were continuous, not from one room to another but from one kind of room to another. The sitting rooms contained scenes that looked like they could come from the building of the house. The libraries had a visual history of an alliance between wizards and merfolk. A war with those same merfolk marched in spirals like a maelstrom over the walls, ceilings, and floors of the kitchens. Harry could have spent hours just trying to read and decipher them all, but Regulus had tugged him insistently through the house, aiming for the lowest level, promising Harry all the while that he'd see something remarkable.

And so he did. The lowest level of the house was composed of caves—or maybe of rooms carved out of the backs of caves, with rock turned transparent so that one could see through into the wild waters beyond. Harry truly wasn't sure if the glassy material in front of him was enchanted rock or pure magic.

When he'd first seen the creatures the caves held, he'd protested to Regulus, "But they don't live around Britain!"

Regulus had nodded slyly at the water. "Tell that to them."

And, Harry had to admit, the hippocampi frolicking in the waves didn't seem to give a fig for what Fantastic Beasts and Where to Find Them said. They continued swimming and playing around each other, snaring weeds and fish out of the water to eat, drifting with their tails curled in sleep, cradling their tadpoles close to them so they could feed. They had fish tails from the waist down, like merfolk, but their heads and forequarters were those of horses. The horses' coats were green, though, or perhaps blue; it was hard to tell in the subtly tinted magical light that filled the cave and allowed Harry to see them. Their manes streamed languorously in the currents, and their hooves weren't true hooves, spreading out in small fins that enabled them to stroke the water more efficiently. Harry caught a glimpse of two tadpoles chasing each other, and could see that their eyes were large and gleaming, opaline.

"How long have they lived here?" he whispered, more to the hippocampi than Regulus, as if they could answer him. "Did your ancestors breed them?"

"No," said Regulus. "And they didn't try to tame them or kill them and sell them, either, which I must admit is surprising when you consider some of my ancestors. They've always been content to watch them. Maybe they were just too beautiful."

Harry nodded, unable to speak. The hippocampi bore no web, it had been one of the first things he looked for. This was what magical creatures should look like in their natural state, unfettered, content, looking as if they had never known fear.

"Wouldn't you like to live in a place like this, Harry?" Regulus asked, leaning on the glassy rock and forcing Harry, reluctantly, to pay attention to him. "Somewhere you could watch water-horses, and take delight in them? Perhaps relax after your vates activities?"

Harry looked back at the water, and a mare cupping her fins around her foal, without answering for a moment. The prospect was infinitely more tempting than it'd been an hour ago, that was for sure.

But in the end, he had to shake his head again.

"Why?" Regulus asked. "I've had some time to think, Harry, and I don't believe you anymore about not valuing the Black legacy. It might be something you'd never ask for for yourself, but you're responsible. You would cherish and love these places and these things if I gave them into your hands; I know you would. And you'd use them well, which is definitely something I can't say for most of my family. So. Why?"

Harry took a deep breath and turned his back on the hippocampi, leaning on the glassy rock, too. "You're not going to like it."

Regulus gave him a quiet smile. Peter had agreed to wait upstairs for them—probably, Harry thought now, so that Regulus could have a chance to speak in private with Harry. Without him around, there wasn't the banter, though Regulus's voice was still light when he said, "A month at the Ministry and fifteen years as a toy have taught me to get used to lots of things I don't like, Harry. I'll survive."

He really won't like it. Harry rubbed his palm on his robes and decided to forge ahead. "Because I feel like it's too much," he said quietly. "Just—too much. So, it's connected to what I told you before. Too many possessions. Too much of everything."

"You don't feel like you deserve it," said Regulus, the same way he had before.

Harry gritted his teeth. "Yes. If you must put it that way, then yes!" His voice rose into a shout on the last words before he could stop himself. He turned away in embarrassed silence, and managed to relax the pressure on his teeth at last. He leaned his forehead on the glass and watched two tadpoles knock each other silly with their tails.

"I don't think it's incomprehensible, Harry," Regulus told the back of his head. "And I don't hate your answer. On the other hand, I do think this is a relic of something you haven't faced fully yet. Gifts embarrass you. Why?"

"Please, don't," Harry whispered, and closed his eyes.

"Please, tell me." Regulus's voice was soft and earnest. "I'm not asking for you to tell me anything else, Harry, and I'm certainly not asking you to accept being made my heir yet. Just the answer to this one question. I know what my version of your answer is, but I'm sure it'll pale besides yours. Please?"

The wistful ring of his voice made Harry squeeze his eyes shut until they hurt. Then he said, to get it over with, "Because it implies too much belonging, too much notice. Gifts are things you give out of gratitude or pleasure or because you like a person or to settle a debt. I can accept that last one. Not the others."

"Why?" Regulus whispered again.

Harry tensed his shoulders unhappily. But this much pressure brought to bear on a specific point wasn't something he could resist, and he had the trust to think that Regulus wouldn't repeat this conversation to anyone else, not even Snape. "I don't want to be noticed. I hate it. And I—" Oh, Merlin. Can I say this? "The only family I've ever wanted to belong to was my own."

He felt Regulus embrace him. He felt tears swarming and struggling beneath the surface, and the urge to keep talking, just tell Regulus how badly he wanted to belong somewhere, anywhere, but how it was tangled up with the notion that the only true belonging he would ever have was back at Godric's Hollow with Lily and James and Connor, and how much he hated his parents, with a strength that frightened him, for that longing when he thought about it in too much depth.

But that would mean spilling all his emotions about his parents, because all his emotions were linked, and one hatred would drag forth others, ones Harry didn't want to admit he had, because he wanted to be able to forgive them, and how could he forgive them if he loathed them with a fury like a storm rising at sea? At least, if he kept those feelings private, then he didn't have to look up and see the knowledge reflected in another person's eyes.

He used the Occlumency pools to swallow the emotions, one by one, until he felt calmer. He opened his eyes, and looked to the side, past Regulus, and saw Peter frozen with one foot on the steps coming down from the upper part of the house, caught in the doorway just as he had been at Hogwarts.

His face wasn't etched with pity, which Harry thought he couldn't have taken, but compassion. And his eyes looked straight into Harry's, and he saw far too much. Harry wrenched free of Regulus and walked over to a different part of the glassy wall to watch the hippocampi again. He regulated his breathing, counted in Mermish, and used the other tricks that Lily had taught him to keep going when he was in the middle of a war-zone. It shouldn't be this hard. He shouldn't have this much time keeping himself to himself. He had to be strong, with the trial coming up, and Lily and James both needing all the strength he could give in the fight to save them from execution.

This was why I didn't want to look at my emotions, he thought. It'll only dredge the depths and bring up all sorts of wet and nasty things, not bright and shining fish. There's so much—Yes, he could admit it, since no one else could hear his thoughts. There's so much that's ugly in my feelings for my parents. I don't want them to see.

He hadn't finished completely sitting on his feelings when Peter said, "Actually, Harry, this is connected to what I'd like to talk to you about. I know the Seers invited you to the Sanctuary for the summer. Obviously, circumstances made it impossible for you to go. But they've renewed the invitation for you over the Christmas holidays. If you could—"

"No." Stars, no.

"Will you tell me why?" Peter sounded as gentle as Regulus had, and Harry wondered if they'd taken lessons from each other.

"I don't want them to see me." It was an efficient answer. Harry watched the tadpoles swirl around each other, doing a dance with tails linked, and shuddered at the thought of a Seer looking at him now.

He had, Merlin knew why, imagined that all of himself was the same forgiveness and belief in freedom and protective instincts that Vera had described to him when she saw him last year. But when he thought too deeply about his emotions, he was looking straight into the face of hatred, and anger, and even a vengeful instinct that he'd felt in flashes before, but was getting a full dose of now, as the trial drew closer. A quick temper was permissible, barely, if it led to him defending the rights of others. But the wash of emotion he'd felt after Bellatrix took his hand had still managed to kill Dragonsbane. Harry had thought he only hated Bellatrix and Voldemort. It was a shock to find that part of him hated James and Lily, too.

Everyone was always encouraging him to talk about his feelings, to be honest, to let them see his real emotions.

And what would they think if they could see them? They'd be horrified. Hell, I'm horrified. Harry shook his head. No. I can't release them for the same reason I can't just let my magic run wild. They're in me. I've acknowledged them. Great. Now they can go away again.

This was the reason he wasn't going to testify under Veritaserum in the trial, though once he'd thought he would. Along with the desire to save and protect his parents that would come out in his answers to the Wizengamot's questions would come his contradictory desires to hurt them and see them condemned. And if the Wizengamot heard about those, unless all the members were more strongly influenced by Dumbledore's spell than Harry thought possible a few weeks afterward, then he could bid hope for his parents' freedom, either from death or Tullianum, farewell.

In, out, in, out, he coaxed his breathing. He thought he managed to look and sound normal by the time he turned around and smiled at Peter.

"No, thank you," he said softly. "I'm glad to have you back again, Peter, but I won't be going to the Sanctuary."

They spoke to him quietly for a short time more, but seeing him adamant on the subjects they'd brought him there to address, they gave in and showed him other things about Copley-by-the-Sea. Harry relaxed by degrees, and even managed to study the house with a great deal of pleasure. He still thought Regulus's children, if he had any, should inherit it, or failing that Narcissa and Draco, or Andromeda and Tonks, but he could admire it. There was no law against that.

"Harry."

Harry blinked and almost walked right back out of the bedroom. Draco was standing beside his bed with a strange look in his eyes. The only expression Harry could compare it to was the look he'd worn the night Harry had taken the Blood Whip Curse. (Luckily, Draco still hadn't taken revenge on Marietta, because Madam Pomfrey still could not figure out how to Transfigure her back).

"What?" he asked.

"Come here."

Harry swallowed and glanced sideways, for once hoping that Blaise would be in his bed to save him. But if Blaise was there, he had up a Silencing Charm, and one to hold his curtains closed, and another one to make even the subtlest telltale signs of his presence unnoticeable.

Reluctantly, he walked up to Draco and looked down at the bed. Something that looked like a Pensieve stood there; in fact, Harry supposed it was a Pensive. But the liquid that filled it was gold instead of silver.

Harry looked up at Draco, and quickly away. The intent stare in his eyes was simply too much, after the good hard look Harry had been forced to take at himself earlier that day in Copley. "What is this, Draco?" He hoped for his voice to be steady, and it wasn't. Damn.

Draco gently cupped his chin and turned his face back around, stooping and kissing him with great intensity. Harry closed his eyes and yielded. It did feel good, and, as ashamed as he was to admit it, he felt like he needed it after the confusion of emotions that he'd felt earlier.

Draco backed off and said, "It's a spell I invented. I did it just the way you said. I wanted it to happen, needed it to happen, and it did. Please, Harry, look into it."

Harry swallowed, and bowed his head, and slid his face into the golden liquid of the Pensieve.

He flipped over twice, the way he might when entering a normal memory, and found himself watching himself. It was a memory of breakfast this morning, when he'd apparently eaten in an abstracted manner, staring at the wall all the while. Harry couldn't imagine why Draco had found it interesting enough to record.

Then he realized that, although he could see Draco sitting beside him and watching him, he wasn't himself, free to observe the memory and see whatever happened more objectively than either person involved could have. He felt as if he were Draco. Ordinary Pensieves didn't compel the observer to share a particular viewer's mindset. This one did.

And it wasn't just an awareness of his mind, either, like the things Harry saw when he used Legilimency on someone else. This was an absolute immersion into—

Into what Draco felt, and thought, about him, Harry realized.

He knew, for one wrenching moment, what it felt like to impatiently crave and want physical affection, not fear it as a terrible thing. He knew what uncomplicated anger at his parents felt like, the utter hatred Draco had at them for having cramped and twisted Harry's mind. He knew what right and wrong were in matters of abuse to most of the rest of the world, and he knew the pride of someone who had grown up in a loving family and was at the moment fervently grateful for it, and he knew what it felt like for someone to love him.

For just one moment, Harry had to see himself as identical to other people in the capacity to be loved and seen, and, in Draco's eyes at least, a great deal more important.

Then the moment shattered.

Harry yanked his head out of the Pensieve, all his nerves afire. He shuddered, the more so when he felt Draco's hand come down on his shoulder.

"I told you that I was going to push, Harry," Draco said softly into his ear. "This is one of those times. Now you know what I feel for you. You've had the chance to see the world through my eyes. Will you allow me to see it through yours? I would like that." He toyed gently with Harry's hair, and Harry, knowing exactly what Draco wanted to do with him and why, was amazed that he had consented to wait so long already, even if the very notion of feeling that good made him freeze, himself. "And perhaps it will help me to be more patient," Draco added, as though reading his mind, "because, believe me, there are times I'm a second away from just hauling you into one of those abandoned classrooms we use for the dueling club and not leaving until we've both broken through every single bit of your conditioning that remains."

Harry swallowed, and swallowed again. Today was a day of unexpected emotional revelations, it seemed.

And here was another one. If there was a part of him that could hate his parents, and it could exist side by side with the part of him that loved and wanted to forgive them, there was a part of him that reached greedily for what Draco was offering, even as his training came down like a cage around it.

Harry wanted. He hadn't known he could want that strongly, that there was anything of it in him at all.

He was a second away from doing as Draco asked and lowering his own mindset into the Pensieve.

And then he remembered what Draco would see if he looked right now. All that hatred, all that anger, that Harry wasn't nearly as perfect as he pretended to be. Shame flooded him, pouring like a fall of gravel across his emotions, making them all the same color and papering over the cracks.

"Not—today," Harry said. "Not just now. Eventually. After the trial."

He kept his head bowed, but Draco grasped his chin and tilted it up. He was frowning, but lightly, more as if he were trying to understand than as if he blamed Harry.

"What's wrong?" he whispered.

And Harry experienced that same overwhelming urge to tell someone that he'd felt around Regulus and Peter, only ten times worse, because it was Draco, and there was a real chance that the urge would break around his strongest resolutions. He hunched unhappily. Yes, yes, he wanted someone else to know, he could admit that, but what price would easing his own soul carry? Forcing someone else into horror and terror of him, just so that he could feel a bit better?

When he'd remolded his mind, Harry had left spots along the steel skeleton for the new emotions to grow like leaves. He was wondering now if that had been a mistake. What if he didn't want some of those emotions that other people thought of as normal? What if he should have trimmed off those leaves, because the depth of what he felt could be dangerous, given his magic?

He certainly hadn't thought that he would ever grow the emotions towards his parents that other people expected him to feel.

"I'm sorry," he answered Draco, when he'd wrestled down the immediate temptation to speak. "I can't tell you yet."

Draco leaned forward and kissed him one more time, then withdrew with a small nod and picked up the Pensieve. "After the trial, then. I hope you hold to that, Harry." He gave him a faint smile, and slid out of the bedroom.

Harry made his way to his own bed and spelled the curtains tightly shut enough that not even Fawkes, Argutus, or the Many snake, whom he'd left behind again, could get in. He just wanted to be alone for a while, to rebuild his shields and constrain his emotions and try to breathe.

Five more days. I can get through this. I can. And I can help insure that my parents aren't executed, and free them if I can, without exploding into some stupid fit of tears or rage. I can. They'll be doomed if the Wizengamot sees what I feel about them.

Intermission: Where Only Love Can Carry Her

The first time Pansy knew how someone else was going to die was the day before the trial of Harry's parents.

She was hurrying towards the Great Hall, since she'd awakened slightly late for breakfast. She passed a Hufflepuff first-year at the top of the stairs from the dungeons, also heading towards breakfast, yawning and rubbing at her eyes.

Pansy turned her head, and her eyes skimmed over the girl's face. And then she couldn't be uninterested any more, because she saw shards of wood decorating her, and saw the blood, and her heart thumped in mad fear as the knowledge tucked itself inside her head, as undeniable at this point as her knowledge of the alphabet.

The girl would join her House's Quidditch team, and die in a fall from her broom when she was seventeen.

Pansy took a deep breath, and realized the girl was staring at her. She shook her head and hurried on. For a moment, she'd nearly yielded to the temptation to gasp or shriek aloud in shock, and of course she couldn't do that.

She'd stepped further into necromancy on Halloween night. After that, she'd finally had to give up going with her left arm bared, though the rest of the Slytherins still did. She had to hide her body behind the wraps, except for her hands. It was necessary, to distance herself from the physical world around her and step into the world of spirits. Pansy had known that as surely as she had known that she couldn't let hatred of Harry drive her any further into this study.

It had to be love, passion for working with the dead, and nothing else.

Pansy had spent hours kneeling in a rune circle Halloween night, before she finally wrestled her way through the conflicting impulses and realized that hatred for what had happened to Dragonsbane hadn't been her primary motivator for a while now, if it ever was. She really did love the dead. She really did want to follow her father. And as the new knowledge came flooding in, she knew she couldn't blame Harry for his death.

Death was an honor. Death was the supreme moment of communion with life, in fact, the moment when the necromancer tasted it for the last time before leaving it and becoming one with the dead. Harry had been part of her father's death, and Pansy should have questioned him about it earlier, so that she could know more about what it felt like for the necromancer involved.

Luckily, he was one of her Speakers, so she still could. She had given up talking to everyone else now.

She slid into place at the Slytherin table, and Millicent nodded to her. Pansy kept her eyes on her oatmeal, not sure that she wanted to look up and see how her friend was going to die.

"Pansy? Are you all right?"

It has to be faced. It must be faced. Pansy reminded herself of that, and lifted her head, gaze locking on Millicent's face.

She relaxed. Millicent was going to die at a decent age, nearly a hundred, in fact, in the arms of her third husband. Pansy snickered into her hands in sheer relief, and Millicent's face both eased and tightened.

"Are you sure you're all right?" she demanded.

Pansy nodded, and then turned back to her oatmeal. Her gaze moved out across the Great Hall as she did so. She had made the hardest decision on Halloween. She had known that necromancers had to see the deaths of other wizards and witches, and never tell anyone about them. She had the example of her father to show her the immense courage that living with such a thing took. Pansy was no Gryffindor, but she had accepted this burden, so she had to live with it.

She saw the bright spots of illness, the grayness of age, the visions of accidents amazing or mundane. There was quite a lot of blood, and the motionless green flashes of Avada Kedavra. Pansy winced. It seemed that many of her classmates, and some of the teachers, were going to die in the War.

But she didn't feel the temptation, any more, to tell anyone of what she had seen. She nodded at each death, if not physically, then inside her head, and her tension eased, and her determination grew. What necromancers saw was inevitable, unlike what Seers who predicted the future said; it could not be changed, or manipulated, or turned aside. It happened. Pansy closed her eyes.

It's no wonder that necromancers are forbidden to speak of it. It's a sacrifice so the dead will trust us, but it's also something the living would never want to know. They hate death. They don't understand. They'd question, want to know the utmost limit of their days, and then blame us for telling them. They'd live lives bounded by their ends, instead of in that glorious uncertainty.

Pansy ate her breakfast. It was Wednesday, and she had History of Magic, always a boring class. If she didn't fortify herself with food enough to become sleepy, then she was likely to start talking to one of the half-formed ghosts that hovered in the castle, and everyone but the Slytherins in the class would become hysterical.

She'd finished most of what she could eat when she saw a trio of people come through the doors of the Great Hall. Pansy glanced up at them.

Her breath caught. They were Harry, Draco, and Harry's brother, and as she watched, Potter peeled off from the other two and went towards the Gryffindor table. Harry and Draco proceeded on towards the Slytherin one, conducting an argument that was low-voiced until Harry snapped something and pulled away from Draco, walking the rest of the distance alone. His face was white with strain. Pansy wasn't surprised, given that his parents' trial began tomorrow.

But it was the vision she had seen as she watched the three of them together that was overwhelming her.

I want to tell them.

But that would break her vows, and even if she could still talk to Millicent and Harry, she couldn't tell them about her visions. Pansy tried to lower her eyes back to her plate and forget what she'd seen.

She couldn't.

She watched Harry and Draco as they settled into place—still next to each other, for all their arguing. Harry ignored Draco entirely as he piled sausages on his plate and started eating, though the bright hive cobra around his neck and the Omen snake on his shoulder both seemed as willing to eat from Draco's hand as Harry's. Meanwhile, Draco went right on staring at Harry.

Pansy managed to eat a bit more, but the food was harsh ashes in her mouth. She rose at last and left, her garments moving about her in directions that the wind of her speed couldn't account for. The ghosts were beginning to catch hold of her and play with her clothes, since she was partially in the everyday, sunlit world and partially in theirs.

She leaned against the wall of the first floor corridor and closed her eyes. She had a few minutes before History of Magic began.

I don't even know what a vision like that means.

But she knew that she did, and that last protest was just the instinctive bleat of a child trying to get out of something difficult.

Pansy straightened, took a deep breath, and turned towards class. She would keep her vows. She would not tell Harry, or Draco, or even Potter, who would surely get the vision wrong even if he tried to repeat it to the others.

She would hold straight and true to her course.

The knowledge and vision of her own death had also come to her on Halloween night, and she had spent some time in tears. If she could overcome that, she could overcome anything she saw for anyone else.

Chapter Forty: Descent and Dissent

Harry woke on the morning of November sixteenth to a cold slap on his cheek.

He blinked, half-expecting that Draco had opened the curtains and used a cold washcloth to hit him. Then he realized that the creature sitting on the pillow beside his face and staring at him was not Fawkes, though they were the same size and looked superficially similar, and sat up quickly.

The red-eyed bird opened its fanged jaws and laughed at him. It was just drawing back one talon, with which it'd stitched another pattern of icy cuts on Harry's right cheek. Harry lifted his fingers to them, and found them already freezing over. The bird moved its lizard-like tail as if that pleased it.

No one can see me but you, but everyone can see them. They are a mark. I feel like marking you. You acknowledge me too little.

Harry stared at the bird instead of attacking. If it had come through the wards on Hogwarts and the charms he used to guard his bed every night, then he doubted there was much he could do to hurt it. Besides, now he felt some sense of familiarity from the vicious, laughing voice.

It felt like his magic had, the summer after second year when it was just free from the phoenix web and surreptitiously trying to murder his parents—just as angry, and just as vicious.

“What are you?” he whispered. “Are you the magic of a powerful wizard trapped somewhere?”

The bird flexed its clawed wings and stalked towards him. Harry kept staring at it, watching it come, but called up his wandless magic when it got too close. The bird didn't seem frightened. It just paused, its head cocked to one side in a listening attitude. Then it hissed and folded its wings. If I must be tied to someone else, it said, seeming to drop the words into his mind, I suppose you are not the worst choice.

At least you are powerful. Then it uttered another hiss, a mocking one, as though the idea amused it terribly.

“Tied?” Harry thought of his bond with Fawkes, but even he could not imagine that this thing was anything like a phoenix, accustomed as he was by now to trying to see beyond the surfaces of dangerous magical creatures. “What do you mean? Are you actually bonded to me, then?”

The bird-creature lashed its tail, which coiled around Harry’s wrist with a sting like frostbite. Harry shook his hand free, and all the while, the thing’s scarlet eyes considered him.

I am tied, said the creature at last. Against my will, since you forget about me so often. But things will fall out as they will. It may be that the tie will be severed at last, and I need not worry about you. Or it may be that I will find my home with you. It hissed again, and the teeth snapped an inch short of Harry’s face; he’d jerked his head back just in time to prevent it taking an ear. A poor home that would be, and yet I would not mind it when the time came.

“You’re making no sense,” Harry told it, trying to keep his voice low. He wasn’t sure if the soothing tone he’d used with magical creatures would work on one that seemed to be made of magic, but he might as well try it. “I can help you, if you’ll just tell me what you mean.”

You can’t help me. You’re as much a victim of this tie as I am, as he is, as all of us are. The bird-creature extended its wings and leaped up, hovering. We must wait for things to fall. Perhaps you will be pierced. I would like that.

It swooped at Harry, who ducked. When he looked up again, the creature had faded from sight entirely, just as it had when he met it in the sky above the Quidditch Pitch. At least he had some idea of why, now. If the creature was made of pure magic, then it could vanish at will. The body it wore was only a temporary construct, anyway, like the box that had imprisoned Harry’s emotions in second year.

But when he tried to imagine why the creature would choose to appear as a bird, or who might have sent it, he wound up blank. He was bound to so many different people with so many different kinds of vows and alliance promises. It could be that one of his allies secretly resented him, or there might be someone bound alive and suffering whom Harry wasn't even aware of. The sentient nature of the magic would argue that, at least. Harry's own magic had gained intelligence only when it was tamped down by the phoenix web and prevented from having its freedom; it had become part of him when it was fully, and finally, freed.

The only thing Harry could find to be thankful for in all this was that he had seen the bird before he bound Henrietta, so he knew it couldn't be her.

He touched the icy scabs on his cheek and closed his eyes, concentrating. He had studied a little more medical magic since the Woodhouse battle and the Blood Whip Curse, especially these last few days, when any distraction from the impending—thing—was welcome. He murmured the word "Integro," and felt the ice melt, as it had when Madam Pomfrey had healed the first set of cuts. Harry had the feeling she hadn't accepted his words about running into a tree as he flew too low on his broom, but at least these would just look like normal scabs now. In time, they would fade, and, if they followed the example of the first set of cuts, not leave scars behind.

"Harry? Are you all right?"

Does Draco have a set of senses attuned to my use of healing magic? Harry rolled his eyes as the curtains got yanked back. "Odd cut, but other than that, fine," he said dismissively, and climbed out of bed.

Draco followed him to the loo in silence. Harry ignored him, even though he knew that Draco had, like Harry, been excused attending his classes today so that he could go to the trial.

The trial.

Harry shivered, and tried to ignore the nervous flutter in his stomach. Today might be the only day of the trial, or it might cover several. It would depend on how many witnesses the prosecution called—though Harry wanted to think otherwise, he could not pretend to himself that the defense would be able to call many—what the Wizengamot had already seen, who believed what, and on other factors that Harry could not estimate or predict.

He did know that he would testify first, for neither prosecution nor defense, and that his information, though in theory purely factual, would also carry an emotional tone. That emotional tone might play a large part in condemning or saving his parents.

Harry felt his breath speed up. He ducked under the shower and let a flood of cold water sluice the back of his neck to try and calm himself down.

So you carry the responsibility for their lives in your hand. You've done that before, as when you planned the Woodhouse attack. You can do it now. If their future happiness is a small glass ball that must not be shattered, then you'll just have to make sure that you don't shatter it.

And that brought him into the realm of things he could control, estimate, and predict. Harry used his magic to run down to the roots of his hair while he considered his weapons.

Occlumency, of course. Slide all the inconvenient emotions into the pools, and leave the ones that might spare their lives near the top. If the Wizengamot sees only that you feel sorrow about their arrest and indifference to the events of your childhood, then you might well succeed in convincing them that the abuse wasn't that bad. How could it be, if it didn't leave that much of a mark?

Manipulation. You won't be testifying under Veritaserum. You can manipulate and lead the questions, respond in such a way that they ask you things you want to answer and not things you don't.

Sympathy and forgiveness. Repeat those as often as you can. Make them the theme of your arguments. And draw the Wizengamot's sympathy in the direction you want it to flow.

Harry had promised that he would not use his magic to force the issue, that he would not compel or coerce anyone to believe him. And he wouldn't. That was still true. But he had said nothing about testifying the way that Snape and Draco wanted him to, either. This was a battle, and he could not be certain of winning.

But he would struggle with all the weapons at his disposal. And this was a battle he intended to win, for all the good that would do him. Freedom for his parents might be a distant goal, but life need not be, even if it was a life spent in Tullianum Prison.

As they went down to breakfast, Harry opened his Occlumency pools and began sliding the inconvenient emotions in.

First went all the tangled mess of his contradictory hatred and love, of course. He would leave only such gentle, fond affection near the surface as might convince the Wizengamot that, yes, he cared a bit for his parents. They wouldn't understand if they saw the violence of his love. After all, as Harry could now parrot from numerous books on the subject, abused children weren't supposed to love their parents.

Well, he did. But they wouldn't see that. So away it went, and Harry summoned up an emotion as gentle and calm and pure as milk, and distributed it in a floating river over the surface of his mind.

Then he submerged the grief. He could not weep about the past during the trial. He would see the past, face it, but he could not weep over it. And he would see his parents, and he could not crack when he faced them, either. He drowned his sorrow deep, and attached stones to it so it couldn't rise again without a great deal of effort on his part.

He was trying to decide how much of his desire to see his parents free he should leave above the surface when Pansy sat down next to him and whispered, "Harry?"

Harry turned and looked at her, startled that she'd decided to address him by his first name, or indeed at all. Save when she wanted him to speak for her during classes, she'd been growing more and more silent the past few weeks, and sometimes used sign language before any words, as if she were forgetting how to speak aloud. He could see her eyes now, hazel like her mother's, staring at him intently from the depths of her hood.

"Yes?" he asked.

Pansy bit her lip, then said, "I wanted to tell you that I understand, now. I saw the vision of my own death on Halloween." She gave a deep shudder, and then said, "I understand that my father didn't perish in some ill-advised attempt to save you. He knew exactly what he was doing. Mother told me that, but I didn't know it. So, if you were still worrying about that, please know that I forgive you."

Harry blinked, and did feel a small grief in him ease. He hadn't done a great deal of thinking lately about Pansy, but at least she wasn't giving him extra stress and strain to carry into the trial. He nodded. "Thank you."

Pansy nodded one more time, paused as if she would say something, then stood and glided from the Great Hall. Harry watched her, for a moment thoroughly distracted from his own preoccupations. She's been carrying the knowledge of her own death for two weeks? And others' deaths, too? From what little Harry knew of necromancy, Halloween was the usual night for the initiation of the deeper sacrifices, and Walpurgis the night when a necromancer would complete all of them and finish his or her training. Harry didn't think Pansy could finish her training by the next Walpurgis, but she'd certainly gone further than he thought.

"Harry."

Harry jumped, and looked sideways to meet Draco's eyes. That was a mistake, and he knew it almost the moment he looked, but then he found himself unable to turn away. Draco gently slid a bowl of porridge in front of him.

"You weren't eating," he whispered.

Harry shrugged free of his strange preoccupation and picked up his spoon. "Pansy had to tell me something," he murmured.

Draco just nodded. Then he said, "I'll be right there for you, Harry, you know, if you need to lean on someone." He paused suggestively. "Or if you want to talk to me."

Harry said nothing. It was true that he hadn't mentioned the trial for the past few days, and snapped at Draco to stop every time he'd tried to bring the topic up. It was also true that he wasn't sorry for that. He'd had to dance a delicate dance. He couldn't lose control, but, on the other hand, if he'd started sinking his emotions into the Occlumency pools too early, then Draco or Snape would have noticed something was wrong and pressed more strongly.

He turned his eyes back to the porridge and started again on the emotional immersion. When he went into the courtroom, he would be calm. He was not a Lord, and he didn't intend to interfere in Scrimgeour's Ministry. He could lift his hand and just command his parents' chains to fly off, but he wouldn't. He would just try as hard as he could to triumph.

"Are you ready?"

Narcissa glanced up from her dressing table and smiled at him in the mirror as she fastened her earrings into place. "Really, Lucius. Intruding into a pureblood woman's bedroom before she finishes putting on her jewelry, and without even an endearment! Have you no manners at all?"

Lucius lingered in the doorway for a moment, watching his wife. Narcissa's long, pale fingers moved swiftly over the earrings, simple golden ornaments that wouldn't look like anything impressive to a quick glance. A more than quick glance would reveal them as scarab beetles. They would come alive at a command from Narcissa, animating to attack the genitals of an opponent.

Her blonde hair was wound up on her head today, revealing a long white neck that would probably distract attention from the golden torque coiled at her throat. That torque was a Black artifact, a snake with its tail in its mouth. It could also come to life at a quiet word, and stretch its jaws wide enough to eat someone alive.

Her dress shimmered red with small golden threads tucked here and there. Lucius wondered how many in the courtroom would recognize it as a battle-gown, not magical in and of itself, but declaring Narcissa's solemn intent to start a blood-feud with the Wizengamot members if justice didn't fall out and the Potter parents were freed.

"Going armed, my dear?" he asked.

"Yes." Narcissa's eyes met his in the mirror, and there was no humor at all in them. "You know why."

Lucius nodded, and entered, sliding his arms around her waist. Narcissa leaned back against him as she slipped her wand down her sleeve, then turned and gave him a fierce, hungry kiss that made Lucius wish they didn't have a trial to attend.

He looked at himself in the mirror, studying the edges of his face. It remained the perfect, cool mask he needed, though. He nodded. "We should leave," he said, and, stepping back, offered his wife his arm.

Uncharacteristically, she didn't take it. She stared into his eyes instead, and said, "How badly do you think it will turn out?"

Lucius sighed. Narcissa spoke of more than one thing. "The trial should go as well as can be expected," he murmured. The Daily Prophet had been carrying reports of Albus Dumbledore's mind-compelling spell for the past two weeks, and most wizards and witches Lucius knew were shocked and angry, even if they hadn't paid much attention to the trial before. And there was the endless evidence on the side of the prosecution. "About the other matter—"

"I think we should tell Harry," Narcissa interrupted.

Lucius frowned. "Not yet, Narcissa. The name of Yaxley will mean little to him until he meets her in battle. And you know the reason we held off. Our Potter will have little chance of concentrating on anything else with the trial proceeding. When it is done, and his parents safely gone, either in Tullianum or to death, then we can tell him, and warn him about her."

Narcissa bit her lip, but, at last, yielded to his advice as she had for the past week, and took his arm. Lucius guided her towards the door of the Manor. They would be Apparating to London once they were past the outer wards, then approaching the Ministry on foot. The recent Death Eater activity had the Department of Magical Law Enforcement paranoid about anyone coming closer than that by Apparition, not that Lucius could blame them.

As they walked, his mind ran grimly on news he'd never thought to hear. It was true that, during the First War, the Dark Lord had had a Yaxley Death Eater. But that one hadn't gone to Azkaban, and Lucius had assumed, at most, that he would rejoin Voldemort when the Dark Lord arose again. One more Death Eater wand was not much of a concern.

Instead of simply torturing Yaxley for not showing him loyalty during the years he was gone, however, Voldemort had done something worse: called in a debt of honor to the entire family. There was no Dark pureblood family more obsessed with honor than Yaxley. They'd put themselves at Voldemort's service.

And he'd chosen to take Indigena Yaxley, the Thorn Bitch, into his service.

That was bad. It was very bad. Indigena was what Bellatrix Lestrange might have been if she were sane and ten times more dangerous.

Lucius knew that he had to tell their Potter the Thorn Bitch was a Death Eater, but it would only put more pressure on him now. Let it lie, until the trial is done.

He didn't want to acknowledge how close he thought Harry was to breaking.

Augustus Starrise added the final bell, and stepped away from his mirror with a nod that made the bells sway in his hair. There. Now he looked like a war wizard capable of killing someone.

Not a bad entrance to his first political activity in more than a year, if he did say so himself.

He whirled away from the mirror, hearing the bells ring softly around him, and picked up his wand and his staff, which was carved with white oak and banded with gold. It pulsed gently in his hand as he spun it. Augustus felt a smile curve his lips as he ran his fingers over the end of the staff. He knew it was a wistful, too-gentle smile, but that was all right. There was no one in the bedroom to see.

Alba had helped him add the final band of gold to the staff, a few days before the Death Eaters took her. Her loving presence, and some of her magic, lingered in it still. Augustus closed his eyes, and imagined his twin sister standing before him, as tall as death and twice as lovely.

“Perhaps soon, Alba,” he whispered, “you’ll have your justice. I know it must pain you, looking down on the world, seeing your murderers go unpunished and one of your sons run wild. But I think this plan should work.”

A knock sounded on the door. Augustus smoothed his face stern, and then opened it. It was Pharos, of course, his nephew and heir, Alba’s younger boy, bowing nervously to his uncle.

“It’s time to go?” he murmured. Augustus nodded in approval. Though Pharos still had trouble controlling his expression—and he was such an openhearted, honest young man, that was no surprise—his voice was cool and calm.

“It is,” said Augustus, and swept towards the Portkey room of his house. The portraits on the walls, showing past Starrises in dignified stances, nodded and sometimes bowed to him, depending on how much reverence they felt for the current head of the family. The windows blazed, open on the sunlight of a perfectly beautiful fall day. Augustus was glad the Potters’ trial was occurring after October, so that he might attend it without fear of the Sunset Accords lopping off one of his limbs.

He could admit it: he'd felt chagrin last year when Scrimgeour had forced him out of the Ministry's arena, and again when Fudge was deposed, and again when he realized how Tybalt had run to Potter's side. But time had sleeted past him and mellowed his opposition, and then had come the news of Potter's abuse, and then Augustus had realized what an opportunity he had.

Several things had changed his mind on allying with the Potter boy. The first was the fact that he was powerful, and not completely lost to Dark magic. If he were Dark, Tybalt wouldn't have allied with him. Merlin knew the boy had gone wrong, but not that far wrong. He was no Death Eater, nor any other species of cringing follower to crouch at a Dark Lord's feet. So Potter must have some spark of Light in him, and Augustus might encourage that to grow if he did join the alliance.

The second was the news of the abuse. Augustus's hand tightened on the staff as he thought about it. That was sickening, the news of what the Potters had done to their own son. And James Potter came from a Light family, too. Augustus was hoping the Ministry would follow the ancient custom of allowing the whole crowd at the trial to spit on the condemned—for he had no doubt that James Potter would be condemned, as he deserved to be. Surely someone had spoken to Scrimgeour about that already, reminded him of the importance of tradition?

The third thing was the realization of just how many former Death Eaters Potter had gathered around him. Augustus loathed the thought of working beside them, but not so much the thought of fighting beside them.

And there was always the chance that he might find Alba's murderers among them, or learn information that would lead him to the guilty parties among those Death Eaters who'd stayed Death Eaters.

Augustus planned to make formal submission to Potter and offer him the assistance of the Starrise family coffers the moment the trial was done.

He did hope he would get to spit on James Potter first, though. "Are you all right?"

Hawthorn started and turned around. Keen though her ears had been since Greyback had bitten her, Lupin had been a werewolf longer, and could still move with a silence that baffled all her attempts to hear him. "Fine," she said shortly.

Lupin looked at her with calm amber eyes. "You shouldn't try to lie to a packmate," he said quietly.

Hawthorn turned to face the wall again and didn't respond. She was already regretting her decision to accept Lupin's invitation and Portkey in to his quarters today before the trial began. It was too small a room to hold two werewolves, one of whom was upset.

"Harry will not hate you for testifying against his parents," Lupin told her back. "You do realize that, don't you?"

"And why shouldn't he?" Grateful, in a way, not to have to hide her emotions any longer, Hawthorn swung around and showed him her teeth, wishing she could lay her ears flat to her head. Wolfish gestures of anger were just so much more satisfying, somehow. "I know all about the memories, and I have to do it, but you know as well as I do that he wants his parents to go free."

Lupin's eyes shifted more towards amber. Hawthorn knew from his scent that he wasn't angry at her, though.

"There was a time when I would have agreed with him," said Lupin softly. "Before I knew about—all this. Now, I wish they would let James and Lily out in a wooded park where our pack might hunt them."

A shocked laugh escaped Hawthorn's lips before she could stop it. Then she rubbed her hand over her face. "Thank you," she said.

Lupin took a step nearer and rubbed his chin against her cheek. "Pack should cheer each other up," he said. "I wish we could go to Claudia right now, but that would only raise her cousin's suspicions."

Perhaps we can get one of her other cousins to owl her for us, and arrange a meeting where we might run together?”

“Perhaps,” said Hawthorn. She knew the suspicious Griffinsnest family, though, and didn’t think it would work. Claudia had managed to keep her lycanthropy a secret from everyone but her parents, who’d been present when she was bitten and decided to support her. Meeting with at least one known and obvious werewolf—Lupin’s signs were more obvious than others’, if you knew what you were looking for, since he’d been bitten so young—would expose her irreversibly to her relatives.

Hawthorn would have thought the precautions acceptable, last year. This one, she felt more and more anger towards the wizards and witches who treated werewolves like beasts, even though she had been one of them until her first full moon.

The feelings combined and melded with her more personal worries over Harry. If he broke during the trial, then Hawthorn could only imagine how long it might take him to recover, and what his enemies would do in the meanwhile. She’d heard rumblings of factions in the Ministry getting ready to push for tougher anti-werewolf laws.

“We’ll survive this,” Lupin whispered into her ear.

Hawthorn almost jumped again, but the pleasant relaxation she felt around anyone else of her pack prevented it. She didn’t understand this change in attitude, either. Normally, anything that gratified her wolf was something she hated, and vice versa. But the warmth and confidence she felt with Lupin, Delilah and Claudia made her feel like more than herself, more even than a divided soul, large and eager and ready to take on the world. And with Lupin’s help they were starting to heal, finally, the unexpected hole that Fergus’s death had left in their world.

“We’ll survive this,” said Lupin. “And he will. And he may even free us, be our vates, too, who knows?” He lifted his arms and tucked them around her shoulders.

Hawthorn leaned into the embrace, and nodded, and tried not to think of the look she'd seen on Harry's face that morning when she observed him from behind a glamour in the Great Hall.

Harry dropped out of Apparition and glanced around once. He'd come with Draco, Snape, Regulus, and Peter to a designated Apparition point within a half mile of the Ministry, in a London alley most Muggles didn't pay much attention to. They didn't have far to walk.

Draco clung close to Harry's side as they stepped into the open, in the perfect position for Harry to lean on him if he needed to. Harry rolled his eyes. He was fine, with his Occlumency pools burying his emotions. The stares Snape and Regulus kept giving him were overkill. Peter, luckily, seemed to be keeping his eyes to himself.

Harry managed to relax a bit as they made their way to the deserted telephone box that would let them into the Ministry. There was no reason to be nervous. Only a few Muggles were around, and a simple Distraction Charm made each of them consider the wizards as nothing important.

They passed a second alley, and then Harry caught a glimpse of movement from the corner of his eye, at the same moment as the Many snake coiled around his throat, whom he hadn't been able to leave behind this time, uttered a sharp hiss.

Harry swung around, in time to see a vaguely familiar man step out of the alley and aim his wand straight at Draco.

"Avada Kedavra!"

Harry heard Mulciber's voice from last year drumming in his head. ...no shield, no barrier can block the Killing Curse...

Harry turned sideways, wrapped his arms around Draco's waist, and bore him, spinning, to the ground. The Killing Curse sped over both their heads and chipped a bit of stone from a building. Harry heard a few Muggles gasp, but the Distraction Charm still seemed to be working.

That meant, though, that the attacker could go after the Muggles, and they wouldn't do anything to defend themselves.

Harry rolled away from Draco, though Draco was trying to cling to him, and rose hastily to his feet. Now he did recognize the man stalking towards him with a mad look in his eyes. It was Kingsley Shacklebolt, one of the Aurors who had questioned Harry when he'd taken Snape as his guardian in third year, and the first Auror to be sacked when Scrimgeour took office.

His eyes held a fanatic's fire, and Harry had no doubt that this desperate strike had come about because of his loyalty to Dumbledore.

Harry drew in a deep breath. "It's all right, Kingsley," he said, keeping his voice low and soothing, edging in front of Draco. "This trial is for my parents, not the Headmaster. If you could just—"

Kingsley swung his wand to orient on Snape. Harry could see the consequences that would follow like a catch of the Snitch in his mind's eye. Either Snape would die, or he himself would use the Killing Curse, and be lucky if he wasn't sent to Tullianum for wielding an Unforgivable.

Harry held out his hand. "Accio Kingsley's wand!"

The wand sped towards him, luckily before Kingsley could fire a Killing Curse. Harry had just started to breathe a sigh of relief when he saw Kingsley drawing another wand, and felt the deadness of the one in his hand.

This one was a blank wand, specially made for the task of killing. Kingsley still held his own.

Harry flung the blank wand down, and then Kingsley was pointing his own wand straight at him.

"Avada Kedavra," he said softly, and the blast of green fire that couldn't be stopped or turned aside came at Harry.

Harry rolled under it. He had to hope that Draco hadn't been just behind him, or Peter. He could see Regulus at Snape's shoulder, his own wand drawn, but he didn't know where the other two were.

No one cried out, but that didn't mean anything. The Killing Curse could strike too fast to leave someone time for a death scream. Harry didn't trust his own senses until he scrambled to his feet and turned, seeing no body behind him.

He faced Kingsley again as Snape cast a Blasting Curse. It bounced neatly off Kingsley's cloak. Harry felt his own face tighten. Kingsley's clothes were strengthened with a powerful Shield Charm, then.

He had to do something before one of the people he loved died or decided to use the Killing Curse. He was not losing Regulus, Peter, or Snape to Tullianum, damnit! He was close enough to that with his own parents.

He saw a small flash of movement crossing the ground between him and Kingsley, and then the former Auror shrieked and kicked. Harry saw a gray rat clinging fiercely to his ankle, biting for all he was worth. Peter had done that to Dumbledore once, too, to save Harry from his anger.

It gave Harry time to decide what to do. The Muggles were staring at them, now, the ones who hadn't fled screaming. The Ministry would undoubtedly be here in a moment—this close, wards could sense use of the Unforgivables—but Harry couldn't depend on them being in time to save everyone.

And now Kingsley was aiming his wand at Peter, the distance so close that Harry knew he wouldn't be able to put anything in between, as if anything would stop the Killing Curse but another body.

The thought passed fleetingly across his mind and was gone. No. He'd survived the green fire from Voldemort, but that was a unique occurrence that wouldn't happen again.

He didn't think he could use Legilimency on Kingsley without eye contact, and the Shield Charm's strength was unknown, and Harry didn't want to use Dark Arts this close to the Ministry.

That left Light spells that would take Kingsley out.

"Incito cordiem," he murmured.

The spell reached into Kingsley's chest, past the cloak, like the spells that Rosier had used on Harry which burned his blood or his heart. This was an incantation that Harry had heard of before, but never cast. He was hoping desperately that it would work.

It seemed to. He could feel Kingsley's heartbeat in his ears beside his own, and it began to quicken as he listened, pumping blood more and more frantically, going faster and faster.

Kingsley's wand fell from his hand. Peter scampered to safety. Kingsley knelt, shuddering, arms wrapped around himself, and Harry heard the heart pick up speed.

He knew this spell could kill someone. Force the heart to beat fast enough, and it would burst. Harry didn't want that to happen. He wanted to hand Kingsley over to the Aurors he could hear Apparating in.

"Finite Incantatem," he said, and then watched as Kingsley scurried for his wand again. This time, though, an Auror bound his hands, which swung free of the cloak, with a silvery rope, and others stepped in to remove the cloak and then capture him in a Body-Bind. Harry let out a long sigh and turned to check on the others.

Peter was staying a rat for the moment, obviously unwilling to transform back in front of the Aurors. Harry had doubts, then, that the Ministry's questioning had actually revealed Peter as an unregistered Animagus. Regulus and Snape were staring at Kingsley with similarly frozen expressions that said he should be glad he was in Ministry custody. Draco was hurrying up to Harry.

"Are you all right?" he whispered, wrapping him in a tight hug.

“Of course,” said Harry with a murmur, hugging him back, though he kept his eyes on Kingsley.

The attack had had an odd effect on him. Of course he’d been horribly afraid that the Killing Curse would hit someone before he could stop Kingsley, and he’d been worried about what spell he would use, but it was as though this had forced him past the last stresses and strains dangling in his mind, and forced him to ignore whatever of his own anger and hatred remained outside the Occlumency pools.

It’s best for everyone concerned when no one has to die. And when someone attacks like this, because of misguided loyalty, it’s more pitiful than anything else. The same thing happened to my parents. They’re ultimately pathetic.

If I can stop Kingsley like this, shouldn’t I be able to spare my parents death? It shouldn’t be that hard, and this first part of the trial all depends on me. Harry felt himself relax further. Yes, I can do this.

“Mr. Potter?” Harry glanced up, and saw an Auror he didn’t know standing over him, frowning. “My name is Auror Wilmot. I’ll be escorting you the rest of the way to the Ministry.”

Harry nodded, and turned to walk in the Auror’s custody, trusting the rest of them, or other Ministry people, to take care of Kingsley and the Muggles. His mind was still clear, as though he’d taken a great gulp of fresh air.

I can do this. I don’t know what I was worried about. Let’s go. He felt a genuine smile widening across his face. Even seeing my parents shouldn’t be hard when I’m feeling this good.

Chapter Forty-One: Reap the Whirlwind

This was interesting. More interesting than she'd expected it to be, actually.

Indigena Yaxley moved with the crowd flowing into the Wizengamot courtroom, nodding and smiling at everyone who paused to look at her. It was always easier to be friendly as Iris Raymonds than as herself. She felt as if she really were a new person whenever the plants beneath her skin flexed, reshaping her features into those of another witch. She carried another wand, too, and the Ministry officials had kindly registered that and given it back to her. Her real wand was carried, unregistered, in her robe pocket.

They hadn't checked for it. There were wards up that were supposed to make entering with an unregistered wand impossible, and none of the officials had any reason to be suspicious of the pretty young witch who flushed when her fingers accidentally brushed someone else's hand.

The yew leaves wrapped around Indigena's real wand kept the wards from functioning. It wasn't really their fault that they didn't know that.

The thing that made her visit to the courtroom interesting was the other people, though, not the tiresome Ministry officials. Indigena paused when she first stepped inside, looking around. She sniffed, and smiled. Here, away from her new Lord—the scent of whose magic was rather overwhelming—she could actually smell the different kinds of power the other wizards carried with them.

She was the most powerful wizard in the room, though she knew that would change when Potter entered. And she hadn't been sure, either, that she'd be more powerful than Severus Snape, the traitorous Death Eater who'd assigned himself Potter's guardian. It was a pleasure to find that she was, if barely.

Indigena made her way lazily towards the visitors' galleries. It didn't matter where she sat. Her new Lord had ordered her to keep an eye on Potter's trial and report anything interesting, but the true information would come from his words, as it did in any trial, not his face. Indigena didn't have to see him.

"Excuse me."

Indigena had turned her head backwards to study a witch with an unusual rose perfume a few steps behind her, and had stumbled into someone without meaning to. She turned around and gave a small shake of her head. "The apology should be mine," she murmured. She knew her face wouldn't show recognition. The plants were not very flexible, and when they reshaped her into Iris, Indigena only let them express emotions that she thought she might need, so as not to overstrain the vines. Feral pleasure at the sight of the Malfoys wasn't one of those feelings.

Lucius Malfoy nodded at her, as though to say that, yes, she should apologize, and then guided his wife up the steps. Indigena eyed them as they glided past her. Narcissa's white hand dangled within an inch of hers for a few moments, as the Malfoys had to pause to let more spectators flow past them. Indigena could reach out and grip it.

And the thorny rose she wore wrapped around her wrist could animate, digging its spines into Narcissa's palm and pumping in a few drops of poison that would hurt no more than a hard pinch and leave no mark. She'd be dead in a few hours.

Indigena would have done it, too—she believed in slaying one's enemies, not toying with them—but Lord Voldemort had claimed the right of killing all traitors, and he had promised Bellatrix Lestrange that she could have Narcissa. Indigena knew the requirements of honor perfectly well, since it was what had made her a Death Eater in the first place. She could not take a kill someone else had marked as his or her own.

She would have, instead, to enjoy the knowledge that death had come within an inch of Narcissa Malfoy today, and she had never realized it.

Indigena climbed to her seat in a silent, thoughtful mood, but only until she remembered her experimental thorns. Then she smiled. She could entertain herself until the trial began by thinking about how big they would soon grow, how much poison they were likely to store, and whether Evan Rosier was in very much pain right now as he writhed on them, pierced through the back and abdomen.

Harry lifted his head as he entered the courtroom. There was definitely an advantage to having been here before, though neither of the occasions he'd been inside it—for Fudge's trial, and for Snape's—was very pleasant. He had at least expected the bare stone walls, and the flickering torches, and the staring crowd, and the chair with chains in the center.

Of course, since he wasn't a criminal being tried but a "victim," as they insisted on calling him, the Wizengamot had conjured another chair for him. This sat not far from the one with chains, still almost in the center of the room, but it was lower and had a cushion on it. Harry took his seat.

He leaned back and tilted his head to meet the eyes of the staring Wizengamot, and the eyes from the visitors' galleries. He hadn't realized there would be quite so many people. Of course, with the Prophet and other newspapers having covered the story in breathless anticipation for so many months, interest would be high when the time for his parents' sentencing finally came.

Harry curled his lip. They think they're here to see me weeping and breaking down, the helpless child they've portrayed in all their articles. Well, I'm not going to. Even if I have to make myself look completely unsympathetic, I'm not going to break down.

He knew Snape and Draco, the Malfoys and his other allies, were up there somewhere. He knew they probably hoped, though for a different reason from the rest of the crowd, that he wouldn't maintain his mask. Harry intended to disappoint them, too.

"Attention," said a quavering voice enhanced by Sonorus charms. "Attention, wizards, witches, and gentlebeings. If you will sit down, please?"

Harry lifted his head to look at the old wizard standing near the front of the Wizengamot's platform, shuffling some papers in front of him. Harry didn't know him. He was extremely small, with barely any wisps of hair clinging to his head, and he wore a pince-nez. Harry nodded. They probably couldn't find anyone else to lead the questioning. Most of the Wizengamot were either against me or too closely connected with me, and of course Scrimgeour can't lead it himself. I suppose this one is neutral.

"My name is Tofty Sapiention," announced the old wizard. "I am an Elder of the Wizengamot, and I will lead the portion of the trial that consists of Mr. Potter's questioning." Harry could feel his eyebrows rise. They're not having the same person lead it all the way through? That's unusual. "Please, sit down and be quiet. There must be no interruptions while we proceed."

Harry relaxed a bit. So far, Mr. Sapiention sounded just like all the books of proceedings on child abuse trials Harry had read. He might not be the questioner all the time, but while he was, it seemed likely that he would be fussy and adhere to strict rules. That was just the kind of person Harry would want questioning him.

"A warning," said Sapiention, and stared in the direction of a pair of witches who wouldn't stop gossiping. When they finally stopped, he gave them a nod and continued. "Some of the memories discussed in this courtroom today will be extremely hurtful. Please depart now if you feel unable to hold the contents of your temper, your wand, or your stomach. Once we begin, the door will be locked, and no one will be permitted to leave until Mr. Potter's testimony is complete."

Harry listened, but it didn't sound as though anyone were leaving. Of course, the observers would have come here today knowing it was a child abuse case.

"Very well," said Sapiention, and spoke the spell that would lock the courtroom's doors. Harry shivered, but tried not to let the echoing boom get to him. He wouldn't feel trapped. The spell wasn't locking him in here with the past; it was locking him in here with the future. This was his chance to get as much for his parents as he could obtain.

“Mr. Potter.”

Harry leaned a little further back in the chair and looked up again. He noticed the chair molding itself to his head, so that he wouldn't hurt his neck continually craning it to see. He made a mental note to thank whoever had constructed the chair like that, if he ever found out.

Sapientian's voice was gentle. “Please let me know at any time if you are unwilling to speak. It is our intent today to learn the truth, but not our intent to make you feel uncomfortable.”

Too late for that. Snape already did it by spreading the news to the papers. But Harry checked his bitterness. It might escape him during the trial, and that would be utterly disastrous. He nodded, instead, to show he understood.

“Now, I must ask: Are you willing to testify under Veritaserum?”

Harry shook his head. He knew the question was procedural only—very few child abuse victims chose the truth potion—but he did feel a brief, fleeting regret. If he could have convinced them that what he felt was true beyond a doubt...

But he would convince them that everything he felt was true beyond a doubt, and that was the problem with that. Harry shoved his anger down again and waited patiently for the first question.

Tofty Sapientian looked at his notes for a moment, then took a deep breath and said, “Mr. Potter, please describe the way Lily and James Potter, your parents, raised you.”

Harry relaxed further. This was the kind of open question that gave him a lot of room to play in, the kind he'd been hoping for.

“Guardedly,” he said. “We lived in a small house near Godric's Hollow, behind tight isolation wards, from the time my twin brother Connor Potter and I were one and a half to the day we started Hogwarts. The isolation wards were constructed out of fear of Voldemort—a collective flinch from the court, which Harry thought would get tiresome soon—returning, and his Death Eaters seeking revenge.

My parents, of course, feared for Connor's life, and so, in addition to keeping him protected from the outside world, they trained me to be his defender."

Sapientian moved on to the next question. "Is it true that you had no choice in becoming his guardian, Mr. Potter?"

Harry kept the scowl off his face. Though they weren't leading the questioning, other members of the Wizengamot and the Minister would have had the chance to make up questions. He would bet anything that that particular one came from Scrimgeour, or maybe Madam Marchbanks.

"It is true that my training began very young, from the night that Voldemort attacked," he said, and rolled his eyes as more people flinched. It's a name. If they're that afraid of his name, of his shadow, how are they ever going to fight him?

Sapientian frowned slightly. "That's not what the question asked, Mr. Potter."

Harry spread his arms. "I was raised to believe in it," he said simply. "Many wizarding parents raise their children to believe in many different things, Elder Sapientian. Pureblood purity, for instance, or the need to keep our world safe and secret from Muggles, or the superiority of one Quidditch team over another." That got a chuckle from some people in the galleries, but they echoed in a mostly confused silence; Harry knew he wasn't reacting the way most of the spectators had expected him to. "In most cases, from the time they can talk, or not much after it. Would you describe them as not having a choice? I had the same lack of choice as they did, or the same freedom. I was raised in a certain way. That way made me what I am. Do I wish that my parents had chosen some different methods? Undoubtedly." He released just a bit of his anger from the Occlumency pools then, to flavor his voice. It wouldn't do to let them think he was emotionless about this. "But I cannot say I am sorry for everything I learned."

"Describe your training in detail for the court, Mr. Potter."

Another wide-open question. I do like Sapientian.

“I was raised to be my brother’s guardian,” said Harry. “To stay in the shadows while defending him; I was to present an ordinary front to the world, and never let anyone know that I was skilled in doing what I was. I expected I would lay down my life for him someday. There was a War coming, and my mother told me the Boy-Who-Lived had to survive to fight the Dark Lord. To do that, he needed his love and innocence intact. I was the one who would stand between Connor and the world, and I promised to do it.”

He could see a few of the Wizengamot members exchanging glances. Harry hid a smile. Good. It’s all in the way I present things. Snape got them on his side by twisting everything around. He can’t blame me for doing the same thing.

Sapientian rustled through another series of notes. Then he made a soft sound and said, “Ah! Mr. Potter, I am now going to lift a memory from the Pensieve that was turned over to me and place it in the air above the courtroom. Don’t worry,” he hastened to add. “Only yourself and the Wizengamot members will be able to see it.”

Harry tipped his head, and watched as Sapientian put his wand in a shallow bowl in front of him and then flicked it up, causing a spray of silvery droplets to animate and take form in the air above his head. Harry could see people from the galleries craning their necks, and heard many groans of disappointment. He ignored them, and watched as his mother and his younger self came into view, kneeling together in the fall of sunshine through a window. Lily had her hands clasped around his. Harry thought, from the look of his face, that he was six or so.

“A new morning,” Lily whispered to him, with that intensity Harry had always loved. It made him feel they were playing a special secret game together, practicing an art that no one else in the whole world knew about. He shifted in the chair, emotions he hadn’t felt in years returning to him. If he had managed to keep everything secret, if he had followed Connor into Gryffindor, then perhaps he could still have felt that, that intense and hidden pride that would have let him stand in a corner and not be noticed.

I'm allowed to regret it, he thought defensively.

"A new day," the Lily in the image continued to the Harry in the image. "So many possibilities for renewal and rebirth. Can you recite your vows for me, Harry? I'd like to hear them renewed."

Image-Harry nodded and began to say them. Harry mouthed them along with him. The words were still so ingrained in his head that, though it had been years since he'd recited them daily, he knew them like the beat of his heart.

"To keep Connor safe. To always protect him. To insure that he lives as untroubled a life as he can, until he has to face Lord Voldemort again." The little breath in the middle, that Harry thought signaled his mother's fear, and then they continued. "To be his brother and his friend and his guardian. To love him. To never compete with him, never show him up, and never let anyone else know that I'm so close to him. To be ordinary, so that he can be extraordinary."

The image dissolved. Harry blinked and glanced up at Sapiention. He had thought the Wizengamot would choose something more injurious to his parents' cause than just something he'd done every day.

Sapiention's voice shook as he spoke. Harry didn't know why. "Are all those vows true, Mr. Potter? You kept them all?"

Harry shrugged. "I attempted to keep them all. They were disrupted my first year at Hogwarts, when I was Sorted into Slytherin House, which my mother hadn't planned on." More words were burning on his tongue, about Snape and how he'd forced Harry to do various things that broke the vow of ordinariness, but he refrained. Say those things, and they'd just think he was still damaged.

"But—" Sapiention paused a moment, as if he were trying to think of how to phrase the next question. Harry was surprised. Isn't he just reading off a prepared list? "The last two as well?"

Merlin! Why is it always those last two that bother everyone? Harry nodded. "Yes. Every one of them."

"And how did you feel about this?"

Harry felt for traps in the question. "At what age, sir?" he asked finally.

"At the age you made them." Sapiention nodded jerkily at thin air, as though he'd forgotten he'd dismissed the image. "At the age you were in the Pensieve."

Harry shrugged. "I welcomed them, sir. I believed in them absolutely. I knew that someone paying attention to me could mean that I wouldn't be as effective a guardian to Connor. Either the Death Eaters might see me as an enemy, and then I wouldn't be able to surprise them, or I might get dragged into friendships and alliances and other commitments that had nothing to do with my brother. Of course, now I realize that's wrong," he added, barely resisting the temptation to make his voice a sing-song.

"So you were to be focused on your brother absolutely?" Sapiention asked, his voice so soft that for a moment Harry thought he would have to ask him to repeat the question. "He was to be your life?"

"Yes," said Harry. He felt uneasiness rising up his back, tickling at his spine. He thought he'd lost control of the conversation, but he wasn't sure how. He swallowed and leaned back on the chair, then sat forward again, then forced himself to stay still. He didn't want to look either as if he were taking a defensive posture nor as if he were squirming in his seat.

"Why?" Sapiention whispered. "What could possibly have been worth this?"

"A prophecy," said Harry. "A prophecy that marked my brother as the savior, and his elder twin brother as his powerful guardian. My parents were raising me, as they thought, in tune with the strict guidelines of fate. If my brother wasn't guarded, then he would have fallen."

“What did the prophecy say?”

Dread thickened Harry’s throat like wine. He couldn’t let the full knowledge of the prophecy out into the world, not when Voldemort might learn of it. “I never heard the full wording, sir,” he lied. “I only know that that was the reasoning my parents gave, and so did Albus Dumbledore. None of them ever said anything to make me think they had any other main reason.”

Sapientian sorted through his notes one more time, then frowned and said, “But here is a memory that may prove otherwise.” He flicked his wand through the Pensieve again, and another image took shape.

Harry barely resisted the temptation to snarl. He knew this one. He’d seen it before. It was the memory of the time that Dumbledore had put the phoenix web on him, when he was four years old.

He sat through it in stony silence. He’d hated it the first time he saw it, and he still hated it, but he hated more the purpose it was being used for. He knew what Sapientian was going to ask next.

He realized he had his arms folded when the Wizengamot Elder dismissed the memory and turned back to him. He unfolded them, but made no other gesture. He probably looked too stiff, and his body language was giving him away already. Harry released a frustrated hiss of breath that should be too soft for anyone else to pick up, even with the courtroom’s excellent acoustics. I can’t believe I’m being knocked down already. What in the world happened to holding strong?

“This, Mr. Potter,” said Sapientian softly, “looks rather as if your parents and Albus Dumbledore imprisoned your magic because they feared you, and trained you as a sacrifice to make sure that you would never turn on them. They treated you as little more than a thing, a tool.”

Harry bit his lip. To speak now would be to spill words that he didn’t want to say.

"You mentioned that I need only tell you if I was feeling uncomfortable, Elder Sapientian," he said after a moment. "I am."

"Do you wish to stop the questioning?" The Elder's voice was quiet, respectful, and Harry knew that he would if Harry wished it.

And Harry almost said yes, but then he remembered: this was the only chance that he would get to influence the court. For the rest of the trial, witnesses for defense and prosecution would speak, but he was neither. Pensieve memories would be shown, and challenges given by biased observers like Snape, with no counterbalance of his explanation.

He shook his head. "No."

"Then I will continue with the questioning," said Sapientian. "This explanation, of treating you like a tool or a weapon, has been presented to the Wizengamot by those who submitted the memory. Would you agree with it, Mr. Potter? Or would you give a different interpretation?"

Harry closed his eyes. He knew one truth that could make them dismiss that explanation forever. But to reveal himself as the Boy-Who-Lived and Voldemort's magical heir would be to cast doubts on the truth of the prophecy, and then the Wizengamot would only look more deeply for convoluted reasons as to his mother's training, when Harry had already told them the true reasoning behind it. She'd been afraid, and she'd thought she was obeying fate and the ethics that Dumbledore had trained her into. That was all, but they would dream up some outlook that made her a criminal mastermind. Harry knew they would.

So give them part of the truth and not the whole thing. You can do that, can't you?

"I turned out to have several dangerous abilities," he said simply. "My mother, as you heard from the memory, was frightened by the fact that I often Vanished things. What if I had Vanished my brother, or the house? I was too young to realize that some types of magic should be carefully restricted in use. The phoenix web took some of my abilities away from me until I was ready to use them.”

“And when was that point to have been reached?” Sapiention questioned sternly.

Harry shrugged. “I don’t know. I don’t think that my mother or Dumbledore ever mentioned a specific age.”

“But we did just hear Dumbledore saying that the web would reweave your mind to its purpose,” Sapiention said. Harry could see his hand shaking as he picked up another piece of paper, but he didn’t think it was from either age or fear. “Is that true?”

“That is what happened,” Harry acknowledged unwillingly. “For a time, my whole mind was shaped as webs. The phoenix web was at the very bottom of them all. I suppose that would count as weaving my mind.”

Sapiention made a small noise that Harry thought meant he was ill. Harry found himself clutching the arm of his chair so hard his hand hurt, and removed it, flexing it slowly open and closed so that his fingers wouldn’t cramp. The Many snake around his throat gave a little wriggle that said she wanted to get down and bite whoever was upsetting Harry. Harry switched to stroking her the moment he thought he’d exercised his fingers enough.

Calmness was my goal when I came in here. Why am I finding it so hard to attain?

He was trying a routine of breaths that should smooth the bubbling surface of his Occlumency pools when Sapiention said, “Would you describe the effects of the phoenix web for the court, Mr. Potter?”

Harry twitched. They aren’t going to like this, either. But he didn’t think he could lie. At least some of the Pensieve memories would center on the web, and it seemed that Sapiention knew them well, if he’d immediately plucked out one of them to look at. “It bound my magic,” he said. “It bound my loyalty to my brother. It also made me unaware of itself. It was supposed to remain secret, a last line of defense; mostly, my mother and Dumbledore counted on my conditioning to make me loyal. But certain—events—in my second year brought it up out of the depths of my mind, and after that it broke. It was still focused on my brother, but it gave me pain, headaches mostly, every time I thought too deeply about going against my mother and Dumbledore's wishes on the matter."

"It made you into a slave," Sapientian summarized.

"No!" Harry sat up, frowning. "A slave can't break free of his confinement. I could. Once I learned about the phoenix web, I managed it."

"Slavery is not based on whether one can break one's own chains, Mr. Potter," said the Elder.

Harry sat back and thought rebelliously on whether they would consider house elves and goblins to be enslaved for that reason, and what the reaction of the court would be if he asked that. But he checked the impulse. He was not about to reveal secrets or debase his work as vates by comparing what had happened to him for a decade to the years and years of suffering endured by the house elves and goblins.

Control yourself, damn it!

Harry lifted his eyes back to Sapientian and said, "I'm ready for the next question, sir."

"There are many mentions in the court's notes of your being trained as a sacrifice, Mr. Potter," said Sapientian, shuffling through some more of the papers. "You've described a few of the consequences for us. What were others?"

Harry let out a little shuddering breath. He could do this, right? He had acknowledged that the sacrificial training hindered him as much as it helped him, that it was wrong. And if he could just pick the right words and make the Wizengamot see that it wasn't all bad, then he might stand a chance of lessening their hatred towards his mother.

“I was trained to give up my life for my brother if necessary,” he said. “Leap in front of curses for him, but that was only the most obvious way. Make sure that I had no friends that came before him, or indeed any at all. That would have been the best-case scenario. No amusements that would detract from his position in my life. No concerns that could displace him from always hovering in front of my eyes.”

“I understand that you both play Quidditch on the school teams in Hogwarts, Mr. Potter,” said Sapientian. “How does that work, if you were trained not to compete with your brother in anything?”

Harry could have kissed the Elder for asking a question like that. He relaxed completely as he replied, “Obviously I’ve overcome some of my training, Elder, haven’t I? I can compete with Connor now, and it doesn’t bother me.”

“But in the first years?” Sapientian pushed.

Harry hesitated. Then he said, “I made attempts to give the Quidditch victories to my brother.”

“When did that change?”

“In third year,” said Harry.

“And what happened then?”

How can I go into this, without revealing what happened to Sirius? “I would prefer not to answer that question, Elder.”

Sapientian nodded, and Harry could see the shadows of other nodding heads moving behind him. Too late, he realized he should have answered the question in such a way as would leave key details of Sirius’s madness and possession out. With his refusal, they just thought that he wanted to skip the details of his healing, as if he were ashamed of them.

Sapientian continued before Harry could object. "I understand that your mother's abuse of you was primarily mental and emotional, Mr. Potter, and your father's abuse of you primarily neglectful?"

"It was all mental and emotional," Harry said sharply, "and all neglect on my father's part." I don't want them thinking otherwise, and damn Sapientian for trying to do that, anyway. Skeeter said neglect and mental abuse weren't as common in the wizarding world. That means that there's the chance the Wizengamot won't take this as seriously, and will downplay the punishment for my parents' crimes.

"And yet..." said Sapientian, and then waved his wand. Another image took form. Harry recognized this one. He stood in front of a cleared space on the wall, where a bookshelf would normally rest. He didn't want to chance missing and hurting the books if his spell went wrong.

Harry watched as his younger self intoned the incantation for the Blood Whip Curse, and the stripes formed on his back, cutting the same thin lines that he'd healed when Marietta used the spell. His younger self bit his lip and squeezed his eyes shut for a moment, but resisted the temptation to cry out, mastering and riding the pain. Lily, of course, had told him it was always all right to scream under torture, because lost pride was worth less than lost life or limbs, but it had been a matter of pride for Harry to learn to resist pain without much of a pause. If someone used that curse on him in battle, then he needed to be able to accept it and still make his way to Connor's side.

The image faded. Harry realized his hand was clenched again, and the Many snake had slid from his neck to his arm. He shook his head, and turned his hand back along his arm to pet her. Dimly, he wondered why in the world the Ministry officials on the door hadn't demanded that he leave her behind in their care. He supposed they might have thought she was just a decorative necklace or band.

"Mr. Potter." Sapientian's voice came as if from far away, breaking and booming in on the silence that had filled his ears. "Will you tell the court how old you were in that image?"

Harry remembered. The memories were dangling in his mind, suspended like crystals in a glass of seawater. He took a deep breath. "Seven," he said.

Loud and angry sounds came from many of the onlookers around him. Harry closed his eyes and lowered his head to bury it against his arm. He knew it was an expression of weakness, but right now he didn't think that he could stand meeting the eyes that were looking at him.

"So your mother had you inflicting pain curses on yourself at seven years old?" Sapiention demanded.

Harry sat up. He could see now how Sapiention was trying to blur the lines, and he'd already known why. Make the Wizengamot think that it had been physical abuse, and he'd get an arrest more easily. But Harry was determined not to let him get away with that. If his mother was going to be imprisoned, then it had to be for what she'd actually done.

"It was my choice, sir," he said. "I knew that I needed training in enduring pain. So I chose to go the route of pain curses."

"Did your mother watch?" Sapiention asked.

"Some of the time," said Harry. "When the curse was a particularly bloody one, as that one was, she came up with a healing spell when I'd mastered the pain for a few minutes." He felt an emotion he couldn't even identify bubbling up in him like boiling water. He closed his eyes and tried to put a lid on it.

He didn't get the chance, because Sapiention was asking, "Mr. Potter, what would you have done had she encouraged your brother to use such curses on himself?"

"Damn it!" Harry winced when he realized that he'd said that aloud. He tried to hurry on before the stares coming at him could actively pierce him and force him not to continue. "I would have attacked her, of course. You saw my training. You know that she encouraged me to protect my brother."

“And if she had used such pain curses on another child?”

Harry made a deep, unhappy sound. The boiling emotion had got out of its pot and was flowing about him, making him feel sick and light-headed.

“Mr. Potter?” Sapiention’s voice had lost its steel. “Do you wish to stop?”

And then James and Lily will die.

Harry sat back up and shook his head. “I’m fine, Elder,” he said, even as he knew the pallor of his face and the shake in his voice belied that. “I can do this.”

“Please answer my question, then.” Sapiention was sounding as if he wished he had never asked it, which was at least something, Harry supposed.

“If she had used such pain curses on another child, I would have interfered,” said Harry. “I was taught that only the Dark Lord’s minions did such things. I would have thought that someone was using a glamour to appear as my mother, or perhaps Polyjuice. I knew about such things. I would have bound the offender down until my real mother could appear and reveal herself.”

“So your mother told you histories of the First War, and of You-Know-Who’s torturers?” Sapiention finished, turning another page.

“Yes.” Harry hoped they would follow this subject. He was sure that it was a less dangerous one.

Sapiention nodded. It was only a moment later that Harry realized the motion was more akin to a fishing bird spearing its prey. “So you would have considered the use of such pain curses on your brother and other children as harm, but not on yourself?”

Harry turned his head away. “I don’t think you really understand, Elder,” he said, with all the calm he could muster.

“Mr. Potter, I wish with all my heart to be wrong about this,” said Sapientian softly. “That is why we give abused children a chance to tell their own stories, because they know many things that none of us will understand, being outside those situations. But, without such speech from you, I am only stating what I see: that your mother taught you to believe yourself the exception to all the rules that normally govern children. You consider others as normal and would protect them from pain, but not yourself. It did not matter what you suffered, so long as it was in the cause of serving your brother. Is this correct?”

Harry knew he was a few inches from vomiting. And, damn it, his Occlumency pools were breaking apart. He just knew that he was going to cry or scream any moment. A particularly vicious rage had linked Sapientian’s words to what Vera had told him last year, that he thought of himself as less than human, and was now suggesting, with a force and clarity Harry had never seen before, that his mother was the source of that attitude, that she was the reason he didn’t think of himself as human, and that that was wrong.

Harry could feel his calmness slipping away, but more, he could sense his commitment to defending his parents slipping away. If the interrogation continued, he thought, with numb horror, he was likely to say evil things about them, things that would prejudice the court against them and confirm his worst fears.

“Elder,” he said, when he thought he had control of his voice. It still wavered and cracked.

“Yes, Mr. Potter?”

“I’m sorry, but I don’t think I can continue,” said Harry. He had to get out of the courtroom, and now. He wasn’t really worried about his anger destroying anyone there, but the rage had gathered its strength, whispering that he had a perfect right to testify against his parents and try to condemn them if he wanted. If he stayed, then the rage would make sure it destroyed Lily and James, not by lashing out with magic, but by speaking with his voice.

“Very well, Mr. Potter.” Sapiention’s voice was filled with respect. It made Harry want to laugh hysterically. Would he respect me if he knew the reason I’m ending the interrogation now? “The doors by which you entered are unlocked now. Please go to them. Ministry Aurors will escort you to your guardian.”

Harry stood up hastily, keeping his head bowed as he strode to the doors. His eyes were blurred, and the Many snake was hissing and sliding up and down his arm, but it was done.

Even if you didn’t save them. Even if, in fact, you’ve condemned them to death with your behavior.

The Auror named Wilmot who’d escorted him into the Ministry was waiting for him. He gently placed a hand on Harry’s shoulder when he would have turned blindly up the wrong corridor, and murmured, “This way, Mr. Potter.”

Harry let himself be guided. He didn’t know what to think of, what to want. When he reached Snape, he knew he wouldn’t have repaired his mask sufficiently. Snape would insist on comforting him, probably talking to him, maybe giving him a sleeping draught. Harry knew that he needed to stay awake and recover, though. They were bringing his parents into the courtroom next. He needed to return and see them.

“You will always have people at your back, Mr. Potter.”

Harry glanced back at Wilmot, thinking that maybe this was a threat, perhaps from Voldemort. He would welcome the distraction of fighting for his life at this point. He thought it was easier for him than what he’d gone through in the courtroom.

But Wilmot was smiling at him, and he reached up and touched his eyes. Harry blinked as he removed the lenses that must have been covering them, and revealed amber eyes under the normal-looking hazel.

“You’re—“ Harry whispered.

"A werewolf, yes." Wilmot kept his voice low and soothing. "One who considers you vates, and who is therefore on your side." He paused and tilted his head. "I trust that you won't reveal me."

Harry shook his head in a daze. He couldn't imagine how a werewolf had managed to get and keep a Ministry job under Scrimgeour, but there it was. He could hardly betray him. Scrimgeour would sack him immediately. The anti-werewolf laws said that no lycanthrope could hold a paying job.

Wilmot winked at him, and returned the lenses to his eyes. "Someday," he said, "when all of this is past, I will introduce you to the London werewolves and the other refugees who have formed the packs. All of us think you're the most interesting thing that's happened for werewolves in generations, and the best chance."

Harry nodded. And perhaps Wilmot had known this, and perhaps he hadn't, but the reminder of the larger life Harry led outside the courtroom was working. He felt as if he were walking more steadily on his feet, and his breathing was calmer.

"Harry."

And there was Snape, hastening to meet him. Wilmot stepped back with a little bow, and Harry found himself ensconced in Snape's embrace. It said something about how worried he was, Harry knew, that he was hugging him in front of a complete stranger.

"Come with me," Snape whispered into Harry's ear. "I think you need a few hours away from the court, and then—"

"I can't," said Harry, yanking at his arms now. "They're bringing in Lily next."

Snape stared down at him with fathomless dark eyes. "And do you really think that you're strong enough to face seeing her?"

Harry turned his head away. "That's not the point," he said, knowing his voice sounded as harsh as the croak of a desert bird. "I have to know what she says. I can't miss a single moment of this trial."

“Harry,” said Snape, softly now. “Isn’t your mental health more important than what happens to your parents?”

“How can you say that?” Harry glared at him. “It’s my mental health compared to someone else’s life and freedom we’re talking about.”

“Someone else is always the key,” said Snape, as if he were talking to himself, but he held up his hand when Harry started to protest. “We will go back inside,” he said. “But the moment you start to hurt too badly, Harry, I will remove you from the court. And that is hurting in my estimation, not yours.”

Harry swallowed and began working on his emotions, tucking them away into his Occlumency pools again. He’d failed once. He had no excuse for failing a second time. At the very least, if his mother were going to be condemned, he wanted to be there to act as a witness.

Why couldn’t I have held strong? It would have been so simple. It seemed so simple when I was entering the Ministry.

He carefully ignored the rage that sat in the center of him now like a great crab, and gripped the idea that Lily had made him think of himself as a tool like a revelation. He ignored, even more carefully, the ripples that that idea was sending through him, what old assumptions it was smashing, what holes it was ripping in his defenses that there were just barriers of a special kind between him and other people.

Perhaps, by the end of it, he would see that he did deserve the same kind of consideration as others, and that terrified him for what it would mean.

But he was not going to think about that right now. He walked up to the galleries of the courtroom, Snape’s arm tight and warm around his shoulders, and just as they entered, he saw the Aurors bring his mother out.

Chapter Forty-Two: Forgive Us Our Virtues

Lily had been gazing out the windows of her cell—which she knew were fake, since the Ministry was underground—for long hours when the Aurors came to fetch her. Currently, the windows showed a lake scene not dissimilar to the one at Hogwarts, lashed with rain. The sky was only cloudy in one place, though. In others, pale autumn or wintry sunlight shone through, licking at the bellies of the clouds with golden tongues and touching Lily's heart like hope.

She had cried herself to sleep last night, and then she had sat up this morning with a gasp, as she remembered that today was the trial which might end her life. Then she sank back, trembling, against the pillow, and closed her eyes weakly. Her hands clenched and closed convulsively around each other.

But that was this morning. Now was the time just before the Aurors had warned her she was going to be fetched to the courtroom, and Lily had cried herself out, and put herself into a rudimentary state of hope, like the sun shining through the clouds.

A perfunctory knock sounded at the door, accompanying the falling of the wards. "Potter? Come on."

Lily kept her face as blank as possible as the Aurors came in. Of course they had sent the two who were nastiest to her outside of Mallory herself: Dawlish and Proudfoot. Dawlish had survived Scrimgeour's purge of the Aurors in spite of his loyalty to Fudge. He apparently loved the Ministry more, and had accustomed himself to the new Minister. And Proudfoot was simply impossible to get along with, as Lily had found. He foamed and snapped even when she was polite to him. He had been a Hufflepuff, and seemed to disdain sacrificing any family member, even if she'd done it for the good of the world.

"On your feet, Potter," Dawlish said when she didn't stand up right away, and then nudged her in the back with his wand. He was so efficient, which was the most intolerable thing about him. He acted as if he didn't care that she might die today. "The Wizengamot's waiting for you."

Proudfoot didn't speak, but gave her the glare he'd perfected over the last few days. Lily tried not to let it get to her as she moved to the door. She did look back one more time, to catch a glimpse of the sunlight out the enchanted windows, and to remember her plan.

Training Harry to value forgiveness as much as they had had been part of Albus's suggestion to make him the perfect diplomat for Connor. He had to be able to forgive Death Eaters and others whose pasts had been questionable if he wanted to lure Dark families to the side of the Light. And, as Albus had explained to her only once, because of course what they had done was not wrong, the training would also make it easier for Harry to forgive them if someone ever found out about his childhood and tried to convince him that they'd done something terrible.

"He will be incapable of condemning you, Lily, no matter what happens." Albus's voice throbbed in her ears, soft and reassuring, as she trod the path to the courtrooms. Dawlish paused along the way to spell fetters onto her wrists, when Proudfoot reminded him to do it. "We need no magical coercion to insure that. Spells can be broken. Psychological patterns take a good deal more effort. He will love you, and forgive you, if you come to the point where everyone else condemns you. You never should—it is my hope that one day everyone will know how we have trained Harry, and honor his contribution to the good of our world—but someone might yet break through the secrecy and think they should interfere with what they don't understand. No one outside Godric's Hollow save me can ever truly comprehend what you have gone through, Lily. Should they bring the force of that incomprehension down upon you, do not despair, so long as Harry is still alive. He should come for you. He should free you."

Lily let those words repeat in her mind over and over, and by the time they reached the courtroom, she had heard them three times, and she believed them as much as she ever had. She waited patiently while the doors swung open, and Dawlish and Proudfoot guided her to the prisoner's chair. Of course, chains came up at once to circle her arms and legs, and it seemed that Madam Amelia Bones, who'd stared at her coldly the whole time during her initial interrogation, was going to be leading the questioning.

It is all right. Their harsh treatment does not matter. Is Harry here?

Her eyes caught a movement near the door in the visitors' gallery above, and she smiled slightly as she saw Harry coming in. She would have known her son's stride anywhere.

As Madam Bones told people to take their places, thanked Dawlish and Proudfoot roughly, and then moved to begin the questioning, Lily settled back. Harry has magic powerful enough to destroy the courtroom if he wants—certainly powerful enough to break my chains and free me, and keep me safe from anyone who might try to come after me. I need only remind him of that.

Harry could see his mother intensely well. He'd created a small window in his palm, as he had before, so that he could view what happened on the floor of the courtroom without craning his neck. Lily was sitting almost comfortably in the chair, her head tilted back so that she could watch the galleries. Harry thought she'd seen him, though he sat far enough behind the balcony railing that that should have been impossible, and Snape's presence at his side would tend to obscure him even more.

It doesn't matter. We could always tell each other's presence in a room. Why should that have changed?

Harry could feel his breath racing in and out of his lungs, and he was almost glad not to have two hands now, or he would be continually wiping one free of sweat. As it was, he settled back in his seat, ignoring the stare Snape fixed on him, and regarded the window in his palm.

Lily looked paler than normal, and the circles under her green eyes were pronounced. Harry swallowed. I don't think this is about to get any easier for her. He wished he could go down to her, but he didn't think the Wizengamot would permit him to do so.

Besides, Snape would probably zap him into immobility and force Sleeping Draughts down his throat if he tried anything like that.

“Lily Evans Potter.” Madam Bones’s voice trembled with disgust as she spoke. Harry wondered why they had to have her lead the questioning. Why not someone else? The thought that Madam Bones was the least prejudiced person on the Wizengamot where this case was concerned hurt, and made his hopes for his parents’ future sink lower. “You are on trial for the abuse of your son Harry Potter, mentally and emotionally, and, indirectly, through magic. Do you deny the charges?”

“I do,” Harry heard his mother’s voice say, strong and lovely and prouder than he would have thought it could be. She sounded as if she were speaking the way she had once spoken to him of war and sacrifice, but this time the whole world could hear. She might finally have an audience worthy of the grand truths she was speaking, Harry thought. Yes, what she had done about those truths was wrong, but they still deserved to be heard. “I did not abuse him. I trained him to survive the war with Lord Voldemort—” the collective flinch Harry found so silly “—and I trained him to be his own person, devoted to his brother, ignoring the lies of the outside world. My training did not work, but I do not regret what I have done.”

Harry shifted around. He had wondered if his mother would repeat the regrets she’d expressed in her letters to him: that she would have trained him differently if she had known that he was the one who reflected Voldemort’s Killing Curse. But she seemed to have decided, even as he had, that it would do no good for the truth of the prophecy to get back to their enemy. She would speak as if the version of the prophecy she had believed for thirteen years was the true one, then. Something in Harry unclenched and relaxed.

“There is a Pensieve memory I wish to show,” said Madam Bones, and flicked her wand through the Pensieve on the stand before her. Harry watched as droplets arched over the railing, and then watched them in his window as they coalesced. He knew that the memory should probably still have been invisible to anyone but the Wizengamot and Lily, but he reached out with an effort of will, and broke the simple ward that kept him from seeing it.

It was a surprisingly ordinary memory to choose, really. Lily was testing him; he was about eight years old in the scene, Harry thought, and it was during the two months she had had him go without touching anyone, to get him used to the lonely life he would have to lead. She sat in a chair in the main room of the house at Godric's Hollow, reading, and he sat next to her on a stool, with a book on defensive magic in his hands.

They were only a few inches parted. He could reach out and touch her if he wanted to.

That had been the test, Harry remembered. Lily had seen him avoid casual brushes of the hand from Sirius and Remus and Connor with satisfaction; she had seen the way he avoided coming to her for a good-night hug. Now she wanted to see what he would do with temptation right in front of him.

Harry could make out the fine tremors in his own body. It had been surprisingly hard, harder than he thought it should be with as secretive as he had already been, to simply ignore the impulse to touch someone. It would have made him feel better, though, as Lily had pointed out many times, that was an indulgence he couldn't afford, just doing things to feel better. His life was given over to a greater purpose.

Harry remembered this memory. He knew what came next. He winced—not because of what would happen, but because of how he knew the court was going to take it.

His younger self broke and reached out to touch his mother's knee. Lily moved at once. She'd been waiting for that, Harry remembered, though her gaze had seemed to be on her book the whole time.

Younger-Harry lowered his eyes at once, the way he'd always done when he displeased his mother.

"Harry." Lily's voice was a whip. "Look at me."

He looked up at her. Lily shook her head at him.

"You need to learn more control," she said softly. "What will happen if you give in to that same carelessness around a Death Eater? You could be killed, Harry, with just a cut from a knife or a simple curse from a wand. It wouldn't have to travel very far. And then what would Connor do?"

Younger-Harry swallowed, and then said, "But you're not a Death Eater." Older-Harry thought it a feeble argument, all these years later. Of course, he'd had those impulses he still didn't understand, unable to think why someone else human under his hands would feel so good.

"No," said Lily, "but neither will the other children in Gryffindor House be, and they could still trap you and distract you. What would happen if you were being hugged, and couldn't make it to Connor's side on time? What would happen if a friend snagged your hand when you are about to charge into battle, insisting that you couldn't jump between him and a curse, and he died? What then, Harry?"

Younger-Harry shrank. Older-Harry closed his eyes. He could hear the Wizengamot making noises of outrage. Madam Bones knew what she was doing when she chose this memory, all right. Damnit. I wish they were using Draco's enhanced Pensieve spell. Then they'd know why she was doing this. They'd be able to understand it much better.

"The world would fall," Younger-Harry whispered.

"That's right." Older-Harry opened his eyes to see Memory-Lily nod at his hand. "No touching, Harry. I know this is a hard lesson, but it's just one of many you'll have to learn. And it doesn't really hurt as much as a curse, does it?" She flashed him a smile, and Younger-Harry smiled back. It had been one of the rare evenings when Sirius, Remus, James, and Connor were all out playing on the lawn, and so Harry and Lily could speak freely of the secret they shared.

"That's right," he said.

"Good boy," said Lily, and climbed back onto her chair. Younger-Harry directed his attention to the book, determined not to break faith again. And he hadn't, Harry remembered, with a feeling like a band of fire circling his chest. Seven weeks more that test had lasted, and he hadn't broken once.

The memory faded. Madam Bones began digging around in her papers. Harry started as someone brushed his arm, and so strong were the impressions the image had left on him that he flinched away before he thought, not wanting to be touched.

He turned to see Snape staring hard at him. Harry dropped his eyes. When Snape was concentrating hard enough, he could use Legilimency just from a gaze. Harry didn't want his emotions read right now.

"I think we should leave," said Snape.

"No," Harry whispered back, proud to hear how stern his voice was, for all its low volume. "I want to know what happens."

"You can get that from a report later," Snape said, leaning nearer as Madam Bones briefly looked up to glare at the talkers in the audience. "I meant what I said, Harry. Your mental health is not to be damaged any further. You will come with me if I think you are hurting."

"And I'm not hurting yet," Harry flared, and then looked pointedly away from Snape as Madam Bones began to ask the first of her questions.

"Reports from Madam Shiverwood of the Department of Magical Family and Child Services indicate that all children need to be touched regularly, or their growth is damaged," said Madam Bones, a stern rasp in her voice. "This is even more essential for wizard children than for Muggle children, as their magic needs to seek out the companionship of similar power, and learn to stay under a child's skin so that accidental magic stops happening. Given that, Mrs. Potter, will you really say that teaching your son to avoid touch was not abuse?"

"Harry had learned how to handle his magic from a very young age," said Lily calmly. Harry was glad that she could be calm. The most peculiar shaking had taken up residence in his shoulders. "It was a part of his training. He did not need the contact for the same reason that other wizard children do."

Snape was making a growling sound beside Harry. Harry looked at his guardian's face, and quickly away again. Seeing such blank, vicious hatred there made it easy to remember the Death Eater Snape had been.

"So you deny that it was abuse?" Madam Bones clarified.

"I do," said Lily. "I did what I had to do to save the world. I made decisions that no one else but Albus Dumbledore has ever made. You have no right to put me on trial for this," she added unexpectedly, rising as much to her feet as the chains would allow her and sweeping her gaze across the courtroom. Harry shivered as her eyes passed across him. "None of you would have done as much. All of you would have huddled in bed while Voldemort came for you, if my sons had not borne the burden."

Probably true, Harry thought.

"Sit down, Mrs. Potter." Madam Bones's voice was flat. She waited until Lily had obeyed, then said, "Another memory."

This time, the memory that was chosen made Harry sit back hard in his chair. Merlin damn it, not this one! They're all going to think they have the right to put her to death, after this one.

He was nine, practicing wandless magic. Lily stood in the background, patiently waiting for him to finish. When he turned around again, she beckoned. Harry watched his younger self's image approach her and look up into her face. He envied, bitterly, the calmness of his own green eyes. There were times I was able to do that without Occlumency. When did they end?

"Harry, we will continue your training in chocolate today," said Lily. She unwrapped a Chocolate Frog. It immediately tried to leap out of her hand, but she held it still, slightly squashing one of its legs in the process; it had been a summer day, and the sweet was already starting to melt. "Indicate when you are ready to me."

Younger-Harry closed his eyes and took several deep breaths. Then he nodded and held out a hand.

Lily gave him the chocolate. Harry popped it into his mouth, chewing slowly. Then he murmured the spell that Lily had taught him for the sense of taste. "Acerbitas in vicem mel."

A moment later, he winced as bitterness flooded his tongue in place of the sweetness. The spell was only physical, however, and wouldn't complete his training without an added psychological pattern to back it up. Younger-Harry knew that by then, and Older-Harry watched as he applied it. In Harry as he was now, of course, the training had made the reaction impulse, without the need for a spell.

"What are you thinking of, Harry?" whispered Lily.

"Connor in danger," said Younger-Harry, and then whispered, "Adligo memoriam."

With no more than that, the idea of his brother in danger was bound to the bitterness, the memory working with the physical sense. More training would be needed, but in the end, it would insure that Harry never became lost in a physical sensation of sweetness, never entirely forgot his awareness of the world around him. Steel cords of perception would pull him up when he did.

Harry shuddered as the memory vanished, and he found himself pulled against Snape, his hair being stroked slowly. He tugged himself free at once, feeling the need to be away, on his own, free. The air away from his guardian seemed sweeter, and he breathed it gently, again avoiding Snape's eyes.

"Do you deny that you trained your son to be afraid of good physical sensations?" Madam Bones asked then.

"I don't deny that," said Lily. "I don't deny any of the accusations that you are going to level at me today, Amelia—may I call you Amelia?"

What I deny is the reasoning behind them. I did not wantonly abuse my son for the sake of abusing him. I did what I did for the good of the world. Were he not sculpted into Connor's powerful guardian, Harry would have followed one of two courses: not playing his part in the prophecy, or becoming a Dark Lord."

Harry had not actually known it would be so hard to hear her speaking those words. He curled into his chair, around his hand, watching as Lily glared with steady green eyes at Madam Bones, and raised a small barrier that stopped Snape's attempt to embrace him.

"What in your son's behavior convinced you that he could become a Dark Lord?" Madam Bones asked.

Oh, no, don't ask that, please don't ask that... everyone's going to know now...

"The fact that his magic was so powerful," Lily answered without hesitation. "That would be one part of it. If he could make things Vanish without even noticing it, then why shouldn't he make someone Vanish when they annoyed him? And, too, there was the sensation of his magic. I could only compare it to dog vomit. There were times it stank like rotting flesh, however. That was the major purpose of the phoenix web, to save and cleanse his magic, and, by extension, save Harry. He was made unnatural by Voldemort's attack. After it, his magic was stronger than it had been before. We had to restrain him, and we had to make him into someone who could serve and save the world, not just take from it."

At least she stopped short of telling them that I'm Voldemort's magical heir, Harry thought. He was panting, sweating, dizzy. Snape had struck a fist on the outside of the barrier, but Harry didn't look at him. His eyes were on his mother, and she was the only important thing in the world.

"Mrs. Potter, do you know what you are saying about your own son?" Madam Bones sounded disbelieving.

That's right, said the crab-rage in Harry's head, and pinched him with sharp pincers. She has no right to say those things about you. She said them once before, and they were wrong then. They are wrong now.

“I know it perfectly well,” said Lily fiercely. “I lived in the same house with him for eleven years. I knew what he was.” Abruptly, her voice softened. “And I knew what he could become, what he might be with the phoenix web on his magic and the proper training. Someone wise and good, self-sacrificing, who could give up his life to save his brother and never think twice of it. Such selflessness is not innate to everyone. I knew there had to be good in Harry, or we could not have trained him the way we did.

“And I now know that he’ll save me if I ask, because I was the person who trained him in the ways of goodness, and he would never give up his mother, not really.” Her gaze turned in the direction of the balcony where he sat, and Harry knew she had seen him come in after all. “Harry? Will you stand and speak a word for your mother?”

“Don’t you dare,” said Snape, with a precision that he normally saved for describing mistakes in Potions.

Harry ignored him. His body no longer seemed entirely his to control. Images of the past were flashing near his eyes, and the conflicting impulses played round and round in his head. As he stood and went to the edge of the balcony railing, he imagined his mother proud, radiant, walking free of the courtroom without her chains. She would smile at him. She would call him a good boy. She had said that he could be good. She didn’t believe he was all evil.

Chasing the beautiful imaginings were the dark ones, the rage that said she didn’t deserve to live, that she had hurt him, that he had every right, according to the pureblood dances she had made him learn, to grasp and crush her life.

He did not know which impulse would overtake him when he looked over the balcony railing, but he knew he had to look.

He looked down, and met his mother’s eyes. He had no need for the window. Despite the distance between them, he knew he was meeting them, and he knew every detail of the clear green so well that it was as if she had levitated up in front of him.

“This is irregular,” said Madam Bones, sounding as if her outrage had half-choked her. “Mrs. Potter, sit down. Mr. Potter, sit down. I am leading the questioning, and—“

Lily ignored her, lifting one of her arms in a sweet, sweeping gesture that her manacles abruptly brought to a halt. “Harry,” she said softly. “My dear boy. You know I’ve loved you. You know I’ve taught you everything that’s made it possible for you to survive and prosper for so long. I’ve paid in return, given up my magic to your vengeance and my freedom to this world that doesn’t understand. Don’t you want to see me free? You could do it, you know. You’re strong enough. You could break my chains, and you could reach into the Ministry and free your father, and then we could go together to the house in Godric’s Hollow and have the idyll we should have had. This time, son, I promise you I’ll show you my love in ways you can recognize. I didn’t know you were that desperate for a family, Harry, for a life somewhat more like what other people call normal, but this time I promise you’ll get it.”

The world spun faster and faster, becoming a maelstrom. Harry didn’t know which was stronger, the love or the hatred. He could imagine her chains shattering. He could imagine her throat crushed. He breathed, hard, and moment after moment passed without his making a decision. Madam Bones was calling for order, but her voice seemed faint and far away—and so did the sounds of another person forcing their way through the packed bodies towards him, at least until that person finally spoke.

“Harry.”

He turned his head. Draco was standing there, as close as the barrier Harry had raised would permit, even closer than Snape, his hands out and braced on the empty air holding him away from Harry. His eyes were gray, and somehow that color, even more present and clear than the green of his mother’s, grounded Harry, anchored him, made him listen as Draco spoke.

"I can feel your emotions," Draco whispered. "My empathy isn't that strong anymore, but it's strong enough for this. That's what you were afraid to tell me, wasn't it? What you wouldn't share in the Pensieve with me yesterday. My Harry. I'm so sorry. I might have guessed. You've always been afraid of every emotion in yourself but the ones she taught you to feel. But I can feel your hatred, like an icy wind blowing on my face, and I don't fear it, Harry. And I feel your anger, like heat across my skin, and I rejoice in it. She's not worth your destroying the courtroom or taking her life, not worth the guilt you would feel afterwards. You're worth much more than that, much more than what she's causing you to feel right now." He took a step back, but only enough so that he could hold out one hand. His eyes never wavered. "Come to me, Harry."

Harry felt the rage and the love and the hatred and the guilt yaw, and dip, and pitch, and turn. He wanted, still, to free his mother, and he wanted to slaughter her. Those two visions, warm smiling Lily and dead sprawled Lily, dueled for and claimed dominance of his sight.

Then he realized there was another impulse stronger than either of them, and that was the impulse to be just taken away somewhere, and held, so that he didn't have to think about this.

He let out a loud sob, and dropped the barrier. Draco didn't seem to move as he crossed the intervening space, looping his arms tightly around Harry's waist and holding him close.

Harry lowered his head, trying desperately to hide the tears. He didn't want to be a child, didn't want to be so young, he had faced harder trials than this and come through intact, he didn't want—

"It's all right," said Draco, and his voice still held no fear, only crooning triumph. "You can weep."

And the rage won, sort of. It turned the memories Harry had seen today sideways, so that he had to look at them and hate them instead of vibrating in sympathy with Lily's training. That made him decide to fight the sympathy, to touch people instead of hold them back, and he clasped his own arms around Draco's waist in return, squeezing so tightly that Draco took in a little gasping breath, burying his head in Draco's shoulder.

Madam Bones called for a halt in the trial. Harry felt himself half-carried, half-supported by Draco and Snape out of the courtroom. He kept his face bowed, and wondered where they were going.

But during that time, the tears forced their way past his eyelids and down his cheeks. When Draco lowered him gently into a bed in Merlin-knew-what part of the Ministry, his face was already hard and hurtful with crying. Harry tried to roll over, putting one arm up around his eyes, but Draco was there with him in an instant, forcing the arm away.

"Not this time," he said, and held Harry close, but open, so that he had to bury his face in cloth and flesh if he was going to bury it anywhere.

Harry hesitated, and then his emotions forced him past the hesitation, and he began to cry once more. Part of him despised himself for needing this, but the need was too great to be halted. Training and memories gave way to what Harry supposed he could call instincts. He didn't think that Voldemort Apparating into the room could have pried him away from Draco in that instant.

He laid his head down and wept, in grief and rage and hatred and sheer relief that someone else knew what he was actually feeling. Snape waited until Harry's tears had finally stopped, and he'd worn himself out with crying. He had several potions to induce either sleep or calm in his pockets, but when Draco gently laid Harry down on the bed in this small antechamber for the witnesses, and then curled up with him, Snape saw they weren't necessary. Harry had simply fallen asleep from his weariness. His hand clutched Draco's robes, and his handless arm curved around him with ferocious determination. To give Draco his due, he was holding back with scarcely less determination.

"Will you be all right?" he asked Draco. "I must go back to the courtroom and begin my testimony soon. I am the first of the witnesses for the prosecution."

Draco arranged Harry so that his cheek lay on top of Harry's hair, and then closed his own eyes. "We'll be fine," he said, the fierce, possessive joy in his voice as good as a Calming Draught to Snape's ears after Harry's helpless sobs. "He's past the worst of it, I think. He's not to come into contact with that bitch again." That was said very casually, as if the insult were actually Lily Potter's name.

"He will not," said Snape softly, and wound up pulling out the potions after all and laying them on the table beside the bed. "Only use these if he needs them. The blue ones to relax him. The dark one is Dreamless Sleep, and the silver one will induce a lighter doze."

"I know that," said Draco, and rolled his eyes at him. "I am actually a good Potions student, sir."

Snape scowled at him, to keep in practice, and then left the antechamber for the courtroom again. The last thing he saw of the two boys was Draco apparently attempting to arrange Harry so that no part of Harry's body touched the bed.

Snape shut his concern up in an Occlumency pool. Harry was safely out of the courtroom, where he should have been in the first place, and beyond his mother's manipulations. That meant Snape didn't have to worry about him until such time as he came to and insisted on returning, or unless Lily managed to break free and find him.

Neither of those things will be happening.

With the concern shut up, his rage came back, a cold black boulder, and sat in him, and grew, until he was filled with frozen stone.

He had just reentered the courtroom when he heard a roar, and then several loud and frightened cries. He hastened to the balcony railing and peered over it, staring at the enormous lioness in the center of the floor. She was prowling towards the prisoner's chair, her fangs bared. Lily Potter had shrunk back in the chair, having lost her defiant manner of a few minutes before, and shook.

Snape knew who it must be: one of the puellaris witches. Since Elfrida Bulstrode had not attended the trial, fearing, rightly, that she would transform when she saw Lily, this left Laura Gloryflower.

A few Aurors had hastened up, but their spells seemed to bounce from the lioness; Snape knew the puellaris witches had nearly the magic resistance of werewolves in this form. Of course, there was also the fact that the Aurors didn't seem to be trying. Perhaps they wanted the woman to be hurt.

Snape took a deep breath, cast Sonorus on himself, and leaned over the balcony. "Gloryflower!" he cried.

The lioness turned and looked up at him, with green eyes whose fire he felt from here. It was nothing compared to being looked at by Harry, but still he winced. Harry was power in its wildest form, pure and dangerous; he might do anything. The lioness was far more straightforward. She could do less, but a single swipe of her claws or teeth and a wizard was still dead. Harry had more mercy.

"Harry is safe now," Snape made himself say, little as he liked exposing his ward's state of mind to the court. Harry would be more devastated if he found Gloryflower had killed his mother than if he found more of his emotions had been exposed in public. "He will recover. His mother will not speak to him that way again, because she will never see him again. Please, calm down. Let the Wizengamot dispense justice."

The lioness's tail twitched, twice. Then she turned and stalked towards the prisoner's chair again, ignoring the more serious spells the Aurors fired at her.

Snape held his breath, but still hoped he might succeed. And he had, he saw. The lioness leaned near enough to Lily to take her head off and roared, a blast of breath that Snape could only surmise felt hot and meaty, from the expression on Lily's face. Her jaws snapped once, a reminder, and then she turned and stalked away.

Lily fainted.

The Aurors shut their gaping mouths and hurried to remove the prisoner from the chair. The lioness waited, making it clear that she intended to escort them back to the cells. Wisely, no one made an issue of it, and Madam Bones resumed the moment the Aurors, the prisoner, and their unusual honor guard were gone.

James Potter came in next.

Snape felt his hatred spread and increase throughout his being with the force of hammer blows. He had hated this man for a very long time now, since the day he had tried to get Snape killed by a werewolf and rescued him only at the last moment, but that was nothing next to what he felt for what James had done to his son. He could have stopped Lily. He could have opened his eyes and seen what she was doing. Harry might have suffered years less of abuse than he had. But James had not done those things, and Harry was someone who still thought his emotions were evil and had to be fought with and contained alone, someone who flinched from being touched and couldn't accept himself as human.

And James was not the cause of it, no, but he was one of the reasons it was not stopped.

"James Potter," said Madam Bones, when he was seated. Snape stared steadily at him all the while, hating. James just looked as arrogant as he always did. "You are accused of the neglect of your son, Harry Potter—"

"That's not true," James quickly responded. Snape clenched his fists to keep himself from going for his wand. His wandless magic coiled around him and whispered interesting things. He kept that still and away from choking James's life out with an effort.

"I assure you, it is true that you are charged with neglect." Madam Bones sounded cranky. Snape couldn't blame her. She had hardly been neutral in the first place, and then to have the constant interruptions in the trial proceedings would have tried the patience of a Demiguise. And then to see Lily importuning Harry...

Snape calmed himself before something unfortunate could happen, and reminded himself his turn at testimony would come, and that James Potter would not really look better as six different sets of Potions ingredients, ready-harvested.

"That's not what I meant," said James. "I mean that it's not true I ever neglected Harry."

The arm of Snape's chair exploded. His magic circled him like a trailing serpent, the first time it had ever done so, and tried to slither under the balcony railing and into the main courtroom space. Snape restrained it with difficulty.

"We have memories and notes that say otherwise," said Madam Bones, but she had allowed a note of curiosity to creep into her voice. "Why do you think you never did, Mr. Potter?"

"Because I didn't know what was happening!" James threw his arms up in the air, but the chains tightened and stopped the gesture. "That's the truth. I never knew Lily had trained Harry the way she did."

"Ten years in the same house while the training happened, and you never knew?" Madam Bones questioned in disbelief. "Are you blind or stupid, Mr. Potter?"

Some of the audience members laughed at that, and Snape's magic tightened around his ankles in wicked amusement. He suspected that Lily had sealed her fate with her little plea to Harry, and tipped the sympathy of the audience, if not the Wizengamot, firmly to his ward's side. James would not find it easy to get out of this now, though Snape suspected he would avoid death.

"Neither," said James in annoyance, flushing. "And the lead questioner isn't supposed to insult the victims, Madam Bones. I read about that," he added defiantly.

Madam Bones leaned forward, and her voice got quieter. "You are a defendant, not a victim of child abuse, you stupid, stupid man," she said. "It was stupidity, and not blindness, then." She pretended to write that down, while more of the courtroom snickered. Snape was glad that Harry was gone now. He undoubtedly would have been horrified, and convinced that James wasn't getting a fair trial. He wasn't, of course, but very few trials in the Wizengamot courtroom were fair—neither of Snape's own had been—and this was far more fun. It was time that James paid in at least a little humiliation for the treatment he'd given Harry.

"I resent this," said James, trying to hold himself in and use that cultured voice Snape remembered from school, the one that got people to follow along and do whatever Perfect Potter wanted them to do. "I resent it greatly. You are making me a laughingstock, Madam Bones."

"No, you're doing that quite neatly on your own," said Madam Bones, inspiring another round of chuckles. "Now, Mr. Potter. You claim you noticed nothing during your son's childhood, which we'll define here as the time before he started Hogwarts. And afterwards? The notes we have state that you became aware of Harry's abuse during his second year at school. That would have been while he was twelve. And yet, you did nothing?"

"Lily told me the truth, then," said James. "That what she did was for the greater good of the world. She convinced me Harry was a sacrifice, and that visiting him or trying to change his situation would just increase our emotional ties to him, which wasn't good, since he was destined to die in the War."

Snape felt his amusement cool quickly and turn to disgust again. His magic whispered in his ear, mentioning that he could use chopped human liver for his Dragon-Calming Potion. Snape told it to go hang.

Madam Bones didn't sound impressed, either. "And what happened when your wife was stripped of her magic? Our records indicate that you left the house at Godric's Hollow then, and went to the Potter family home in Lux Aeterna. Why did you not divorce your wife and strive to protect your sons, when you had put distance between yourself and Mrs. Potter?”

“I—” James sighed. “This is complicated,” he said, with another expression Snape remembered from Hogwarts, one that spoke of his readiness to spin a wild tale to try and protect himself from the consequences of his own actions. “You see, I still loved Lily. I love her even now. I had to learn to love Harry. And she hadn’t been abusing Connor, not really. So I just needed a little time to get used to the idea.”

“You had more than a year,” said Madam Bones. “And still, you made no significant progress in protecting your son.”

“He didn’t need it then,” said James crossly, flushing. “He didn’t see her most of the time.”

“But Albus Dumbledore played a part in his life, and he continued his abuse of your son,” said Madam Bones. “And you still made no attempt to charge him or your wife with child abuse, or even go to a private Healer from St. Mungo’s and insure that the damage to Harry’s mind was undone. All in all, you seemed content to pretend that it had never happened, until the night you were arrested for neglect, when Minister Scrimgeour reports verbal abuse of your son, as in your blaming him for your arrest. Why, Mr. Potter?”

“All of this is more complicated than you can possibly understand!” James retorted.

“Then explain it to us, Mr. Potter.” Snape could hear the steady tap of Madam Bones’s fingernails as she struck her lectern. “We are gathered here to hear your side of the story. As there are no witnesses for the defense, you may have all the time you like.”

James visibly swallowed once or twice. Snape felt some of his anger melt and turn into satisfaction. Do you feel the rope coiling around your neck, Potter? Not that they’d literally hang you, but you can’t run anymore, can’t find an excuse they’ll believe. How does it feel, to know that the world that once supported you and that bitch of a wife of yours as good parents now stands on Harry’s side?

"I was upset," James muttered at last. The acoustics of the chamber made sure he was heard. James looked as if he wished otherwise. "I did blame Harry. I shouldn't have. That wasn't verbal abuse, just a slip of the tongue."

"Then explain the rest, Mr. Potter," said Madam Bones at once. "Your not seeking help for Harry. Your not turning in his abusers. What of that?"

"They were my wife and my mentor, one of the greatest wizards who's ever lived," said James. "Would you have turned them in, Madam Bones?"

"Yes."

Her resolute word seemed to shrink James, who looked about as if for help. Snape didn't know if he'd actually seen him, or only surmised he must be in the courtroom, but James's eyes narrowed abruptly, and he looked up at Madam Bones with new confidence.

"Severus Snape brought these charges," he said. "The man hates me. He's animated against me by a schoolboy rivalry that he should have let drop a long time ago. Put him under Veritaserum. He'll tell you that's the truth."

Madam Bones shook her head slowly, mockingly. "Not so, Mr. Potter," she said. "Professor Snape filed the original charges, but we have received corroboration from a number of sources, too much evidence to dismiss. Now, I will ask you again. Why didn't you turn in your son's abusers?"

James shrank in on himself, and then a sullen expression settled on his face. He didn't answer.

"Mr. Potter?"

Still no answer.

Madam Bones clucked her tongue sharply. "Does the defendant wish to say anything else?" When James remained quiet, she nodded to the Aurors to remove him, and then looked up at Snape. "First victim for the prosecution's side of the case, please step forward."

Snape walked towards the stairs that would take him to the courtroom proper, just barely remembering to take the Sonorus charm off his voice so he wouldn't shout everywhere. His magic flowed with him, making him shiver. It did try to snap at James, but Snape kicked it back under control. He took the chair made for Harry, and at once it adjusted to his spine, molding itself comfortably around him. An improvement from the last time he'd been in this position, Snape had to admit as he looked up at Madam Bones.

"Professor Severus Snape," Madam Bones began. "You are Harry Potter's guardian?"

"I am," said Snape. Not that he always acknowledges it, but I am, and it would take more than a piece of paper in the Ministry to proclaim his guardian someone else.

"And you filed the charges of abuse and neglect?"

"I did." At the words "abuse and neglect," his magic strained and danced like a Crup at the end of its leash, trying to get away and go in the direction the Aurors had taken James. Snape restrained it. He was going to get out of the Ministry without being convicted of murder, or anything else. It was important that he control his behavior in all aspects of his life, which was one reason he was grateful that Minerva had worked as hard as she had to make sure the potential murder charges against him for Rovenan's death were dropped. He wanted to remain free, to insure that Harry believed him when he said that nothing mattered more than his health and safety.

"When did you first notice signs of abuse?"

"At the time, I did not know they were signs of abuse," said Snape quietly, thinking back to Harry's first year at Hogwarts. It struck him as odd now that he could have been so impatient with the boy then. Of course, he hadn't known that Harry's reluctance to do anything right, to live up to the skills that Snape could see burning brightly in him, was induced by his parents. It had seemed right and natural that someone in Slytherin House would follow his ambitions, and to think that Harry would put love for his untalented, Gryffindor brother, James Potter come again, above his own self-interest had driven Snape quiet mad. "He botched simple Potions he was capable of making. He remained behind his brother in all his classes. He hid the extent to which he could perform wandless magic and complicated spells. When he won the Quidditch match between Gryffindor and Slytherin in his first year, defeating two Death Eaters at the same time, he arranged matters to make it look as if his brother had won. When I saw into his mind in second year, as I trained him in Occlumency, I realized what the problem was."

"And why did you not report it earlier?" Madam Bones sounded genuinely interested. Snape supposed she had been through the Pensieve Potion he'd turned in, and the memories collected from Lily and James during their rare cooperative periods with the Aurors, and had come to be convinced, had she doubted it at first, of the extent and malice behind Harry's abuse.

"Because the Headmaster told me to keep silent on account of the prophecy, and at that time, I still believed in him," said Snape. "I planned to treat Harry as a savior, train him to be a powerful wizard, and then reveal him as mightier than his brother at some point in the future. Then Harry himself begged me not to reveal the abuse. At the time, he seemed to have good reasons for it, and I listened to him. I did not know all the details of what his parents had done to him then."

Madam Bones nodded. "And when did you first change your mind about staying silent?"

Snape could remember the moment with acid-etched clarity. It was one of the defining points in his life so far, after all.

"When Harry's mind was shattered at the end of his second year," he said softly. "You have heard him say his mind was webs, yes?" When Madam Bones nodded, he continued, "He had a magical snake who had become entwined in his webs. The snake was killed. Harry's mind shattered. He had to rebuild himself piece by piece, and I entered his mind to help him do it. While there, I chose to do what I could to heal him, in defiance of the Headmaster.”

Madam Bones frowned and flipped through her pages for a moment. “There are references to multiple changes of Mr. Potter’s mind here,” she said. “How many times would you say he has almost gone mad?”

“Three,” said Snape without hesitation. “Once at the end of his second year, once in the middle of his third when his mother attempted to renew the phoenix web on him, and a few months ago when the Dark Lord returned and cut off his hand.” He noticed Madam Bones shuddering convulsively, and hoped, with anger like the bite of a northern breeze, that the shiver would pass along the line. You owe him so much, all of you, for defeating the Dark Lord five times so far, six if we may count the time on the beach. Well may you feel sorry for what has happened to him.

“Would you say that Mr. Potter’s abuse has exacerbated the effects of the damage to his mind?” Madam Bones asked.

“Yes. Indeed, in two cases it was the direct cause of it,” said Snape. “The boy needs to be safely away from his abusers, and they need to be punished for what they have done to him.” He remembered the emptiness in Harry’s eyes when he was pleading with Snape not to hurt them, that first evening when Lily and Dumbledore had been arrested, but then he dismissed the memory. I am sorry, Harry. They do. Dumbledore will never stop trying to gain control of you. Your mother would never stop pleading with you to save her, or the world. You have been their sacrifice, their penitent little sufferer, long enough. It’s time for you to start living, and for them, with all luck, to stop.

Madam Bones nodded in satisfaction. “What would you say is the worst abuse Mr. Potter has suffered, in detail?”

Snape began to describe the abuse, based mostly on details that he had taken from Dumbledore’s memories, forcing his mind to be elsewhere, as it was when he used to report the consequences of Death Eater meetings to the Headmaster. He was thinking, instead, of the way that Harry had put up a barrier to keep anyone from touching him when Lily spoke.

If the Wizengamot is so misguided as to free her, I will see her dead. I cannot kill her myself, or be suspected, because I will not go to Tullianum and I will not leave Harry. But I can and will make sure that someone else does it. A hint dropped in Mrs. Bulstrode's ear might not be out of place.

Harry stirred much sooner than Draco had expected him to, murmuring and rolling over about an hour after he had fallen asleep. Draco found himself disappointed. He had enjoyed the warmth, the trusting press of Harry's body to his, and, most of all, the feeling that Harry had nothing to hide, neither emotions nor thoughts.

Harry, of course, opened his eyes, and immediately moved away from him, his cheeks flushing. "What time is it?" he asked, even as he used his wandless magic to cast a Tempus charm. He stiffened at the numbers it revealed, sucking in his breath. "Do you think my father's testimony is over?" he asked, and started to turn towards the door.

Draco decided that letting Harry get away with this hiding was stupid, and therefore it wasn't going to happen.

"Harry," Draco said, and reached up, catching his chin and turning his face back.

Harry flushed again when they were face to face, and his eyes darted in another direction. Draco shook his head. Harry was definitely listening, look away though he might, and that was what mattered.

"You shouldn't go back there," Draco told him calmly. "Yes, your father's testimony is over, and Snape and my mother and your other allies will be testifying now. It'll do nothing but weigh on your mind. Stay here and talk to me. By the way your emotions burst out of you, you're tired of cooping them up." He shuddered a bit. The sudden assault of rage and hatred on his face where there had been nothing before had stunned him for long moments before he was able to get to Harry. Otherwise, he would have been at his side no more than a few seconds after Lily began her plea.

“I was just really tired,” said Harry, his words blurring. “Now we can—”

“This isn’t going to work, Harry,” said Draco, and heard his own voice tighten. Harry was not making him irritated so much as desperately worried and frustrated, but he did seem to be assuming that he could cry his eyes out, sleep in Draco’s arms for an hour, and then go on as if nothing had happened. That wasn’t the way it was going to be. Now that Draco had a better idea of what Harry was hiding, he wasn’t going to let him go back to hiding it. “You’ve got a secret that’s hurting you the same way denying yourself sleep did last year—”

“They’re not the same,” said Harry. “I know why I lost control then. This time, it’s just weakness.”

“Merlin, Harry,” said Draco softly, and pulled him down again, so that Harry was resting on his chest. “You’ve survived abuse, and you’re at the trial of your abusers. The last thing I would say that is is weakness. Normal emotions, yes, and I’m sorry you’ve struggled to hide them for so long. Why did you? Did you think we’d hate you for them?” He moved one hand strongly over Harry’s back, his longing for Harry to speak more intense than even his longing to touch him at the moment.

“I don’t want to feel them,” said Harry, and then yanked at Draco’s arms, though, Draco noted, he still didn’t use his magic to block touch, as he had earlier at the trial. “I want to spare my parents. I hate them, and I don’t want to hate them, and—oh, fuck.” He broke off awkwardly, and Draco realized he was probably on the verge of tears again.

“But you do,” said Draco softly. “And probably, Harry, if you really want to stop feeling those things, the only way through is to speak about them.”

“What is it with you and Snape and this mania for me talking?” Harry glared at him from beneath his fringe, but Draco knew at least half the rage in those brilliant green eyes was directed against himself. The other half was aimed at Lily and James, or at least Draco hoped so. "I don't want to."

"Why?" Draco whispered.

"I don't want to tell you why, either. Besides, you know it." Harry made another, more determined effort to get away.

Draco wished Harry would take a Calming Draught, but knew he had no chance of getting him to agree to that right now, and that he'd lose Harry's trust forever if he force-fed him one. He rolled over instead, pinning Harry's lower body to the bed with his own. That brought up unfortunate ideas, but Draco found it easy to push them away. Harry's expression wasn't panicked, just miserable. He must know that being this close, or even just the sensation of arms around him and a hand stroking his back, was causing him to surrender.

"Harry," Draco said softly, "you can feel as much rage and hatred as you want. I won't despise you for it. Neither will Snape. Neither will anyone who knows the truth." His yearning to hear what Harry wanted to tell him grew sharp as a knife-blade. "Please. Tell us. I know you want to."

Harry tried to curl up on himself, not that he could do that when Draco was holding him the way he was. "I'll despise myself. I already do."

"Then what harm will telling someone do?" Draco kissed his hair, then the side of his cheek. "You know you can trust me, Harry. I want to know everything you are, everything you feel. Tell me." I want everything you are, he thought, but didn't say, in case those words might push Harry too far.

"I don't want these emotions," Harry said precisely. "If you convince me it's all right to have them, I'll just keep on feeling them. And I don't want to."

"Why not?" Draco took a slight stab in the dark. In truth, he thought he was correct, but Harry was the most complicated person he'd ever known. He could have some arcane subterranean reason for feeling the way he did. "Do you think they're that inconsistent with being vates?"

Harry jerked like a landed fish and tried to roll away again. Draco rolled with him, ending up in a messy half-embrace, half-sprawled position.

"Just—don't," said Harry, and pushed at him. "I don't want to do this, Draco. I don't want to feel these things. I don't want to confess them." He spoke so fast Draco could barely understand him, keeping his face turned away. "I don't want to talk."

"They're normal, Harry," Draco breathed. Harry was on the verge of a breakdown, he could feel it. He felt bad for pushing him, but if he managed to thoroughly shatter Harry's barriers, then at the very least, Harry wouldn't go on pretending. "And you are normal, in this respect at least."

"I don't want to be normal," said Harry, and he sounded desperate. "It hurts."

Draco clasped his arms more firmly around him. "What do you want to do?"

"Go back to the courtroom."

Draco gave a little growl. "I meant, besides that."

"And that's what I want to do." Harry rolled back over and looked at him. He had, with what superhuman effort Draco didn't like to think, put his emotions away again. His face was calm and blank. "You can't restrain me, Draco, you know that, not if I really want to go."

And Draco did know that, though Harry might have been talking about the strength of his magic, and Draco simply meant in general. He wouldn't oppose something Harry truly wanted—not least because he thought the courtroom would give another push to Harry's barriers, and change him for good. He nodded and sat up, reaching for his wand to murmur a few quick cleaning charms on his hair, Harry's hair—as much as that was possible—and the tear tracks on Harry's face.

Harry waited impatiently for them to pass, then made for the door. Draco caught up with him and supported him with his arm.

Harry gave him a sharp glance. "I'm fine."

"I like doing this," Draco said, and then of course Harry gave him a startled glance, as if he couldn't imagine that someone liked touching him for its own sake, but relented.

They walked back to the courtroom. Draco worked on burying his impatience. The more time he spent with Harry lately, the more he wanted. Not just time, of course, but everything. Touching him, hearing what he wanted to say, hearing what he didn't want to say, wanting to be wanted back—

It was that last that was most frustrating, Draco acknowledged. Harry loved him, he knew that, but his emotions were tangled and wound around each other like barbed wire, and now he was hiding from them. Draco mostly wanted them out so Harry would heal, but he was selfish enough to admit that he also wanted them out so that Harry would stop bloody hiding from everything else, and get a move on.

After the trial, Draco was going to hold Harry to his promise about sharing his mindset via the Pensieve.

They arrived in the courtroom just as his mother was finishing her testimony. Draco avoided both his father's and Snape's glare—though he flinched more at his father's than at Snape's—and settled Harry back from the balcony railing in an empty seat. Harry just conjured a damn window in his palm, of course, so it obviously didn't really matter where they sat.

"And the next witness for the prosecution," said Madam Bones, in a carrying voice, "is Connor Potter."

Only when Harry's head jerked up, his eyes flying wide, did Draco realize that Harry hadn't known his brother had worked out a deal with the Minister that would allow him to testify against his parents instead of taking a victim's role. Connor had told him of it at several points during the last week, but Harry had never really seemed to hear, and now here was proof that he hadn't.

Here comes the next storm, Draco thought, and prepared to hang on.

Chapter Forty-Three: Greater Love Hath No Brother

Connor had known this wouldn't be easy. Who would be so simple-minded as to think this would be easy?

But he hadn't realized—because he hadn't realized how little impact his announcements must have made on his brother—that Harry would be staring at him with betrayal in his eyes as he stood up to testify.

He hesitated. Then he shook his head and went forward, working his way out between the press of bodies. Most of the people sitting with him hadn't realized who he was, and turned to stare at him in absorbed fascination as he made his way forward. Connor wrestled with the temptation to reach up and either brush his fringe over his scar or toss it aside.

A nice-looking witch in the same row he'd been sitting in gave him a smile and a nod that seemed to say It's fine just the way it is, dear. Connor smiled back at her, and walked the rest of the way around the galleries towards the steps into the main courtroom.

By that point, Harry had overcome his shock enough to protest. He was standing up, his hand extended to Connor across the intervening distance. Connor didn't turn his head aside from his brother, because no Gryffindor would do that. He just returned his gaze as calmly as he could, and kept walking.

"Connor, please," Harry whispered. His words echoed in the vast quiet that, for some reason, had decided to fall. Connor found himself irritated at the audience. They could talk now, since he hadn't reached the floor of the courtroom and Madam Bones hadn't begun the official questioning yet. Why did they have to choose now to act like they'd all eaten Fred and George's Silencing Sweets?

"Please don't do this."

He had known Harry would say that, or words like that. He'd imagined that he would be able to make some grand speech when the time came. Surely, even if no one else could get through to Harry and make him see the necessity of this, he should be able to. He was Harry's twin brother, after all.

But he found his mouth so dry and his head so filled with what had to come next that no grand speeches helped him along. He just held Harry's eyes and said, "This has to be done."

Professor Snape, who sat closer to the staircase, was giving him what Connor thought was only the second approving look he'd ever got from him.

"Please take your place in the witness's chair, Mr. Potter." Connor couldn't make out the exact tone of Madam Bones's voice—she could have been irritated, amused, angry, or weary—but he decided that he'd made a spectacle of himself long enough. He sped up until he was on the floor, and then strode across to seat himself in the witness's chair. It adjusted itself to his neck at once. Connor was glad of that, even as he fervently wiped his palms off on his trousers. This was going to be hard enough without feeling as though he were taking his OWLS already.

"You are Harry's twin brother, Mr. Potter?" Madam Bones asked him.

I'm the same age as he is, and you're addressing me by the same last name. I'd think that was pretty bloody obvious. But Connor had given himself lecture after lecture not to do anything that would mess up the trial for Harry, so he contented himself with a terse nod.

"And you grew up in Godric's Hollow with him and with your parents?"

"Yes, Madam Bones," said Connor, thinking that two nods in a row was a bit much, when everyone was craning forward along the railings to watch him. They might start thinking he was afraid to speak. Connor didn't want to give them that impression, not at all. He wanted to give them the impression that his mother was a raving lunatic who needed to be prevented from hurting Harry anymore and his father was a spineless coward who shouldn't be let out of a cell for as long as he lived, just in case he did something out of spineless cowardice to make either of their lives miserable again.

“How aware were you of the abuse during Harry’s childhood?”

Connor grimaced. This was the part that wouldn’t look so great. On the other hand, he’d been a child, and not the most observant of children, either. It had taken him how long to notice that Harry was the better flyer, for example? And he still hadn’t taken him seriously as Quidditch competition after that, and paid the price. So of course he hadn’t noticed Harry’s training.

“Not aware at all,” he made himself say. “Lily concealed it so well from me that I just thought Harry was bookish, and shy, and in awe of me, by nature.”

“Did you never notice his various wounds from the pain curses he practiced?” Madam Bones asked, curious now. “Or that he had wandless magic?”

Connor let out a breath and wiped his hands again. “No,” he had to admit. “He hid the spells, and made sure to perform the most advanced magic when he was away from me, or I was gone. I remember asking Lily a few times why Harry didn’t play outdoors with me more often. She just reassured me that he liked to read, and that anyway, I didn’t have to worry about it, because there would be plenty of children who wanted to play outside with the Boy-Who-Lived when I went to Hogwarts.” He heard more than a few people snicker in the audience. He hoped one of them wasn’t Professor Snape. Not that he liked the git, Merlin no, but he was Harry’s guardian, and he knew how to teach dueling spells even if he didn’t have a clue about Potions. Connor wanted to get along with him because of that. He had the feeling that Professor Snape was going to be in Harry’s life for a long time.

“So your mother trained you as well?” Madam Bones sounded soft, and sorry for him now.

Connor scowled. They were not going to make this about him. That was what Lily and James had done for too long. “Not the same way she trained Harry. Never the same. She only had me practice a few charms that I could handle, that every wizarding boy handles. I saw more magic from James and his friends—“

“Friends?”

“Sirius Black and Remus Lupin.” Connor was a little nervous about naming Remus. He didn’t want anyone in the courtroom to remember that his godfather was a werewolf. But Madam Bones had her mind on other things, as it turned out.

“Do you think they were aware of the extent of Harry’s training?”

Connor shook his head. They weren’t going to touch Sirius and Remus, either. He’d argued with the Minister by letter for a long time before he managed to convince him to let him testify, and he’d become aware that the Minister didn’t like werewolves much. So this wouldn’t become about Remus, and Sirius was dead, and he’d died a hero no matter what anyone said, so it wouldn’t be about him. “They never knew. Lily was very careful to keep it hidden.”

Madam Bones’s face was troubled. “It just seems extraordinary that four people in the same house could have gone ignorant of such extensive and untrammelled abuse,” she murmured.

Connor shrugged, even as he felt himself flush. “I told you, I didn’t see everything. And Sirius and Remus weren’t there all the time. And James...” He trailed off for a moment, looking up towards the balcony where Harry sat. He knew what he wanted to say, but he wasn’t sure that he wanted his brother to hear it.

“And your father?” Madam Bones prompted him gently.

Connor took a deep breath and got the bit between his teeth. He remembered what Hermione had told him when he confessed his fears of being part of the trial. Oh, there’d been lots of cryptic babble about psychological states that Connor didn’t even try to follow, but Hermione made her best points in plain English, and he remembered those. It’s got to be done, Connor. Harry will never be healthy if his wounds aren’t healed, and this is the best way of doing that.

And there was what Ron had said, too. Think of it like this, mate. At least you’re helping them find a legal solution. What the Wizengamot's going to do to 'em won't seem like anything beside what Snape will do. And the Malfoys? Ron had shuddered. Can you imagine them?

"James was an idiot," he said bluntly. "And sometimes he acted weird around Harry. I know that he saw things, sometimes, but he pretended he didn't see them. And a few times he told me to be careful around Harry, but he'd never tell me why. He was a coward. He was always a coward. I told him last year that I wouldn't let him hurt Harry, and I meant that. And then he did it when he verbally abused him after he was arrested." He turned and sought out his twin's eyes. "I'm sorry, Harry," he added. "I wanted to be there to punch his nose in after I heard about it."

Madam Bones made a small noise that Connor thought was probably a muffled chuckle. He didn't care. He'd needed to say that, and now that he'd said it, the questioning could continue.

It didn't continue, not quite yet. Before Madam Bones could say anything, Connor saw Harry's head appear over the side of the balcony railing. He waited. Harry was going to say something unfortunate.

That was all right. Connor had actually been more prepared for this than for the moment he went down the staircase to testify. It had taken him a lot of putting together of puzzle pieces—Hermione said he was a 'bricoleur,' which Connor thought meant a nicer way of saying 'slow'—to realize that that mantra the Slytherins repeated to themselves was true and, yes, Harry was an idiot sometimes.

"Connor," Harry said softly, "do you know all about Mum's history with Dumbledore?"

And that's unfortunate thing number one. I wish he would stop calling her Mum. "Yes, I do," said Connor. "You did mention something about that." And Harry had, in his conversations in the last week while he was walking about the school and muttering to himself. Connor had been part of the honor guard that trailed along on several occasions.

“Mr. Potter,” said Madam Bones, and then paused for an infinitely small second, as if trying to figure out whether they would know which one she was addressing. Then she continued with greater force. “Sit down.”

“Then you know that she wasn’t really responsible for her own actions,” Harry said earnestly. “I meant to bring that up, but I couldn’t stay in my own questioning that long, and Mum doesn’t think she did what she did only because of Dumbledore, so she wouldn’t say it in her own defense. But you can. You know that a lot of her actions were influenced by him.”

“Yes,” said Connor. He waited a heartbeat, just in case Harry would go back and sit down, or Draco or Professor Snape would make him sit down. Neither happened. Connor sighed, and finished the statement. “So?”

“So she doesn’t deserve to be blamed for this.” Harry’s hand curled around the railing. “You can make them see that. You can say that. You can still speak, and I can’t.”

“You’re doing a good job of interrupting the trial right now.” Madam Bones’s voice was an odd mixture of soft tone and loud volume, as though she were trying to figure out how to get Harry to stop interrupting the trial without yelling at him and perhaps making what he’d suffered worse. “Please, Mr. Potter, sit down again.”

Connor ignored the questioner. Harry had probably always been going to bring this up. He probably wouldn’t understand Connor’s answer, either. That was all right. The partial idiocy accounted for it.

“Dumbledore didn’t take away her ability to choose,” said Connor. “He never did that. No webs on her. The Wizengamot tested her for that, Harry, both right after she came in and after they found out about his spell that was influencing people. The Minister told me. So she was free-willed. She still had a choice. He didn’t coerce her to do what she did.”

“But it was like a web,” Harry said. “And she didn’t mean to do it to me for the sake of abuse, Connor. She was saving the world. You heard her. She could have made me a sacrifice, and then—“

Connor could feel himself start to scowl midway through that little speech. One of the things he’d learned in the weeks leading up to the trial was how hard it was for him, now, to listen to Harry put himself down. Everyone else around Harry seemed to understand it better than he did. Or maybe they’d just been taking care not to upset Harry as the trial came near. Whatever it was, Connor thought it was about time Harry knew the truth.

“You were actually under a web, Harry, and you broke free!” he said, loudly enough that he saw some of the people in the audience wince and lean back from the railings. “Don’t you dare make excuses for her when you had a lot more odds stacked against you and climbed over all of them!”

“Misters Potter—“ Madam Bones was saying, sounding upset, and then someone must have cast a Silencio on her. It was the only way Connor could have heard what Harry said next, his voice was so quiet.

“It’s all right, Connor,” Harry said. “Please. Please don’t condemn her to death. What do you want? I’ll give you anything you want.”

Connor closed his eyes as a wave of pity came over him. He did manage to say, “Please go back and sit down again, Harry.”

“And you won’t talk about her that way anymore?”

Connor knew that Harry’s eyes would be bright with hope if he looked. He knew that he would be relaxing, at the thought of the woman who’d abused him, whose womb they’d been unlucky enough to come out of, surviving, maybe even walking free.

“I didn’t say that I was making a bargain with you,” said Connor, quietly, and then forced himself to look up again. “I asked you to please go and sit down again. I’m going to talk about Lily, Harry, and try my best to make sure that she’s locked up in Tullianum.”

Harry shook his head. "I didn't know that you hated them this much," he said.

Connor had never been gladder that he wasn't Harry. He could just hate his parents. He'd tried not to, for a while, but he'd kept picking up pieces and putting them together, and after a while, he couldn't ignore the puzzle staring him in the face anymore. To forgive Lily and James was impossible, not when they'd just keep coming at Harry. And they'd said and said that they were right, they must be right, because they served the Light and they were Gryffindors. They'd said that over and over again during his childhood, even during the times when Connor asked what was wrong with Harry or why the other Hogwarts Houses let Slytherins stay in the school if they were evil or whether they were sure that he could defeat Voldemort.

And then it turned out that they couldn't live up to the ideals that Light wizards and Gryffindors should live up to. They'd lied about what they were. They were cowards, and they wanted Harry to save them, and they wanted to hide. Connor had known then that he hated them, and that he wanted to try as hard as he could to make them go away permanently, and he'd argued with the Minister until he wore him down.

At this point, not even pity for his brother would stop Connor, because he knew Harry's life would be so much better without them. He couldn't comfort his brother like Professor Snape could, or share secrets with him like Draco, or even fight beside him yet the way his allies could. But he could do this.

"Well, I do hate them," he said. Madam Bones tried to say something then, but apparently the unknown person renewed the Silencio the moment she started to speak. Connor was grateful for that. He wanted to talk, and he doubted that Madam Bones would have let him get away with saying this for long. Luckily, even the other members of the Wizengamot seemed too enchanted to interrupt. "They risked our lives when we were a year and a half old, Harry. They sent Peter to prison for their crimes, and told us he was evil all the time. They lied about Regulus. Lily trained you endlessly, and didn't even let me have a choice about whether I wanted you to protect me or not. They gave us prejudices that made you hate what you were for your first two years at Hogwarts, and me hate you for the first three. James got better for a little while, but then when everything turned around, he blamed you instead of trying to do something about it. He acted like a prat when he was tried, too. And what was their justification for everything? A prophecy they couldn't even interpret right!"

Until he said that, Connor didn't realize he was going to say it. He heard the shocked gasps around him, and then some other member of the Wizengamot said, "Mr. Potter, is this true? Your brother told us that your parents and Headmaster Dumbledore based their actions on a prophecy they sincerely believed to be true. And now you are saying they did not know the truth of it?"

Connor made some quick calculations. He knew Harry had wanted to keep the true nature of the prophecy secret, but so had Lily, which wasn't a recommendation for him. And it wasn't as though Voldemort didn't already know the truth; he'd gone after Harry first the last three years, not Connor. Connor would keep the exact wording and the changeable nature of the prophecy quiet, but he didn't see any reason not to let Harry get the credit he always should have. Fair's fair.

"My brother is the true Boy-Who-Lived," he said quietly, and watched Harry's face ripple and change as if it were a reflection in a pool of water broken by a stone. "He was the one who blocked Voldemort's Killing Curse that Halloween night. He has a lightning bolt scar because of it. My parents left us exposed to Lord Voldemort on Dumbledore's orders, so they didn't know for certain whose scar came from rubble and whose scar came from Avada Kedavra. But I've seen—we've both seen—a Pensieve memory of that night, and heard the real story from Peter Pettigrew, who was there. It was Harry. And our parents just guessed, because they were afraid of Harry and they thought his magic was Dark, so they said that I was the Boy-Who-Lived and Harry was my guardian. They were trying to shape the prophecy to fit their own ends. They made Harry into what he is because they were afraid. They're cowards. They abused my brother, and I don't want them to go free."

He ran out of breath, and sagged back against his chair. Connor glanced from Wizengamot member's face to Wizengamot member's face, and wondered what his testimony would mean. They were perfectly blank now, good political faces, and he didn't have the expertise in reading expressions that Harry did.

Madam Bones had apparently finally managed to get herself free of the Silencio. She took a deep breath and said, "Mr. Potter, I'm sure you realize that this testimony is highly irregular."

"I don't care," Connor muttered under his breath, cross. He'd said a lot of what he wanted to say already. He waited to see what questions she would ask him now.

"But I would like to clarify some points of it," Madam Bones continued. "You are sure that your parents and Albus Dumbledore did not know which of you was the Boy-Who-Lived?"

"They made a guess," said Connor angrily. "But it was in the face of the evidence. They had reasons to suspect Harry, since his magic was stronger and waving around him after the attack. I'm not powerful. They just didn't want it to be him, so they manhandled fate and said I was the Boy-Who-Lived."

"And what are the reasons they didn't want it to be him?"

Did the spell cover her ears, too? Connor folded his arms and glared up at her. "Fear," he snapped. "Their stupid idea that Harry could turn into a Dark Lord. And more fear. They always thought he was Dark, you heard Lily say that. They thought he was foul." He thought of a trick to use. It was a trick that Harry would never use, but then, Harry was too self-sacrificing. He let his voice waver and drop, and a sound of tears creep into it. "Can you imagine what it was like, to grow up in a house with parents who thought like that? And my brother can't even see that it was wrong? Do you see what they've done to him?"

This time, he saw some of the expressions change to pity. He let out a deep breath. He didn't know if he'd won, but he thought he'd come pretty close.

“Connor.”

And there went Harry, again. Luckily, this time someone did tug him away from the railing and make him sit down, and Madam Bones resumed the questioning. From there, it was mostly clarification on points he'd already raised, but Madam Bones did dip her wand into the Pensieve and summon forth a few more memories.

Connor could see them for the first time. He watched as Lily told Harry that he must not expect to have time away from Connor, because his life was bound up in his brother's. He had to make sure Connor survived the War, first, and survived it innocent enough to kill Voldemort. Then his primary duty, if they both lived afterwards, was making Connor happy.

Connor shivered and scrunched up his arms. The thought of someone else living for him was really, really creepy.

I don't want someone else to live for me. And if Lily had asked me, I would have told her that.

He watched as Lily cast a spell that made Harry feel as if he were cradled, held in warm, safe, loving arms, and then paired it with one that made the touch turn cold and slimy. Harry tied it to himself with what sounded like a memory charm to Connor. Several memories like that made it clear that he'd been trained to consider any kind of touch, little by little, as something to be squirmed away from.

Connor felt his anger rising as he watched that. You didn't need to do that, even if you wanted him to protect me, he told Lily in his mind. You could just have taught him defensive magic and let him be. But no, you had to do this. You couldn't really have thought that someone would be hugging him in the middle of a battle. You just wanted to twist him more, because you hated him.

It made it worse that he recognized the day of the first memory, because of the old practice wand lying on a table next to Harry. It was their ninth birthday, and they'd both received new practice wands, so Connor had excitedly abandoned his old one to go outside and cast charms with James and Sirius. He still remembered laughing proudly when he got a charm that made colored bubbles come out of the end of his wand to work right for the first time.

And Harry had been a few hundred feet away from him all the while, learning to hate being touched.

It made Connor want to punch Lily in the nose, too.

Then came a memory of them playing a Quidditch game, one where Harry came close to catching the Snitch. But Harry had kept it concealed from everyone that he was a better flyer than Connor, so Lily had thought he was trying deliberately to show his brother up. She'd apparently taken Harry off by himself afterward, while James ruffled Connor's hair and congratulated him on the win—a win that Connor could see now, in the Pensieve, had been given to him, with Harry pulling up at the last moment.

Lily knelt down in front of Harry, her eyes bright as Connor remembered the Hungarian Horntail's fire being in the Tournament last year. "Harry," she said softly.

Harry stood with his head bowed and a look of profound misery on his face, though he didn't have much of an expression normally. He looked up at his mother's voice, though.

"Harry, Harry, Harry." Lily shook her head back and forth, once for every time she spoke his name. Connor reminded himself that it really was just a Pensieve memory, so he couldn't step in, grab his younger self's broom, and concuss Lily with it. "What were you doing?"

"Playing with Connor," Harry whispered, his voice so small and tight that Connor wondered at it. If he'd heard his brother sound like that any time during their years together as children, he would have known something was wrong. But then, a lot of the time Harry didn't talk. He just smiled and listened.

And his eyes were always fixed on me.

Connor found that even more disturbing in retrospect, since at the time he'd never suspected anything there, either. He shivered, and then leaned forward as Lily spoke again.

"You weren't just playing," said Lily. "You almost won. And that would have broken your vow, Harry. Why did you almost break your vow?" She sounded disappointed, not scolding, and Connor saw Harry wince and bow his head again. He didn't cry, though. Connor tried to remember his brother crying before he came to Hogwarts and drew a blank.

"I didn't know—I didn't mean to—"

"But that was just it, Harry," said Lily softly. "You always have to know. You always have to mean to. That's why you aren't like anyone else. It's all right if some random Seeker in Gryffindor shows up Connor. But you can't. You have to make sure that you always pay attention to what you're doing. You might get your brother killed someday if you don't pay attention. And you don't want to do that, do you?" She paused for a long moment, then said, "Or maybe you do. I don't know, Harry. Perhaps you're jealous of Connor, and you want—"

"No, no, I promise," Harry whispered, not sobbing, which just made it worse. "I promise. I've put it all away, Mum. I might get jealous, or angry, but I'll put it away. I promise." He looked up at her, and smiled slightly. "It won't happen again."

Lily kissed him on his forehead, which made Harry look positively rapturous. "That's my sweet Harry."

The image faded. Connor realized his hands were shaking, and wondered for one mad moment if Fred and George would like to help him figure out a way into Tullianum before the sentencing happened, so that they could make his mother pay with some of the twins' crueller jokes. Madam Pomfrey still hadn't managed to discover how to re-Transfigure Marietta, and Connor knew they had some tricks that made that look like a Canary Cream.

"Mr. Potter."

Connor blinked, and looked up, and realized that Madam Bones was done with the questioning. "You don't have anything else to ask me?" he asked, wishing she did. His hatred had built back up. He could say some more things. They would be mean and hurtful, and Harry probably didn't want to hear them, but they would make him feel better.

Madam Bones made a small motion with her hand that could have been exhausted. "No. The next witness for the prosecution will be Peter Pettigrew."

Connor nodded, and then went to climb back up the staircase. His legs felt heavy. He didn't feel tired, though. He just felt, increasingly, that what he'd done wasn't enough. Damn the Minister for not allowing post into Tullianum, anyway. I'm sure that Fred and George could get something through to Lily if that weren't the case.

He reached the gallery level, and passed Peter on his way down. Peter gave him the first real smile he'd ever got from him, and squeezed his shoulder. Connor straightened his spine and lifted his head. You did good, that smile said.

He made for the doors. Madam Bones had given up on locking them, since most of the witnesses weren't assumed to need the same delicate care that Sapiertian had given Harry during his questioning, and it seemed the fate of this trial to be interrupted by people going in and out. Connor felt he was too angry to stay where he was.

"Connor. Connor, wait."

He turned around, not at all surprised to see Harry coming up behind him, but a bit apprehensive. He was angry, but he didn't want to vent that anger at his brother.

And Harry, judging from the look in his eye, was more than a bit vexed. At least Draco was with him, no more than a step from his right shoulder, and Snape was rising from his chair even as Peter began to speak his answers to Madam Bones's questions. They would keep Harry from plastering him to the wall with wandless magic the way that he had in third year.

Well, I bloody well hope so, at least, Connor thought uneasily.

“How could you do that?” Harry asked in a hissing whisper the moment he was close enough. Connor noted, with a distant amusement, that Harry was now trying not to disrupt the normal proceedings of the courtroom. Sometimes, Harry, you have a very misguided set of priorities. Well, no, not sometimes. It’s only the idiocy that’s sometimes. “How could you betray our parents like that?”

Connor narrowed his eyes. For Harry to accuse Connor of betraying him was one thing; Connor had been prepared for that, and at least it would have showed that Harry was being a little selfish for once. But Harry wasn’t allowed to get away with just ignoring what Connor had said about hating their parents and feeling no loyalty towards them at all.

“I don’t care about them,” he said. “They’re not my parents any more.” It burned on the tip of his tongue to say that Harry shouldn’t consider them his parents any more, either, but he’d seen what happened earlier in the year when he just reacted without thinking: Harry thinking so little of himself that he took an unknown curse and wound up lying pale and motionless in a hospital bed. Maybe that wouldn’t happen here, but Connor wasn’t about to risk it. Harry and hospital beds had a way of coming together. “I care about you. You’re my brother. I want to protect you for once. So I did.”

Harry shook his head. “I don’t need protecting. Connor—“

And then he stopped and stared, because Connor had let a snort of laughter escape. He couldn’t help himself. Draco had come up behind Harry and wrapped his arms around Harry’s waist, watching Connor over his shoulder, so that he could see the carefully concealed amusement in the gray eyes. It was immediately replaced by worry, though, so Connor thought that Draco probably knew how fragile Harry was.

“I don’t.” Harry twisted fretfully in Draco’s hug, reminding Connor far too much of the way he’d twisted when he was under that spell that was supposed to make him feel comfortable and good, learning to resist it. Draco didn't let go, and Harry gave up on resistance in favor of leaning forward and glaring, his hand making a sharp gesture. "And why did you tell them I was the Boy-Who-Lived?"

"Because it's true," said Connor. "Because maybe now you'll get even more protection, because people will think you're Voldemort's target, which is true. Because you deserve some credit for it, Harry."

"I don't—that's not—I don't want it."

Connor sighed. "I'm sorry." He had meant to say something about it, but not like that. "It's out there now, though, and I don't think anyone will forget it."

"Please," Harry whispered. "Please—"

"What is it, Harry?" Connor leaned nearer, never taking his eyes from Harry's, thinking irrelevantly that Lily and Harry looked completely different despite having eyes the exact same color. "If I can do it, I will."

"Will you go back, after the testimony today is over, and tell them you lied?" Harry whispered.

Connor sighed and stepped away. "I don't want to think about you asking me that, Harry," he said, and then moved off.

He heard Harry whisper behind him, "Please. I—I want you to. Please, Connor? Please? Anything you want, I promise—" And then a sharp cry as his emotions probably escaped his control again. This time, Connor hoped that Draco and Snape would get him away from the courtroom and make it so that he couldn't come back. A binding spell or a potion might not be out of place.

He just kept walking until he found a deserted patch of corridor to lean his face against, and sighed.

I didn't like doing that.

He forcibly brought visions of the twins' products to mind. There had to be some way of getting some of those past Tullianum security. Indigena Yaxley tucked her wand back inside her sleeve. She'd cast the spell to silence Madam Bones nonverbally, and with her real wand. The Ministry officials would search in bafflement, unable to find out who had done this, since, of course, no unregistered wands could get inside the building.

Indigena had wanted to hear the younger Potter's words in full. And what fascinating words they had been, she mused. Of course, her new Lord knew about the prophecy already, but she would report this to him anyway. It was interesting.

And she did fear that interest would be lacking in her life now, since the Dark Lord insisted on tugging her away from her greenhouses and her gardens and making her torture people. Indigena found torture boring. At least he was letting her use Evan Rosier as thorn food.

She settled back and prepared to wait out the rest of the trial, though she didn't think anything so interesting would come again. She had a mission, and one she was honor-bound to complete.

She had to smile again, thinking of the way Connor Potter had been reassured on catching sight of her as he fiddled with his fringe. Such a sweet boy, really, the kind to make a mother proud if he wasn't testifying against her. She hoped she wouldn't have to be the one to kill him.

Well, if I am, I'll give him to the devouring grass. Just a few moments of intense pain, and then he's done for. At least he'll get a quick death.

Chapter Forty-Four: The Wind of the Future

Harry felt it as he realized that his begging wasn't going to convince Connor, that their parents might die, and Connor wouldn't agree to the last desperate plan that Harry had thought of to save them.

For just a moment, temptation reared up in him, and turned, and looked him in the eye.

You could use your magic to interfere, after all, it whispered. An Obliviate, or even just a simple confusion spell that would cause them to believe what you told them about the evidence—

Harry shoved the temptation away from him, horrified that he'd listened to it for this long. Dimly, he heard himself crying out. He buried his face in his arm, unable to speak, barely able to think. It was easier just to feel the skin burning against his forehead, and the arms clutching at him, and to pant.

"Harry?" Draco whispered to him. "Harry, what was that?"

He shook his head, not thinking he could answer, either. Thought came back to him in drifting bits and pieces, like the broken flotsam of a shipwreck on the tide. He shuddered, and felt Draco tighten his hold again in concern. Obviously, the shudder hadn't done a great job of convincing him that nothing was wrong.

Harry didn't think he could stay here another moment. He hadn't listened to Peter's testimony so far, but he could hear it continuing behind him, relentless and calm, paving the road to execution. He would listen to it if he stayed here, and perhaps his desperation would grow until he reconsidered using magic to interfere with the process of the trial, as he'd said he wouldn't, as no one but a Dark Lord would do.

"I need to get out of here," he said, moving his mouth enough back from his arm that Draco could understand him. "Can you get me out of here, Draco?"

Draco was more than willing to comply. Harry kept his eyes lowered as they passed to the courtroom's upper doors. He knew that most of the gazes would be pitying, but at least some would be speculative. They would begin thinking of him as the Boy-Who-Lived, now, and wouldn't things change the moment some reporter wrote that up for the Evening Prophet?

Things had changed, and Harry felt, for the first time since the trial began, that he had a glimpse of just how great the changes would be. And as the protective dread for his parents faded and his rage reared up again, he knew that the changes wouldn't be just in the outside world.

Merlin.

Draco and Snape had been right. Harry didn't like admitting that even in his head, since what they'd wanted had seemed so mad, but it was true. Draco, ushering him into an anteroom that might or might not be the one they'd used before, and Snape, briskly unstoppering a vial, by the sounds of it, had both been right.

He needed to talk. He needed to think. He needed to shove this out, or he might end up taking the first step on the road that Dumbledore had followed. Dumbledore had had no qualms about using his magic to interfere with the process of the trial, after all, just as Voldemort didn't care about destroying and manipulating other wizards' lives to suit his own whims.

"Harry? Harry, will you drink this?"

Harry lifted his head, blinking. He wasn't entirely sure if he'd had his eyes shut, but it felt that way, so involved in his own thoughts had he been. He certainly hadn't realized that Snape had poured a Calming Draught into a conjured goblet and was holding it out to him, or that Draco hovered off to the side, eyes frenzied, somewhere between grabbing Snape's hand and forcing it away and opening Harry's mouth and forcing the potion down his throat.

But they were still leaving it open to him. His choice.

Yes. Everything has to be.

Harry once more slammed his emotions into a box, as he had just before he went back to the courtroom with Draco. That box hadn't held. This one had to. He padlocked it tightly. He would have to think about and resolve the questions he'd thrown into it, but for the moment, he just wasn't in a place where he could accomplish that.

The word "place" hit his mind like an arrow, pinning him to one particular idea before he could stray from it.

I need a place. I require it. I'll use the Room of Requirement when we get back to Hogwarts.

He took a deep breath, feeling much better now that he'd already made one decision, and said, "Yes. Thank you." He reached out and accepted the goblet from Snape, who had just started to pull his hand back. Both Draco and Snape stared at him in shock as he drank the potion, wrinkling his nose slightly at the taste. It was sweet enough, but had a faint, acidic aftermath.

He felt the serenity spread across his mind like another Occlumency pool, and took a great, whooping breath. What emotions he still had he felt detached from, as if he were hovering above them—except for the determination. Absentmindedly, Harry wondered if Calming Draughts didn't affect the will. It wasn't something he'd ever researched, being more interested in the properties of the Potions themselves. I can do this. I can still do this. And I'm going to do this.

"I didn't expect you to take it, Harry," Draco said, breaking the silence that had fallen between them.

"I know." Harry looked up. "I felt I had to. I don't want my magic exploding and destroying the Wizengamot." Snape's face hardened at that, but Harry refused to allow himself to think it was anger at him, because he knew it wouldn't be. He was shaping his own thoughts into an arrow now, aiming at his target, forcing himself to ignore distracting, irrelevant, nagging little insecurities. It wasn't very comfortable, but he wouldn't have to endure for it very long.

I can't go on as I have been. I need to go to the Room of Requirement and think, not just feel and react. And I don't want to do it alone, not this time. I'll take Draco with me.

"Can we go back to Hogwarts?" he asked. "I know that it wouldn't be good for me to hear the rest of the testimony." At the very least, he thought Hawthorn would testify—unless someone had found out she was a werewolf; the newest anti-werewolf restrictions said that known lycanthropes couldn't testify in court—and Lucius. Remus couldn't, of course, because too many people knew about his lycanthropy, including the Minister. Maybe Adalrico Bulstrode, if he was there; Harry hadn't seen him.

And he had to stop reciting the list of witnesses to himself, or he would go mad. He brought himself down with a sharp chop, and thought nothing more about it. Those thoughts went into another box.

"Don't you want to hear it, Harry?" Draco asked.

"Very much," Harry said softly. "Too much. I won't, not now." He hesitated one moment further, but if he didn't tell them, it was likely neither of them would understand why he wanted to go to the Room of Requirement. Besides, he wanted to tell them. He could admit that much, in the privacy of his own head. "I almost used magic on Connor when he refused me."

Draco closed his eyes. Snape drew in his breath sharply, and then said, "What kind of magic?"

"A spell I would have regretted using." Harry met his eyes and held them, grabbing other thoughts that wanted to rise, about other circumstances when Snape had looked that way—last Christmas, most prominently—and throwing them recklessly into another box. The sense of urgency, similar to what he had felt when he was getting ready to rush to the battle on the beach, built up in him. "I can't stay here. I have to get back to Hogwarts, and to the Room of Requirement. It'll give me a place where I can actually face these damn things."

Draco looked as if the morning had come. "Harry—"

He broke off, but Harry didn't know if he was choked up, or didn't trust himself to find the words, or if it was because of something else. Throwing more thoughts into boxes, he said, "Yes. I know. My parents may both die tomorrow, but I'll have to go on living. And I've got to do something to make sure I can." He'd lost track of how many boxes there were now, how many memories and feelings they were holding away from him so that he could function. That was all right. He had time to unpack them, once he was in a place where he wouldn't destroy anyone else when he did. "I must, I have to do this."

Snape said nothing, but reached into a pocket of his robes and brought out a small key carved of what looked like ash wood. Harry blinked and looked up at him. "Sir?"

"The Headmistress thought we might have to return to Hogwarts quickly," said Snape. "She has set up a Portkey location on the sixth floor that we may travel to for as long as the trial lasts." He hesitated a long moment, then said, "Harry. Will you want to do this in the company of both of us, or only Draco?"

Looking into his guardian's eyes, Harry wished he could say "both of you," but he couldn't. A large part of the anger he'd put into the boxes was still anger at Snape, at the way this had worked out. "With Draco, sir," he murmured, and Snape nodded and put the ash key into his hand.

"Speak the Portkey incantation while you hold it, and both of you will be taken to Hogwarts," he said, moving his gaze to include Draco. "I will stay here and watch the trial. I will tell you what they said later this evening, if you feel capable of hearing it, Harry."

Harry was wildly grateful that he didn't say something like, "If you've survived this bloody scheme with your mind intact." Snape was showing trust now, too, showing that he expected Harry to do the right thing, and that there was no question of his survival because he wouldn't endanger himself. He grasped the Portkey, and Draco stepped forward and held the other end.

"Thank you, sir," Harry said. "For everything. Portus!"

Draco recovered from the dizzying swirl of the Portkey method of travel faster than he usually did. Perhaps it was the odd emotion gripping him now, a mixture of battle-readiness and desperate joy. Perhaps it was that he'd been staring so intently at Harry's face that he'd had a focus in the usual formless dance of color.

Perhaps it was just the fact that Harry had finally, finally decided that he was going to speak about this. And unlike the time he'd run away to Godric's Hollow, he wasn't going to do this alone.

Harry waited for a moment, until he was sure Draco had his feet, and then opened the door of the small closet they'd landed in. Draco peered out behind him, searching for moving students. They must have arrived in the middle of classes, though. Draco would have murmured a quick Tempus charm just to make sure, but Harry was already striding out of the closet and down the corridor, making for the stairs that would take them to the seventh floor and the Room of Requirement.

Draco sped up until he was almost running. He was taller than Harry, and his legs longer, but none of that seemed to matter when Harry got into one of these moods of his. Draco had seen moods like this when Harry faced the dragons in the First Task of the Triwizard Tournament, and when he was getting ready for the battle on the beach, and when they were leaving to fly to Woodhouse. It was Harry's look when he was about to go conquer something.

But, Draco realized as they waited for one of the moving staircases to swing back around, it wasn't exactly like any of those. The determination to face the dragons last year and Voldemort on the autumn equinox had had Harry's usual protective fervor behind it; he knew that other people were in danger, and he wanted to do something to help them as soon as possible. At Woodhouse, he'd been almost giddy. This wasn't giddy. It was—

Damn it. Malfoys are not supposed to lose all their words at once.

Harry's magic was glimmering around him now, though Draco doubted that he knew it. When the staircase deposited them on the seventh floor, Harry almost floated off the last step rather than simply walking. The light that traced him shone indigo, and then red, and then green, pacing through the shades as Harry paced until he found the tapestry of the ballet-dancing trolls. As he began to move up and down before the opposite wall, muttering something fiercely under his breath, Draco realized that the magic had outlined Harry in a mantle of keen, dark color, like a trailing cloak.

He stepped closer, fascinated and awed and longing to hear what Harry muttered.

"I need a place where I can think for myself and talk to Draco and work out what I need to do and won't harm anyone."

Draco blinked. He would have thought the demand shorter, since Harry's will ran so high. But he supposed Harry was trying to think consciously and painstakingly about this, so as not to miss out on anything he needed to do tonight.

If he does it. Harry had ignored so many invitations to talk about his emotions towards his parents in the last few weeks that Draco couldn't help but think this would be another failed attempt.

And then he remembered that Harry had taken the Calming Draught of his own free will, and walked away from the courtroom, and invited Draco to come with him, and his hope began to rise.

He waited with suspended breath until a rough stone door appeared in the wall Harry'd been pacing in front of. Then Harry stepped forward and opened it, and Draco followed him inside, into a large dark space.

Harry glanced around with eyes he could feel widening. He'd concentrated on his need rather than on what the room might look like when it formed itself, but still. He was sure he hadn't been thinking of something like this.

The room was a gaping cavern now, large enough that Harry knew it would extend out of Hogwarts entirely if its dimensions were normal. The walls were made of a dense dark crystal, slick and gleaming, but smooth enough to present wavering reflections of himself and Draco. Harry's wonder increased as he watched strings of silver move under the crystal, the worms that fed on it and spun it. He knew this substance, now. Called ianthinum, it was less rock than living thing, a growing matrix that slowly increased as its worms did. And it absorbed whatever magic was thrown at it. It had supposedly existed around Merlin's time, but because no wizard had seen ianthinum since, Harry had had no clue if it was real or just an old legend.

Well, the Room can make it real, obviously.

Towards the far end, the ianthinum melted into darkness. Void or black fire? Harry couldn't tell from looking at it, but from the way it moved, it might be either. He tossed a bit of magic into it, to see what would happen. It just fell, like a Knut down a bottomless pit, and didn't come back. Harry smiled. Well, I can't hurt anyone with my magic this way, even if I get angry enough to blow up half of Hogwarts.

The crystal didn't cover the whole surface of the walls, he saw, when he turned and looked at them again, though the faint light—which came only from the worms in the ianthinum shedding their silver glow—had fooled him into thinking it did. He moved a step forward, and studied the small, framed portrait that hung, looking like a wizarding photograph, between one strip of deep blue and another.

He choked a bit when he recognized it. It was the memory that the Wizengamot had watched during Connor's testimony, as Lily taught him how to resist taking pleasure from anyone else's touch.

Harry flicked his eyes to the side, and saw other portraits waiting. He nodded. The Room had obviously decided that one thing he required was the inability to back away from any of his sacrifices.

He felt coiling terror rise from his belly in a spiral, heading for his heart, but he crushed it. He'd faced Lily's training once before, hadn't he, the day he asked for Draco to touch him? And he'd been equally courageous other times before.

Until he had that thought, he hadn't realized how deeply and thoroughly Connor's words about cowardice had shamed him.

Thank you, brother. You're one of the reasons I'm here. But this time, I'm not screaming in pain as Sylarana's death destroys me, and I'm not trying to rebuild my mind. This is making decisions that I should have made a long time ago, continuing the shift that's already begun. I'm not Voldemort, and I'm not Dumbledore. I can accept that I have limitations, and I need to change, and that there are things in the world greater than I am. I can't afford to do anything else. The strength of my magic and the fact that I want to be vates say that.

It was why he'd asked for a place to think, rather than feel. He'd had enough of reacting out of blind emotion. He was going to face the emotions, yes, but he was going to face them consciously. He'd felt ashamed of crying in Draco's arms as he had earlier that day, and that just made him tighten up and pull away again. So this time he was going to do it his way.

"Harry? What do you think this is?"

Harry turned around, and saw Draco standing next to an enormous pendulum in the center of the room. Harry blinked and strode over to it, wondering how he could have missed it before. It was silver, and apparently hanging from the ceiling, and had a huge, sickle-shaped blade. Draco held a hand a few inches from it, as if he wanted to touch it but thought that wasn't a good idea.

Harry shook his head. "I don't know, Draco."

Draco eyed it one more time, then took a step backward. "All right." He faced Harry. "So what did you want to talk to me about?"

The pendulum began to swing. Harry moved Draco out of its path, made sure the blade wasn't about to cut into his own back, and then met his boyfriend's eyes.

"The things I can't hide from anymore," said Harry. "The reasons I didn't want to use the Pensieve spell that you made, essentially."

Draco's mouth opened slightly, perhaps at the way Harry had phrased that. Then he asked, "Do you want me to summon a Pensieve? The Room could give it to us, if we require it, and I know how to cast the spell again.”

Harry shook his head. “I will keep my promise about that spell after the trial’s over, but I know my own mindset. I’ve just hidden from it.” He started walking back and forth, parallel to the pendulum’s swing. Whoosh-thrum, the enormous blade sang as it sailed past him. “I want you to help me talk it out, and tell me when I’m being stupid.”

Draco looked as though someone had slapped him. Harry cocked his head at him. “Did you not want to?” he asked. “I admit, I didn’t ask that before, but I thought you would have objected if you didn’t want to come.”

Draco said something inaudible, then shook his head and murmured, “Not—not at all, Harry. I’m just amazed that you’re actually willing to do it now. Did nearly using your magic have that much of an effect on you?”

“Yes,” said Harry flatly. He could already feel the emotions knocking on the insides of the boxes, demanding to be let out. He was no longer good at building and holding these kinds of solid containers, not since Snape had trained him so well in the fluid pools of Occlumency. “I saw that I could turn into what I hate. And I don’t want to. I will not.”

“All right,” Draco breathed.

Harry took a deep breath, dissolved the first box, said, “You might want to stand out of the way,” and then turned and threw a burst of anger and magic at the ianthinum wall.

The magic manifested as a whirling black vortex, tugging in air and light as it moved about the room; Harry even saw the pendulum sway towards it, as if it wanted to vanish into it. And then the vortex touched the crystal, and turned into a waterfall of purple and blue. The ianthinum expanded a bit, and then settled back, pulsing gently.

Harry smiled. At least I know that it works to absorb magic. He squeezed his hand, and his magic sprang up and trailed him in faithful, obedient waves as he began talking again.

“I want so badly for them not to die, Draco. I told myself I was content with that. If I couldn’t save them from Tullianum—well, at least they’d be alive. I wanted the same thing for them as I did for anyone else. As long as they’re still alive, then I could visit them sometimes, perhaps—“

“No, you couldn’t have,” said Draco. “I would have sat on you if you tried.”

Harry nodded at him. “Yet another sign that I wasn’t thinking right, right there. And then I realized that I didn’t want the same thing for them as for anyone else. I wanted more. And I didn’t care that they’d abused me, that was what I told myself, I was somehow above all that—“

He dropped to his knees as two of the boxes shattered at once, and rage flooded him like a dark, hot whirlwind. Harry felt everything around him burning. He turned his head, to make sure Draco was all right, and found Draco standing safely on the other side of the pendulum, beyond which none of the flames could apparently pass.

A cool wind came blowing out of the darkness at the far end of the Room. Harry felt it take his flames and swallow them. In a moment, they were gone, but that didn’t remove the emotions, which circled in him like sharks hungry for blood.

Harry closed his eyes, and gritted his teeth, and drove his palm into the floor as he spoke the words he had to speak. “I do care. Quite obviously. There is part of me that hates them and wants them to die. Also quite obviously. And I need to stop thinking that I’m somehow above that, because if I was, I wouldn’t be feeling this.”

“And there’s no need for you to be a saint,” Draco snapped at him. “Quite obviously. For fuck’s sake, Harry, did you think that you couldn’t be angry?”

“Yes,” said Harry, and then convulsed as another box broke. This let out a bunch of shame that tumbled merrily around in his chest, and he knew that he’d have to deal with that next. “That was exactly what I thought,” he whispered, and took a deep breath, and then he was crying.

Draco slid around the pendulum and came up to put his arms around him. Harry leaned his head on him, and did his best to talk through the sobs. The words didn’t sound that great individually, but, assembled, worked out as:

“I needed this, you know. I wanted to talk to someone so much about my parents before the trial, especially after I’d punished Mrs. Bulstrode and didn’t have that weighing on my mind anymore. I didn’t think there was anyone I could talk to. I was so convinced that you would hate me if you found out about my anger, my hatred, my desire to string them up by their guts until they were dead.”

“I wouldn’t have,” Draco whispered in his ear. “It’s not the kind of thing you’d go to McGonagall about, sure, but I don’t care, Harry, I don’t mind.” His hand was making large circles on Harry’s back now. “I would have helped you string your parents up by the guts.”

Harry found he could still smile, which was at least more than he’d been able to do during his crying jag earlier. “I know. But I still love them, too.”

A startled pause, and then Draco pulled away and glared at him. “And now I know that you’re a bloody idiot.”

Harry glowered in the sharp spark of defiance looking at him. He wanted Draco not to agree with him. He needed to be reminded that there were people in the world who didn’t think like him, who weren’t him, who believed things that were in perfect opposition to his own beliefs and with perfect justification. When he knew that, he had a reason to go on arguing, and he had the necessary caution to keep his magic from making too much of an impact on the world. He couldn’t just do whatever he liked, because there were other people here, too.

Neither Voldemort nor Dumbledore ever really remembered that.

"I am not," he answered. "I love them, Draco. I wish they could have been real parents to me. I told Regulus that when he asked me on Saturday, the day we went to Cobley-by-the-Sea. The only family I've ever wanted to belong to is my own."

Draco flinched as if the vortex had struck him. Then he stood up and moved several steps back. "Harry," he whispered. "Does—I mean, my father hooked you into the wards on Malfoy Manor. Mother and Father gave you an alliance bracelet for your birthday. Does that mean nothing to you? Would you really prefer your mother and father over mine?"

Harry wanted to bite his own tongue, he wanted to take it all back, he wanted to say that of course he hadn't meant it that way and of course he would issue an apology at once—

But this was fear, the kind of fear Connor had talked about, the kind that had made his parents send Peter to Azkaban for crimes he hadn't committed. He had to remember that other people existed, but he couldn't let fear of what they might say prevent him from facing his emotions.

And he had to remember, he had to, that Draco trusted him, loved him, was in love with him. That love was strong enough to survive a disagreement, even a savage one. Harry was walking in strange territory, grasping things he didn't instinctively feel or know, had heard only as proverbs, for guidelines. But if he was ever going to make them part of his own life, then he had to do this.

"I would have preferred my mother and father the way I thought they were for the first eleven years of my life," he said quietly. "My father was the perfect Gryffindor, brave and strong and so like Connor. And my mother was someone I shared a secret trust with. We were going to save the world together. If they were real? Yes, I'd prefer them. Your parents are wonderful, Draco, and they've done so much for me, but I don't belong with them the way you do."

Draco folded his arms and snarled at him, angry tears forming in the corners of his eyes. Harry tried to remember the last time he had seen him this enraged, and didn't think it had been ever.

Fear ate at him. He Vanished it. Fear was the only emotion he was going to refuse to feel this afternoon, because it was fear that had kept him from feeling everything else.

"I'd like to know what other definition of belonging you'd use," said Draco, voice cracking down the middle. "They've welcomed you, treated you like a son, and like a son-in-law, known before you did that I loved you—"

"And all of that's wonderful," said Harry. "But, for example, I don't feel comfortable accepting the Black legacy because I think it should be yours. Or Andromeda's, maybe." He felt a surge of confusion. He let it ripple through him. He was granting permission to himself to do things like that, after all. "That kind of belonging, the kind that comes with blood. I don't feel that with your family. I'm sorry. Maybe I will someday, but I don't right now."

Draco turned away from him. Harry let him. He was still listening—Draco had never been good at the silent treatment—and Harry knew that he was hardly defeated. This was still words. It was still a contest where they could be equal.

"But now I know that my parents weren't the kind of people I thought they were," he whispered. Images of his mother flashed and rippled before his eyes. Whoosh-thrum, the pendulum sang. "I wanted them to be, and I desired them to be. I thought I could still make my mother into that kind of person when she appealed to me. She really did believe that she was saving the world. So, if that much of her was real, why wouldn't the rest of it be?"

"Because she abused you!" Draco screamed, swinging around again. "Does that fact not stay in your mind for longer than two minutes at a time, Harry? What is it going to take to make you think that you're the same as anyone else in rights, that you didn't deserve what she did to you?"

Harry held his eyes, and felt another box fly apart as if struck by a Blasting Curse. "This, I think," he said simply, and then turned and faced the wall. Draco had the good sense to duck behind the pendulum again.

Harry took a deep breath. This time, the air in his lungs seemed to turn to scales. Freezing rage ran along his arms, and manifested as coils, as tails, as hissing, lifted heads, as venomous fangs. Harry whirled, and serpents, magical and mundane, flew from him in every direction, sliding off his shoulders, vomiting themselves up from his throat, flying like sling-stones off his spine. They sped towards the ianthinum and the void at the end of the Room, but there were always more where they came from. Harry's emotions choked him and sped out of him, manifested and choked him again, appeared and then cleared from his throat, until he could finally scream.

"I hate her!"

The words themselves seemed to crack the air. Harry watched as a jagged lightning-bolt shape sped towards the wall, opening the Room up to—nothing behind it, but the crystal ate that, and grew a little closer. Harry could see the silver worms under the blue-purple rock brightening with contentment.

Draco made a small sound that turned Harry back towards him. "You hate who?" he asked.

"My mother," said Harry clearly, and pushed.

The fear he'd felt of saying that shredded and collapsed to the floor in limp rags. He remembered Lily telling him how she'd become a part of the sacrificial ethics Dumbledore preached, and heard, for the first time, as a response to it, not his own pity thinking that he should heal her mind and forgive her, but Connor's voice saying that Lily hadn't been under a web, but Harry had, and he'd still done better than she had.

"Lily Potter," Harry whispered. "I hate her. I hate that she made me into what I am. I hate that I can't just get rid of her. I hate that she'll always have marked me, no matter what I do."

His emotions altered, from the choking serpent-spit to wild contempt like the lash of lightning on a mountaintop.

“And I despise my father,” Harry continued viciously, not knowing he would say the words until he did. “Could he be any more of a coward? Edith Bulstrode is stronger than he is. Connor is stronger than he is. I thought he was going to change, but he couldn’t cling to and keep that change. And if I can’t keep my own change, my own promises, then I’m going to be no better than he is.”

“Harry, don’t say that,” Draco said, coming forward to the edge of the pendulum, and then hesitating again. “You’ll always be stronger than he is.”

Harry scowled at him. “Don’t interrupt.”

Draco shut his mouth.

“Not right now,” Harry added, and tried to keep his tone light, but he couldn’t manage it. He could feel himself prowling back and forth, his scorn rising and fluttering behind him like ragged wings. “Merlin. He lied last year, when he said that he’d always loved me, but he didn’t know what Lily was doing to me. He doesn’t love me. Of course, at this point, who can tell? He was saying something he thought would save his pride, I think, and keep him from being exposed to the shame and ridicule of being a child abuser. But maybe he meant it at the time. He couldn’t keep it up, though.” Harry heard his own voice descend to a hiss. “No matter. I cannot trust him. I am done with him.”

His thoughts swung again. This time, he knew what he was going to do, but he had to pause, to reflect, to reconsider whether it was a good idea. Then he shook his head wildly, impatiently. No, and no, and no again. I don’t want to deal with him again. He can have all the second chances in Tullianum that he wants. I don’t care if Connor visits him, or ignores him. I don’t want him to die, still not now, but I don’t want him as part of my life anymore.

He glanced to the side, and saw the pendulum at the top of its swing. He moved under it and held out his hand, hearing Draco’s shocked gasp, ignoring it. By the time Draco grasped his shoulders and pulled him out of the blade's path, the edge had already cut his palm. So sharp was it that Harry didn't feel the pain until several moments after the cut had appeared.

Harry squeezed it to remove some of the blood, and four drops fell to the floor of the Room. Harry considered whether four would be enough, then decided that he would make it be enough. He was in a wild, fey, impatient mood, and he didn't want to wait any longer.

"I renounce what James Potter has given me," he said calmly. "From this moment, I renounce all claim to Lux Aeterna and the house at Godric's Hollow." One of the drops of blood froze into a pebble, and Harry nodded. "From this moment, I renounce all other Potter inheritances that might possibly pass to me as his son." The second drop burned. "From this moment, I renounce all claim to my middle name, which is his." The third drop turned into water. "From this moment, I renounce all claim to my last name, which is his."

The fourth drop became wind, and a deep, violent, bitter, sweet note of ferocious song. Harry tilted his head back and let it wash over him. The wind became indistinguishable from the swing of the pendulum in a moment. Harry stood there for a long moment, conscious of feeling lighter than he had just a short time before.

"Harry," Draco whispered. "You do realize that you just left yourself penniless, don't you?"

Harry opened his eyes and smiled at him. "And nameless, I know." He shook his head. "I'll survive, thanks to my magic—"

"And to me, you git," Draco cut in. "Not to mention all the other people who would be more than happy to help you."

Harry felt an instinctive revulsion rear up in him. But he looked at the revulsion, and it was revulsion Lily had taught him, to think that he didn't deserve gifts and a sense of belonging. He had told Draco the truth: he didn't fit in with the Malfoys or anyone else just yet. But perhaps he could, someday, and it would be stupid of him to reject that chance, just like the revulsion was stupid.

“Thank you,” he said, and made himself accept it.

He turned, and began walking back and forth again. He almost wanted to swear a vow that he wouldn’t use his magic to interfere with the trial, even if execution was declared for both his parents tomorrow, but the more he thought about it, the more he thought that was unwise. He had to make the decision on his own, or it was worthless. Yes, in some ways he’d have to lay himself under strictures—he grimaced to think of what he’d already decided he’d have to do after they were out of the Room—but he didn’t think this was one of them.

No. I’ll make the promise to myself, and not anyone else. That way, I’ll always have to be vigilant and clear-eyed, and watch myself. I know that I’ll still want to stop the Wizengamot if they decide on death tomorrow, but I have to see if I can actually hold myself back.

He must. He had to. He had to do this, and in some ways it was like surrendering to a law of the inevitable, reassuring and freeing, and in some ways it was like riding a thestral he couldn’t see, plunging into the darkness and trusting that there was something to catch him, from moment to moment.

He took a deep breath, and said, “I hate my mother so much. But I have to go tomorrow. I still know that I’d rejoice if they freed her, because of that part of me that loves her, even though I don’t want to come into contact with her again.” He glanced at Draco. “This time, if you think I’m doing something stupid that’s hurting me more, then you have my permission to force a Calming Draught down my throat, to try and get me to see reason.”

“But not to use a sleeping potion on you,” said Draco, slow realization creeping across his face. “Or remove you from the courtroom.”

Harry shook his head. “I have to watch this. I have to watch if she—if they kill them, Draco. I have to.”

Draco closed his eyes. “I don’t think it’s a good idea, Harry. I think you’ll break.”

"I know," said Harry softly. "And I don't think it's justice, that's why I'd break. But I can't stop the Wizengamot at this point short of compulsion. I won't use that. And I know—" Why was this part suddenly so hard to say? "I know that I can't be objective," he finished, miserably. "Maybe they do have some points, and I just can't see them. Maybe—oh, damnit."

And he was crying again, but Draco was there, holding him up again. Whoosh-thrum, the pendulum sang, and Harry clung to Draco and cried fiercely, out of anger as much as pain.

"Maybe they were right," he whispered, when he could speak again. "Maybe you were right. Maybe I was being abused, and denying that it was abuse."

He felt a great shudder run through Draco, the kind of motion a prisoner might make when getting up after being bound to a rack and stretching. Harry held on to him, and watched the walls part in his mind. If he was riding a thestral he couldn't see, it was carrying him high and far and fast now, and Harry couldn't tell for sure if the light ahead was sunrise or sunset.

I'll just have to take the chance, won't I? It's all new now. It's all changing. I thought everything was settled after I resculpted my mind, but it's never settled, it can't be settled. I'm going to have to change from moment to moment. I'm going to have to listen to Draco and Snape and all the others and evaluate what they say, not just trust that they're right or I am. I'm going to have to refrain from using my magic some of the time, and use it at others, sternly enough that my enemies will realize they shouldn't try to kill anyone on my side. I'm going to have to lead.

This time, he was the one who shuddered, and his magic spun around him like thrumming thestral wings, so chaotic that Harry couldn't tell what shape it formed from moment to moment. It bore him over a changing world. He closed his eyes and stood in the middle of rushing black wind.

But he was also firmly in the middle of Draco's arms, and that was what kept him grounded, spinning around a center instead of just flying loose and wild in the storm.

I've fallen once. I'll go on falling, and trust that he's there to catch me.

Harry hoped he would grow to trust others as much, in time—though he wasn't entirely sure Draco would want that—but it would have to begin here, with this one person. He trusted Draco with his life, his sanity, his weakness. Draco had taken the central place in his life that Connor had once held, but Harry couldn't just serve him the way he held Connor.

Merlin, I'm in love with him.

The realization almost made Harry lift his head and jerk away, but then he burrowed in once more and clung close. Draco grasped his hand and squeezed tightly. Harry chuckled.

"Don't damage that," he whispered. "I have to write a letter when we're out of here."

"A letter?" Draco pulled back enough to look at him.

Harry nodded. "A letter to—to the Seers. I can't go to the Sanctuary, not when there's a war on—"

"Yes, you can—" Draco began.

"No, I can't," Harry disagreed, vehemently enough to shut Draco up. "It's too isolated, and news takes too long to travel there. But maybe one of the Seers would agree to come here, and speak with me. I think I want them to now. Isn't that odd?" he added, meditatively.

"No," said Draco, who looked as though Christmas had come early.

Harry snorted. "Yes, you wouldn't think so."

He pulled back, and closed his eyes, and took a deep breath, and felt around in himself. He couldn't feel any more boxes, any more need to explode with magic right now. He'd renounced his father, and committed himself to surviving the trial, and to at least considering that what other people said about his parents had more basis in reality than his own beliefs. He'd admitted he hated them. He'd had an argument with Draco, and fallen in love, and come to the realization that there wasn't just one course he could take and have it all be better. He thought that was enough for one hour.

"I think we're done here," he said.

Whoosh-thrum, the pendulum sang, and then it embedded itself in the floor, and stopped. The door opened.

Draco didn't believe it—he didn't dare let himself believe it, in some ways—until he came back into their bedroom from using the loo and saw Harry sitting with his Transfiguration textbook braced on his knee, under a piece of parchment, on which he steadily scribbled. Then he had to creep around to Harry's shoulder and read what the letter already said.

Dear Vera,

I know that you made the offer to me, once, to come to the Sanctuary. I still don't think I can do that, but will you, or another Seer, send me post, or come to Hogwarts to speak with me? I think I'm ready to speak to you about the state of my soul now. I'd prefer you, out of all of them, but as long as you're sure that the Seer sent is equally gifted and compassionate, then—

Draco had to put his hand on Harry's shoulder. Harry looked up at him, cocking his head.

"What?"

Draco said, "I love you, that's all," while around him he felt the wind of the future catch them up, and hurtle them forward.

Chapter Forty-Five: Spake As His Soul Bore Witness

Harry knew there were eyes on him. He would always be sensitive to that feeling, he thought, and the more because of his new change. Since he couldn't ease the staring with hiding and shrinking away, it would be harder to bear for a time.

He sat down at breakfast and ate his porridge. He knew people were murmuring rumors of the trial yesterday, and poking each other to go up and ask him questions about it. Harry ignored them. He knew the Daily Prophet had arrived, and from the way that people went quiet, the story on the front page must be about him. Harry ignored that. He kept his gaze on the porridge. The other Slytherins didn't bother him, though they gave him many puzzled glances, clearly unable to comprehend why he would be up this early when he didn't have to attend classes.

"Harry, you prat," Draco said from behind him, in a nasty tone. "You could have awakened me and told me that you were coming down to the Great Hall for breakfast." He dropped into the chair beside Harry's and glared at him, before helping himself moodily to a plate of sausages, as if to say that Harry could eat bland things, but he didn't have to.

Harry shrugged. "I couldn't sleep. I figured you would want to." He ate another spoonful of porridge.

Draco lowered his voice. "But you could have avoided all—this." He waved one hand to encompass the staring and the rustling and the whispering and the other signs of a bunch of people too interested in his business. "Didn't you want to do that?"

"I've got to get used to it sooner or later," said Harry quietly, and met Draco's eyes. "Since, after all, I don't plan to hide who I am any more."

The smile that spread across Draco's face at that was really quite frightening. Harry found himself eyeing it as cautiously as some of the Ravenclaws watched him. Draco leaned nearer and stared hard into his eyes, then turned away and went back to his sausages, now helped along by a generous goblet of pumpkin juice.

Harry stared at the back of his head, then shrugged and started eating again. He supposed he would get used to that in time, too, at least if Draco planned to do it on a regular basis.

“Potter.”

Harry paused with his spoon halfway to his mouth. He knew that voice, but it wasn't one he'd expected to hear. He carefully set the spoon back in the bowl, and the bowl a good distance from his elbow, before turning around. Then he had to lean sideways, to stop Draco from going for his wand at once. Really, I'm not the only one who needs to make some changes. I know why he's overprotective of me right now, but he knows what I cursed her with.

“What do you want, Parsons?” he asked the Ravenclaw, who stood behind him, shielding herself with the Prophet as if paper would somehow protect her from powerful magic.

“I—I want to know if it's true,” she said, and fluttered the paper at him, too rapidly for Harry to make out the headline or the photograph on the front page. Luckily, Margaret elaborated a moment later. “I want to know if you really are the Boy-Who-Lived, the one who bounced back the Killing Curse.”

Harry rolled his eyes. Connor had come up to him yesterday evening and said he was sorry again, but wasn't that just like a Gryffindor, to blurt out something like that because he got angry? “Yes, I am,” he said, and tried to return to his porridge.

“But that changes everything,” Margaret told his back.

“Why?” Harry glanced over his shoulder, not trying to hide the dislike in his eyes. If she didn't know how he felt about her by now, she was truly mad. “Because you think the Boy-Who-Lived must be inherently of the Light?”

Margaret frowned. “Aren't you?”

“For Merlin’s sake,” said Harry. “You were the one who thought I was Dark, evil enough to curse, for getting your Headmaster in trouble. And now you’re ready to reverse everything that you believed about me, for the sake of one article? Come off it.” He took a bite of porridge, and then said out of the corner of his mouth, when he’d swallowed, “Draco, put your wand down.”

“Just one hex,” said Draco.

Harry shook his head. “She can’t use magic against you anyway, and it’s not fair, considering that other curse I put on her.”

“But I want to,” said Draco. He didn’t have a dreamy expression on his face, only a determined one. Harry knew he might choose a pain curse, though Margaret hadn’t done anything that awful to Harry himself; she’d hurt Argutus more. “And you want to,” Draco added, causing Harry to reflect that this conscious effort to drop his mask and show more of his emotions wasn’t always an unmitigated good.

“Put it down,” said Harry. He spoke to Margaret without turning his head again. “I didn’t defeat Voldemort because of any inherent Light I have. The decisions I’ve made between that night and now are what put me in Slytherin and made me into the person you said you despised. So, yes, it’s true, but you don’t have to let it change your mind. Think differently about me, think the same, I don’t care. Just let me eat my breakfast in peace, Parsons.”

Eat my breakfast in peace, and not think about having to be in the courtroom in an hour. They’ll do the sentencing today, I think. There wasn’t as much witness testimony to get through as I thought there would be, since no one testified for the defense.

Harry could feel his stomach dropping away from him as he thought about it. The Wizengamot had a good chance of sentencing at least his mother to death; whispers he’d heard yesterday and disregarded were rushing back to him now. The testimony’s many interruptions and irregularities had all been of the kind that flowed against her.

Harry wondered for a moment what he could have done to save her, then shook his head. He knew one answer to that; the magic slumbering around him in shimmering waves could have changed their minds, yes. And he had already said that he wouldn't walk that path, that it would make him too much like Dumbledore.

I didn't know that I would still want to save her so much, he reflected dismally, as he bit into a scone. I hated her so much last night that I forgot I also love her.

"Harry?" Draco whispered into his ear. "Are you well? You're shaking."

Harry shook his head. "Not going to vomit," he murmured. "Just thinking about what they'll do to my parents." He wondered distantly if he should have been more concerned over James, but he was fairly certain James would survive. The crimes he was accused of were less pernicious, and when he'd asked Connor yesterday what James's testimony had been like, his brother's report eased his worries further. The Wizengamot would laugh at James and give him imprisonment in Tullianum. Harry had already learned yesterday, in the Room, that he could live with that.

"Are you sure you should go today?" Draco brought him back from his racing thoughts, with a gentle touch on his arm and a fierce look in his eyes.

"Yes," Harry whispered. "I do owe them a witnessing, Draco."

"Why?"

"Because I would owe anyone a witnessing," said Harry. "Imagine having your magic stripped from you alone, Draco, knowing that everyone in the audience hated you."

"But you hate them, too," said Draco.

"And love them."

Draco clamped his lips together, his nostrils flaring, and Harry remembered his reaction to that declaration last night. He wondered if they were going to have a row during breakfast. But Draco just nodded, in the end, and ate several pieces of sausage to relieve his feelings.

“Potter?”

Harry tensed his muscles to keep himself from startling. He’d had no idea that Margaret was still there, since she hadn’t said anything. “Yes?” he asked mildly, refusing to face her.

“I hope your parents live.” This time, Harry heard her walk away.

“Bloody bitch,” Draco said, the insult the more vicious for being so soft, not less. “She probably means that she hopes they live to hurt you more. Bloody bitch. I hate her so much, Harry.”

“Aren’t you full of light and cheerfulness at the world this morning?” Harry asked, while his mind traced the outline of Margaret’s words again. “And I don’t think she meant that, or she would have said she hoped they went free. She may actually want them to live because she knows I would be upset if they died, Draco.”

Upset...does not quite cover it. The thought of their deaths set Harry’s world spinning dizzily on its axis. Harry covered it with short, thick bites of his scone, and a few swallows of pumpkin juice. The dizziness wasn’t the kind that would cause him to be sick. Harry hoped.

“She doesn’t,” Draco insisted. “She can’t mean you good.”

“I stand by what I said about light and cheerfulness.” Harry could feel himself creating a box again, to conceal his terror of what would happen. Carefully, he shut his eyes and stopped it. He made boxes clumsily now anyway, as he had seen yesterday. He didn’t want this one bursting open in the middle of the trial.

But I can use a mask to conceal what I’m feeling just enough to let myself appear calm. And if I see a chance to do my parents good, then I'll take it. No magic, no compulsion at all, nothing that will hurt another person or me. But I don't know what the Wizengamot's decided, or how far along they might be towards sentencing. There may still be hope.

Harry wondered if he would feel this same painful sensation of standing on a precipice and not knowing whether a long drop or a gentle step lay below him before every major decision, before every battle.

If so, then that's what I'll have to feel. Harry shivered, and picked up his spoon again, while a cold wind seemed to speed along his skin. Maybe, if Vera or another Seer arrives soon, they can help me work through this. Realistically, though, Harry knew that his letter would take at least two weeks to reach the Sanctuary. He would have to cope on his own for some time.

I can do that. I meant what I decided. I'm not going back on any part of it. Harry hesitated as something else brushed against his mind. If I meant what I decided, then I should be able to take comfort from Draco. I don't think he would mind. Cautiously, he leaned towards Draco.

Draco was more than happy to wind an arm around his waist and attend to eating his breakfast with one hand. Harry sighed. The warmth of Draco's touch seemed to alleviate the dizziness, and let him eat more.

And I really do deserve this as much as anyone else? That was still a shy, fugitive thought, darting across his mind from one hiding place to another. I suppose I might. How strange.

Draco kept a close eye on Harry as they entered the Wizengamot's courtroom. Strong as Harry was, wonderful and marvelous as the changes he had made yesterday were, this was still the day that might see the death of his parents, or at least their imprisonment and the loss of magic from the one who still had it. Draco would have been more worried if Harry looked like an ice statue.

He didn't. Harry had bitten his lip raw already. His hand frequently closed into a fist, though Draco got him to open it by pretending that he needed to have his hair stroked. He lifted his head as if to peer over the heads of the people in front of them, though not even the full Wizengamot was there yet, and certainly not the prisoners.

"Draco. Harry."

Draco turned his head and met Snape's gaze. The professor had apparently stayed so late at the Ministry last night that he'd wound up sleeping there. His eyes were sharply alert, though, and he held himself like a coiling serpent. Draco could imagine that this day was as much a relief to him as it was a source of stress to Harry. At least the trial would end, and one of the two spells he'd launched into motion would have found its target. There remained Dumbledore's trial in March to deal with, but that was distant enough to allow Harry at least some peace.

And Snape some time to reconcile with him, which Draco knew was on his mind. No one outside Slytherin House would believe the way those dark eyes looked as they rested on Harry.

They narrowed, though, and Draco knew why. Snape would be examining Harry's eyes, his emotions, for traces of Occlumency pools, and not finding any. Harry had gone unshielded today.

Snape's eyes moved from Harry's face to his, and they bore a clear command. Draco nodded. "I'll be right back, Harry," he whispered, and then stood and followed his Head of House down the row of chairs and towards the doors of the courtrooms.

Snape leaned on the wall in the corridor outside and cast a Silencing Charm around them. "What has happened?" he demanded.

Draco smiled. He wondered if the professor had had any good news since the trial began. He doubted it. It felt better than he knew it should to be the bearer of that good news. "Harry faced himself in the Room of Requirement yesterday," he said simply. "He was able to say that he hated his parents, and he cried, and he made a commitment to facing the future with me." He paused to savor

Snape's stunned expression, before finishing with the two pieces of news he knew would mean the most. "And he rejected his last and middle names, and he willingly called upon a Seer."

"What."

Snape didn't say the word as if he were disbelieving, but more as if he dared not hope this was true. Draco nodded. "No one suggested it to him," he said. "I certainly didn't. But he bears only his first name now. He despises his father too much to receive that legacy. And he doesn't want to go to the Sanctuary, but he did write to Vera, the Seer he met last year when you were—away—and asked her to write to him or come to Hogwarts."

"What happened to him?" Snape whispered.

"He really, really doesn't want to be like Dumbledore," said Draco, with a shrug. He at least understood Harry's goal of not ever using his magic to compel or hurt another person, though he thought it unrealistic and wished that Harry would spend his magic on himself a bit more. "The temptation to become that way scared him so much he was able to drag himself through some of his fears."

"I wish I had been there."

Snape's voice was pure longing for that one moment, a yearning that Draco had only heard in other voices before when someone discussed originating a spell or being close to the source of mighty magic. He understood it perfectly, though. If Snape had been the one to go with Harry yesterday, he would be feeling that same envy himself.

"He'll reconcile with you," he said softly. "He'll forgive you for this."

Snape grimaced. "I am not so sure," he murmured. "Not after yesterday."

"Professor Snape," said Draco, wondering at the strangeness of his taking a comforter's role to this man even as he did so, "he can forgive—that woman. I think he can forgive you. And if it takes some time to come, it'll just show that it's genuine, not the trained emotion that he feels for her."

Snape closed his eyes and said nothing for a long moment. Draco shook his head. You may not feel that you belong anywhere but with the family who bore you, Harry, but, Merlin, open your eyes. Snape would give everything he has to be your father. In a sense, he's already given up his invulnerability, his comfort, even his capacity for objective thought.

It was strange that he knew that without empathy, and it was strange that this was happening, and the strangeness thrummed in his blood. But Draco wasn't tempted to walk away from it. After the Room of Requirement, strangeness alone wasn't going to make him flinch.

Then Snape straightened with a snap, and all his masks came down again. "Thank you, Draco," he said coolly. "Did he say anything about what measures he is willing to let us take, if he becomes upset again?"

"A Calming Potion," said Draco. "Forced down his throat, if need be. But he gave that permission only to me." He couldn't quite help snapping the words. As Harry improved, other people might think they could approach him more freely, require things of him that he hadn't given so far. Draco was determined that some of those gifts would be his. His jealousy would be unfathomable to Harry, at least for a while. Draco didn't care. This was the way he was. "No sleeping potions, nor binding spells, nor removal from the room."

Snape gave a faint half-smile, and Draco wondered for a moment if he were seen as much as he saw. "Very well, then." The professor put a hand in his robe pocket, and Draco tensed out of instinct grown paranoid over Ravenclaws, but Snape merely handed over several blue vials. "This is all I carry at the moment."

Draco accepted them. "Thank you, sir," he said.

A movement, and a wave of people began to flow past them. Snape lifted his head, and his eyes grew more distant. "They finished the testimony yesterday," he said quietly. "There will be a summary of the case, after they bring in the prisoners, and then the Wizengamot votes on their fate.”

“What do you think it will be, sir?” Draco asked. He knew what he thought, but Snape had seen far more of the testimony than he had.

Snape’s mouth pulled into a thin line, and his eyes glittered with some emotion that, for Draco, had no name. “For James Potter? Stripping of his magic, and imprisonment for life in Tullianum.” He shook his head. “For that woman? Execution.”

Harry watched the Wizengamot members settle into place. Amelia Bones still led them, he saw. She had taken her place behind the questioner’s desk, and watched the doors impatiently, as if longing for the moment when they could close them.

Harry glanced swiftly around. A great many people watched him, but none hovered on the edges of their chairs, the way he thought witnesses who had yet to bear their witness would. That meant—he thought it had to mean—that the testimony was done with. From the books he had read, he knew Madam Bones would speak for a few moments, reminding everyone of the major points from the case, before the vote started.

And it meant he had a chance.

Harry could feel his palm begin to sweat. That was all right. He controlled his face, and he doubted anyone had cast a spell that would let them smell his sweat, specifically, across this distance. And if they had? Could anyone really doubt that he was nervous, this morning?

He caught Connor’s eye as he arrived. His brother smiled at him, a nervous look, but his eyes glinted with determination. Harry knew Connor wouldn’t speak against whatever punishment the Wizengamot decided on—unless they released his parents, in which case he would probably be the first around the balcony railing to strike at Madam Bones. Harry had seen the expression on his face yesterday. It was Connor’s “I am just barely restraining myself from violence” look.

And he only wears that when he's really, genuinely angry. I'll have to apologize for asking him to lie.

Draco touched his shoulder and his hair, then slid into place beside him. "Professor Snape says that the Aurors will bring your parents in just a few moments," he murmured. "Are you ready?"

"I bloody well hope so." And Harry did. His plan was a light, fragile thing, made of leaves, really, and anything could destroy it. If he didn't get to put it into play, which was entirely possible, then its failure might destroy him. He had to be ready for either occurrence.

He could feel Draco's odd look boring into the side of his face. He ignored that, in favor of watching the lower courtroom doors as they opened and the Aurors marched Lily and James Potter in.

James walked with his head bowed and his gaze fixed on the floor. Harry thought that he didn't fully understand what he'd got himself into, even now, and what a decision against him by the Wizengamot could mean. He felt a stirring of pity inside him for the man. He paused, then allowed it. He had expressed his contempt yesterday afternoon. This was a new day, what could be the last day of at least one of his parents' lives. He would treat it with the seriousness it deserved. If pity was the closest he could get to compassion for James, he would take it.

Lily walked with her head up, and turning from side to side. Several times, her eyes went to the area of the galleries where he'd sat yesterday. Harry was a good distance back from that now, though, with Draco planted slightly in front of him, and straining as if he'd like to be completely in front. If Lily felt disappointed at not finding him, she didn't show it. She merely looked ahead, and wore a bored expression as the Aurors bound her to the second prisoner's chair beside James.

"The spectators will stop talking," said Madam Bones, with a Sonorus charm enhancing her voice. Harry was amazed at how quickly the chattering stopped. Then he realized that most of the room was probably eager to see his parents sentenced, and clenched his hand into a fist.

Madam Bones remained silent for a moment herself, surveying the room regally, like an eagle from a mountaintop. Harry knew this was the best chance he would ever have. He stood.

“Madam Bones,” he said clearly, ignoring Draco’s hissed, “What are you doing?”

The questioner turned and looked at him, blinking a bit, as if he’d woken her from a dream of justice. “Mr. Potter—” she began.

“Not Potter, anymore.” Harry shook his head. “I renounced my surname yesterday afternoon, Madam. Harry will do.”

He heard chains rattle in the middle of the floor as James apparently jerked against his bonds. Harry didn’t care. His attention was for Madam Bones, and what she might or might not allow him to do. She was frowning slightly, as if he had handed her a Firewhiskey when she wanted butterbeer.

“Harry, then,” she said. “Surely you know that this is irregular. The time for witnesses to speak is past. I will summarize the case for the Wizengamot, and then will come the vote and the sentencing.”

“I know that, Madam,” said Harry, “but this whole trial has been irregular. I ask for your indulgence one more time.” Draco tugged at his sleeve. Harry ignored him, and remained on his feet. His hand did slip when he tried to put it on his robes, so slick with sweat was it. Harry didn’t let that show on his face.

As he’d hoped, the odd, formal way he spoke intrigued Madam Bones. She nodded to him.

“I would like to ask permission to speak one final defense of my parents,” Harry said, making sure to project his voice to all parts of the courtroom, raising it louder and adding a touch of magic to it when the buzz from the shocked and the appalled and the amused nearly overrode his words. “I give you my word that I shall use no magic to influence the vote or the sentencing. I wish only to speak. I was not able to finish my own testimony yesterday, and then I was part of two witnesses' performances that I should not have been. I would like the opportunity to give my own speech, in full. If you and the Wizengamot will allow it, of course, Madam," Harry went on, turning back to Madam Bones.

Madam Bones seemed entirely at a loss for words. She opened her mouth, then shut it swiftly again, as if she didn't want to leave her jaw hanging open. And then she looked at the Wizengamot for guidance.

Harry's hopes climbed rapidly. His chances increased with every moment she didn't just refuse.

Draco tugged violently enough at him that Harry had to pay attention. "What are you doing?" he repeated. "Don't do this."

"I want to," said Harry gently. He wondered, afterwards, if it was the gentleness or the wording that made Draco stop, and sit up, and stare him full in the face, instead of just obliviously insisting that he was wrong and Draco right.

"Merlin and his demons, Harry," said Draco, which wasn't an oath that Harry had heard him use before. He breathed out in short huffs, and with each huff, one of his fingers let loose of the sleeve of Harry's robes. "All right."

Harry nodded, and looked back up at the front of the room. Madam Bones was speaking in heated whispers with someone who had leaned forward from his seat. Harry blinked when the man sat back again, and he realized it was Scrimgeour. Usually, he could sense the Minister's presence at once. He radiated power that had nothing to do with magic. This time, he had kept himself to the background.

In fact, why did he let Madam Bones take over at all? Yes, his moderating the trial might have been a conflict of interest, but everything else about this trial has been unfair and anything but disinterested.

Harry shook his head. Perhaps it was Scrimgeour's trust in him to do the right thing, a trust that seemed to have been restored now that he knew Harry wasn't the one who had used the compulsion spell.

"We will allow it," said Madam Bones, and Harry had more proof of that trust.

"Thank you, Madam." Harry inclined his head towards her, and towards the Wizengamot, and then made for the staircase that would take him down into the main courtroom. Draco probably did make a grab for his robes then; Harry didn't think he'd realized where he intended to stand. But Harry slipped past it, and made his way briskly forward.

He could feel his heartbeat, thin and chill, in his mouth. He felt the importance of the moment threaten to freeze him and make him unable to say anything.

But, no. I won't allow that. That would be the only disaster. This is a slim, fragile hope at best, and I might stammer and I might phrase things wrongly, and that would be all right. But not speaking at all, now that I have the chance, is indefensible.

He reached the bottom of the stairs, and found himself suddenly closer to both the man who had sired him and the woman who had borne him than he'd been for five months. Harry lifted his gaze and moved resolutely forward. He met their eyes, which was harder than deciding to speak for them in the first place.

James's eyes were haunted with warring emotions, dashing and colliding like stormclouds. Sometimes he looked worried, sometimes hopeful, sometimes upset, sometimes defeated. Harry wished the courageous emotions would win, but he doubted they could, at this point in James's life.

Lily's eyes held quiet satisfaction, and she nodded to him as he came to a stop next to James's chair. "That's it, Harry," she whispered. "I knew you would do this."

You didn't know a fucking thing, Harry thought, and held her eyes, and forced himself to remember yesterday, when she had encouraged him to break her chains. She wanted him to forget that she had tried to incite him against the court. She wanted to take credit for his decision to use only words today. Harry wouldn't let her.

His hatred howled at him. He pushed it gently away. He would no longer deny it, but it didn't have control of his life. Yesterday had been its day.

Today, he spoke out of love.

He turned and met Madam Bones's eyes. She shrugged. "You may as well go ahead, Mr.—Harry," she said, voice twisting oddly.

Harry nodded, and felt wind come rushing towards him and mantle him in cold wings. He was riding above the darkness on a thestral again, not knowing where he was going to land, not knowing how to stop, not knowing how to turn aside—

So you're alive, then? Good.

Harry pulled himself through the irony of the voice in his mind, which sounded a lot like Vera's, and reached for the words he needed.

"I was abused," he said quietly. "You know that now. You've heard the explanation of my mother's motives for doing so. I doubt you found them adequate." An explosion of snorts from the Wizengamot indicated that he'd been correct. "You've heard how my father didn't know of the abuse, and then ignored it and its consequences when he was made aware of it."

Harry heard tears gathering thickly in the back of his voice. He considered, then let them sound, but not pour down his face. He wouldn't try the equivalent of Connor's little trick in his testimony yesterday. He would, instead, show them what he was feeling, stripping off his mask and stepping into the world.

"I can feel hatred. I can allow that to myself. I can feel pain, and dread the road ahead, since it's going to take me so long to recover."

“Harry,” Lily hissed out of the corner of her mouth. “Harry, what are you doing?”

“But I can also feel love,” Harry continued. “There are moments in my parents’ lives when none of this happened. Their abuse of me does not define them, though I think it’s been allowed to do so, in this courtroom.” A few of the Wizengamot members actually shuffled their feet at that. Interesting. So they know they’re not objective, then, and they just didn’t care. “You’ve heard part of the explanation for my mother’s behavior, but not the whole of it. She made the decisions she did out of fear and a desire to belong. Albus Dumbledore told her when she was quite young, thirteen or fourteen, that she had a destiny, to carry the wizarding world into the future. My mother was a Muggleborn, and most of the students in school didn’t accept her or were afraid of what it would mean to relate to her, during the first years of Voldemort’s rise. She, and several other Muggleborn students, loved the idea of serving as sacrifices to rescue the wizarding world from itself, to keep it alive when Dumbledore convinced them no one else would. Think of it. Thirteen years old, and she could do what neither adults nor her pureblood classmates could. She was excited, of course.”

“Harry, stop this,” Lily whispered. “I knew what I was choosing. Do not try to blame Albus. He taught me ethics, not wound the rope around my brain that you are claiming. He did not abuse me.”

“None of that excuses her,” Harry said. “But it explains her.

“And my father... he was afraid. He told me the story himself of how he went slightly mad when hearing of how the Lestranges attacked and tortured Frank and Alice Longbottom. This was in the aftermath of the attack on us. He went after Bellatrix and Rodolphus and used Dark spells on them.” No need to mention that it was an Unforgivable. He’s not on trial for that. “He feared himself. He removed himself from Auror work the next day, and spent the next decade with us in Godric’s Hollow behind isolation wards, growing steadily more and more fearful of the outside world. He didn’t have the purpose that Lily and I did, to keep him going, and he didn’t have my brother’s innocent conviction that he, too, was destined to save the world. He thought he'd played some part in the saving, and failed badly.

"None of that excuses him. But it explains him.

"The saddest thing about all of this is the wreck of our lives." Harry tilted his head towards his parents. So I think of them, one last time and no more. "So many people we could have been, so many things we could have done, so many other roads we might have walked, broken and stripped away." He had to close his eyes for a moment to hold back the tears, remembering what Vera had said to him when she saw his soul, about how Harry valued the endless unfolding of possibilities for other people, so long as they did not infringe on the freedom of others. They could have grown out of themselves, become so much more, in such profusion of beauty, than they did. Yes, I mourn that, and always will. For them, and for Sirius, and for Peter, and for Dumbledore, and for me, for all the people we might have been.

"I'm in a position to recover, somewhat. I was a victim of abuse, and, as my brother said yesterday, managed to step out of it and break the webs that held me. I have people who will continue to help me heal. But all Lily and James Potter have is a mentor who sacrificed them as he did so much else, friends who have turned their backs on them in justified disgust, a son who hates them for not letting him make his own choices, and me."

Harry turned to face Lily and James. He had to. The motion of his speech, the spiral it was taking, required it. James just stared at him as if he had never seen him before. Lily's eyes were filled with tears, and she was shaking her head back and forth.

"Harry," she said. "You cannot—you cannot be free. You can't have broken all the webs. You will be a Dark Lord if you do."

Harry looked directly into her eyes, and answered her, and answered the staring, silent Wizengamot up above.

"I plead for them because I cannot help but plead for them, because they are living souls in the world who have no one else, and I love them. They have done harm, and they must be punished, and their healing is beyond my power. But I can ask that they be left alone, that the wreck of their lives not be ground into smaller pieces.”

Harry glanced up again at the Wizengamot, over his shoulder. “And I can plead for myself. It was for my sake the charges were filed, that the case was brought like this against both my parents and Albus Dumbledore.” Do you hear me, Snape? I understand, now, why you did it. Understanding is not forgiveness, but it may be a beginning of it. “A healing and a cleansing has begun in me with this trial. I can ask that it not be paired with sorrow as love and hatred are paired in my emotions with my parents. I ask for the Wizengamot to consider life in Tullianum for both of them. Abroad in the world, my parents can grind down other lives. Locked in one place, they can at least dwell with their own hearts, in their own silence, and rend and be rent no longer.”

The silence that had fallen was more still than death, and so Harry thought the entire court heard Lily’s reply to him. “Do you even know what you’re asking for, Harry? Why are you doing this, if you’re not going to ask for our freedom?”

Harry faced her again. The green eyes were the eyes of the woman who loved him, the woman who hated him, the woman who’d shared a secret and wonderful fate with him, the woman who had trained him in things that Harry now found so disgusting.

The woman who, more than any other, had made him what he was, but not what he might become.

“Because my own soul requires it,” Harry answered.

He turned back to the Wizengamot. “I have nothing else to say. Thank you.”

He climbed the staircase. His heartbeat sang in his ears, thin and high as the cry of a diving seabird. He fell limply into Draco’s arms when he reached the top of the steps, but then clung like a starfish when he realized just who was holding him.

“Harry,” Draco said into his ear, and no more.

Harry let himself be escorted back to his chair. He sat down, and leaned on Draco’s shoulder, and didn’t listen as Madam Bones summarized the case in a strained voice for the Wizengamot. He didn’t listen, either, as the vote went through condemning Lily and James as guilty, and thus worthy of sentencing, not freedom. That, they had had no chance to avoid, with the evidence of their crimes everywhere and no one denying they had actually happened. Besides, not a single person voted for innocence, vaguely surprising Harry. He supposed Dumbledore’s spell might have influenced the trial less than he originally thought.

And then came the sentencing.

“Speak your choice,” said Madam Bones. “For James Potter, imprisonment in Tullianum without magic, or death. Madam Marchbanks.”

“Tullianum,” said Madam Marchbanks, and Madam Bones nodded, and her gaze moved on.

Harry closed his eyes, but relaxed when he realized that there were twenty-eight votes for Tullianum. The Wizengamot had fifty-one members. Even if the rest of them voted for death, there was no way that James would not be spared.

And then came the moment when Madam Bones said, “Lily Potter. The choices are imprisonment in Tullianum—she has already been stripped of her magic, thanks to events that we all saw yesterday—or death. Madam Marchbanks.”

Harry looked into the face of the old witch, who was friends with the southern goblins, and had helped him free them and secure the London tunnels when he thought Voldemort’s attack might fall there. She looked fierce.

“Death,” she said.

Harry closed his eyes.

The next witch voted for life in Tullianum, and then the world altered and became unreal in Harry's consciousness. He couldn't feel his own breathing, but he could feel Draco's. He could hear the voices calling out their votes, but he shouldn't have been able to hear them at all, since his own heartbeat was so loud.

He counted. He had two lists, a ledger in his mind, and for each vote, a quill inked down a word on either side.

Ten for death, eight for Tullianum...

And then another for death, and two more for Tullianum, and what did that make?

"Tullianum," said another voice, and Harry panicked. He'd lost the count.

He could feel his breath speeding up, to the point of a panic attack. He felt Draco exclaim something softly, and then a vial was jostling at his lips, the sweet smell of a Calming Draught filling his nostrils. Harry gulped it, and then struggled against the serenity that spread over his thoughts. He had to think, damn it!

The doom went on spreading, voice by voice down the circle, and Harry did not know what was to happen, and he hung suspended over a knife's edge. Everything hurt—his eyes, as if he'd spent a month weeping; his throat, as though it were closing in on itself; his skin, as though it could hardly bear to have Draco's arms wrapped so tightly around him. The Calming Draught forced his muscles to relax against their will, and his mind not to speed so fast, but nothing could stop the Wizengamot members from speaking.

And then Madam Bones said, "Minister Scrimgeour."

Scrimgeour. Who hated his parents. Who hated abusers. Who had promised James that he would look over the charges again, and try to see if he couldn't get him charged with something more violent than neglect.

Harry found his eyes open without a notion of how he'd opened them. He was looking straight at Scrimgeour, who was looking straight back at him. Somehow, that did not surprise Harry.

Scrimgeour looked into his eyes for a moment that could not have been longer than a moment, because Madam Bones didn't get impatient and ask for his vote again. His eyes were yellow, one indication of Light pureblood heritage, and merciless and fathomless as an eagle's. Then he leaned nearer to Madam Bones, and he spoke. Harry saw his lips form the word as if in a dream.

"Tullianum," he said.

Madam Bones nodded, looking slightly dazed. "Lily Potter goes to Tullianum for life."

Harry felt himself sag back; the words had stolen all his own power to keep himself upright. He felt Draco's arms come around him, and pull him in tight, and he knew he was crying again. He had the urge to raise his hand and wipe at the tears. Merlin, he was so sick of crying.

But he couldn't, he truly couldn't this time. The moment was past, and he might have helped to save her life, and he was free, the last tie severed.

James tried not to fight when the Aurors stepped back into the courtroom. It would be all right, he told himself. There was still time for Harry—just Harry now, but the renunciation of a name didn't mean the renunciation of a family—to come leaping over the balcony railing and save him.

And then an Auror was undoing the shackles, and another pulling him to his feet, and James realized, realized, that he would not be saved this time, that there was no magical cure, no sudden reversal of fortune, to spare him the loss of his magic.

"No!" he screamed, and his magic rose, wandless, and lashed at the Aurors. They'd expected that, though, and one of them cast up a shield to defend his partner. That partner stepped up a moment later, James's brief fury done with, to clasp a collar around his neck with a murmured incantation. James knew the collars and the spell, both, from his time in the Aurors. It would bind his magic to his body permanently. It was only used as a prelude to a criminal's being led off to lose his magic entirely.

Truth struck him and exploded his mind.

"No!" he screamed again, and he might have fallen to the floor, and he might have struck someone, or kicked someone, but he didn't know, he didn't think, he couldn't think, his mind swimming in uttermost despair, inevitability—

Until the moment the Aurors brought him into the room with the artifact that would strip him of his magic, and there was no escape. Lucius narrowed his eyes and gave a small shrug. It was not the outcome he had expected—nor, indeed, the outcome he had desired, since it now meant his spell on Lily Potter, the one that would insure she felt the few seconds of her death as a year of torture and pain, would not be allowed to come into play. But then, perhaps he should not have expected anything else, when they had a vates in the courtroom.

A vates who had just renounced his last name, apparently.

Would he like another one? Lucius thought, amused, but he knew better than to ask the question now. He rose and held out his arm to his wife, who accepted it with grace. Her red gown rustled around her.

"Pleasant not to have to declare blood-feud on anyone for a wrong verdict, isn't it, my dear?" he murmured, as he guided her towards the doors.

Narcissa tilted back so that her head rested on his shoulder, her eyes bright with half a dozen emotions Lucius did not often see there. But her answer was purely herself. "Of course it is. You know that the Wizengamot only made the decision that it did because of me, I hope, and their fear of being on the wrong end of my wand."

Lucius laughed aloud, a sound that caused most of the people in the nearby galleries to turn around and stare at him. He did not care. Those people were not married to his wife.

Indigena Yaxley rose slowly to her feet, her eyes narrowed and thoughtful.

Well. The Dark Lord wanted me to see this and report anything interesting to him. I shall have more than merely interesting things to report.

She worked her way down the stairs, pausing patiently when others forced themselves past her. She wasn't in a hurry to go anywhere. And the constant pauses allowed her to gaze her fill on—Harry? Lord Harry? She was not sure what to call him, even in her head.

He had spoken as his own soul required him to. Indigena did not doubt it for a moment. She had caught a glimpse of that soul through his words, and she knew what she would be facing.

She would never change her allegiance. Her nephew had done that, hiding from what the Dark Mark on his arm meant, and had required her to answer his debt of honor by adopting the allegiance herself. A true Yaxley did not waver, did not turn, never forsook honor and never forsook pride.

But she did regret that it could not have been different, that she could not walk up to—Harry now, and offer him a simple oath. He was a leader that she would be proud to have served, someone for whom she would willingly have left her greenhouses and her gardens.

I regret it, my lord. Indeed, I do. And I look forward to meeting you on the battlefield. That we may share the bond of honorable enemies is something to hope for.

It was a regret. She was still allowed those.

Lily was sure there was some mistake, when she was escorted from the holding cell they had given her down into one of a row of little rooms, all the same, all carved out of the rock. She had a bed, and a small loo, and a table where food would appear three times a day. There was nothing else, but there did not need to be. Harry could not have meant what he said, or the world would already be shaking in fear of a second Voldemort. It was a feint, to fool the Wizengamot. He would be along any moment, to free her and run away into the darkness with her, to go back to Godric's Hollow and renew his training.

Lily did not see a reason to fear, when the enchanted lights in her room went off and Harry had not come. Of course he would come at night. The darkness should be literal, the better to hide them.

Lily did not lose hope, when she woke and Harry was not there yet. All the cells in Tullianum looked alike. He would need to search for her, past steel doors and carved gray walls, all the same.

Lily felt a faint tremor of disquiet, when she had sat on her bed in silence for hours—there was nothing to do in the cell—and still Harry did not appear. But, of course, he would need to wait until no one suspected he might move. The ones who claimed to love him, but had not molded him like she had, would be watching him too closely right now. He would come when he could.

Lily had to bite her lip to keep from crying, when the lights went out again and she was reminded that Harry's magic was powerful enough to have let him do anything he wanted about the people, the doors, the bars, the walls, holding him back from her.

Lily woke in the darkness that second night, and began to understand.

Chapter Forty-Six: Our Echoes Roll From Soul to Soul

Augustus Starrise was on his feet and moving the moment the sentence was announced, and the elder Potters taken away. He knew that Potter's—no, Harry's, he was Harry, now, and his brother Potter—friends would try to get him away as soon as possible. He had to speak to the boy before then, since visiting Hogwarts would be far too public for the kind of private alliance offer he wanted to make.

The staff he held abruptly brightened, the band of gold on the top, the one that held a bit of Alba's magic, shining as if struck by the sun. Augustus turned his head, sighting along the top of the staff. His heart beat in a mouth that seemed all bone, without a drop of moisture. Was one of Alba's murderers here? Had her magic recognized one of her killers? For that, he would abandon the alliance offer he was about to make Potter, since, if he could find the killers, nothing would matter after that, not once he called the Caerimonia Inrevocabilis, the sternest of the justices rituals.

But the gleam faded, and Augustus shook his head. He had never entirely understood the twining of his twin sister's magic with his own; her death so soon after the creation of the band of gold had ruined the enchantments that would have enabled him to summon her after death, speak with her, and learn whom he should take vengeance upon. The staff might have reacted to nothing more than the Dark Mark on the arm of someone in the room.

The Malfoy heir was helping Harry out of his seat when Augustus focused again. He took several small, smooth steps forward, calling on the pureblood dances that let him project an air of majesty out beyond his own features. People moved out of the way without knowing quite why they did so, and Augustus found himself standing comfortably in front of Harry, who glanced up at him and blinked.

"Mr. Starrise," said Harry, his voice devoid of emotion. Even with the tear tracks on his face, he still looked impressive, Augustus had to admit. Shutters had come down inside his eyes, hiding all the possible emotional wounds behind a mask of strength, and he was tensed, as if he prepared to run or leap. His magic sang around him, a low-voiced sob of sweet music. "Is there something I can do for you?"

Augustus inclined his head. "I have never seen such a display of compassion and mercy," he said quietly, letting the truth come spilling out of his lips. It really was what he had felt when witnessing the boys' performance on behalf of his parents, imbeciles who had never loved him and had treated a child that any pureblood wizarding family would have been proud to bear poorly. "You are enough of the Light to make me honor you, Harry. May I become your ally?" He held out his hand, and waited patiently to see if the boy would accept it or not.

Harry stared searchingly into his eyes instead of accepting or rejecting the offer right away. Augustus nodded. This was a worthy person to follow, quite apart from his other allies possibly opening the way to Alba's killers. At his lowest, his most broken, he could still evaluate the political world that never stopped turning for personal causes, and ask intelligent questions.

"Why do you want to?" he asked. "It is true that I honor some ideals of the Light, Mr. Starrise, but you should know that I also practice Dark magic, and have Dark allies." The Malfoy heir's arm tightened around his waist, and he snorted, as though he could claim the highest place in the ranks of those allies. Augustus studied the boy, and was able to dismiss him in a moment. Someday, Draco Malfoy would be impressive, but that day was not yet come. "I thought you were too purely of the Light to ever want to fight beside me."

"I have changed my mind," said Augustus. "The year away from politics that the Minister forced on me gave me time to think, and You-Know-Who's rising this summer completed the change."

Harry inclined his head. "And you would be faithful, and not object to working beside Dark wizards, then?" he asked.

A fair question, Augustus had to admit. "I would not be willing to use Dark Arts myself, but other than that, yes, I would follow you faithfully," he said. "And you gain more than just the Starrises with my hand, Mr. Pot—Harry. Where the Starrises go, the Griffinsnest family will follow, and at the very least, the minor Light families, like Owlborn and Morningsgift, will consider following. We have long been considered the most prominent of the northern Light wizarding families.”

He wondered why Harry’s face went still when he said the word “northern,” but it seemed no more foreboding than the still eyes. Harry nodded when a moment had passed. “Very well,” he said.

“Harry!” the Malfoy heir exclaimed. “You can’t seriously mean that! He would have testified against you at Fudge’s trial last year!”

“And he didn’t,” Harry pointed out, ignoring, with what Augustus thought was good tact, the fact that the ritual Scrimgeour had invoked against him hadn’t let him do anything vaguely political at the time. “And now he’s here, and he says he’s changed his mind. I should let him do that, Draco, at the least.”

The Malfoy heir grumbled low in his throat and gave Augustus a nasty look. Augustus smiled back at him. The threats of puffed-up little Dark wizards were not something he took very seriously.

He shook Harry’s hand, feeling content as that outpouring of magic surged around him. He had meant what he said. He knew something of grief, and the way that Harry had been able to ride and master his own had struck him like a lightning bolt.

He also knew, from that display, that there was no way Harry would ever join him in his vengeance against Alba’s murderers, or allow him to take it if he knew what Augustus was searching for. That was all right. Augustus fully intended to serve this young vates, who might be the only successful vates in history, to the best of his ability for as long as he could, and then part ways when he had to take his own justice without damaging Harry more than the loss of a murderous ally would.

Connor wrinkled his nose and rubbed a hand over his hair. He had thought he would feel complete satisfaction at seeing his parents sentenced, but a few minutes after they’d led James out of the courtroom, he had started feeling—weird.

Yes, weird was a good word for it. And so was “strange,” and so was “itchy.”

He scratched at his scar for a moment, and wondered if a minion of Voldemort was in the courtroom. But why would one of them come here? What could possibly be interesting about this? They could read all about the outcome of the trial in the papers. There had been loads of reporters present. Besides, Connor really, really doubted the Dark Lord who wanted to conquer Britain was interested in what one coward and one idiot had been doing to their children during their spare time.

Then he remembered that he’d told everyone that his brother was the real Boy-Who-Lived.

All right, maybe Voldemort would be interested.

But none of that explained why his hair itched, or the back of his head, or the inside of his elbow. Connor was getting tired of scratching all of them, and he was starting to think that someone would think he had fleas. He was already getting a few odd looks from people passing him by in their rush to get out of the galleries.

Then the people stopped passing him, and someone gasped. Connor didn’t know why until Harry said, “Connor?”

He looked up, and did his best to smile. It was difficult. Harry—hadn’t been familiar for a while. He hadn’t looked anything like as fragile as he’d been yesterday. He’d gone down into the courtroom and spoken for their parents the way a phoenix would sing. Connor felt awe, and a little of the wonder he used to feel around Dumbledore, and worry, too. He would have liked to know how Harry had managed that, and at what cost to himself.

“Harry,” he said, and then they both asked, at the same time, “Are you all right?”

Harry smiled. Connor was glad to see the expression. “I’m fine,” Harry said. Draco snorted his own impression of that at Harry’s shoulder, but Connor had learned to look at his brother when it came to questions like this, and, incredibly, it did seem as though he might really be fine—his eyes were wide, but not dark, and he seemed drained, but not worn to a thread. “But what about you? I saw you scratching.”

“I itch,” Connor admitted. “I don’t know why. If I find out the twins put itching powder on me, I’ll—“ A small explosion of white light came off the back of his hair, and he cursed softly and tried to cover it with a hand.

Harry’s expression altered. “Oh, Connor,” he whispered. “Close your eyes for a minute, and then tell me what you see.”

How can I see anything with my eyes closed? But Connor obediently closed his eyes, and concentrated. He started when a vision of a corridor appeared, lined with portraits high enough above his head that he couldn’t quite make them out, and paneled with rich white wood.

“A hallway?” he asked as much as stated. “And portraits, and white wood.”

“I thought so,” Harry whispered. “I should have thought of it before. You just became heir to Lux Aeterna, Connor. They stripped James’s magic from him—“ Connor felt a fierce, brief stab of triumph that Harry wasn’t calling James their father anymore “—and I renounced the Potter name, so the linchpin is linked to you now. Probably other Potter properties, too.”

Connor nodded. He could feel more itches if he thought about them, just waiting to explode into visions when he looked. But, right now, he was more concerned with something else. Houses would be there when he went and looked for them. The chance to have a conversation with Harry wouldn’t always be.

“Just because you renounced the Potter name doesn’t mean you’re not my brother anymore, right?” he asked, opening his eyes and staring at Harry.

Harry's face softened at once. "Of course I'm still your brother, Connor," he said softly, reaching out and clasping his hand. "You're the only one of them I still want to be related to. Nothing will part us, I promise you, unless you have the bad taste to paint Lux Aeterna pink with green polka dots."

It actually took Connor a moment to understand that Harry was making a joke, though he would have got it in a moment from Ron. Harry didn't make jokes, especially not in the wake of a trial like this. But it seemed that he did, and he was smiling at Connor, encouraging him to laugh along. Connor heard himself chuckle almost unwillingly, and then he stared at Harry again.

Most of the time, he wasn't jealous of Harry anymore. Yes, he got to do great things, but those things were bloody dangerous, too, and he got hit with curses that made his guts spill out of him. That was not Connor's idea of a good time, though punishing the Ravenclaw who had hurt Harry still was, if only Professor Snape hadn't got to it first. And he knew now that training was necessary before he would be up to guarding Harry's back in battle.

And he wasn't really jealous of Harry's status as Boy-Who-Lived, either. Sure, Connor would miss some of the attention and the approval, but, ultimately, that name for himself had been based on a lie. The lie had been bothering him since he and Harry and Peter had all agreed to keep it a secret. Now it was out in the open, and everyone knew the truth, and the lie would stop itching in Connor's conscience.

But he did think he could envy the—he groped for a word, and couldn't find it, though Hermione would have known. Maybe it was capability? Yes, that would do, though it didn't have as many syllables as Hermione's words. He envied the capability Harry had to survive the battles and the dangerous things, and to make speeches like the one that had made Connor cry for Lily and James. He did wish he could have something like that.

But maybe he could. Not even Harry had been born with it, after all.

“Everything I inherited is yours,” he told Harry softly. “Or at least half yours. If you want it. You’re older.”

Harry shook his head, his face relaxed and calm. “I’m only older by fifteen minutes, and I don’t want it,” he said. “Or I wouldn’t have renounced the name, Connor. I know I have the connection with you no matter what, but the possessions are tied to the Potter name.” He shrugged. “I don’t need them.”

“Are you going to take another name?” Connor asked. He thought it was a good idea. He’d been getting a better idea, from talking with Ron and watching the way students in other Houses acted, how big a deal family was in the wizarding world. Since he’d been raised mostly as the Boy-Who-Lived and not as a Potter, it wasn’t instinctive, but he was working on it, and Harry without a family at his back would constantly have to face small annoyances, people trying to outmaneuver or trap him.

He’s got me. That thought made Connor ache with pride. But other people wouldn’t see it that way, now that a name no longer connected them.

Harry shook his head. “Not right away,” he said. “Not for a long time, in fact. I—” He hesitated, as though he wanted to find the right words, and then spoke carefully. “I never felt as though I belonged with anyone the way I belonged with James and Lily and you, or the way I should have belonged there. And until I can actually experience that sense of rightness somewhere else, I don’t want a surname, or parents.” He smiled, and Connor flinched. It was a smile that expressed all the sadness Harry had so far succeeded in keeping off his face. “Besides, I’ve had a lot of practice being a brother, so that’s all right, but not much practice being a son. I don’t think I’d be any good at it.”

“Merlin, Harry, you’d be perfect for plenty of people,” said Draco, apparently unable to keep his mouth shut any longer. Of course, for a Malfoy, silence is unnatural, Connor thought. “You don’t know how welcome my parents would make you. And you know what Regulus is offering, and I’m sure Mrs. Bulstrode—Millicent’s mother, I mean—would love to make you her son, and you know Professor Snape—”

“Don’t, Draco,” said Harry, all but snapping the words, and Draco hushed. Connor hid his smirk. At least I don’t have to worry about Draco walking all over him anymore. “I’m not ready to think about it, I said.” He turned back to Connor, his eyes steady and soft again. “What about you? Are you going to be all right now that Lily and James are in prison?”

Connor nodded. “I talked with the Weasleys when I was with them this summer. Mr. Weasley said I was perfectly welcome to stay with them as long as I liked, and they’d apply for legal guardianship when I wanted them to.” He didn’t quite want them to, not yet. Lily and James deserved prison, of course they did, and Connor didn’t need someone to come rushing up to him and hug him just because they were in Tullianum now. He wasn’t a little boy.

Harry seemed to disagree, since he leaned forward and hugged Connor in the next moment. Connor blinked and bowed his head to his brother’s shoulder, then hugged back. “I’m glad,” Harry whispered into Connor’s ear. “I know you would make as good a brother to Ron as you have been to me.”

Connor remembered the first three years they’d been at Hogwarts, and bit his lip. But he wound up nodding. It seemed that Harry had forgiven him for those years, if he’d ever held them against him in the first place. “Thanks, Harry.”

And then Draco was drawing Harry gently away, and Connor had to follow them or find Remus, since he had to get back to Hogwarts somehow, but he spent a moment gripping the balcony railing in his hands and staring at the floor of the courtroom.

It seems so strange that it might actually be over.

But the itching in his head said it was. Connor hesitated, then closed his eyes and gave in to the visions of Lux Aeterna again. He had to admit, he was curious about what was behind some of the doors locked with wards that James had never allowed them to open...

Rufus leaned back in his seat, now and then nodding to show that he was paying some attention to the pauses in Amelia's nervous chatter, and followed Harry with his eyes.

Remarkable, really, how much of the room turns around him.

Some of that, of course, came from the reporters and others who just wanted to see the trial as a spectacle. They would peer at Harry as if he were the main actor in a play. Rufus felt even more viciously satisfied with Harry's speech than he might have, on account of them. They had come expecting to see a tragedy, and Harry had brought a touch of the sacred into the room and made them confront it. A few hadn't been able to, and had taken to their heels, feigning boredom with yawns.

Their too-wide eyes gave them away, though. Rufus would be extremely surprised if many of their accounts of the end of the trial, either appearing in the papers or passed by word-of-mouth, were coherent.

Others turned around Harry as if they were planets and he the sun—or perhaps moons and the sun would be a better analogy, Rufus thought, since they were hoping to catch and shine with some of his reflected glory. “Power” traveled in hushed whispers throughout the courtroom, and there were a few too many people obviously not leaving until Harry did. Many people had heard of the young Lord-level wizard; few had ever been in the presence of his magic. Rufus was glad that he had been, before, and so had most of the members of the Wizengamot. That irresistible feeling of wanting to get closer to the source and soak up the magic, bask in it, had not influenced their decision in the sentencing of the Potter parents.

Well. Much.

There were Harry's allies, too, watching him openly, though some had already departed, as if secure that the boy was in good hands. There were more of them than Rufus had expected, and he saw another alliance made as Augustus actually went to Harry, and Harry, after a few moments of discussion, accepted his hand. Rufus shook his head. I do not think that particular set will survive, but we will see.

The world always altered when another Lord or Lady appeared. So far, though, Rufus had mostly seen only interruptions in the dance. Now people were starting to find partners, and fall into new patterns.

And pick up speed. The next few weeks would be dangerous, Rufus knew. That was to be expected. News of Dumbledore's spell was spreading. There was Diggle to question. There were the revelations that had burst like dying stars in the trial, that Harry was the Boy-Who-Lived and had renounced his name. Their world was changing. Everyone who was wise and cared about his or her own position would be lifting up a head, pricking cautious ears.

Rufus could feel himself smiling, despite all the evidence that he still had changes to make in the Ministry he had thought was getting cleaner, despite the fact that half-controlled chaos in the wizarding world would make his own task harder, particularly now that Dark wizards, who'd withdrawn from the Ministry under Cornelius's paranoia, would be trying to influence his people through bribery and favors.

Good to be challenged. Let's me know I'm alive.

And it seemed that Harry was a Lord-level partner who might actually be trusted to keep his word and not muck about in the Ministry. No doubt they would clash, but Harry would not actually seek to win because of his magic.

Rufus had not thought he would live to see this day two years ago, had not thought such a day was possible. But it was, and here it was.

That was one reason he had voted for Lily Potter's life, he thought as he stood, and apparently stunned Harry to the core. Of course, he had accepted most of Harry's speech, and he had been an Auror who, while he hated abusers, also hated losing someone he'd arrested to death—it was too simple—and he had to admit a certain longing to see Lily Potter's face if and when she learned what her son really was, what he was really doing.

But he had also wanted to show Harry that he had that trust in him, that he believed in many of the same principles and could walk beside Harry on the path he trod.

Walk beside. Never follow. That is where, and how, we will clash, when it comes. He's a leader, but so am I.

But Rufus felt an eagerness for that challenge, now. It was no longer a storm to be feared, the wind that had begun blowing today, but a cleansing gale that might yet sweep most of the foulness left in their world away.

Snape shielded Harry from prying eyes and questions as he guided him and Draco out of the Ministry. Regulus, and Pettigrew, and even Lupin, shepherding the Potter boy, soon joined them.

The only Potter boy, now.

Snape allowed himself a moment to revel in that, and dismissed it. He couldn't actually enjoy Harry's renunciation of his family as much as he might have, say, a year ago, because he had felt too deep a longing the moment he heard of it—a longing to be able to fill that place in Harry's life himself.

He had known what he was giving up, what sacrifice he was making, when he revealed Harry's abuse. He told himself that for the thousandth time. He had known it would cost him the trust Harry had in him. But it had also led to this moment, this freedom, and apparently Harry's conscious choice to shut the lid on the past and continue with his life. Snape could not regret that.

But he had always been greedy, selfish, wanting more than he should want. He had seen that in himself when he brewed the potion out of Melissa Prince's book, the one that let him see his own soul. He could summon the vision if he closed his eyes, a dark flawed crystal—the ambitious impatience that had put him into Slytherin, and led him into the Death Eaters.

He wanted to be a part of Harry's life again. He wanted to see Harry take his surname, and call him by something other than a title, which Harry had never done. He wished he had at least the level of comfort with Harry that Lupin had.

It would not come without hard work; he knew that. When had anything he wanted in his life come without struggle that would kill half the Gryffindors and Hufflepuffs in the world?

He wanted it now anyway.

He had been hovering behind Harry as he spoke to his brother, enough to hear Harry say that he wanted a rightness, a sense of belonging, before he took another surname. Snape was sure that he could give him that—more than sure. It would take time, but he could outwait the time, and do whatever was needed to show Harry that he would have a home if he wanted it, in the Slytherin dungeons or at Spinner's End, for the rest of his days.

But Snape did not believe that was the only reason Harry was currently refusing to take a surname. He was used to hearing a heavy tone in his ward's voice when he held something back, and he had heard it when Harry spoke to Potter about family.

What was it?

That question had to wait until they had arrived back at Hogwarts, and had an interview with the Headmistress in which Harry said very little, and then Lupin and Potter had cleared off. Regulus lingered, Pettigrew at his side, looking expressively at Harry. And Draco, of course, was there, too, but Snape did not mind that. Draco could hear every question he asked Harry, and would not breathe a word of it to anyone else.

Harry kept his head bowed, refusing to meet Regulus's eyes. Snape watched his old friend's face, and saw the moment when Regulus decided to throw caution to the winds and just ask. He sighed, but kept the sigh internal. Given what they both are like, this has to happen.

“So, Harry,” said Regulus, a little too casually, “now that there’s no longer two people who don’t deserve you hanging around in the background—“

“No,” said Harry, and jerked his head up, the motion violent. “I can’t. Not yet, maybe not ever. Don’t push me, Regulus,” he added, when Regulus opened his mouth. “I can’t do this. I—want to see you, talk to you again, this weekend, but I don’t want to talk about inheritance or family or bloodlines. Please.”

Regulus, like Snape, could apparently hear the wavering in Harry’s voice on that last word. Ordinarily, Harry would have already withdrawn to lick his wounds and grieve in private. That he had not was a vast step forward, Snape knew, but now he had reached the limit of his tolerance.

Now, Regulus nodded, and said softly, “Of course, Harry. I’ll be happy to come visit you on Saturday, Sunday, whenever you want to see me.” He abruptly dropped to one knee and hugged Harry hard, surprising a squeak out of him. “Whatever you need, Harry. I want to be there for you.”

Snape saw Harry freeze in shock, and narrowed his eyes. Yes, there is still something wrong, something unexpressed.

But the shock was gone in the next moment, and Harry returned the embrace. “Thank you,” he murmured. He glanced at Pettigrew. “And you, too, Peter.”

Pettigrew was wiser than Regulus, in some ways; he simply hugged Harry, nodded once, and turned away, wishing him a soft good-night. Then the two men left together. Snape guessed that they’d stay at Copley-by-the-Sea, always Regulus’s refuge when he’d suffered a severe disappointment.

That left the three of them, and Harry looked at both Draco and Snape as if he’d like nothing so much as to slip away. Snape could not allow it, not yet. He wanted to know what the thing gnawing at Harry was.

Harry turned his head away when Snape tried to meet his eyes. Snape realized with a little jolt that the boy was apparently afraid he'd use Legilimency on him.

This is not good. I must show him he can trust me. Does that mean that I should not ask him what is troubling him? Snape pondered that, but, in the end, felt he had to. I don't think Draco realizes there's more to this, not when he's caught up in his own hurt feelings about Harry rejecting the Malfoys as an immediate family. Draco had looked extremely disgruntled the whole time Harry spoke with his brother, but never more so than at the words about family. I want Harry healthy. I need to speak with him.

"Harry," he said quietly. Harry turned back towards him, but didn't raise his eyes. "Something more is behind your reluctance to take a surname than a sense of rightness or belonging, important as that is. What is it?"

Harry almost slumped against the wall. "I wish you didn't know me so well, sir," he whispered.

Snape tucked the pain those words gave him away in an Occlumency pool. Draco started and glanced between them, then reached out towards Harry. Harry leant towards him, trembling, and Snape realized that he was probably pushed over his limits already, and dropping fast.

Snape winced, but reminded himself that, if he didn't do this now, then Harry might tuck the pain away and simply refuse to be questioned on it again. "Will you tell Draco, if you will not tell me?" he asked quietly. "I will leave, if you wish me to."

Harry brought up his head with a gasp, as if he were drowning. He looked from one face to another, then said, in a mutter, "If I can't tell you, whom can I tell?" He waited one moment more, as though for an invisible signal, then nodded and began.

"What I said about family was true. And I know that I h-hate Lily and James now as well as love them, and I understand that other people love me. You two, for example, and Connor, and Regulus, and Peter.” He took a deep breath, and Snape could almost feel him shoving through a barrier that prevented him from saying the next words. Knowing how thick Harry’s resistance to talking had been in the weeks leading up to the trial, he was silently impressed.

“I know why I love you,” said Harry quietly. “I’m inside my head, after all. I know my own emotions. And I know that you love me. I said that. I acknowledge it. But I don’t know why some of you love me, not completely. I don’t really understand why Regulus wants to make me the Black heir, instead of someone related to him by blood, or instead of his own child, if he ever gets married. I don’t understand why someone else would want to adopt me into a family—me, that is, and not any powerful Lord-level wizard, or the Boy-Who-Lived. I don’t understand the level of love that Draco claims the Bulstrodes have for me, or his own parents, or—“ He clenched his hand. “Or you, sir, on that level.” He nodded at Snape. “I trust that you care for me, because you’ve demonstrated it. But I don’t understand why you care for me as a father, if you do, and not just a guardian. I’m not good at being a son. I don’t think I can do this.” His voice sank, nerveless, and then dropped away entirely.

Draco made a small, fierce noise, but didn’t say anything. Snape found that he could not speak, either, but stared into Harry’s eyes. Harry had lifted his head and stared back at him with emotions he needed no Legilimency to read. They were terror and incomprehension, honest and open and complete.

“Harry,” he whispered, ready, at that moment, to try and explain the terms of his love, use words that would make him sound soppy, reveal his own secrets, anything that would calm the shaking boy in front of him.

Harry shook his head and closed his eyes. “I’ll understand someday,” he whispered. “I’ll work on understanding it. But not just yet. I—I wish I could take this weekend and just calm down, come down from the trial. But I don’t think I can. I have letters to write, and there’ll be a circus to deal with when the papers start reporting all the outcomes of the trial.”

Draco reached for him, but Harry slipped sideways. "I'm sorry," he said. "I've just taken all I can for right now." Gently, he reached out, caressed Draco's right cheek, and then turned and slid off down the hallway.

Snape thought about pursuing him, but was confident that Harry would do himself no harm. He was probably going to a place he could be alone, and recover in the best way he still knew how to heal himself. Silently, though, he promised himself that Harry would indeed have the weekend.

If there was only some way that I could insure that he takes it.

But then, as long as I'm wishing for the impossible...if only there was some way to show him how very much we all love him, and that he isn't a bad son. He simply never got the chance to try.

Harry stood on top of the Astronomy Tower, blinking as rain sluiced down over him. It had started raining shortly after they left the Ministry, but he hadn't thought the storm would chase them back to Scotland. Apparently, he'd been wrong.

He bowed his head and put his head in his arms, welcoming the touch of the cold water. At least it would explain his shivering if someone came up and saw him.

He was still feeling the aftereffects of the intense fear he'd experienced in front of Draco and Snape—the fear of revealing a vulnerability like that; the fear that they wouldn't understand him; the fear that, no, he didn't know how to be a son, how to relate to a parent, and that he never would.

He was trying. He believed them when they said someone else could adopt him. He was talking. He just didn't know why the chance for another family existed yet. It was like understanding that magic existed, but not having the slightest idea how to grasp and use it. He'd have to understand it from the inside before he could trust himself not to mess things up.

Apart from anything else, understanding why other people loved him would make him change his vision of himself even further than the Room of Requirement had. He could feel the first dawning of the revelation. It was as terrifying as it was exhilarating, and to deal with it in the presence of other people—particularly people who'd just realized how much he didn't understand—wasn't something he was up to yet.

Harry took a deep breath and wiped the hair back from his forehead. He was all right, he reassured himself. A good night's sleep would restore his balance wonderfully. Then he could continue with his course in the raging political world he'd finally realized didn't stop turning just because he had a bad few days. There were alliances to be made, as Augustus Starrise had proven to him, and other people affected by the trial to be cared for, as Connor had shown him. Harry wished he could collapse for the weekend, but he didn't see how it was possible.

Someone moved beside him. Harry turned his head, ready to tell the person to go away, if it was anyone other than one of the Slytherins, and to tell one of them that he'd come down to bed any minute now.

It was none of them. It was a woman he hadn't seen for more than a year, a calm, small, wren-like woman with brown hair and brown eyes. Harry stared at her, and felt her eyes see into his soul in return. Well, of course. She was a Seer. This time, though, he thought he could feel the operation of her gift.

Then he shook his head, and found his tongue. "I just—I thought letters wouldn't reach you for two weeks," he said weakly.

"For owls from you, we have lifted the shadows around our Sanctuary," said Vera softly. "And we have our own ways of traveling fast when we must, isolated though we are. We have waited for a summons like this, Harry." She cocked her head at him. "And you may, of course, take a few days to rest. If you wish, I will talk to anyone who objects."

Harry closed his eyes and swallowed. "I think you're talking to the only person who will," he said as lightly as he could.

“And do you have any more objections?”

Harry hesitated one moment. He supposed he didn't have to answer the latest letters from the Burkes and the Belvilles immediately. And there were not, as far as he knew, any battles to be planned for or attacks to be defended against in the next two days. And he was not the only possible source of comfort in the world. Connor had Remus, after all.

Can I do this? Do I really deserve it?

What if I assumed the answer was yes, and went from there?

“No,” he whispered. “I think I'll do this.”

“Good,” said Vera, her voice radiant. “That is very good, Harry.” Her footsteps moved towards him, and he opened his eyes to see her smiling down at him, one palm extended. “Shall we get out of the rain?”

Harry nodded, and, reaching up, clasped her hand.

Intermission: The Light and the Light Lord

It was like nothing he had experienced before.

One moment he stood, as always, in Still-Beetle confinement, unable to tell, from the faint connection that he still felt with Kingsley's mind, if his assassination attempt had succeeded as yet. There was not either the despair that Albus would have expected if Kingsley had failed completely, nor the wild triumph that would have signaled an assassination safely carried out. Nor had Kingsley died yet, as he should have under the wands of enraged Aurors, or at Harry's hands. Albus could not tell what was happening, and it puzzled him completely.

The next moment, a gryphon was in the room with him.

Albus eyed the creature cautiously. He was sure it could not be real—such an animal could not have flown throughout the Ministry without triggering half a hundred wards—but he was equally sure that someone powerful enough to project this illusion through all the spells that surrounded him was an enemy he should have heard of before now.

This was not Tom's illusion, he was almost sure of it. Tom would settle for a more direct approach.

The gryphon was made of some delicate substance, now white in color, now gold. It raised its eagle-head and stared around the small cell, deep in Tullianum, to which they had sent Albus with another Portkey. Its eyes were yellow, unforgiving, cold.

Albus let out a slow breath. Perhaps he had the identity of the gryphon's creator wrong. Perhaps his old friend had made it and sent it to rescue him. Certainly, the creature didn't seem to approve of the conditions in which the Ministry had chosen to keep Albus.

Then the yellow eyes turned on him, and he knew it was not so. The gryphon came from a foe. Its wings snapped up as it looked at him, and a low, long hiss, more suited to a serpent than either an eagle or a lion, came forth from its beak.

Albus felt his magic surge beneath the bounds of the Still-Beetle confinement. So far, he had not managed to break his imprisonment, and he had not really tried, since he wanted, if he managed to recover his reputation, to show the wizarding world that he had obeyed the due process of law and gone tamely to his fate. Yet he knew it was not impossible for him to step free of this; Harry had done it last Christmas when Lily confronted him. If need be, if he could summon the rage, then perhaps he could break free of his bonds and defend himself from the gryphon.

Yet wasn't it Harry's Dark magic that had shattered the Still-Beetle's hold? Albus was sure that he did not want to practice Dark Arts.

He hesitated, and into that hesitation, the gryphon spoke.

"Albus Dumbledore," it said, the hissing forming into words as the voices of snakes must when Harry or Tom spoke to them. "Did you ever think what you were doing, when you took the title of Light Lord upon yourself?"

Albus only regarded the gryphon calmly. This was a trick, he was certain now. Perhaps the Minister had learned something of his involvement with Kingsley. That was one possibility, that Kingsley had neither succeeded nor failed, but been captured and stopped. Well, Albus would wait until they ceased to suspect him—they would think it was only the lingering effects of the widespread compulsion that had driven him to this, not a second spell—and then sent him off again. Sooner or later, he would force Harry into a murder done with Dark Arts. He knew that Harry would turn to that, if Kingsley killed or sufficiently threatened someone he loved. And if Harry killed someone who was not a Death Eater, and not in the heat of battle, then public opinion would begin to swing against him. Albus would stand a much better chance of emerging unscathed from his own trial, particularly if Homer could bring Hestia to him again, or sneak in himself, and he could use a different sort of compulsion.

With the old compulsion itself gone, though, he would need a black reputation for Harry to build the new spell upon, to convince the Light magic that he was fighting a deeply Dark opponent. And Kingsley would achieve that for him sooner or later.

The gryphon hissed again. Albus waited for it to go away. Surely a wizard of enough power to send it here would realize that it was not having the effect he wanted. He would withdraw it in disgust. Albus was not sure why he had sent it in the first place.

“You have not thought,” said the gryphon. “I will tell you. I have watched you for a long time, Albus Percival Wulfric Brian Dumbledore. I sensed the power in you, and I waited, and hoped. You declared yourself a Light Lord after you turned from the vates path, and you promised that you would do good among the people of the wizarding world. You were a compeller, but you promised to do good, and promises can counteract the darkest of inborn intentions. Free will is the most wonderful of gifts, and I trusted you to use your compulsion in the defense of the free will of others.

“You battled the Dark Lord Grindelwald, and so emerged fully into your power. The magic on which you drew was contented. The song of the sun and the moon and the stars in their spheres was not unknown to you. You heard it in your dreams. You might have gone on growing, to become one with the Light in a way that no one has managed since Calypso McGonagall.

“Alas, that you did not do so.” The gryphon’s voice descended into a whisper. “Alas, that you have become what you are now.”

Albus was now sure that this must be a sending of Tom’s, or Harry’s; they were the only other wizards in Britain now, besides his mentor, powerful enough to have heard the song of the spheres in their dreams, and his mentor would never do something like this to him. He waited for it to be done. Of course, in the Still-Beetle confinement, he could do little else, but he could and did refuse to let the words make an impact on his brain. No illusion would make him doubt his choices. They remained as they had always been—regrettable, some of them, but inevitable.

“You changed,” said the gryphon. “You began to make sacrifices. That would not have sufficed to change your good intentions to twisted ones, if they had been sacrifices that you made yourself. But you asked them of others. You bent their wills with tactics that any Light Lord should have scorned. A true Lord of Light has no need of compulsion to enforce his will, nor deceptions and subterfuge and glamours to make others believe that which is not true.”

Albus was sure now that this apparition had come from Harry. The words about free will proclaimed it—they were not words that Tom would have used—and so did the thick disdain for his use of compulsion. He felt a surge of sadness. Harry, this is why I must be free, and why you must surrender to my will or be slain. I still wish you alive, and that is why I have refrained as long as I have. I am almost glad that Kingsley did not assassinate you, now. But if you continue to trouble me, I shall have no choice. We will find someone else to take your place in the prophecy. There are those who love your brother, or can be persuaded to.

“And even now you doubt me,” said the gryphon. “Even now you think this is a falsehood. You have fallen so far into yourself that you have lost the ability to distinguish between truth and lies. Only a short time ago, you were desperate. Do you remember that? You were convinced that you needed to destroy the vates. And now, you think that you are glad that you did not succeed, because you believe you can still control him. Your thoughts run and flow like water, molding themselves around you, so that you can think anything rather than think that you are wrong.”

A frisson of unease slid down Albus’s spine, hurting a bit, as his frozen muscles could not shiver. Then he told himself this was nonsense, because the creature must be guessing; Harry could not truly know what was in his head.

“I have come because I think now that there is no chance you will ever change,” said the gryphon. It moved forward, its feathers rippling like light on water. “I waited on opportunity after opportunity for redemption, and you have never taken any of them. The Dark does not care what its Lords do in its name. I care for mine. You have lost the right to call yourself a Light Lord. Even cornered, you do not admit the cornering. Even presented with proof of your wrong, you do not admit the wrong. And that is not what a Light Lord should do. A Light Lord must see.”

The gryphon loomed over him. Albus could no longer observe its eyes clearly. That was all right. This was magic, very strange magic, of course, but ultimately the product of a frustrated boy’s mind.

The gryphon bowed its head, clenched its beak on what seemed a corner of the air, and ripped his ability to practice Light magic away.

Albus felt the comfort, the center of his life, the warmth that beamed in the center of his chest and which he always reached for instead of Dark Arts, blaze and then fade. Frantically, he groped for it, a purely internal movement, like the race of his thoughts. He could still do magic, there was no doubt of that; his power was still there. But he found that he could not remember the incantations for Light spells. He could not remember the words that would have framed them, nor the will that would have driven them in the proper direction. He was like someone deaf for years, who could not remember what voices sounded like, though he knew that voices had once existed for him.

Nothing could have taken the ability to perform Light magic from him—

But the Light itself.

And there was the truth, after all. Confronted with his lost ability, Albus screamed silently, and stared at the gryphon, the manifestation of a magic he had ceased to hear in his dreams years ago, and had never more than half believed in for itself.

“It is done,” said the gryphon. “I cannot touch the Dark Arts; they are yours. But you are not a Light Lord any longer. I do not accept you. I turn my back on you.”

It faded, and Albus was left, spinning above a gulf of blankness, to confront his new reality.

On and on it went, long moments of reaching for certainties and having them fall out from under him, of clutching at cherished dreams and feeling them tatter. Then he found the one that did not unravel, and clung to it.

It was his love for his world, the world he had tried and striven so hard to protect, made so many sacrifices for, demanded so many sacrifices for. It could not tear, because all his being was bound up in it. Albus clung close and fast to it, and wished that he could close his eyes.

Our world is in more danger than ever before. I do not know if I can even command the spell on Kingsley any more, or the Order of the Phoenix, and I cannot call out to my mentor.

And then he paused, because he felt his magic still squirming in him, and there were all the Dark Arts incantations in his head, spells he had used before with only the greatest reluctance.

But needs must when a vates is in the world.

There were ways. Yes, there were ways. Albus felt his frantic heartbeat—which, under the Still-Beetle confinement, he was probably imagining—slowing. Hadn't he thought this would happen someday? Hadn't one of his dreams for years been that he lay in the mud of a battlefield, looking up at Tom, and heard the voice of their young savior behind him even as Tom incanted the Killing Curse? He had died content in those dreams, knowing that another was taking up the burden of saving their world, soothing it, settling it and protecting it from violent change.

Now he knew that neither Connor nor Harry was going to do that, at least not willingly, and he didn't possess the ability to gently make them do it, either. Even if he passed his own trial unscathed, other would find out what he was now the moment he began using Dark magic.

But there was another who could take up the burden.

Albus had known his mentor did not want to be disturbed. He had walked long and far, into strange pathways, and had not claimed the Light Lord title that he could, by right, because of the seclusion he lived in. But he had bestirred himself to advise Albus about Harry several months ago, and if there were absolutely no other choice, then he would come forth, and take over Albus's burden.

Albus needed a way of sending a message to him, though.

And since he had only Dark Arts now, and no way of knowing when Homer or Hestia might be able to come for him, it would take much more maneuvering than it would have before.

Carefully, wrapped in love and bounded by Dark, he began to plan.

Chapter Forty-Seven: A Port in the Storm

Harry settled down with Vera in a small room on the sixth floor, furnished with thickly cushioned chairs—white, Harry wasn't surprised to see, not after his glimpse of the Sanctuary in Peter's mind last year—and with a fire blazing in a hearth larger than even the one in the hospital wing. Harry eyed the chairs cautiously. The wood appeared to have whorls of red in it. He didn't think that kind of wood was ever used for chairs at Hogwarts.

He glanced at Vera, who simply smiled. "We bring a bit of the Sanctuary with us when we come to stay somewhere, Harry," she said quietly. "And yes, I did clear this with your Headmistress. I could do nothing else, not when I hope to be by your side for a few months."

A few months? Harry blinked. He hadn't planned on that. He had planned on one of the Seers writing him, actually, with comfortably long gaps between the letters. He swallowed, and said, "I thought that Seers grew inundated with the sight of other souls, and had to retreat to the Sanctuary every once in a while?"

"And that is why I shall be here until my gift gets the better of me," Vera said. "But it will be some time before that happens, and I have long wanted to help you, Harry." Her face grew brilliant with an expression that wasn't really a smile. "You do not know how pleased I was when you wrote to me, and with no sign that someone else was forcing you to set quill to parchment."

Harry swallowed a few times. He could do this. Just because it was going to be harder than he'd expected was no reason to abandon it. And he had made the decision on his own. That was important. It was not like the decision to bring his parents to trial or face Voldemort, which, important as they had turned out to be, had their ultimate origin in other people's choices. This was born of his confrontation with himself in the Room of Requirement. He had to take an active part in his own healing, or it was foredoomed to fail.

And how many horrible things had he faced and fought his way through before?

“Did someone force you to write to me, Harry?” Vera’s voice was still soft, but tight now with anger. “If someone did—”

Harry lifted his head and shook it. “No. I did that on my own. And I’m ready to face what you have to tell me.”

Vera nodded, the brilliant look appearing again. She leaned forward. Harry tensed instinctively, but she was too far away from him to cup his face, though it looked as if she would have liked to.

“You will not be surprised,” she murmured, “to learn that you don’t really regard yourself as human, not yet. That is one of the things you must learn.”

Harry huffed and crossed his arms. “I thought I had made more progress than that. I don’t think of myself as less important than other people any more.”

“Your first thoughts are still of them, Harry.”

“And is that a bad thing?” Harry frowned as he thought of the short-sighted selfishness that had prompted the Ravenclaws’ actions against him, that had prompted Connor’s behavior in first year, that had made James into the kind of man he was, along with cowardice. “So many people think of themselves first. I might be a bit less selfish than most, but—”

“You know that it can hurt you,” said Vera softly. “More, it can hurt others. What happens if you take a curse for someone else and die in battle, Harry? What will happen to those who follow you, honor you, love you?”

Harry could feel his frown growing more pronounced. They shouldn’t fight on one side of the war just because of a person. That’s like the Light families only fighting because Dumbledore led them, not because they think Voldemort’s an evil person or his ideals are wrong. I’ll have to show them that the ideals I represent are worth struggling for all on their own.

“What happens to your bond with your Malfoy if you do things only to please him?” Vera asked.

Harry’s face burned. Somehow, in the noble, high-minded moment when he had decided to contact Vera, he had forgotten that this would inevitably lead to discussion of Draco, and the physical pleasure that Draco was so eager to share with him. “He wouldn’t like it,” he admitted, once he saw that Vera was waiting for an answer and his embarrassment wouldn’t save him. “He’s said more than once that he wants me to reach out to him because I want to.”

Vera nodded. “So that is another thing you must learn to do. I think that learning to regard yourself as human and fallible comes first. But a good bit of selfishness would not go amiss. Listen to your own thoughts, the ones you ordinarily try to dismiss, the whims and momentary ideas.”

“You sound like Madam Shiverwood,” Harry complained.

“The woman who first tried to make you think about your abuse?” Vera cocked her head thoughtfully. “Well, I do not think it is necessary to make you regard the trial in any particular way. You have taken care of that very thoroughly on your own. You have spoken for your parents—I can see the cut that made on your soul—and that is all you owe them. But you must still deal with the legacy they have inflicted on you.”

Harry squirmed, keeping his eyes on his hand, which was clenched in a fist on his knee. “I meant that she wanted me to indulge my whims and do something pleasurable for myself once a day.”

“I do not think that is terrible advice, though too limited,” said Vera calmly. “You disagree?”

“I just—” Harry wondered if he should phrase the idea differently, then decided that the phrasing was probably exactly the kind of thing Vera needed to hear. “I just don’t see the point,” he said. “They’re small things. Fleeting things. Whims, the way you and she both spoke of them. What good will it do if I decide to go flying for an hour one day? I might want to go flying, but I couldn’t abandon the Charms essay I’m working on, or the political letter I have to write, for the sake of indulging myself. They're small. They don't matter."

"And if someone else wanted to go flying?" Vera asked. "Someone who had been through a trial—not a literal one, mind you, but a period of difficulty?" Harry's mind skipped to Edith Bulstrode. "Would you think it was unimportant, if you believed it would aid their healing?"

"Of course not!" Harry exclaimed.

"And what if this would aid your own healing, Harry?"

"This is one of those places where you think I don't regard myself as human, isn't it," said Harry flatly.

"Isn't it?" Vera turned the question back on him.

"I just—" Harry leaned his head back on the chair and scowled at the ceiling. Instead of turning aside into the answers his training provided him, he tried to make himself ask the question head-on. Why should it be so different for him? If Edith could go flying because she wanted to, and it would help ease the lash-marks on her soul, why shouldn't he be able to do the same?

He did have an answer in a moment, one he didn't think Vera could refute. "Because I have responsibilities," he said softly. "I don't believe that I can do everything that needs to be done in a day and then push aside the rest until some unspecified time while I enjoy myself. Free time is just a myth."

"For you," said Vera.

But not for other people. Harry wished she would stop doing that. Now his mind was coming up with the answers on its own.

"I'm a leader," said Harry. "People told me that I needed to accept that for so long, and I finally have. I'm vates, and I need to be a war leader, and I suppose I'm a political leader, too." He made a face as he thought about it. He understood the pureblood dances, but so many of those were based on manners, or reciprocal gifts, or strength of magic—all things that his training had prepared him to deal with and accept as good standards for judgment. Politics seemed to be based mostly on people indulging their greed for more money and power, an impulse Harry couldn't comprehend, and feeding their ridiculous prejudices, something he was determined to stop. "So doesn't that mean that I should spend as much time as I can fulfilling my responsibilities?"

"As much time as you can? Perhaps. But do you really think that someone like Rufus Scrimgeour spends all his time working in politics alone, Harry, with never a moment for indulgence or himself?"

Harry was feeling decidedly cranky by this point. He was probably going to have some sort of revelation any moment, and he didn't like them. They hurt. "He sleeps, of course," he said shortly. "And I think he has a tea moment in the mornings that's not to be interrupted. And he's not married, but he probably doesn't scrabble among paperwork all the time."

"Then why can't you do the same?" Vera again cocked her head, like a bird eyeing a crumb it was about to peck up. "Do what you must, do what you can, do what opportunity presses you to do in the arena of politics, but then turn back and take some time for yourself. Fly, spend time with your Malfoy..." A moment later, she trailed off with a sigh. "That is another thing you will need to do, Harry. Find pleasures that do not involve protecting and saving people."

"Learn to be selfish," said Harry.

Vera nodded. "And now, I asked you a question. Why can't you do the same?"

Harry hunched his shoulders. He hated the answer he was going to give. He knew it wasn't an adequate answer. But he didn't think that he had another one right now. "It's just different for me, that's all."

"And why is that?"

"You're not going to give up, are you?" Harry asked her, with a sharp glance.

"No," Vera agreed peaceably.

Harry sighed. "Because my mother trained me to think of myself as different," he said. "As someone who didn't need as much as other people—as much pleasure, as much human contact, as much sleep, as much freedom from pain. And I know that's the answer, but I can't help thinking she was right in this much, most of the time. I mean, I can do this. Why shouldn't I?"

"And you know the answer to that, too, where you would not have a year ago," Vera murmured.

Harry clenched his hand. "Yes," he said. "Because I deserve as much indulgence as anyone else."

"I would call it a normal life, rather than indulgence," said Vera softly. "Not being struck with pain curses seems normal to me, Harry. Tending to your own wants and needs seems normal. Balancing your intense devotion to the freedom of others with devotion to your own freedom is, perhaps, not normal, because most people carry a devotion only to their own freedom, but still something a vates should do. Unless you truly believe that a vates need not see himself as clearly as he sees others?"

"No," Harry whispered. "I do."

Vera made an abrupt, though still soft, noise of understanding. "Ah. That is what may be hindering you. I have not seen your soul in a year, Harry, and there are many changes to absorb. Until this moment, I was not sure how one new realization fitted in with the rest." She raised a hand and moved it through the air, as if she were trying to maneuver a piece of an invisible puzzle into place. "Your training in resistance to pleasure."

"I know that I have that," Harry said defensively. "I'm working with Draco to overcome it."

“Not just the pleasure of touch and human contact,” said Vera calmly. “Your mother conditioned you against all sorts of things.” She was still staring intently at the invisible puzzle. “The appreciation of the sweet taste of food. I suspect that may be one reason that you do not care that much about your meals, and can see eating only as fuel for your body, so that you may do more things for others. Does everything truly taste bland to you?”

“Not bland,” said Harry. “But I like porridge as well as anything else. It’s nourishing. It’s always on the table. I might as well eat it.”

Vera nodded. “And you do not think of sleep as a pleasure and a comfort, either, nor warmth. Thus you can ignore the need to rest in favor of doing something more—” She paused, and Harry was reminded of Snape reading his thoughts with Legilimency, though there was no sensation of someone else moving about in his mind. “Productive, I think, is the word you use. And you can stand in the cold rain, as you were on the Tower, without a thought of getting sick.”

“I could always use a warming charm,” Harry suggested. “I am a wizard.”

“But you did not.”

“I didn’t think of it.”

“You must learn to think of it,” said Vera softly. “This is connected to learning to think of yourself as human, Harry, not different from it. It may be even more urgent. You are well used to conducting intellectual debates on the rights of others, and you can learn to apply that kind of thinking to yourself. But you accept pleasure as something inherent to other people. The right of someone else to eat chocolate and appreciate it is not something that even enters your head as a subject of debate. On the same note, you accept it as something separate from yourself. It would not enter your head to work to overcome that, either.” She looked directly into Harry’s eyes. “You have said that you are working on overcoming your fear of touch with your Malfoy. Did you start doing that for his sake, or yours?”

Harry squeezed his eyes shut. Merlin, Draco would kill me if he knew. But Draco wasn't here right now, and Harry was almost certain Vera already knew the answer to this. "His," he whispered.

"That will not do, Harry," Vera said. "If he ever found out, it would devastate him. Granted, I have not seen his soul in a year, either, but I glimpsed him last Halloween. He was obsessed with equality then. He does not want to leave you behind, and he does not want to be left behind, either. He wants your bond to be as pleasurable for you as it is for him, a source of comfort and strength—and not because you are doing what he wants with something that you don't care that much about, your body. Try to learn to want this for its own sake, for your own sake."

"I am trying!" Harry opened his eyes and glared at her. "I am."

"And what happens then?"

"I panic and pull away from him as quickly as I can." Harry felt his cheeks burn again, but it was as much anger as embarrassment—anger mostly at himself, truth be told. "It feels too good. And what kind of a stupid idea is that to have?"

Vera shook her head. "That is another thing you cannot do, because you have done too much of it," she said. "Condemning yourself for trained reactions. Learn to see yourself clearly, Harry. Never stop pushing. You have grabbed hold of that lesson, or you would not have contacted me. But also know when to rest from pushing. Do not try to do too much at once. Remind yourself that this is a long road to walk, and the end may not be in sight for a time."

"I can live with not being like everyone else for a long time," said Harry, shifting restlessly. "I did it for years, after all. But I don't think Draco should have to live with it."

"Have you asked him how he feels about that?" said Vera. "I know he is more impatient than you are, but have you asked him?"

"Um. No."

“Well, then,” said Vera. “I think that should be your first task, Harry, before we speak again. Talk to him honestly. Learn what he wants, instead of waiting for him to show you or simply assuming it from his reactions.”

“I can do it,” Harry said, now looking down at his feet. “But it sounds so stupid to say it out loud.”

Vera didn’t reply, and when Harry chanced a glance up at her, he found that she was smiling, eyes shining with something that might have been recollection.

“I think you will find, Harry,” she said, “that even fifteen-year-old boys are more than willing to speak on the subject matter of what they want, when you ask them.”

Harry felt himself blush again. Vera stood from her chair and held out her hand to him.

“Have patience,” she murmured. “With me, with him, with yourself. That last most of all. I will be here when you wish to speak with me again.”

“It won’t be boring for you to just stay in Hogwarts?” Harry scrutinized her face.

“Your Headmistress has a very interesting soul,” said Vera happily. “So does the woman who is part dragon. Talking with them alone can take up a good deal of my time. And you should worry about yourself first.” She stooped and gave him a kiss on the forehead. “Speak with him when you are ready. Take these two days to rest, to sleep, to dream, to do what you must. You deserve a rest before the next push.”

Harry nodded, and then left the room, stretching and flexing his shoulders as if he had wings. He felt a bit lighter, though he couldn’t account for that. Perhaps it was his clothes finally drying from the rain. “Here I am, Harry.”

At least Harry wasn't writing letters when Regulus surprised him this time, because he had promised himself he wouldn't write any today. He was sitting on the bank of the lake, eyes closed and head leaning on a tree. Snape had obviously told Regulus where to find him, since Harry had set up a small charm to make people casually glance elsewhere. He didn't want any reporters interviewing him about being the Boy-Who-Lived this weekend.

"Regulus." He opened his eyes and smiled, standing with a stretch. He held out his hand, but was clasped and pulled into an embrace. Oh, well. I suspected that would happen.

"Are you all right?" Regulus murmured into his ear, his hands roughly massaging his spine. Harry wriggled back into the sensation instead of hunching his shoulders as was his instinctive response, and reflected wistfully that sometimes, yes, it really might be nice to have two hands. Then one could do things like Regulus was doing.

"Yes," said Harry. He received a snort and a sharp look of disbelief, and gave in. "Oh, all right, not completely. That's one reason I wanted to talk to you. I know I said I didn't want to talk about inheritances and bloodlines and things like that, and I still don't want to talk about being Black heir," he added warningly, as Regulus's face brightened like a firework. "But I did remember Narcissa telling me once that Silver-Mirror was the most peaceful of the Black houses. Is that true? Because I think I'd like to see it. I'd like to go somewhere soothing." Hogwarts was not that at the moment, with stares continually following him.

Regulus's face moved into a smug smile. "Of course, Harry. And I'm very glad that you're seeing the place where you might go for holidays in the future." He held up one hand and laughed when Harry glared at him. "Just kidding. Let's get beyond the wards, and I'll Side-Along Apparate you."

Harry nodded, and started to follow him, only to pause when he realized Regulus showed no sign of letting him go, but wanted to walk with an arm around his shoulders. Uneasily, Harry came up beside him and walked there.

Why are you uneasy? he thought, almost a ritual now after his talk with Vera last night. He had asked himself the same question when he woke this morning and immediately thought he should stop wasting time and get out of bed, and when he found himself avoiding foods he knew were sweet and savory for bland ones.

In this case, the answer was relatively simple. I don't think he likes touching me. Why should he? I'm just me, not a child related to him by blood.

Harry sighed and reminded himself that he knew the answer to the answer. He loves me. There's no rational reason for it that I know yet, but I know it's true. And he seems to love me just the way I am, without demanding that I become Black heir to satisfy him.

It was very strange. Harry knew that he still did best with conditional love, not unconditional. But he made some effort to relax, and by the time he and Regulus got beyond the wards, he no longer felt as though the arm around his shoulders were a burden too heavy to carry.

Regulus drew him towards him once they were near Hogsmeade, and they Apparated. This time, the jump felt even longer than it had to Copley-by-the-Sea. Harry wondered where they were going.

He found out when they appeared inside a shining place. Harry tilted his head back, staring. It looked as though they were at the center of a giant mirror, which he supposed was only appropriate, given the name of the place. But this was golden, not silver.

They stood on an immense round floor, beneath an immense round ceiling, in the center of which a single pool of golden light shone, like sunbeams continually gathered and given out again. Harry could see other colors moving in the pool—it wasn't as bright as the sun, though he had afterimages dancing in front of his eyes when he looked away—but they always melted back into gold, into rich shades of life and light. No drops appeared to fall from the pool, except along slender chains that led to lamps on the walls. They would inch down, fill in the lamps and glimmer through the casings of what looked to Harry like dragonbone, and then inch back to the pool. Thus, under the dominant effect of the shifting pool, other radiances came slowly to life and as slowly died, and strange shadows sprang up and then descended again.

He traced his glance down the walls at last, but couldn't tell what they were made of; the light danced on them in a way that might have fit metal, or wood, or stone. They were crowded with numerous paintings, though. Harry took a step forward, staring at a landscape of trees he had never seen before. Their leaves were silver-blue, and they rippled in a wind that seemed to blow on Harry's face as he stood in front of the picture. Startled, he blinked.

"Welcome to Silver-Mirror, Harry," Regulus said softly. "Though it could just as well be called Golden-Mirror, really." He nodded at the paintings around the walls. "This is the place where the Blacks keep our most intensely magical possessions. They're not weapons, but they are works of art."

"What do they do?" Harry whispered. He had no doubt the pictures were wizarding portraits, but he had never seen as many without people before, and usually they depicted places more realistic and ordinary than these seemed to. He could see, besides the forest one that kept drawing his attention, one that showed a road seemingly made of starlight running under a dark sky, and one that came out on a high mountain ledge with a blue crystalline door to the side, and one that showed a sea made of fire, like a more violent version of the golden pool above their heads.

Regulus said nothing, but he was grinning when Harry looked over his shoulder. "Touch one and find out," he invited.

Harry eyed his grin—it looked like the kind the Weasley twins used when they got up to an especially good prank—but he faced the forest one and stretched out his hand.

The sensation of wind grew stronger as he reached for it, and then he felt enveloped, as though he had stumbled over a cliff into a long drop. But there was cool earth beneath his feet, and a murmur of leaves over his head, and sweet air singing in his ears.

Harry lifted his head and stared in disbelief. He was beneath the silver-blue trees, which were revealed as giants, standing many times higher than his own head, their bark silver with swirling white patterns. The air around him was fresher than any he had ever smelled, even on the Northumberland beach at Midsummer. The grass was actually moss, which gave beneath his feet with a sighing musical sound and a scent like strawberries.

I don't believe this, Harry thought, in a daze.

He turned his head, to see a picture on the trunk of the tree directly behind him. It gave a confused golden glimpse of Silver-Mirror, which Harry thought he wouldn't have known how to make out if he hadn't been there before. Regulus's head was in the middle of it, grinning madly.

"Wonderful, isn't it?" he asked.

Harry looked up at the trees around him again. This time, he could see things moving in the branches, as graceful and quick as monkeys, but with what looked like five legs. "What is this?" he whispered.

Regulus heard him, luckily, and answered. "Doors to other worlds," he said. "We think. One of my ancestors, Neptune Black, painted them. We don't know for certain if he made them up, or if he just had dreams of real other places and painted them. I think they're real, though, because another of my ancestors found the artifact that Silver-Mirror is named for in one of them and brought it out. Old Neptune can't have dreamed everything."

"I have to admit," said Harry, tilting his head back as he heard a song falling in the distance like chiming crystal, "I don't know why the Blacks haven't become filthy rich bringing out artifacts from these other worlds."

"It doesn't work like that," said Regulus softly. "Either Neptune didn't want it to work like that, or it was something inherent in his gift. You can only go into one of these portraits for an artistic or healing or protective motive. You could go to find a weapon that would let you help others, for example, but not a jeweled sword that you could sell for hundreds of Galleons. If you try to come here with a selfish motive, it's just a pretty picture."

Harry nodded slowly; he could see some of the drawbacks. "And of course you might not find what you were looking for in one picture, and you'd have to spend a lot of time searching all of them."

Regulus made a little sound of agreement. "There are a few closely guarded secrets about some of the portraits, about what they lead to—maps of their worlds. I can't reveal those even to you until you agree to become Black heir, thanks to the magic in them." He happily ignored Harry's mutter about "if I become Black heir." "But they're a wonderful heritage for someone like you, Harry. I know you would appreciate them."

Harry felt a twinge in his chest, something shifting in his head. He thought he was having an idea, but he couldn't make out the dimensions of it as yet. He asked slowly, "Can you send someone else into a picture?"

Regulus had his brows arched when Harry looked at him again. "Yes, you can. But you'd have to be pretty cunning to convince them to just go. Most wizards can sense the danger in a picture like this instinctively. And once someone outside the picture turns it to face the wall, that person can't come back again."

Harry snorted lightly. "So there goes my great plan for capturing Voldemort," he said, but he tucked the idea into a corner of his brain. It might yet be useful.

Regulus grinned ruefully. "Yes. I told him all about these pictures when I was still a Death Eater. It's one reason he wanted to take Silver-Mirror, why he was happy to have the Black heir as part of his entourage. He thought he could at least arrange to sell the pictures to raise money for his Death Eaters." He extended a hand through the frame. "Ready to come back now?"

Harry took his hand, and once again stepped into what felt like a fall. But then he was standing on the floor of the circular room again.

“How many pictures are there?” he asked.

“An even thirteen,” said Regulus happily. “One each for the thirteen blazing dreams Neptune Black had throughout his life. I can’t wait until you do accept your inheritance, Harry. Then I can tell you all about the one that I think might be most—” Abruptly, his face paled, and he put one hand over his heart. Harry took a step towards him, his own heartbeat quickening in fear, but Regulus stood back up and shook his head wryly. “I’m fine,” he reassured Harry. “Just came too close to a secret the magic doesn’t want me to share until you’re actually confirmed.”

Harry frowned. “That’s strange, you know. I don’t think James’s inheritance ever did that to him with Lux Aeterna.” He was proud of himself, to find that he could say James’s name without trembling. But why should he tremble? The man was nothing to him now, certainly not his father. “It did just what he wanted, in fact. The wards kept out anyone he didn’t like.”

Regulus snorted. “That’s because the damn thing’s a linchpin. Light wizards and their linchpins!”

Harry narrowed his eyes. He had known that most Dark families didn’t use linchpins, but he had assumed the operation of their inheritance magic wasn’t that different. Obviously, he’d been wrong. He knew more about magical than blood heirs, and more about sheer formal customs of inheritance, such as the acknowledgement festivals held for magical heirs, than either. Information about just how exactly Dark purebloods transferred property and money down the family line wasn’t easy to come by for someone born outside their circles, even Lily Potter or Dumbledore, while many dances were a matter of public record. “So the Black houses aren’t linked to the earth?”

Regulus shook his head. “Each inheritance is linked to a person. It’s a subtle difference to most people, I grant you, but real. That’s why it was so important that Sirius—” His voice faltered on his brother’s name, then became brisk once more. “That Sirius have a spell designating him the Black heir,” he finished. “If he’d left it alone, the properties would still have belonged to me, since technically I was still alive. And if I had been dead, and Sirius hadn't cast certain specific magic, then the inheritance would have gone to Bellatrix—not in common to Bellatrix and her sisters. That was part of the purpose of the pureblood dances, you know, to sound out who was best suited to be heir. It was the eldest child most of the time, since they'd have longer to train and prove themselves worthy before their parents died, but not always. Most Dark pureblood inheritances are bound to a person, and they'll have conditions that can be changed—like the openness of the wards—and ones that can't—like the charms locking my lips shut about those damn maps to anyone other than my heir.”

Harry stared at him, fascinated. “But then shouldn't Narcissa have been unable to remove the weapons from the Black houses that she did?”

Regulus shrugged. “No. My ancestors considered old Neptune's pictures the most valuable things the Blacks owned. There are protective charms on them, and on the vaults and the houses, but not on a lot of the other minor treasures we have. The current owner would have to specify, with rituals, that certain things could pass only to his heir if he really wanted to guard them. Sirius never thought he would have to, of course. As it was, since Narcissa could get in through the wards, and she was of Black blood, she could take almost anything she wanted.”

“Could a Light family's inheritance be linked to a single person that way?” Harry asked.

Regulus snorted. “Of course. But good luck getting any of them to agree to it.”

I bet Connor would, Harry thought feverishly. Maybe even Augustus Starrise, now that he's my ally. And that would remove at least one linchpin, perhaps two.

He had some idea how to free the northern goblins now. He found himself smiling, and Regulus smiled back.

“I really didn't bring you here to discuss inheritance,” Regulus said. “I promised. So come on, then, and we'll see the artifact that gave Silver-Mirror its name.” He clapped Harry on the back and led him towards a door on the far wall which, with the charms of this room, Harry hadn’t even noticed. “You might have realized that a few of the other houses have elemental affiliations,” Regulus commented over his shoulder. “Number Twelve Grimmauld Place doesn’t, not really, but Copley-by-the-Sea is water, and Wayhouse is earth, since it was built of wood. This is fire.” He nodded to the golden pool overhead.

Harry simply raised his eyebrows as he followed him through the door, but he felt his expression change with the movement of the air around him.

“And this part of Silver-Mirror,” Regulus whispered in his ear, “is wind.”

Harry couldn’t respond. For one thing, he wasn’t entirely sure that Regulus would hear him at anything other than a shout, but for another, he didn’t think the words could get around the lump in his throat.

They stood on a narrow balcony, beyond which probably lay a staircase. Harry couldn’t say for sure, because his eyes hadn’t adjusted that far yet. The immediate portion of the room was as dark as a cave, and led his gaze downwards, to Silver-Mirror itself.

A turning, shining pool lay there, like a complement to the golden one in the entrance room. Harry didn’t think it was water, though, not after Regulus’s words. It was wind made visible, crashing waves of air. It was beautiful, and even more alive than the shifting fire had been.

And sound. Sound was everywhere, stroking his ears, murmuring with music. Harry heard nothing ugly there, or, if there was something ugly, it was taken up and woven into the immense pattern so that it sounded as natural and beautiful as the rest. The songs of sirens were there without the awful enchantment, and Fawkes’s voice, and the wild symphony of the frenzied Dark, and thunder, and the dash of falling rain, and voices singing lullabies.

Harry found himself putting out his hand. His sight was adjusting, now, to that intense, faraway silver light, and he could make out winged shapes skimming through the air.

Birds.

They came and went, magical and mundane, wheeling in great flocks, though so enormous was the room that Harry didn't feel overwhelmed by their numbers. He felt the same kind of exaltation he did when he was on his broom as he watched them: soaring, swooping, diving, folding their wings and plunging into Silver-Mirror as if it were water, circling, fluttering, nearly colliding with one another. Their voices trickled in and out of the din, which gave them back sounds as it chose, so that sometimes a swan's voice seemed to come out of an eagle's beak, or a phoenix's sweet tunes from a Diricawl as it continually appeared and disappeared in midair. Harry tried to make out an order to their movements, but couldn't. Or perhaps one existed, but it was beyond him.

He felt his mind clear as he watched them. By the time he came back to himself again, he'd had muscles relax that felt as if they had been tense since the trial, and Regulus had one arm firmly wrapped around his shoulders, and he didn't mind at all.

"This is brilliant," he whispered.

Regulus just squeezed his shoulder, and didn't make any comment about inheritance at all, letting him simply be absorbed in his watching.

Harry ran his fingers through his hair, then told himself to stop that, because he was messing it up.

No, wait, his hair was always messy. He should stop this because he had no reason to be nervous. Draco was hardly going to object to what he wanted to say.

He entered his bedroom quietly, and jumped when he realized Blaise and Ginny were involved in a sloppy kiss against the far wall. He looked only long enough to make sure that Draco wasn't on his bed, then slipped out and shut the door behind him.

"Awful, isn't it?"

Harry jumped a second time; Draco was right beside him on the stairs. He shook his head at Harry. "They're not done yet? I thought it was odd that Blaise asked for an hour of 'study time' this afternoon, but, well, he's cleared out of the room for us before. I can at least repay the favor."

"Let's go somewhere else private, then, because I want to talk to you," Harry told him.

Draco's eyebrows rose, and he stared hard at Harry. Harry stared hard right back.

Draco smiled a bit, then, his lips quirking. He nodded. "Will I need the Pensieve?"

"Yes, if you want it," said Harry, startled. He'd intended to keep his promise to Draco about putting his mindset in the Pensieve for Draco to experience, but he hadn't thought he'd keep it so soon. Then he shrugged. Oh, well. If he does have questions about why I'm talking to him like this, then he can understand them better once he experiences things from my side.

Draco opened the door and sneaked into the bedroom to retrieve the Pensieve. That gave Harry a chance to lean back against the wall and ask himself why the hell he was so nervous.

Because I don't like all of this intensity focused on me. It can be focused on someone else, just not on me.

Harry snorted a moment later. He could understand Vera now when she said that wasn't good enough. He was becoming tired of his own insecurity on that score. He might not comprehend exactly why yet Draco was willing to focus so much on him, but he accepted that Draco wanted to. And he had admitted to himself that he was in love with Draco.

You can do worse than indulge that, I think.

Draco came back out a moment later, flourishing the Pensieve in triumph. They went upstairs to find an abandoned classroom, and, on the way, Harry decided to look at Draco and think about him without scolding himself for such silly and inappropriate thoughts.

It was remarkably easy, once he gave it free rein. He'd thought things like this before, he realized now, but had pushed them into the Occlumency pools rather than deal with them. Once he'd got past the first acknowledgement of his own desire, he could start thinking that it wasn't silly or inappropriate after all.

Draco's way of movement attracted him, he had to admit. It was partially training, born of pureblood dances that warned against revealing too much emotion with a careless gesture, but Harry knew exactly how someone trained exclusively in that way moved; Lucius Malfoy was like that. It made him into nothing so much as a breathing statue, lovely in stillness, too graceful in motion.

Draco blended that grace with a more human jerkiness, a remnant of the boy Harry remembered who had dragged him around half Hogwarts by one arm in first and second year. He paused to look around a corner and make sure they weren't being observed, and then pulled his head back with a sharp oath as someone else came out of a door down the hall. He made constant arm-movements that showed his impatience. He tossed the Pensieve from hand to hand because he could. He did freeze up around his father, but away from Lucius, Harry could see Narcissa's influence, the naturalness she'd passed on to her son.

Yes, so that attracted him, he told himself, pushing himself forward to consider these things, regardless of how silly it felt. And what else?

How expressive Draco's face was—again, not something that a good pureblood wizard should necessarily show, but something Draco did. His eyes always showed an intense awareness and aliveness, an awakening to the world. Every part of his face was involved in his every emotion, not just a short curl of his lips for his disdain. His eyebrows would cant down and his cheeks would tighten and his eyes would get into the act, too.

And I never realized I paid enough attention to him to notice all that.

Harry swallowed nervously. He had accused himself, several times, of taking Draco for granted. Finding out he hadn't been, at least on some levels, was unnerving.

It does mean I can change, then. I'm human somewhere under all this training, and I don't know myself that well.

And that was terrifying.

"Harry?"

Harry started and glanced up. Draco had one hand reached out towards him, the other clutching the Pensieve white-knuckled. Harry let himself drink in the brightness of those eyes with concern, the way Draco had his head tilted to one side, the sharp angle of his eyebrows.

"Are you all right?" Draco whispered.

Harry nodded. "Just realizing that you're beautiful to me in several ways," he said. Oh, Merlin, let that not be soppy. Please.

But even if it was soppy, the look that came over Draco's face immediately afterwards was worth it. Draco moved several steps nearer, and then cupped his chin and raised it. His eyes were intense, as piercing as thorns, but Harry felt the courage to offer himself up to them anyway. He won't hurt me. I know he won't hurt me. He would never hurt me.

Draco moved his face slowly nearer, but Harry was the one who leaned the rest of the way to initiate the kiss. That surprised a noise out of Draco that was certainly startled and might have been indignant, but Harry knew exactly how to silence that. He opened his mouth and let Draco slip his tongue inside.

Draco tried to say his name, but this, Harry decided immediately, was difficult when his tongue was where it was. Then his other hand slipped around Harry's neck to hold him in place, dropping the Pensieve, and he was kissing Harry frantically, as if he thought the training would kick in at any moment.

The training was trying to kick in. Harry could feel shivers running up his spine that were not all pleasure, could feel the screaming thoughts that said he shouldn't feel this good, he didn't have the right—

Fuck off, he told his own thoughts, and put his Occlumency to good use, swallowing the protests of his training. There was sudden, wonderful silence in his head, silence that filled almost at once with the cloudy feeling he'd experienced the night Marietta used the Blood Whip Curse on him and Draco had tried to coax Harry to tell him his attacker's name.

Harry tilted his head back, slipped his own arms around Draco's neck and waist, and put his own tongue to good use, surprising another one of those strangled sounds out of Draco. The cloudy feeling grew thicker and more intense, a sharp warmth invaded his belly, and Harry wondered if this was what eating chocolate was like for other people.

Draco drew slowly backwards at last, and stared down at Harry with his eyes alive in an expression that Harry definitely wanted to see again. Harry reached out and ran his hand down Draco's chest, pulling back only reluctantly as he realized the cloudy feeling and the warmth lingered in his own body, and his training was protesting more strongly than it had before.

"Sorry," he said.

"You have absolutely nothing to be sorry about." Draco's voice had deepened, and Harry found those intense eyes still focused on him when he looked up. They weren't as far above him as they would have been a month ago, only an inch or two, and Harry grinned as he realized what that meant. I'm getting another growth spurt, then. I might even be taller than he is one day.

"I suppose not," he agreed. "Do you want to do the Pensieve, still?"

"I'd rather hear what brought that kiss on." Draco couldn't stop looking at his lips as he said that. It amused Harry entirely too much, and even though the cloudy feeling and the warmth had knocked him somewhat off balance, he grinned as he nodded up the hall.

"Don't you think we should get into the classrooms we were making for, and not have this conversation out in the hall where anyone could hear us?"

Horror flashed across Draco's face at the thought, and then another intense look, though different by several degrees from the one he'd been giving Harry before. "Of course," he said. "I'm not sharing you with anyone."

Harry rolled his eyes as Draco picked up the Pensieve, then dragged him up the hallway by one arm. Honestly. Like other people would want me with the same degree of possessiveness he does.

All the same, Harry thought it was a good thing to get into a room where they could lock the door with spells, both because he wasn't comfortable with anyone else seeing the way he acted around Draco yet and because he could easily imagine someone else wanting Draco the way he did. So, all in all, it was better just to get out of sight.

When they'd locked the door behind them, and Draco had cast several layers of wards, he turned around and demanded, "Well?"

"Vera's here," said Harry simply. "She came last night. She suggested I talk to you about what you want. I know what I do." He eyed Draco's face. "I'm surprised you had the strength to stop when you did, given how much you want," he murmured.

Draco sat down in a chair as if his legs had given out. Unfortunately, the chair turned out to be broken, and dumped him on the floor amid an immense puff of dust. Harry started to snicker, but stopped when Draco raised his head.

The intense look was back in his eyes. Harry swallowed.

"I want everything you can give me," said Draco. "All of what you are, Harry. I want to know things you don't even think are important about yourself yet, like what kind of tea is your favorite. I want to know that no one else means as much to you as I do. I want to be the only person you want in your bed. I want to know that you understand the things I believe in even if you don't agree with them. I want you to yell at me without holding anything back, even your magic. I want you to know my moods well enough that you know without my speaking when I need to be held, or fetched a sweet, or left alone. I want to have that kind of closeness to you that depends on choice more than it does need, and makes everyone jealous who sees it. I want sunlight love. I told you that, once, last year."

Harry nodded, swallowing. It was a demanding list, and he could think of several things on it that he could not imagine, say, Parvati asking of Connor. But Draco was demanding. He had shown that well enough when their bond was just friendship.

And he wants those things of me.

Like the fact that Draco loved him, it was just something that had to be accepted. And it sent a shiver of sweetness down Harry's spine, and a tremor of a smugness that he didn't understand at all.

He wants those things of me.

Harry blinked at nothing. And? So? If he wanted them of someone else, we wouldn't even be having this conversation.

The smugness stayed there anyway. Harry shivered again. He would have to learn plenty of things about himself, it seemed.

He stepped nearer to Draco and held out his hand. "And I want to give them to you," he said, holding Draco's eyes. "Some of them will take longer than others."

"I. Don't. Care."

Harry tried to speak, but he thought he was probably going to sound stupid if he did. He settled for pulling Draco to his feet and wrapping him fiercely in his arms, settled for feeling warm, and safe, and loved.

Except that that's not settling, not at all.

Chapter Forty-Eight: Back Into the Raging World

Harry sighed as he sat in the Slytherin common room and stared down at the stack of letters the owls—and one large, proud, black-shouldered gull come from the Isle of Man—had delivered over the weekend. He had to deal with them now, since it was Monday morning, the end of his weekend of relaxation, and visions of letters piling up on his bed canopy and crushing him had plagued him last night. He reached for the ones he knew he was going to dislike most, the letters from Compton Belville and Adelina Burke, first.

A few minutes later, he was gaping at the letters, and wondering if they were some practical joke. But no, when he fetched his last letters from the Burkes and Belvilles and compared them to the writing on these, the hand was the same. Harry sat back on the couch, feeling almost nerveless.

It seemed that the trial had changed Compton Belville's mind about him rather decisively.

Dear Harry:

I will give no last name, as I have just heard that you renounced your last name. Congratulations on your victory in the trial. After what your parents did to you, it would have been a waste for them to die and escape punishment so easily, and if they were free, they would not have lasted long. I would have taken a hand in insuring that myself, were I not sure that many, many more who deserve to take vengeance for you would get there before I could.

Forgive me for having doubted you. I did think you were a child who could be easily approached and toyed with, that you knew nothing of the way the world really worked, because you did not use your magical power to gain what you wanted. I see now that you were playing with a subtler hand. Lords often do, and those of us who can only look at them in awe tend to miss those subtleties in our own envy.

I would like to offer you my family's help in your alliance, specifically your next battle with the Dark Lord. We are older wizards and witches, with the exception of Mortimer, but not without experience. We are willing to come and speak to the other members of your alliance whenever you wish us to come. I hope that you will not think my having seen sixty-seven years in this world puts me beyond the honor of helping you.

I am yours, my lord, whenever you wish to call me.

Compton Belville.

Adelina Burke's was almost the same, unctuous flattery and heaping praises, with the exception of the paragraph at the end.

I understand that you may feel you have no family now, Harry, since families are so valued in our world and you have rejected your last name, but I promise that one awaits you wherever you wish to seek it. Many families would be honored to have a son so powerful and decisive. I offer you the last name of Burke in the spirit of humility, should you ever wish to take it.

Adelina Burke.

Harry closed his eyes and shook his head. He supposed he should have anticipated this, really. There were some wizards who would think he was vulnerable without a blood family at his back—and who wouldn't accept that one brother the same age as himself counted as a blood family. He had magical power, and they would probably think that he had political power, after the way he'd swayed the Wizengamot, though Harry thought that was more just being a vates. He was young enough to make the question of legal guardianship appropriate, if not yet the question of marriage or joining. His parents were most definitely safely out of the way, as safe as they could be without death, and would not challenge the rejection of his surname. And...

Harry sighed. And my current legal guardian is a former Death Eater who was tried for use of an illegal potion within the last year. And he just killed Gilbert Rovenan. Not hard to stir up stories about him, even if they don't dare accuse him outright. And rumors are harder to fight than accusations.

He felt a slight stirring of unease, then, like a prickling of claws up his spine. Should he repair his relationship with Snape, just to show everyone who might come sniffing around him that he was attached to his current guardian enough to reject anyone who tried to substitute for him?

No. When I reconcile with Snape, it has to be genuine. I can't do it just because other wizards and witches can't take a hint. Harry shifted restlessly on the couch and stared at the letters in his hand again. Never mind that I don't intend to take another surname until I'm damn good and ready, since I can afford to be choosy, and maybe not even then. There was something appealing about remaining just "Harry" for the rest of his life, forcing everyone to address him by his name instead of some stupid and contrived title. He was morbidly curious about what was going to happen in his classes, particularly with teachers like McGonagall and Flitwick who liked to be formal with him in public.

In the end, it was easy to decide what to reply to Burke and Belville—a formal acceptance of their new offers of help, along with hints that he could not possibly consider any closer connection, either as an adopted son of the family or an adopted lord, than he had right now, since he was still caught up in the throes of grief from the trial. They would lap it up and respond annoyingly, but it was better than having them sniffing along a trail that might be truly bothersome. Harry sealed the letters with magic and laid them aside; he would have to take a trip up to the Owlery before he went to breakfast.

The next letter was the one the gull had brought. The gull had apparently stayed in the Owlery, screeching and irritating the owls to no end, and now, since it was probably magically linked to the letter, it came sliding in through the door of the Slytherin common room as it opened behind a yawning seventh-year just stumbling in to bed. The seventh-year eyed Harry, and then went on her way, shaking her head and muttering about idiot Lords who didn't get to bed at a decent time. The gull landed on Harry's knee and proceeded to look bright and helpful until Harry shooed it away so he could spread Paton Opalline's letter on his knee and read, whereupon it perched on the couch and looked bright and helpful for about three seconds, when it pecked him.

Harry shook his head—he thought he could see, now, why Honoria's Animagus form was a gull—and turned his attention to the letter.

Dear Harry:

First of all, my condolences and my congratulations on the trial. I cannot imagine that it comforted you much, if at all, to hear the sentences of your parents, but I will say that it is better than having them free. And your severing of ties with them is probably what will do you the most good, in the end. It will allow you to grow on your own, without the shadow of a poisonous tree looming over you.

Now, to business. I did promise you that the Opalline spy network is yours now, and that my relatives are spread out in many directions, over Europe as well as the British Isles. It is from Europe that my most urgent news comes.

Two of my cousins in Bulgaria report that Durmstrang has gone silent. No owls leave it, and the ones who try to approach it are turned away by what appears to be a lightning ward—a complicated Dark Arts spell that applies more force than necessary, and often kills. Parents who have tried to reach the school to inquire about their children cannot do so. Neither Apparition nor Portkeys work on school grounds, and no child has been seen outside for a week now.

I am not entirely sure of what this means, and neither are my cousins, but they have gathered rumors and passed them along to me in the absence of concrete information. The old Headmaster, Karkaroff, now a known Death Eater, recruited at the school last year. My cousins worry that his trainees may have taken over Durmstrang and are trying to use the other students as hostages or potential fighters for the Dark Lord. I am not entirely sure what I believe myself, but I thought you would wish to know of this as soon as possible.

Harry closed his eyes, imagining what Charles Rosier-Henlin must feel like at the moment. Both his sons attended Durmstrang.

Of course, does he know? Harry opened his eyes and looked at the two letters he had waiting after this one again. No, there was most definitely not a letter from Charles, and Harry couldn't imagine the man not appealing to him for help in a situation like this, even during the trial. If he didn't write his sons often, then he might not know about the silence, and of course an owl took a long time to fly from Britain to Durmstrang...

I'll write him this morning, Harry decided, and turned back to Paton's letter.

The Veela of Southern Europe are considering an alliance with you, two of my aunts living there have reported. However, you should not necessarily depend on them. Unless they are attacked directly—and the Dark Lord has not yet made an overture of either threat or good will to them—the Veela's Council requires a unanimous vote for such an alliance, and they have several hundred members. They will be bogged down in discussion and argument for a long time yet.

There have been several wizards seen approaching giant territory in the last little while. Most of them were killed, two fled, but one has not returned. My brother Gilander fears that this wizard remains in negotiation with the giants, and that he is perhaps a Death Eater. The Dark Lord, as we know from the example of the sirens, has the power to break a species' web, and I doubt that would be good news for any of us.

Several other wizarding communities, particularly in Russia and France, are growing interested in you, Harry. They are accustomed to some wariness regarding British Lords in the last half century, of course; they knew that Voldemort did not intend to restrict his reign to his native land, if once he conquered it. And now that Dumbledore is in prison, and the Dark Lord returned, and a young Lord-level wizard just revealed as the Boy-Who-Lived and the Dark Lord's mortal enemy without Declaring for the Light...their interest is natural, I think.

It is up to you what you wish to do about them. So far, not one of my cousins has reported a strong movement to offer assistance. They are mostly watching, cautious and curious, to see what will happen. Most of my cousins do not think they will join Voldemort; although the predominance of Light wizards in most international wizarding communities is not as pronounced as it is in Britain, they know what the consequences of serving him are. But they could serve as distractions if you try to dance with them when they insist on remaining neutral. You may be able to offer them profitable alliances, but I am not sure what will tempt them. Let me know if you do wish to initiate discussions with them, and I will pass the message on through my cousins.

Closer to home, several siren attacks have been reported. A school of them swam near the Isle and tried to attack our Muggles, but our wards repelled them. Two people have drowned in the Loch Ness in the last week, and the local wizards do not think it the work of their kelpie. There have also been several isolated deaths along the coastlines of both Britain and Ireland—easily attributable to carelessness in the water, but bearing the marks of siren attack.

Harry closed his eyes, feeling dizzy. He wondered if the sirens had broken free of Voldemort, or remained under his reign and were attacking on his orders. The pattern of random attacks might fit the attacks on the equinox, when Voldemort had simply wanted to take Muggles, without seeming to care about whom he captured.

He shook his head, opened his eyes, and went on reading.

Several of my British cousins, who have studied to relearn what they could of place and green magic, have reported unusual weather patterns in the places they have bound themselves to. Storms all over the Isles are growing fiercer. It has rained nonstop at my aunt Mawde's home for the past five days, breaking through all her weather wards. She is not sure what this means, but she has gathered the report and sent it along with the others.

Harry frowned slightly. I did think that for the same storm to extend from London to Scotland on Friday was unusual. It hadn't rained at Hogwarts on Saturday, but he did remember something about rain on Sunday, now that he thought of it, though he'd been too deeply involved in conversation with Draco to look outside.

He returned to Paton's letter.

My family has contacts among the London werewolves, and reports them agitated, for two reasons. One: the Ministry is apparently preparing to push tougher anti-werewolf laws, including one that would require all lycanthropes to spend the nights of the full moon in Ministry custody, perhaps in Tullianum. Second: there are rumors of you as vates spreading, and the werewolves disagree on what they should do about it. Their animal sides have no love of you as many other species seem to do.

This is the most important news my family has gathered. In return, I have a personal request to make. I invite you to join my family on the Isle for New Year's. I am aware that you will most likely spend Christmas in the care of your own loved ones, but I would like you to enjoy one celebration with the Opallines, and other than Christmas, this is the closest holiday.

That is not the only reason, of course. Calibrid, my daughter and heir, would like to meet you. Circumstances forbade her from attending the trial; she spent the past year traveling to learn the politics and customs of Europe, and now must remain bound to the Isle for a year to renew her acquaintance with it. As well, my son Doncan, similarly bound, looks forward to meeting with you. I think you will like him.

Please write back soon. I look forward to hearing from you.

Yours in the grace of the Light,

Paton Opalline.

Harry leaned back on the couch and stared at the ceiling for a moment, thinking. One thing was clear: There was no way that he could handle all this by himself, as much as he would have liked to.

He closed his eyes and drew up a parchment in his mind, carefully placing concerns on it.

It doesn't sound like I can do anything about the Veela as yet. Same thing with the storms, except keep an eye on them, and ask Paton to report anything else unusual about them to me. I don't have any idea about weather magic, and Merlin knows what would happen if I asked Trelawney to read the patterns to me.

The giants...damn. Send someone to negotiate with them? Who? Hagrid? I don't know if I have the right to ask that of him. Harry gnawed his lip, then decided, I don't have the right, no, but I can ask him, and see what he says about it.

The werewolves are a problem, especially since the only contact I might have among them is Wilmot, and I think a letter from me to him would probably raise a few eyebrows. I remember Remus mentioning that he knows some of them, though, a long time ago. I'll ask him if he'll serve as my delegate.

I have got to get in contact with whatever the closest wizarding community is to Durmstrang. I'll write to Charles, and I'll ask Paton to put me in touch with whichever one of his cousins can most help me there. For the others, I'll wait until they actually approach me. And if they're just interested in watching, I'll make sure I put on a bloody good show. Harry could feel himself grin briefly.

Now, the sirens. Stupid things. It does seem random so far, and I don't know how to predict where they'll strike next. Siren schools are the next subject of study for me, then. And I'll write Arabella Zabini. If anyone knows a way of counteracting musical threats, then she will.

Harry sat up, and began writing. He detailed all his decisions in his letter to Paton, including his decision to accept their New Year's invitation. The moment he finished and sealed that letter, the gull snatched it in its beak, gave a bright, piping cry, and flew towards the door of the Slytherin common room, again just as it opened to let someone else out to breakfast. Harry shook his head. They must have a magic of their own.

His letters to Charles and Arabella followed. Harry didn't see a way or a reason to dance around the problems delicately, so he told them the blunt truth. He was hungry by the time he finished writing, but he still had two more letters that had arrived during the weekend left. He reached for them gamely.

The first was, luckily, only a short note from Lucius.

Dear Harry:

Please be advised that the Dark Lord has a new Death Eater. Her name is Indigena Yaxley, of a family that values honor more than sense, and who is now serving because her nephew served my old Lord and betrayed him. She is incredibly good with plants, a powerful Dark witch, very clever, and determined to be neutral in the War until this occurred. Think of her as a sane and more dangerous Bellatrix. This means that you must be even more on your guard when you go to face our common enemy. Do not, I repeat do not, trust anyone you do not know who approaches you with an offer of alliance. We know that Indigena can disguise herself well enough to fool most wizards, though not how or what she looks like in the disguise.

We will have to find something else to call the Alliance, now that you have rejected your last name. Do think on it.

Lucius Malfoy.

Harry rolled his eyes, but penned a short note back, to say that he'd received the warning and was grateful for it. He remembered studying the family Yaxley, though not in depth; they hadn't participated in any wars of Dark and Light for nearly a century, preferring to stay in seclusion and study the Dark Arts. Vita desinit, decus permanet, ran their motto. Poetically translated, it meant Life ends, honor does not.

Harry could see why Indigena Yaxley would be a problem.

The last letter was from Augustus Starrise, a diplomatically worded note that suggested informing his fellow alliance members of his new allegiance as soon as possible. Harry had to agree with that. He didn't have the time or energy to write any more letters right now, though. His head was spinning with complications, and he had five letters to post.

He scooped up those five, and made for the Owlery, running over possible wordings for his appeals to Remus and Hagrid in his head. Remus would normally be happy to help him, he knew, but the secrets of his fellow werewolves weren't ones he had willingly revealed to Harry so far. And Harry had never had the close friendship with Hagrid that Connor had enjoyed.

More to the point, I'm not Dumbledore. And Hagrid had been loyal to Dumbledore.

Harry rubbed distractedly at his head, stopping only as he heard the crinkle of parchment and realized he would crush his post if the rubbing continued. Sometimes I wish I had never gone into politics, he thought, and decided to ignore all the factors in his life that would have made politics go after him.

Harry was so involved in plotting what he was going to do about Durmstrang—not only the Rosier-Henlin children were there, but Gregory Goyle, assuming that the rumors last year were true and his father had sent him to Durmstrang instead of letting him come back to Hogwarts—that he didn't notice the stares at first. Therefore, it was disconcerting to look up and find himself the focus of most of the eyes in the Great Hall.

Harry returned their gazes for a moment, then snorted. Of course. Most of them haven't seen me since the trial, with the way I buried myself away this weekend. This is the first public appearance I've made as the Boy-Who-Lived and Renounced His Name and Got His Parents Put In Prison.

He took his seat at the Slytherin table, ignoring the stares as best he could. It wasn't as though he didn't have other things to worry about. Among the other things, he'd discovered a storm raging when he went up to the Owlery, blasting, lashing rain descending on the stones so hard that Harry was reluctant to send the birds out until they hooted their readiness to fly at him. Such a storm wouldn't have made him do anything other than blink normally, but with storms all over the British Isles...

Could Voldemort be altering the weather patterns? I have no idea why, though. It would make it more inconvenient for his Death Eaters than anyone else, since they're the ones who have to meet outdoors more often.

Or perhaps the storms were actually incidental. Harry was sure he had read something once before about the weather changing as a result of powerful magic. But the magic would have to be so powerful that only a Lord could raise it.

He reached automatically for porridge, and a hand covered his. He glanced at Draco and raised his eyebrows.

“Have you forgotten the talk we had yesterday?” Draco asked.

Harry frowned. He had, actually. He’d told Draco most of what Vera had said, and Draco had insisted that he try sweeter and more savory things than porridge to, as Draco put it, “recover his sense of taste.”

Harry still thought the whole thing immensely silly, the silliest of Vera’s prescriptions to him. Yes, he could see the necessity of learning to accept himself as human; after the much-improved conversations he’d had with Draco on Saturday and Sunday, he was impatient to push himself some more on it. And yes, he could see the necessity of relearning the pleasures of touch and sleep. But why should caring about what he ate make such a difference?

He had made the mistake of telling Draco about it, though, so under his stern eyes, he was forced to load his plate with eggs, sausages, and a roll. Draco just barely approved the pumpkin juice, saying that he thought orange juice would be better, and refused to let Harry have any corn flakes.

“I don’t need this level of fussing,” Harry said under his breath as he took a bite of his eggs. He chewed them, then shrugged at Draco’s stare. He didn’t dislike them, exactly, but they had texture and salt, and that made him feel uncomfortable. He didn’t see why he couldn’t have porridge.

“Sometimes, you do,” said Draco softly.

“You’re not my mum,” Harry pointed out. “Or my brother.”

"I would say that I'm definitely not either of those things," said Draco, his eyes brightening, and Harry realized he shouldn't have given him the opening. "Considering what we were doing yesterday, I would be most disturbed to wake up and find myself related to you in any way."

Harry flushed and returned to his breakfast. If it would get Draco to stop reminding him of things better kept in private, then he'd eat the damn eggs.

"Potter."

Harry deliberately didn't turn around. The person behind him coughed and leaned forward to say, "Potter!" right into his ear.

"That's not my name anymore, Smith," Harry pointed out absently, biting into a sausage. He winced at the flavor. "Besides, since when are we on such formal terms? We're allies, I'd thought."

That was perhaps the only time that Harry remembered being able to render Zacharias Smith speechless. It didn't last very long. Zacharias coughed and tried again a moment later. "Harry," he said, and Harry was glad to put his fork down and turn around.

"Yes?"

Zacharias stood up haughtily straight, looking as if he refrained from rolling his eyes only because it was something no Smith would do. "I just want to ask you a few questions about what this means," he said, tapping the Daily Prophet article that Harry refused to look at.

"All right," Harry agreed.

"You're not the heir of your family?" Zacharias stared straight into his eyes.

"No." Harry rolled his head back on his neck and smiled at him. "Does that disappoint you?"

"A bit," Zacharias said. "You're elder son, correct? I thought the Potter inheritance would pass to you, with your father in his—current condition.” Harry wondered if Light pureblood manners forbade referring to the loss of someone’s magic. It wasn’t a custom he’d ever heard of.

“I renounced my name before then,” said Harry quietly. “It went to my brother because it had nowhere else to go.”

“Ah.” Zacharias hesitated a moment, as though he now regretted doing this in the middle of the Great Hall. Harry didn’t. It would answer some questions so he wouldn’t have to answer them multiple times over, and it kept him from having to eat. Draco couldn’t complain, and had better not poke him with the fork that Harry could see him picking up from the corner of his eye.

Zacharias recovered himself, though, and said, with a smooth, cold, stern face, “What family name do you plan to adopt?”

Definitely glad that we did this here. Harry raised his voice for his answer. “I’m Harry for right now, and that’s all I want to be. I’ll never renounce my kinship with my brother, who’s keeping his name, but I’m not accepting the Potter name again. Nor do I have any plans for adoption into any family, currently. And I like it that way.” A slow turn of his head had him meeting multiple speculative eyes, and he sighed. I suppose that won’t stop all the offers. Each of them is going to think they’re the family that can persuade me otherwise, and they’ll think me vulnerable without relatives until they tangle with me. At least it might be on the level of words, as this confrontation is, and not shouted hexes, which ought to improve my relationship with Ravenclaw.

“You don’t know how glad we would be to take you,” said Draco, quietly enough that Zacharias probably didn’t even hear.

Harry turned his head and gripped his hand. “I know,” he said quietly. “But I want to be just Harry right now.”

Draco didn’t answer, but squeezed his hand back, some of the sulky look fading from his face. And he put down the fork.

Zacharias seemed to be suitably impressed with this show of strength. He nodded. "Then I'll simply reswear my alliance to Harry the vates instead of Harry Potter," he said. "Will that be acceptable?"

"It will," said Harry, and his erstwhile ally left him. Harry hopefully cast a Tempus charm to check the minutes left in breakfast, and brightened when he saw there were only five minutes left before they had to leave anyway. He started to stand.

Draco clamped a hand on his arm. "Sit down," he breathed. "You didn't get enough to eat."

"I had all I want," said Harry.

Draco looked into his eyes, obviously asking him if he really wanted to have an argument this stupid in front of everyone.

Harry resignedly sat down and ate a few more sausages to make Draco happy, trying to ignore Millicent's snickering. "Remus?"

Remus looked up, surprised. He had thought that Harry had Charms at this hour. "Is everything all right, Harry?" he asked, setting down the letter from Wilmot he'd been looking at. Wilmot had bragged about revealing himself to Harry. Remus wasn't sure that was the wisest thing to do—not because Harry would betray a secret like that, but because it might put Harry in an awkward position with the Minister. The situation was giving him a headache, and he was happy to focus on another problem. At least Harry didn't smell particularly distressed.

Harry grinned at him and leaned against the door. "Sure, Remus. But I can already do the Silencing Charms we're covering perfectly well, after all. And Professor Flitwick doesn't know what to call me. He finally settled on Mr. Harry, but he still doesn't like it." Harry chuckled. "So he said I could come see you."

Remus lifted his eyebrows. "And what do you need to see me about?"

Harry pulled a letter out of his pocket and levitated it over to him. Remus accepted it without thought, then shook his head a bit. Sometimes he found himself forgetting that Harry had ever had two hands, so well did he compensate with his magic. It was—well, disturbing. Remus wasn't sure why it should be disturbing, though, so he focused on the letter, blinking as a certain paragraph flashed green. Remus's eyes caught the words London werewolves, and he leaned close.

"I know about Wilmot," said Harry quietly as he read. "He revealed himself to me during the trial. And he said that he had contacts among the London werewolves. I'm afraid that owling him might reveal him, though. My post is going to be tracked if at all possible, and a random Auror writing me would set off bells I don't want ringing. Would you be willing to talk to the London werewolves for me?"

Remus took his time to raise his head. Old loyalties were tugging him in two directions now. At least he'd been to the Sanctuary, and was sure that he could handle the conflict now. In the old days, this might have tugged him apart.

On the one hand, Harry was the only member of his family, besides Connor, for whom Remus had any love left now. And he'd known Harry since he was a child, and he knew him now as vates. He couldn't see Harry doing something that would hurt the refugee packs on purpose.

On the other hand, some of the London refugees had specifically requested that no human know about them. They kept an eye on dealings in the wizarding and Muggle worlds that might affect them, of course, but as quietly as possible, mostly through werewolves like Remus who hadn't joined a pack. Even a vates wouldn't be welcome among them without a wolf snarling in his head. And they had helped Remus during the summers when he was a student in Hogwarts, and during the years between the time he left Hogwarts and the first fall of Voldemort, and again during the time before Connor and Harry came to school, giving him money, shelter, protection, when he couldn't hold a job. Betrayal would be a poor return for all they had done for him.

“What do you want me to say?” Remus asked, deciding to temporize. Harry, at least, unlike some humans, would understand if Remus refused to do this.

“That I’m going to try as hard as I can to make sure those anti-werewolf laws aren’t passed.” Harry’s eyes flashed. For a moment, Remus was carried painfully back in time to his sixth year, when Lily’s eyes had flashed like that at James. Then it was past, and he was looking at a boy more determined than Lily had ever been about anything. “It’s time Scrimgeour and I talked about that. And that if someone wants Wolfsbane, they can approach me through you or Hawthorn or one of the Light werewolves I can safely communicate with. Delilah Gloryflower would probably be best, since her aunt is my ally, too.”

Remus leaned back in his chair. “You’d just provide the Wolfsbane for free?”

Harry frowned at him. “Of course.”

Remus pondered for a moment, then decided he had to reveal this, or some of his words wouldn’t make any sense to Harry. “Some of them would actually prefer if you charged for it, Harry. Without a price, they’re likely to think it’s poison, or a trap.”

Harry nodded slowly. “I can see that. But then some who need it might not get it.”

Remus smiled in spite of himself. “Worry about the ones willing to approach you, first,” he said.

“Then you’ll pass the message along?” Harry’s eyes widened, and he smiled brilliantly when Remus nodded. “Thank you. That’s really all that I wanted them to know. If they want to tell me anything, I’d appreciate it, but it’s up to them.”

Did his training make him a diplomat, or did he just turn out that way? Remus asked himself, as he watched Harry slip out the door. This open-ended approach was the one that would work best with the London packs, many of whom were as wary of wizards as true wolves were of Muggles. It'd take a lot of circling and sniffing even so before they could bring themselves to trust Harry—well, except with Loki's pack, but Loki was something like a Weasley twin, and Remus wouldn't trust the immediate offer he would be sure to make.

And there was the chance, however small and distant and far in the future it might be, that this would someday lead to freedom from their wolves.

Remus's wolf snarled in his head, demanding blood. Remus grinned fiercely to spite it, and then rose to begin writing his letters.

Harry peered out a window on the fifth floor at the steadily falling rain, and felt his shoulders relax, despite the storm's unnaturalness. The day had gone well so far. No one had been stupid enough to approach him with offers of adoption—yet—Remus had agreed to contact the London werewolves, Hagrid had hesitated but said he'd think about talking to the giants, Draco had been satisfied with the sandwiches Harry had eaten at lunch, and Harry had finished writing the letters that would inform his allies of Augustus Starrise's new place among them. He couldn't help grinning as he imagined Lucius's reaction. Yes, Draco's father probably knew about Augustus already, but assuming he didn't...

"Harry. There you are."

Harry jumped, turning around as he did so. Acies Lestrangle stood behind him, her hood over her face as it usually was outside class. Harry relaxed and inclined his head. "Professor Merryweather," he said, just in case someone was around to overhear them. "Did you need something?"

"I need to tell you something," said Acies. "I have known about it for several months, but you were not yet ready to hear it. Other songs have ridden your mind. Now you may hear this prophecy's music."

Harry felt his shoulders tense, most of his good mood vanishing. Not another fucking prophecy. "I suppose there's no chance that it doesn't concern me?" he asked.

Acies gave him just enough of a look from under her cloak to intimidate him, then began to half-sing, half-chant.

“Three on three the old one coils,
Three in its times, three in its choices,
It bears his rivals to silence and stillness,
And the wild Darkness laughs, and the Light rejoices.

“Two on two the storms that are coming,
Two for the day, and two for the year,
The storm of darkness when no moon will shine,
And the storm of light that will blaze most fiercely here.

“One on one all the prophecies bear down,
One is their center, and one is their heart,
And from my mouth comes no Divination again
Except those prophecies in which he has a part.”

Harry blinked, his mind emptying for a moment, the way that it had when he finally heard the full prophecy that concerned him and Connor for the first time. Then he found his eyes turning to the rain outside the window first. It showed absolutely no signs of stopping, and the thunder screamed like something with its guts ripped out to make the point.

“Two on two the storms that are coming,” he whispered.

“Yes.” Acies moved up beside him, one hand touching his shoulder. Harry blinked and glanced at it. It was an ordinary hand, but for a moment, it had felt incredibly heavy, weighted and scaled, a dragon’s talon. “I think these storms the prelude of them, though, rather than the storms that the prophecy means. But there is something I fear, something I fear very much. Did you know, vates, that on the night of the midwinter solstice, the moon will be dark?”

Harry closed his eyes. Shit. That’s a prime day for one of Voldemort’s attacks, and if the moon is dark and all influence of Light is banished... He didn’t know for certain what Voldemort might do, but something strong enough to influence a prophecy wouldn’t be pleasant.

“Thank you, Acies,” he said. Then his mind leaped again, reciting the eighth line of the prophecy to him, and his eyes flared open. “And the storm of light is coming to Hogwarts?”

“So the prophecy says,” said Acies calmly, stepping away from him. “Sybill Trelawney stood on the Astronomy Tower when she made it, and it sounds like a local reference, does it not?”

Harry nodded, his mind spinning rapidly, investigating several conclusions and disregarding most of them, pinpointing the one most likely.

A storm of darkness on Midwinter. A storm of light on Midsummer. And on Midsummer, it'll be a year since Voldemort's resurrection.

He took a deep breath, and expelled it again. A ringing had appeared in his head, but he didn't think it was anything to worry about. This was the kind of ringing that he usually got just before he confronted a worthy opponent, or did something that mattered to the war he'd been training for all his life.

“Thank you, Acies,” he said, starting to move away, but paused when she remained where she was, staring out the window. “Are you well?” he asked gently.

“I hear the music,” Acies whispered. “Dragons are called the Singers, I have told you that.”

Harry nodded.

Acies turned her head to look at him, though again it was only a quick flash of wild eyes before she slid her hood back over her face. “I am still mostly human, Harry,” she said. “But only mostly. The dragon in me hears the music and sings back to it. And every time I use the dragon, I yield more of the human. If I am ever close enough to the great songs, however, the songs of Dark and Light, I fear that I will not be able to help myself, and my dragon will come.”

Harry hesitated, unsure what to say. Acies was staring out the window at the rain again.

"Is there anything I can do?" Harry asked at last. "As vates, I mean?"

"You cannot free me from freedom," Acies said gently. "Be on your way, Harry, and be well. Only remember me as human, when there is nothing human left of me."

Harry bowed his head, feeling no fear, only sadness and a great awe, and left her there, staring as the rain continued to fall and the thunder screamed its anger and its death.

Chapter Forty-Nine: Ariadne's Web

Harry woke at a note of phoenix song. He sat up, pushing his hand sleepily at his eyes, trying to wake up faster than seemed to be happening. If Fawkes sang to him in the middle of the night, and not to put him to sleep, then it must be serious.

But the song wasn't coming from Fawkes, he found when he opened his eyes fully and saw the phoenix sitting on the far end of his bed. It soared from just above his left wrist, and a moment later Charles Rosier-Henlin's voice said, "Harry? Can you hear me?"

Harry bowed his head and suppressed a groan. Of course. The spell Charles had taught him to communicate over long distances, the spell that he and his allies had used in the Woodhouse attack! He could have used this to speak with Charles right away about Durmstrang, if only he had remembered it.

"Sir," he said. "What can I help you with?"

There was a pause, as if that wasn't the greeting Charles had expected, but he went on with no discernible change of tone. "I assume that you know about Durmstrang now."

"Yes, but almost nothing about it," said Harry honestly. It was the reason why he hadn't felt able to do anything about the other school as yet. A few subtle questions among students who had relatives at Durmstrang had produced shaking heads and blank looks. Harry couldn't plan an attack when he had no information.

"You could have spoken to me."

Harry felt his face burn. "Yes," he said. "I'm sorry. I forgot."

"Did you also forget that I use this spell to communicate with my sons?" Charles asked. "I know what has been happening inside Durmstrang."

"I did forget, but I would be grateful if you would tell me," said Harry, his mind springing into action. "What can I do? Is there a way of bringing down the lightning ward that they have the school surrounded with, or—“

“The answer, Harry, is nothing. We can do nothing. Right now.”

The bitterness silenced Harry. He waited a moment until he was sure that nothing else would emerge from the air above his wrist, and then he asked cautiously, “Why? Is Voldemort Marking the students as Death Eaters?”

“That abomination, at least, is beyond his reach, unless he changes the magic of the Dark Mark,” said Charles. “He cannot take anyone unwilling. It was a protection he devised during the First War so that he would know who was loyal to him. He didn’t think that someone would turn traitor to him after they had the Mark, or take it for any other reason than serving him.” His voice was vicious with satisfaction, before it went back to the dry tone that Harry thought meant he was extremely angry. “No, he is holding the children as hostages. I have received a polite little letter, informing me that I will not fight beside you anymore. Or else. Mr. Rhangnara has received a similar letter.”

Harry’s head was light, spinning. This happened, and I wasn’t able to prevent it. This happened, and I let it happen. He crushed the guilt, because it would have prevented him from speaking. “I didn’t know that Mr. Rhangnara’s children were at Durmstrang,” he said instead. He had assumed without thinking that they were schooled privately, since Thomas was obviously a wizard interested in books and learning.

“They are,” said Charles. “And his daughter Charis has taken the Crucio—“ There was a sudden silence, as if he hadn’t meant to tell Harry that. He probably hadn’t, Harry thought.

“How old is Charis?” Harry asked.

“Harry, I do not see—“

“How old?” Harry stared at the far wall. He could always speak to Thomas with this spell and ask him. He probably couldn’t owl him, since Voldemort would be watching for some sign of communication between Harry and the allies who were being pressured to withdraw from him. And what had the owl to Charles yesterday cost his sons?

“Twelve,” said Charles. “She is twelve.”

Harry closed his eyes.

“And my son Owen took it, and he is sixteen,” Charles went on, in a harsh rush, as if determined to get all the bad news out of the way at once. “Voldemort sent in Bellatrix Lestrange, Harry.”

“Is he mad?” Harry murmured, then realized he knew the answer to that question. He changed it. “Does he really think that she’ll be able to control her urge to curse all the children in sight?”

“Apparently so,” said Charles, once again dryly. “Or perhaps not. Considering the spell he has used on the school, absolute loyalty may mean more to him than the actual good condition of the hostages.”

“You still haven’t told me what that spell is,” Harry said, opening his eyes and frowning at nothing. “Or why it’s impossible for me to go to Durmstrang with you and rip that lightning ward apart.”

“Have you ever heard of Ariadne’s Web?”

“I know who Ariadne was, of course,” said Harry. “She let Theseus into the center of the Labyrinth to kill the Minotaur by giving him a clew of thread that would show him the way in and then the way out. But perhaps we’re not speaking of the same one—“

“We are. Ariadne’s Web is, according to wizarding legend, what Ariadne did to Theseus and all those in his palace after he deserted her. It binds everyone in a particular enclosed place from using magic against the caster. It’s a strange spell. The web is absolutely impossible to break from inside it—there is no way that the students could take on Lestrange and win, no matter how many of them tried. But from the outside, in this case Durmstrang’s walls, it seems to be linked to a single object that the caster carries. If we could make her put that object down, then we would have a chance of fighting her.”

“Thus the lightning ward,” Harry summarized. “But, sir, I do have the power to break a ward like that, and I am vates. Destroying webs is what I do.” The very thought of Ariadne’s Web was making him sick with the need to destroy it. “We could still go to Durmstrang and—“

“There exists another effect of Ariadne’s Web,” said Charles quietly. “The caster can will anyone in it to suffer pain or to die instantly. There is no stopping that, from either inside or outside, unless the web itself is broken. Lestrage has announced to the children that the minute she feels the wards fall, she will begin lashing out through the web, hurting anyone in sight.”

Harry closed his eyes. “And certainly my allies’ children would be among her first targets,” he muttered.

“Precisely.”

“So what can we do?” Harry whispered. He felt helpless—not necessarily against what had happened, but against the extent of Voldemort’s cruelty. He had not thought to guard against a spell like this because he had not dreamed that it existed, much less that Voldemort would use it.

“Portkeys and Apparition no longer work onto school grounds,” said Charles. “And the Floo Network to Durmstrang has been sealed off. But a Portkey into the school itself would work, to get us around the wards without having to drop them. They are, of course, only available to someone trusted. That means—“

“A Death Eater,” Harry finished. “We need a Death Eater.”

“Yes. I don’t suppose you know one?” Charles’s voice got dryer.

Harry’s mind went at once to Evan Rosier, but he had to say, “No. Not one that I could trust to give me accurate information, or a Portkey that actually worked to take us to Durmstrang.”

"I thought not. I am working, subtly, on contacts that I had in the First War, when I gave the Dark Lord monetary support. It will be a long, slow process, to get through to people who can help me disrupt his plans so thoroughly as this, and to convince them to take the risk in the first place. In the meantime, I've told my boys to keep their heads down, and avoid Lestrangle's notice as much as possible. Rhangnara has passed the same message along to his children."

"And there is nothing else that can be done?" There has to be, Harry thought, but he realized that was probably his experience as vates talking. From the time he had learned of a web until the time he broke it, he had never encountered one he thought could not be broken—only the consequences of what might happen if he unraveled it too early. The idea that he would have to wait in silence and patience while people who had trusted their lives to him suffered was intolerable.

"Nothing, Harry," said Charles quietly. "I am sorry. I have spoken with my sons exhaustively. The spell is undoubtedly Ariadne's Web, and I have been through both my library and Rhangnara's, which is much more extensive. The web cannot be broken from the inside, and they have restricted all access thoroughly from the outside."

"I am sorry," Harry whispered. "So sorry, that following me has brought you into this." He shuddered at the thought of living in the same school with Bellatrix, never knowing when she might make you suffer pain or even death, instantaneously and at her whim.

"I knew something like this might happen," said Charles, sounding calmer than he had so far. "But they still should not have touched my children, and for that they will suffer." His voice was like dry ice. "I will not owl you, and neither will Mr. Rhangnara, now. We must be seen complying with the terms that the Dark Lord has dictated to us. But we will use this spell to speak to you, and if we find some other method to get around the Web and into the school, we will let you know at once."

"I don't suppose brooms would—"

“No. The lightning ward has the school surrounded, Mr. Pot—Harry. You would still have to try and drop the ward as you rode above Durmstrang, and Lestrangle would know at once.”

Harry gave a little snarl. He hated feeling helpless. But until he could think of a better solution, this one would have to do. Perhaps he could send an owl to Rosier, though he hadn't heard from the man in long enough for the silence to make him wary.

“Very well,” he murmured. “Thank you for telling me.”

“You are welcome.”

Charles's voice ceased, and Harry was left to sit on his bed, in the dark. There was no chance of going back to sleep—and, he decided abruptly, he didn't want to sit on his bed in the dark either. He opened his curtains and peered cautiously at the other boys' beds. The sound of Draco's light snores came from beside him, accompanied by Blaise's slightly deeper ones, and Harry nodded. Though neither of them slept anything like as heavily as Connor, they were still in the phase of sleep where they were least likely to hear him if he crept out.

He wasn't sure where he was going as he went down the stairs and crossed the common room velvet-footed. Going outside the school to fly would be too dangerous. He only knew that he wanted to do something, since he couldn't do what he really wanted: fly to Durmstrang, take down the ward, and rescue everyone.

He stepped out into the dungeons, shut the door to the common room behind him, and leaned his head against the cool stone. He thought he could hear the sound of rushing water if he listened intently enough. That might only be in his head, but it comforted him nonetheless. He didn't know how long he stood there, letting his hand stroke the stone and trying to think of nothing at all.

“Harry. Is there a reason that you are filling your hair with slime and your palm with blood?”

Harry started and looked up. Snape stood not far behind him, his wand held out in front of him with a faint Lumos on the end of it and his eyebrows raised. Harry glanced down then, as a stinging pain in his hand made itself known, and realized that he'd ground his palm so hard into the stone that it had a gash on it. He grimaced.

"I had bad news," he said softly, then could have struck himself. He didn't want to talk about this with Snape.

Snape studied him intently, then said, "Come with me, Harry. We will not disturb Madam Pomfrey this time of night."

Harry knew he could have argued, could have resisted, but he really didn't want to go back to bed, the only other possible option. Anyone's company was to be preferred to his own right about then. He followed Snape to his private rooms—which slightly surprised Harry; he had thought they'd go to his offices—and took his seat on the couch near the fire. Snape ducked briefly towards the shelf along the wall where he kept his personal potions, then came back with two of them. Harry accepted one that smelled of a normal healing draught, but shook his head at the other. "I don't need to be calm," he said.

"Don't you?"

Harry squinted at Snape. He didn't sound the way he—well, should have sounded. He sounded interested, and as if he thought there was at least a reasonable chance that Harry might not need the Calming Draught. Harry would have expected Snape to force it down his throat, instead.

And that made Harry hesitate. It's my choice. He eyed the blue liquid, then sighed. Do I have a chance of getting back to sleep if I don't take this? No. Do I need the sleep? Yes.

He drank down the vial, and was briefly gratified to see Snape's eyes widen before the potion spread serenity across the surface of his mind. He sighed again and gave Snape back the empty vials, then leaned back and closed his eyes. The pain in his palm had already stopped, and Harry knew the wound would have closed.

"Do you wish to speak about what is troubling you?"

Snape's voice was low and careful. Harry listened, his senses sharpened now that he didn't have to worry about emotions clouding them, and found no trace of impatience. Snape wasn't trying to force him to do this any more than he had been trying to force him to take the Calming Draught. It was—unexpected.

And, given his free choice, Harry decided to answer. "It's Durmstrang," he murmured. "Charles just spoke to me and told me that I can't do anything about it. Bellatrix Lestrange is in the school, with Ariadne's Web on the children, and a ward around her that she'll know the instant I try to take down. Then she can hurt or kill the people I'm trying to save." He felt a wave of tension run through his muscles, despite the Calming Draught. "Why? Why can't I do anything?"

"Should you have been able to do something?" Snape asked.

Harry opened his eyes. "Of course I should have. What kind of question is that?"

"Why?"

"Because it's a strange question for you to ask, that's why."

He thought Snape smiled. "I did not mean what was strange about my question. I meant, why should you have been able to do something?"

"Oh." Harry frowned. "Because I'm the only wizard who stands a chance of matching Voldemort in power, now—unless we really want to free Dumbledore and ask him to pretty please help us." He snorted. "I should be able to do something about the ward and the Ariadne's Web."

"And did you know that the Dark Lord was going to do this?"

"No," said Harry reluctantly. He frowned at Snape. "You're going to make me see sense or something, aren't you?"

"If I can." Snape's face was neutral. "You seem to be feeling helpless, Harry, but there is no reason for that. You did not cause this."

"But I should have anticipated it." Harry moved restlessly; he couldn't tell if the Calming Draught was wearing off or if his emotions were simply too strong for the potion to contain them all. "I would have known immediately if I hadn't been paying so much attention to my own affairs, the trial. And then that weekend where I didn't look at letters! Paton's letter telling me about Durmstrang's silence came on Saturday. If I'd looked at it—"

"You would have known about your own helplessness earlier," Snape finished. "That is all."

"Maybe I could think of something," said Harry. "There has to be some way to get through the ward and the web."

"Sometimes, Harry, there is not," said Snape softly.

Harry frowned at him. "But you've always found a way. You've never been helpless in your life. It's one of the things I admire about you, you know." Something very odd flickered across Snape's face, but Harry didn't think he could identify it, so he didn't try. "You found a way out of just being a Death Eater, and you found a way out of serving Dumbledore when you saw he wasn't worth serving, and you found a way to rescue me when you shouldn't have been able to. You even found a way to get my parents punished." This time, he couldn't help the slight accusing tone to his voice. "When you should have just left things alone."

"Harry," said Snape, voice low, intense. "I was helpless in most of those situations, and took the only road open to me."

"But that's just the thing," said Harry, flinging up his hand. "There's no road open in this situation that I can see."

"And there was no road open in the situation with your parents that did not cost me something I held dear," said Snape. "Please understand that, Harry. I did not accuse them to hurt you. I did not accuse them to hurt James. The cost of accusing them was your good opinion of me. The cost of leaving them free was your soul.”

“It wouldn’t have been,” Harry muttered, closing his eyes.

“It would,” said Snape. “You would have driven yourself to death trying to rescue them, and it was impossible to rescue them. You saw that yourself at the trial.” Abruptly, he drew in his breath, and was still. Then he murmured, “You must weigh the costs of acting against not acting at this juncture. What are the costs of not acting?”

“Lives, potentially,” Harry whispered. “My own peace. The feeling that I’ve failed my allies.”

“And if you act?”

“Lives, potentially,” Harry had to answer again. “My allies’ good opinion of me. The feeling that I’ve endangered the children at Durmstrang through my own actions, instead of just letting something happen to them.”

“So it all swings on your own feelings,” Snape said. “And are your own emotions enough reason to do something difficult and dangerous, something that might endanger the children inside Durmstrang because of you?”

Harry made a small sound of distress. He didn’t think he could open his eyes. The Calming Draught was drowning his mind deep. But if he didn’t deal with the problem now, then it would just overwhelm him when he woke up. “No,” he whispered. “They can’t be. They aren’t. I just—I just wish there was something I could do.”

“Research Ariadne’s Web,” said Snape. “Research wards. If you find something that might mean nothing to anyone else, something only possible for a wizard of your power, then you can launch yourself at it. Until then, there really is nothing else that you can do.”

“Maybe not,” said Harry. He felt himself lying back on the couch. Snape was beside him in a moment, with a soft swish of robes, arranging him so that he lay back and removing his glasses. Harry managed to peer at him blearily, though he didn't think he could focus his eyes. "Did you really do it because of that?"

Snape looked down at him. "Because of what?"

"You didn't accuse my parents because you hated James," Harry clarified. "You did it to save me."

Snape stiffened in surprise. Then he said, after a moment as full of life as a heartbeat, "Yes, I did."

"Oh." Harry closed his eyes. "Wasn't sure about that," he muttered. He felt a hand smooth over his forehead, lingering on his scar, but sleep was already claiming him, full of dreams that wouldn't eat him alive.

"Mr. Potter?"

Harry knew it was probably childish, but he kept his head bowed over his book. Ariadne's Web is sometimes considered to be a myth, the text told him, but it is most assuredly a real spell. There are myths about it that have hindered researchers into it for centuries, however. The most persistent of these is the idea that it can be cast only by a woman, as it was a witch's vengeance on a man who forsook her. This is not true, though it is true that the web is stronger when cast by a witch...

"Mr. Potter. Please."

The speaker had stepped around in front of him. Harry was vaguely surprised to see that it was a stranger—a rabbit wizard with what seemed to be a permanently apologetic look on his face, clutching a small sheaf of papers. He held out a hand when he saw Harry's stare, flushing.

"My name is Adam Proudfoot," he murmured. "I was Mr. Potter's—that is to say, your father's solicitor. I've come to see you and your brother about the settlement of the properties and the Potter inheritance."

Harry didn't take his hand. "Then you want to talk to my brother," he said, turning back to his book. "He's the one who inherited everything."

"Harry."

Harry looked over his shoulder reluctantly. Connor stood in the library entrance, frowning at him, and ignoring Madam Pince, who was giving them a glare of death for interrupting the silence.

"There are things we need to discuss," said Connor. "I want to make sure that you have some of the money, for example—"

"And I don't want it," Harry cut in.

"Mr. Potter—" twittered Mr. Proudfoot, who obviously didn't get it.

"Brother." Connor took a single step forward, his gaze stronger than Harry had seen it since that day in the courtroom. "I'll need an heir, and I don't have a chance of having one for a while yet. And I know things about the Potter properties that you don't. They want an heir. They want to know that they'll have somewhere to go if I die."

"They can talk to you?" Harry asked, startled. That wasn't something he'd heard about Lux Aeterna or the house at Godric's Hollow, though of course he'd known Lux Aeterna had its own personality.

"Not talk," said Connor, his forehead wrinkling. "It's more like they have a hunger, and my mind translates the hunger for me." He blinked, and his eyes focused on Harry again. "And I think you're the best choice for someone to be heir. You don't have to take the Potter name again, just take charge of the properties if I—if I die." His voice faltered on the word, at least; Harry would have been worried if his brother had gone stoic about his own death all of a sudden. "They'll accept you, since you have the blood connection."

"Well put, Mr. Potter, well put," said Mr. Proudfoot. When Harry looked at him again, he was cringing in front of Madam Pince's scowl. "Should we take this somewhere more private?" he asked.

Harry stood up with a sigh. "There are abandoned classrooms we can use," he said, and Mr. Proudfoot nodded gratefully. Harry waited until they were out of the library and safely sitting down behind dusty desks in one of the third-floor classrooms before he added, "I understand what you mean, Connor, but I don't want them. I don't want anything to do with the Potter name except your love and your friendship."

"You won't accept money even as a gift?" Connor asked, his voice wistful. "Mr. Proudfoot told me that all the Galleons in your personal vault have reverted to me. The commitment James made to give them to you couldn't hold up against the loss of his magic, because his magic was bound to his signature."

Harry nodded; he'd expected that. Many things changed when a pureblood wizard lost his magic. "I'm sure. Thank you, Connor, but they just have too many bad memories. I won't be tied to James and Lily by anything except memories now. That's the way I want it."

Connor sighed. Mr. Proudfoot said, "Ah, Mr. Pot—Harry, but your father did leave something in trust for you, something sealed with a spell that the loss of his magic did not disrupt. Because the object is sentient, it could agree to the transfer, and its agreement was recorded again when your father lost his magic."

"What is it?" Harry asked, though he had the feeling he already knew.

"The Maze," Connor said. "It belongs to you now, Harry."

Harry had the feeling that the Maze belonged to itself as much as anyone, so he nodded. "That, I'll accept," he said.

Connor's face brightened into a smug smile. "Does that mean that you'll visit Lux Aeterna sometimes?"

Harry couldn't help a smile of his own. "Yes, sometimes. I—" He paused abruptly, as something he'd learned in his visit to Silver-Mirror last weekend came back full force. "Connor," he asked, his voice gentle. "Would you permit me to tie the Potter properties to you personally, instead of to the earth, as they are now?"

Connor's face went blank with an obvious lack of comprehension. Mr. Proudfoot, though, gasped aloud. "Mr. Potter!" he scolded. "Er, Harry," he added, when Harry shot him a look. "That is a custom followed by Dark wizarding families! Linchpins are linked to the earth they stand on, enduring in a way that Dark properties never can. Surely you cannot want your brother to be sole heir to the Potter properties, and in such a way that he must designate a sole heir? You do not want to be the one responsible for changing the very nature of his inheritance, do you?"

"As a matter of fact, I do," said Harry. "Linchpins are stakes in a web that ties the northern goblins down. I want to free them. I am vates." His gaze went back to Connor's face. "But he's the one who must make the decision."

Connor chewed his lip. Harry waited, fairly confident. He knew that, two years ago, Connor would have rejected this idea the moment he heard that it was used by Dark families. But they were not sitting in a room from two years ago, thank Merlin, and Connor knew now that Harry wouldn't agree to accept anything but the Maze. His face slowly hardened, and then he nodded once.

"I'll agree to that," he said.

"Mr. Potter!" Mr. Proudfoot was obviously scandalized all over again. "It would entail your signing numerous forms, and speaking aloud a sacred, binding oath seven days from now, and creating a will that says you surrender your linchpin—"

"Oh," Connor said, leaning forward like a lion leaping on a zebra, "so I would have to go through you, then? It isn't something Harry could do after all?"

The color drained gradually from Mr. Proudfoot's face. Harry found it wonderful to watch. The solicitor looked down at the table, hemmed, hawed, tapped his fingers for a moment, and then flung up his hands. "Yes, yes, it is," he said.

“Wonderful.” Connor’s face brightened. “Then start filing the papers at once. And since seven days from now will be Saturday again, I can swear the oath with no trouble. Oh, and bring copies of the papers so that Harry can see he owns the Maze now.” He caught Harry’s eye, and added, “I want you to have them.”

“Fine,” Harry muttered.

Mr. Proudfoot made various woeful noises, but Connor refused to listen. He suggested several alternate courses, but Connor refused to take them. He attempted to persuade them that James, not to mention their Potter ancestors, wouldn’t have wanted it this way, but Connor stared at him, and Mr. Proudfoot flushed as slowly as he had paled, doubtless recalling that Connor had testified against his own father in front of the Wizengamot, and didn’t give two figs for what James wanted.

Harry was grinning as he stood. He had to get back to studying Ariadne’s Web, Merlin knew—five days of study so far hadn’t revealed anything he could use—but at least there was this mild triumph, of knowing that one linchpin would be removed from the northern goblins’ web. And it was two triumphs, if one counted Connor acting more like himself than a Potter heir.

Harry swore softly and bent over the book, a new one on the history of Greek witches in general, and the webs they might have woven to control the sirens and various other magical creatures. Another week had ground by, and he hadn’t had any luck with the books specifically about Ariadne’s Web. Perhaps some detail about the weaving of other nets would give him a hint, however.

So far, everything he’d discovered indicated that Charles was right: surround an Ariadne’s Web with a powerful ward also linked to the caster of the Web, and there was absolutely no way to get inside without a Portkey. But Harry refused to accept that. He would find a way through it. At least Charles and Thomas so far hadn’t contacted him to say that one of their children was dead or further hurt, and Harry was sure they would have done that if it’d happened.

Thunder screamed abruptly, and Harry blinked. He was studying in one of the classrooms on the fifth floor, and he'd forgotten the storm for a time. Now, he did pay attention to it, narrowing his eyes to stare out through the glass. He didn't envy Hufflepuff and Ravenclaw, who were playing their Quidditch match today.

In fact, he didn't envy anyone who had to be outside at the moment. The storms had come every other day at first, but it had been raining steadily since Wednesday. Snape had renewed the water-proofing spells on the dungeons, to make absolutely sure that they wouldn't flood, and all Care of Magical Creatures classes were being held in the Great Hall. Harry had spoken to the Many through the small snake who still wrapped securely about his throat, but they reassured him that the creatures of the Forbidden Forest were doing well enough; they were much better able to cope with harsh weather than wizards, after all.

Harry shook his head. So many problems, and I still don't know what Voldemort is doing to cause this level of disturbance in the weather.

He started to turn back to his book when a flourish of wings passed in front of his face. Harry started, and then saw a familiar gull hovering outside the window, beating at the glass desperately.

Harry Vanished the glass, let the gull fly inside, and then restored the window. He stared down at the dripping bird as she landed on the floor, looking half-waterlogged, and shivered absently in the flood of cold air that had entered with her. "Did you want something, Honoria?" he asked dryly. "You could have walked up to the school as a human, you know."

Honoria transformed back. Harry suffered an unpleasant flashback for a moment—the position in which she lay on the floor wasn't that far from the one in which she'd sprawled just after taking the Severing Curse for him in the Woodhouse battle—but she got up almost at once, and cast a warming charm on herself. She gave him a haughty look. "I found it b-bracing." The chatter of her teeth ruined the effect somewhat, and her haughty look became sheepish. A moment later, her soaked hair and streaming face vanished behind the illusion of perfectly arranged features, and she took a chair across from him, proud as a queen.

Harry rolled his eyes. She probably made it worse flying around outside to make sure I wasn't watching the Quidditch game, and then roaming from window to window in search of me. Idiot. "Was there something you wanted to ask me in person, then?" he asked. He and most of his allies had been communicating using Charles's spell lately, since it was faster than either owl or firecall, and Harry was determined not to forget his advantages again.

"Yes," said Honoria. "Or rather, something that magic requires me to ask in person. I'm calling in my life debt that you owe me from the Woodhouse battle."

Harry blinked. "All right, then. What do you want?"

Honoria leaned forward. "You said that Augustus Starrise is joining the alliance?" Harry nodded, wondering if she had come to ask him to persuade Augustus out of it. Honoria didn't say that, though. "I want you to try and reconcile him and Tybalt."

Harry closed his eyes. He knew Augustus better now, from several letters they'd exchanged, and of course he knew what Tybalt was like. He wasn't looking forward to this. "What was the cause of their disagreement in the first place?" He couldn't recall either Augustus or Tybalt specifically mentioning it.

"Tybalt got joined to John," said Honoria. "And John's Muggleborn. Augustus thinks Muggleborns are good enough to protect and say you like, but not good enough to bring into the family."

Harry groaned. So I'm up against pureblood bigotry. Great.

"Don't think of it as a problem," said Honoria brightly. "Think of it as a grand opportunity. After all, you'd have to confront the prejudices that the pureblood families carry sometime, right? This is practice."

Harry nodded wearily and stood, carefully putting the book on Greek magic aside. He did feel the urge, for just a moment, to say that life wasn't fair, and to ask Honoria to make her life debt watching him wrestle dragons or something similar.

But, if he hadn't asked for these burdens when he decided to be a leader, he hadn't put himself in a position to refuse them, either. He opened his eyes and smiled at Honoria. "Let's contact them, then, and tell them we want to meet."

Chapter Fifty: Waltzing Politics

Harry sighed as he folded Augustus Starrise's letter. At least the man had actually agreed to come and speak to his nephew at Hogwarts, instead of insisting that Tybalt and Harry go to the Starrise home. Harry knew it wouldn't have been neutral ground, couldn't have been, not after Augustus had kicked Tybalt out of it.

He shifted and cast a longing glance at the book on Greek witches on the other end of the library table. He'd spent the rest of Saturday writing to Augustus and arguing with Tybalt by means of the spell that Charles had taught him, trying to convince him to come to Hogwarts. It had taken hours to wear Tybalt down, and then he had only agreed to come if John could come with him and Honoria could be there. Harry had agreed, glad to win any kind of victory after hours of argument.

And then Augustus's letter had come this morning, full of pompous agreement to speak in negotiations because "he was not in the wrong," and he was sure that a conversation or two would show Harry that.

Harry sighed and glanced at the other letter waiting for him. It had the Ministry seal on it, and he knew it came from Scrimgeour. He didn't want to read it. Merlin knew what the Minister had discovered that required his attention, and required him to communicate with Harry about it.

"Harry?"

And there was Draco, threading in between the library tables with a determined expression on his face. Harry winced. Draco had accepted, over the last couple of weeks, that Harry was too busy researching Ariadne's Web to help him with his possession gift, save in scattered lessons, or even spend much time with him. But from the way he sat down on the chair at the other end of the table, his patience had just run out.

"Harry," Draco said, insistently.

“I’m paying attention,” Harry said quietly, and reminded himself that he had no right to complain. He had wanted this position of leader, at least to the extent that he hadn’t objected all that much when it fell on him, and he had commanded his allies’ help in battle and the Minister’s help in politics. And Draco had given him so much more than mere help. That all his debts were coming due at once was unfortunate, but no more than that. It was not a malicious conspiracy, and it was not evil, and he had no reason to feel dread coiling in his stomach as Draco stared at him.

What Draco said was completely unexpected, however, and rather ruined Harry’s attempts to keep a smooth mask.

“Have you spoken with Vera since that night we came back from the trial?”

Harry stared at Draco. “No?” he asked at last, but when Draco gave him a searching glance, he shook his head. “No. You know I haven’t. Why? Is something the matter with her?” He supposed Vera might have had to leave the school, if her gift had started to overwhelm her, but he couldn’t imagine her not coming and telling him if she had to.

“No.” Draco leaned forward. “And she hasn’t come to nag me about it, either. I just think that you should go and talk to her.”

Harry couldn’t help the snort that broke from him. “Sorry, Draco, I can’t. I have a meeting with Augustus and Tybalt Starrise—not to mention Tybalt’s partner and Honoria Pemberley—at noon.” He nodded to the Minister’s letter. “And that to answer, too. I’m not sure what Scrimgeour wants. Then I should get back to looking up material on Ariadne’s Web.” He eyed the book, but controlled his longing to reach for it. For all he knew, Scrimgeour’s letter could take hours to answer.

“What about this evening?” Draco persisted. “Surely your meeting with the Starrises ought to be over by then?”

Harry shrugged. “I don’t know how long it’ll take to persuade Tybalt and Augustus to reconcile. Probably longer than just today, though.”

“Then dismiss them if they’re still here when evening comes, and go talk to Vera,” said Draco firmly.

Harry frowned. “Are you sure she didn’t talk to you, Draco? It’s all right to say if she did. I know I’ve been neglecting her lately, but I don’t think I have much choice. I have to figure out how to break Ariadne’s Web.”

Draco leaned forward over the table and clasped his hand. “She hasn’t spoken to me about you, just about my own soul—”

“Really? What did she say?” Harry felt pleased. Draco quite obviously didn’t give himself enough credit for some of what he knew and was, but he would have to trust a Seer’s word on the subject.

Draco shook his head. “Oh, no. I am not getting you interested in something else, not when you’d just try to pursue it. My conversations with Vera are staying between her and me for right now. The point, Harry, is that I think you’ve started neglecting your own healing for the sake of others’.”

Harry lifted his head. “I didn’t! I promise, Draco, I haven’t. I meant what I said that night in the Room of Requirement. I’m not going backwards. I promise.” He felt a mild panic at the thought of Draco disbelieving him. Going through this change was something Harry had known would be hard, but if he had to go through it alone—he didn’t think he would have the strength to do it.

“Harry!” Draco’s free hand settled on his shoulder. “Harry, it’s all right,” he said softly. “Breathe. I don’t disbelieve you. I don’t think you’re going backwards. But you’re neglecting it, yes.”

Harry stirred restlessly and looked at the book again. “I have to figure out how to break Ariadne’s Web, Draco,” he said. “My allies’ children are trapped in that school, not to mention Greg and all of the others. No one should have to be at Bellatrix Lestrange’s mercy.” He shuddered as a memory of the graveyard bit him, and his left hand throbbed. He didn’t care that it wasn’t there; it still throbbed. “What kind of leader am I, if I don’t figure out how to break it?”

“You’ve looked for two weeks,” said Draco. “Do you really think there’s still something left to find? And I’m sure that Rosier-Henlin and Rhangnara are looking as well. Do you think they have less motivation than you do to find a solution? Harry, stop driving yourself mad over this. Think about something else. You can’t find a way past Ariadne’s Web right now. That’s all right. It’s all right. I promise.”

“And what if she kills one of them?” Harry clenched his hand shut until he saw Draco wince, and realized he’d injured him. He pulled his hand back at once, and shook his head, whipping his fingers through his fringe. “Sorry. Sorry. I’m sorry. I just—I have to do something.”

“You can’t,” said Draco softly.

Harry squeezed his eyes shut. Merlin, is he right? But admitting that felt like he was giving up without a fight. There had to be a solution, something he was overlooking. The thought of anyone at Bellatrix Lestrange’s mercy made him feel like someone had used the Entrail-Expelling Curse on him again, and even though he knew that was exactly the reason Voldemort had chosen to use children as his hostages, that didn’t make the feeling go away.

“Enough, Harry.” Draco moved up behind him and caught him in a close embrace. “I didn’t realize you were driving yourself this close to breakdown over it, and neither did Professor Snape, or he would have made you stop researching. Think about something else. There are other things happening.” He lowered his head and rubbed his cheek against Harry’s hair.

“I know that,” Harry whispered, turning his head so that he could rest his cheek on Draco’s chest. “But I need to think about and research Ariadne’s Web, and find time for them, too.”

“Harry.” Draco made it all but a command, now. “Leave it up to Rosier-Henlin and Rhangnara.”

“There might be books at Hogwarts that—”

“Then I’m sure the Headmistress wouldn’t deny them permission to come here and do the research,” said Draco firmly. “But you’re not going to do them or their children any good by worrying yourself into a frenzy. And if they're not contacting you begging or imploring you to do anything right now, then why do you think you have to?"

"I'm vates," whispered Harry. "It's a web. I have to break it."

"Not the moment you hear of it." Draco's arms clamped around his shoulders. "I mean it, Harry. Calm down and think about something else, or I'll speak to Rosier-Henlin and Rhangnara. You haven't talked to them at all in the last two weeks, have you? You decided that you absolutely had to solve the problem right away on your own? They didn't ask you to do this?"

"No, but the hostages are children, Draco—"

"And they're beyond your reach right now," Draco finished quietly. "That's the way it has to be, Harry. If it will make you feel better, select some books and send them to Rosier-Henlin and Rhangnara. But leave the task of research up to them. They're parents. They have all the love and worry needed in the world. You're going to have to start trusting your allies to do things on their own at some point, Harry."

Harry winced. He was remembering a conversation he and Draco had had summer before fourth year, when Draco had reminded him that some people might want to follow Harry, and he would have to let them, because it was their free will. This sounded suspiciously like that.

"I—I'll try," he whispered. The thought of the children was still tearing at him, but he recognized his own frustration from his childhood. Whenever he got upset, his effectiveness at training in spells and doing other things necessary to protecting Connor would go down. Right now, it was affecting the way he thought about other necessary tasks than breaking the web, and probably also the way he read the books. Intolerable as it was to leave the web intact for this long, it would be even more intolerable to miss something that could have helped the children at Durmstrang because he was flipping feverishly through the books instead of taking the time to absorb the information.

“Good,” Draco said, and held him for a moment. Harry let himself absorb the heat for as long as he could before the shivers of discomfort broke out and he had to sit up and move away. Draco sighed, but said nothing, just taking the seat across from him again and eyeing him intently.

“Promise me that you’ll speak with Vera this evening?”

Harry nodded. “I didn’t mean to stop,” he protested again. It was important that Draco understand that. “It’s just—other things came up.”

“Someday, I hope,” said Draco, his face easing back from its tightness, “you’ll learn that not everyone expects you to solve every problem, right now.” He let one hand brush along Harry’s shoulder, and then departed the library.

Harry watched him go, a feeling of determination growing in the pit of his stomach. Draco did so much for him—speaking words he couldn’t have been all that fond of speaking, or thought that Harry should have known already, since they were common sense; reaching out to him; refusing to abandon him in a fit of exasperation or temper until Harry actually did see sense.

He deserved better than Harry had been able to give him so far. But since Harry knew Draco wasn’t about to go anywhere, at least he could try to give Draco what he was able to give him.

Harry sighed the resolution out, then picked up the Minister’s letter. It was brief, as Scrimgeour’s letters tended to be, and to the point.

December 3rd, 1995

Dear Harry:

I require your help to make some important decisions. There are three people currently in Tullianum with whom you have some connection: Kingsley Shacklebolt, who tried to kill you; Fiona Mallory, who tortured your parents; and Homer Digne, who wrote articles to discredit you and also apparently permitted another member of the Order of the Phoenix to visit Dumbledore and free him so he could cast his spell. All of them are claiming they acted as they did because of Dumbledore's compulsion spell. I have to know if you are willing to press charges or not. Please come to the Ministry this afternoon if you are free. Enclosed is a Portkey that will bear you to my office anytime between noon and six-o'clock this evening.

Rufus Scrimgeour.

Harry sighed, and eyed the Portkey, a bottle cap, that tipped out of the envelope. That meant he would probably have to cut his meeting with Tybalt and Augustus Starrise short, in order to journey to the Ministry and talk to Scrimgeour, and could give them only a few hours.

Do you owe them more than a few hours?

Harry paused, and shook his head. That was a new thought, and in a new tone, one that might have been Vera's. He supposed he was only having it at all because of everything else he had to do. Circumstances were finally conspiring to make it impossible for him to do everything, much as he hated to admit it, so he would have to juggle and cut some things short, and if that meant not listening to Augustus and Tybalt rant at each other all day, so be it.

Honorina had not said, after all, that he had to reconcile the two proud and stubborn men or die trying. She had said only that she wanted him to do what he could to initiate a reconciliation.

Harry slid the Minister's Portkey into his pocket, wrote a brief note to tell him he'd be coming later in the afternoon that he would take to the Owlery in a moment, and scooped up the book on Greek magic. He would look through it, see if there was anything useful, and ask Charles where he should send it if there was. No, on second thought, he would speak to Thomas. Charles had said that he would be negotiating with old contacts in an effort to get a Portkey that would actually take them to Durmstrang, and might be at that and not want to be disturbed.

Harry set his mouth in a thin line. So this is the way it has to be. I can't do everything perfectly, because I'm not perfect. I'll do what I can, and ask others to live with it. If they can't, they can always withdraw from the alliance.

"Thank you for coming."

Augustus gave Harry a lazy smile, and kept his eyes perfectly trained on Harry's face. "Thank you for inviting me, my lord."

Harry grimaced at the title. "Please, none of that." He gestured to the large round table that took up the center of the Room of Requirement. The Room had seemed to know what they needed—in this case, a table that absolutely would not make anyone feel unequal to anyone else. "Have a seat. Your nephew, his partner, and Miss Pemberley should be here soon."

Augustus had started to sit down, but he paused, his face acquiring a light flush. "You did not say they would be here."

